i Scope, Procedure and Contents—The author touches on his purpose and procedure in 24:40-49; 33:16-19; 39:16-20, 38 f.: 50:29-31; 51:31-38. Having been given by the Lord a store of divine wisdom through study of the Scriptures and reflexion on life, he proposes to put it into writing, following at a distance the wise men who have gone before (Prov was especially his model). He calls on thoughtful men to ponder on his teaching and put it into practice. By doing so they will find the same wisdom he has found himself, and the same spiritual riches. The translator in the Prologue emphasizes the practical scope of the work, with its insistence on the Law as the divine guide to human life. This end is served by weaving together whole series of pithy sayings about life, summing up the fruits of study of the Scriptures, experience and mature reflection.

At intervals, however, there occur meditative passages of a more abstract character, where the nature of wisdom itself and its theological relations with God are expounded. The recurrence of such passages enables us to separate the strata which went to the building up of the book and make the following Outline of Contents: Part One—1:1-43:37, Wisdom considered in its ethical bearings on human life, and in its higher aspects and its relationship to God. Sub-divisions, on the basis just indicated, begin respectively at 1:1; 4:12; 6:18; 14:22; 16:24; 24:1; 33:7; 39:16. Part Two—44:1-50:31, Praises of the Ancients of Israel. Appendix—51:1-17, Prayer of Thanksgiving for Deliverance. Conclusion—51:18-38, Acrostic Poem showing the spirit in which wisdom is acquired and imparted.

397a Doctrinal Content—Dogmatic truths are pre-supposed rather than expounded. The Messianic Hope as embodying an explicit reference to an individual Messiah is found in 24:34, but only in Vg and without supporting context. But in the sense of a reliance on the promises made to Abraham, David and his successors, and an explicit recalling of the terms of these promises, it is found wherever the context calls for an expression of it. (See 36:10, 17, 18; 44:20-23; 45:31; 47:13, 24; 48:17.) The second coming of Elias as prophesied by Mal 4:5 is referred to in 48:10; and the everlasting glory destined for the temple of Zorobabel in 36:16 and 49:14. It is in his moral teaching, understood as including also those dogmatic truths which underlie God's guidance of the universe and his shaping of the moral life of man, that all that is deepest in the message of Ben Sirach is to be looked for. A convenient series of headings under which to summarize it is suggested by the arrangement of ch 24, the climax of his thought—here followed in reverse order (see commentary on 24). In this summary the wording of some verses is slightly modified to facilitate their being woven together effectively, and the distinction between Primary and Secondary readings is noted only where they are in doctrinal contrast.

Wisdom comes to Israel through the Law—All wisdom originates with God; but before he can impart it to men he must externalize it for them in his revealing word. This word of revelation is for men the fountain-head of wisdom (1:1-7). Its waters flow perennially in the Book of the Law, which bears within it vitalizing forces like the four rivers of Eden. Every moral precept and every ritual ordinance is a channel branching off from this great stream; and every faithful scribe is a cultivator bringing to mankind its life-giving waters (24:32-47; also 6:37; 15:1).

Wisdom and the Temple Worship—When it is said that the fear of the Lord is the beginning and the fullness of wisdom (1:16, 20) and conversely that the perfection of the fear of God is wisdom (21:13), the fear spoken of is the religious fear fundamental in the OT. It is that reverential awe of the divinity which brings home to man that God is the one supreme and worshipful being, and which expresses this conviction both by rendering him the worship he requires (a worship which for the Israelite is that prescribed in the Law), and by doing his will in the sphere of moral conduct. This fear is the beginning of wisdom in a twofold sense. First, this religious attitude itself is the soil in which wisdom takes root within the soul. And secondly, the observance of the ritual law, in the proper spirit (including therefore worthy moral dispositions), is the choicest fruit of that wisdom whose possession ensures man's enlightened co-operation with all God's plans. Hence Ben Sirach's eulogy of Aaron and his divinely bestowed priesthood (45:7-27; see 33:12). Hence, too, the transport with which he describes Simon the high-priest as he had often seen him, offering the sacrifice in full solemnity (50:12-23; see 47:9-12). The possession of this incomparable Service makes of Israel a priestly people, set apart among mankind for purposes of worship, like the oil of priestly consecration and the incense of the sanctuary (24:20 f.). And it is against this background that every Israelite is exhorted to 'fear' the Lord and reverence his priests, giving them their sacred dues (7:31-35).

Wisdom and Moral Conduct—Fundamental though worship is, right conduct is more fundamental still. The Law is essentially a moral law. Ritual observances which are not accompanied in the worshipper by a virtuous life and fitting inward dispositions are roundly denounced (2:18-23; 7:8-11; 34:21-35:22). From this root-principle stems that foliage of proverbial lore which bulks so large throughout the book. Its author enriches every portion of the vast field of the moral commonplace in which 'the ancients', especially the compiler of Prov, had already so shrewdly toiled (33:16-19; 39:1-3). (For lists of references under appropriate headings see Knabenbauer, 4; Lesêtre, 26-30.)

Wisdom and the Inner Life—Wise conduct in the broader fields of morality is within the reach of every prudent man, Israelite or not. But there is a choicer fruit of wisdom proper to the chosen people amongst whom wisdom dwells at home (24:12-16). This is the special favour of God bestowed on those he makes his friends (33:12); the special intimacy with him which they enjoy; the special sensitivity to what he desires and the will to fulfil it, cost what it may of hardship, which they study to perfect. This wisdom of the inner life is drawn first from the sacred books (38:39b-39:1; 397e see 24:32-47 and § 397b). Nor is it only as a record of God's words that Holy Writ inspires and instructs, but also as a record of his dealings with the Fathers, and of their surrender of themselves to be moulded to his purposes. This thought dominates chh 44-50.

The profound study of the Scriptures which this implies demands to a great extent renunciation of other occupations (38:25). But there is a higher step than mere professional devotion to scholarship and reflection. Wisdom comes in the long run only by the communion of mind with Mind. The thinker must grow into the contemplative. The spirit of man must immerse itself in the Spirit of God and commune with him in the give and take of loving conversation. He must give his heart to resort early to the Lord that made him and must pray in the sight of the Most High. For if the great Lord please he will fill him with the spirit of understanding and will direct his counsel and his knowledge: 'Come to me all ye that desire me, and be filled with my fruits; for my spirit is sweet above honey, and the possession of me above honey and the honeycomb. They that eat me shall hunger still, and they that drink me shall yet have thirst' (39:6-10; 24:26-29; see 51:18-27).

f This sweet familiarity is not bestowed until the seeker has been purified by trial in sense and in spirit. His quest involves a wrestling of the soul and a torment of the heart (51:25, 29): within, a sense of frailty and sin (22:23-23:6); without, a struggle against abandonment by friends and the treachery and violence of foes (51:3-10). 'When thou comest to the service of God prepare thy soul for trial. Take all that shall be brought upon thee, and in thy pain endure and in humiliation keep thy patience: for gold is tried in the fire and acceptable men in the furnace of humiliation' (2:1-5). 'For wisdom walks with a man by trials when she chooses him at first. She brings upon him fear and dread; she scourges him with the affliction of her discipline, until she tries him by her laws and trusts his soul. Then she strengthens him and gives him joy, and discloses her secrets to him and heaps upon him treasures of knowledge and of understanding' (4:18-21; see 6:25-32).

But 'her bonds are a healthful binding' (6:31), for they bind the soul to God, its Father and its Friend. He is the Father of every soul that rises to him in prayer (23:1, 4; 51:14). He also is its Friend, giving and inviting the love of friend for friend. This concept, based on Deut 6:5, is brought out clearly in the Primary Text, and repeatedly emphasized in the Secondary. (Primary: 1:10; 2:18, 19; 4:15; 7:32; 47:10. Secondary: 1:14; 2:10; 3:4; 13:18; 24:24; 25:16; 34:15.)

g Wisdom and Mankind at large—Wisdom, whilst dwelling in Israel as in its proper home (24:12 f.), was yet, in a measure fixed by God, poured out from the beginning upon all mankind (1:10; 24:9-11). Man was created in the image of God, a spiritual being endowed with intellect and will, holding the supremacy among created things, and bearing in his conscience the moral law which God had given him to guide his conduct (17:1-12). The moral responsibility thus imposed was matched by the endowment of free will. 'When God made man from the beginning he put him in the hand of his own counsel: If thou wilt thou shalt keep the commandments. Death and life are before a man; that which he wills shall be given him' (15:14-18 after Heb.). The object here is to prove that God is not responsible for sin. Man is responsible, by abusing his free will. What then is responsible for man's abuse of this divine endowment? Ben Sirach does not say it is the Fall of man. His paraphrase (17:1-12) of Gen 2 stops short of the Fall. In 25:33 he says 'From a woman was the beginning of sin, and because of her we all die'. But beginning here is taken numerically: the first recorded sin is that of Eve. It is not said to have a causal influence on the sins of her posterity. As regards the consequences of the Fall, Ben Sirach does not go beyond the data of Gen 2:16-19, viz. it results in the yoke of affliction which is laid upon the children of Adam, and results eventually in death (40:1-8). 397g

As to sin, Ben Sirach traces it to a twofold root within the human soul. (1) The inherent defectibility of every man by the very fact of his creaturehood. 'All things cannot be in men, because the son of man is not immortal; all men are earth and ashes. What is man and what good is he? A drop of water in the sea or a pebble on the sand, so are his few days in the day of eternity' (17:29, 31; 18:7, 8). (2) But there is a more sinister element in man: an inherent propensity to moral evil. 'He that keepeth the Law subdueth his impulse' (21:12, Syr.); 'The sun faileth, and how much more man, who hath the inclination of flesh and blood' (17:30); 'God sees the presumption of men's heart, that it is wicked' (18:10 Vg); 'O wicked propensity, wherefore wast thou formed, to fill the face of the world with deceit?' (37:3, Heb. emended). The Heb. here underlying impulse, inclination, presumption, propensity, is yēser, the word translated 'counsel', i.e. free will, in 15:14 above. In the abstract, the yēser is free will, regarded as something ontologically good and morally indifferent. In the concrete, however, experience shows that man habitually misuses his free will; it shows itself in practice as impaired. This misuse of it so predominates that Rabbinism eventually came to use the term yēser exclusively in a pejorative sense, to describe that strong inclination to evil which St Paul later traced to original sin. Ben Sirach does not trace it back so far. He is satisfied to explain sin as due, not to God, but to man's misuse of a good thing God has given him; and to explain that misuse itself as arising from a moral defectibility, and still more from a moral disorder, in the sinner's own make-up. Why this is found in every man, he leaves unexplained. The sad fact remains: 'We all of us are guilty' (8:6); 'as a lion lies in wait for prey, so does sin for workers of wickedness' (27:11; see 21:3). Every man is thus a Satan to himself, and 'when the wrongdoer curses the Adversary it is himself he curses' (21:30). No man therefore can say 'My transgression is from God', for God hates sin and did not make it (15:11). He made, however, the power of free will, and made the very action whose concomitant defect is sin. For he is the cause of everything that is; and everything that is, is good (18:1; 39:21, 39). He even made those things which scourge sinners for their wickedness, for the punishment of sin is good (11:11-30; 33:7-15).

Sin is evil. But out of evil God draws good in many ways. (1) The sinner's frailty is of itself a claim on God's compassion. 'God is patient with men and pours forth his mercy upon them. He compassionates and teaches and corrects, as a shepherd does his flock' (18:8-14). (2) In the Law he gives guidance to avoid sin, and the practice of the Law gives moral stamina to keep sin's stirrings in control (11:15, 17; 15:15 f.; 21:12). (3) Consciousness of propensity to sin is an occasion of prayer, and prayer wins grace to overcome it, so that with God's help a man can 'flee from sin as from the face of a serpent' (22:33-23:6; 21:2). (4) Thus it is an occasion of merit also. 'Blessed is the man that is found without blemish. Tried and found perfect, he shall have glory. Able to transgress and not transgressing, able to do evil and doing it not, his good is established and all the congregation shall declare his praise' (31:8-11). (5) And even when sin has been yielded to, repentance for it draws men closer to God, and amendment cancels its effects (17:20-28; 34:30 f.; 35:5).

But evil not repented of, God sees and punishes. 'He judges everyone according to his works; the sinner shall not escape with his plunder, and whoever does righteousness shall have his reward. Their iniquities are not hid from him, and their sins are in his sight; and afterwards he shall rise up and render them their recompense' (16:16-20; 23:25-29; 17:13-19; 42:18-20).

What is the nature of that recompense? The Primary Text expresses the older view that the wrong-397j doer is punished in this life. After death he is punished only in the sense of leaving no children, or only such as are to his discredit, so that his name is blotted out (40:15; 41:8-10). In the same way the just man will be rewarded by prosperity here below, even should he first have to undergo a period of purifying trial (1:13). And after his death worthy children and a name long held in honour will carry on his reputation and be a permanent reward (30:4-6; 37:28 f.; 41:14-16; 44:13-15). In the Secondary Text, however, sanctions after death of a truly personal and lasting kind are clearly spoken of. 'The examination of all is in the end' (16:22). 'The gathering together of sinners is like tow gathered together, and the end of them is a flame of fire. The way of sinners is made smooth from stones, but the end thereof is the pit of Hades, and darkness and pains' (21:10 f.). The underlined phrase, which is Secondary, changes the complexion of what precedes; as does the Secondary addition to 7:19 (see comm.). The righteous man, likewise, is rewarded after death. He shall enter the world of the Holy Ones (the 'holy age' of 17:25; 24:46; see in comm. Syr additions to 1:22 and 18:8). There he shall enjoy 'the reward of God which continues for ever' (18:22): 'life everlasting' (24:31); a life whose delight is drawn from gazing upon God (6:23; 15:8).

k Wisdom in the Universe—Man is made in God's image, and has dominion over other living things (17:1-4). The larger world of nature has a meaning as a parable and an instrument of God's dealings with mankind (33:7-15; 39:26-37). But the world has also a value apart from man (17:31). The sweep of God's power through the firmament, the penetration of his glance to the heart of the Deep, the reflexion of his beauty and the imprint of his skill in the innumerable armies of being that fill earth and sky and sea, the resistless energy with which he holds all these together and draws them forward to their goal—these are manifestations of the Lord which man in his littleness cannot convey nor even comprehend. It is fitting, therefore, that God should from the beginning 'pour out his wisdom upon all his works' (1:10).

Wisdom, thus, can speak of itself as the medium of his creating, sustaining and energizing power throughout the universe. 'Like a cloud I hung above the earth; I circled round the vault of heaven, my path lay in the depth of the abyss, upon the waves of ocean did I walk' (24:6-9a). Ordered variety, purposive and unailing energy are the characteristics wisdom stamps upon the works of God. 'In making them he gave to each its part. He set an everlasting order on his works. They hunger not nor tire, and cease not from their operations, nor does any of them cross his fellow or ever disobey the Lord's command' (16:25-29). To grasp something of what God's revelation of himself in nature meant to Israel's sages, the Hymn to the Creator (42:15-43:37) must be read and pondered, alive as it is with spiritual and aesthetic sensitivity, vibrant with awe and adoration, aglow with love that strives for utterance, groping for the Word as yet ungiven. 'Even his Holy Ones have not power to recount his wondrous works. All his works are truly lovely, and all that we can see is but a spark. And he himself surpasses all his works. Exalt him all you can, yet will he overtop your utmost praise. Set to and grow not weary, and yet he will outstrip you. Who can see him, who can express him, who can sound his praises as he is?' (42:17, 23; 43:29-35).

l Wisdom and God—'The Lord upon his throne alone is wise' (1:8, Gk); wise of his very nature. Wisdom is with him (1:1), and when regarded as distinct from him, originates within him and from him comes forth (1:1; 24:5). It is with him from eternity (1:1). Its eternity, however, is of that purely relative kind which the Heb. ʾōlām frequently expresses—pre-existence as compared with other things (1:4; 24:14). For, in fact, wisdom was created (1:4, 9; 24:12, 14). But once created it is to last for ever. 'From the beginning was I created, and unto the world to come I shall not cease to be' (24:14; cf. 1:5). This creation of wisdom as something distinct from God was effected by his utterance of a word. The creative word which brought all other creatures into being, which first 'came forth from the mouth of the Most High' (24:5), was itself the externalizing of that wisdom which had hitherto been identical with God himself. Henceforth wisdom as distinct from God exists, and is the medium of his dealings with the world (42:15 and 43:28 as in comm. See 39:37).

Besides being just a 'word', the medium of God's external operations, is wisdom a person? The texts show a gradation in this respect. In 6:25-32 wisdom is personified purely as a figure of speech, as the concluding phrases show. In 14:23-27 no advance on this is perceptible. The passage merges into 15:1-8 where, whilst 'her' personality takes on more concrete attributes, the note of metaphor is still predominant. It is an advance on this to present wisdom speaking of herself, as in 4:16-22 (Heb.). But it is of what happens in and to wisdom's votary that the passage speaks, not of wisdom's personality itself. The crucial passage is 24:1-31, where wisdom speaks in her own name, describing what she is and what she does. We have here a unity of concept, not merely of image. It is the concept of God's giving of himself in and to the world which he has made. Wisdom is presented as God's revelation of himself in nature his handiwork, and in man his image. It is his revelation of himself also in the teaching which he gives in the sacred writings, and in the moral law which he implants in every heart. It is his inward giving of himself, too, to those he loves: in the form of the light which makes them know him as a friend, and in the form of the impulse from on high which makes them respond in prayer to his advances, rendering him their service and giving him their friendship in return. Wisdom is thus neither an abstraction nor just a single attribute of God. It is his many-sided self-bestowing, personified to make it comprehensible. But it is not personalized. It is not here presented as an hypostasis of God, coming to men to bring them the divine. Not yet. But in the growing light of revelation these inspired reflexions on what God has begun to do for men, and on what he is calling them to, will soon be seen to adumbrate an ineffable fulfilment. One short step and the Wise Men of the Old Testament will stand upon the threshold of the New. The Son of Sirach will pass the pen to the Son of Thunder.

N.B.—Round brackets () in the commentary signify an omission to be made in DV.

Prologue—A spurious prologue of little value 'by an uncertain author' is given by AV and by some ed. of Vg, e.g. SSCC, 17, 681. It comes from the Gk of Pseudo-Athanasius, Synop. Scrip. Sac. (PG 28, 376 f.; Hart, p. xviii). The genuine prologue, though not canonical, is the authentic work of the grandson of Ben Sirach. It falls into four paragraphs. (1) 'The knowledge . . . wisdom, and since they that read them must not only become adept themselves, but in their learning should also by speech and writing be of use to those outside.' Israel has received a treasure in the Scriptures. Her learned men have a corresponding duty to pass on the knowledge of them to the less favoured, the Jews of the Dispersion. (2) '(Therefore) my grandfather . . . learn, being instructed in these things, may progress more and more by living according to the Law.' In fulfilling the duty outlined in (1), 'Jesus', i.e. Ben Sirach, composed his work on a scriptural basis, treating of wisdom with the practical aim of helping his readers to live according to the Law of Moses. (3) 'I entreat . . .' The translator asks his readers to remember the practical aim of the book, and to be indulgent to the imperfections which any Gk translation of a Heb. original must exhibit. For the significance of the references here and in (1) and (2) to 'the Law, the prophets, and the rest of the books', and to the existence of Gk translations of them, see §§ 12a-d and 23g-k. (4) 'For b I 1-IV 11 Eulogy of Wisdom; Man's Duties to God, his parents, his neighbour.

I 1-10 Wisdom's Origin from God—(Heb. text is not available before 3:10.) For the doctrine of the passage see § 397f, where 1, 4, 9 are explained. 2. 'Who shall number . . . and the days of eternity? . . .' Only God can do these things, for he alone possesses wisdom in its fullness. See 8, 9. Heaven, earth, abyss, are divisions of the universe according to Heb. cosmogony (Gen 1). 3 is a doublet of 2b, 4a. 5. The fountain-head from which wisdom comes to men is the word by which God creates the world and reveals himself. The 'ways' or channels through which its life-giving waters flow down to men are God's commandments, especially in the Law of Moses. (See 24:32 ff.; 33:3, Heb.; § 397b). This verse is Secondary, but its doctrine is that of 42:15; 43:26. 6. To whom has God's self-manifestation in nature and revelation been granted? 8-10 give the answer. 7. Doublet of 6. 8. 'There is one wise, greatly to be feared, sitting upon his throne, the Lord.' He alone is wise in himself, but he has communicated his wisdom to creatures. 9. 'He created her () and saw her and numbered her ().' He externalized his wisdom in the word which was his creative medium; in that word he 'saw' or possessed all his wisdom in so far as it was to be imparted to creatures; he then portioned it out to different branches of creation. In the holy ghost 'is Secondary, after Wis 1:4-7. 10. 'According to his gift'; in measured quantity, to the material universe and to mankind in general; but 'to them that love him', i.e. to Israel, he gave unstintingly (Gk).

c I 11-II 23 Wisdom and the Fear of the Lord—Wisdom taking root in men, and their response to it, are now described; chiefly applicable to the Chosen People. The fear of the Lord by which they respond is explained in § 397c. 14, 15. Secondary. 16a. 'Beginning': its root and choicest fruit. See § 397c. 16b. 'The faithful' are the Israelites, whose patrimony wisdom is. 16c. 'Among faithful men she hath been established from of old.' Meaning as 16b. 18, 19, 23, doublets of 12, 13, 9, 10. 22. After this verse Syr. adds 12 vv describing the future reward of the wise or virtuous man. It is said to be 'an eternal crown and eternal righteousness among the holy ones'; 'life as an eternal heritage'; 'being inscribed in the book of life.' See § 397j. 24-26. Fear of the Lord brings wisdom, honour and long life. 27-30. It brings patience and self-control. 31-33. It accompanies the true worship of God. 34, 35. It ensures fidelity to his Law, and meekness towards fellow-men.

1:36-2:23. To fear the Lord means to serve him; dispositions necessary for this. 36-40. Hypocrisy is ruled out. 36. 'Be not disobedient . . .'. II 1-6. To serve the Lord brings trials, which call for constancy. 1. 'Prepare thyself to be tested.' 'Soul' is a Hebraism for 'self'. 'Temptation': test or trial. 2. 'Control thy heart . . . and run not when calamity comes.' 7-13. Faith, hope and love, towards God, are necessary, based on his fidelity and compassionate forgiveness of sins. 10. Secondary, completing the triad of virtues. 14-17. Woe to the heart that is insincere or fickle. 14. See 1:36. 18-23. True fear and love of God do his will and trust his mercy. 18. ' . . . will not be disobedient to his words . . .'. 22. 'If we do not penance . . .': Secondary addition. See § 396g.

d III 1-IV 11 Fear of God expressed in Acts of Virtue—III 1-18. Filial piety. 1. Vg only. 4. Secondary. 10. (Heb. text begins to be available.) 16. 'Repaid thee for thy sins': filial piety will merit forgiveness of sin. Doublet of 17a. 19-26. A due sense of one's limitations. 24b. Doublet of 22d. 26. 'For many are the speculations of the sons of men, and ill imaginings lead astray.' A rebuke to Greek philosophizing. 27-32. The stubborn heart and the wise heart: a contrast. 27a. 'Fare evil.' 'Fear evil' is a misprint in some edd. of DV. 27b. 'But he that loveth good things shall be led by them.' 3:33-4:11. Kindness to the poor and afflicted. 33. 'expiates sins'. See 7:36; 29:15-17; Dan 4:24; Tob 4:7-12. IV 6. 'For the plaint of him that crieth in bitterness of soul.' 9b, 10. 'and be not harshminded in judgement. Be a father to the fatherless'. 11b. 'And he will have mercy on thee and save thee from the grave': will reward thee with long life.

IV 12-VI 17 Wisdom's Hardships and Rewards; 399a Thoughts on Conduct. IV 12-22. Wisdom's Good Things, and her severe training. 12. A heading for what follows. 'Wisdom instructs her children and exhorts all those who give her heed.' 13-15. Wisdom and the inner life: a bond between the soul and God, bringing life, glory, blessing and love. 18. 'They that love her love life, and they that seek her find grace from the Lord.' 14. 'They that hold her fast find glory from the Lord, and abide in the blessing of the Lord.' 15. 'They that serve her serve the Holy One, and God loveth them that love her.' 16-22. How wisdom trains her clients. In Heb. wisdom speaks in the first person: for her read me, for she read I. For the doctrine see § 397f. 21, 22. A reference to Solomon's defection. See 47:15-23. 23-31 Sincerity in Speech—27. 'thy neighbour to thine own detriment': undue servility. 32-36. Contrasts in conduct. 31a goes with 32b: the facts will sweep away our words if we deny that we are sinners. 31b, 32a go together: 'Prostrate not thyself for a fool to tread on, and accept not the person of the mighty.' Sense as 27. 33a. 'Strive for justice with thy soul': doublet of 33b. 'And even until death fight for justice': constantly, all your life long, let principle not partiality be your guide.

V 1-10 Against presuming on God's Forbearance—1. b 'Trust not in thy wealth and say not "I have power".' 1b is a doublet of 10. 5. 'About forgiveness be not confident, adding sin upon sin.' Do not go on sinning, presuming on eventual forgiveness by God. Future forgiveness is spoken of, not past. 8-10. Against presumptuous delay in turning to God. 5:11-6:4. Wise self-control in speech and conduct. 11, 12. Against being guided by expediency rather than truth. VI 1 continues 5:18. 'Deal justly alike with the small and the great, and instead of . . .'. 2. Control of passion. 'Yield not thyself to the power of passion, lest it eat up thy strength like a bull.' 'Passion': Heb. nepes lit. soul (2, 4) means the soul as the seat of bodily appetites.

6:5-17. Friendship, false and true. 5-7. Care in choosing friends. 8-13. False friendship. 9b. He will betray your confidences (see 6). 11. 'In thy prosperity he shall be as thyself, but in thy misfortune he shall desert thee.' 12. 'When misfortune comes he shall turn against thee and hide himself from thee.' 13. Pseudo-friends are meant. 14-17. True friendship.

VI 18-XIV 21 The Quest of Wisdom; cautions about social relationships—18-32. Its Hardships and Rewards—21. 'How repellent is she to a fool.' The 'fool', as usually in wisdom literature, is the man culpably devoid of religious insight and moral feeling. 23a. 'Discipline' is according to her name, and comes not easy to many.' Possibly a play on the words mūsār 'discipline' and mōšer 'fetter' (see 25, 30). 23b. 'She continueth even to the sight of God.' Secondary, reflecting an advanced idea of next-world happiness (see 15:8 and § 397j). 26. Wisdom's discipline is a yoke (see 51:34). 29-32. The seeker's toil rewarded by a deeper spiritual life, and success as a teacher (see 51:18-38). 33-37. Frequent the company of the wise. 35. 'and let no proverb of wisdom escape thee'. 37d. 'And the wisdom thou desirest shall be given thee.' The verse shows the Law ('precepts') and the 'commandments' as a source of wisdom (see 24:32 ff. and § 397b).

VII 1-IX 23 Social Relationships—1-11. On avoiding b

400b ambition and presumption. 2. 'Depart from iniquity and it shall . . .'. 7b. 'And do not ruin thyself with the people': by corrupt use of power. 8-11. Presuming on God's forgiveness without amendment of life. 11. See 34:23 and § 397d. 12-20. Some social virtues. 15b. See Mt 6:7 with 26:44. 16. 'Ordained': see Gen 2:5, 15; 3:17. 17-19. Act virtuously, for God punishes vice. 19b. 'For the expectation of man is worms': a motive for humility is the thought that the body is destined to corruption. The Secondary Text expands to 'punishment (on the flesh) of the wicked is fire and worm', referring to punishment in the next life. 20. 'for gold of Ophir' see 3 Kg 9:28; Job 22:24 (Heb.); 28:16; BDB s.v. 21-30. Household and family virtues. 21. Deprecates divorce; see 28; contrast 25:36. 22, 23. Servants. Refers to Ex 21:2; Lev 25:39-43; Deut 15:12-15. 25. 'Hast thou sons? Train them and give them wives in their youth' (see 27). 26 f. Unmarried daughters, by oriental social custom, are to be strictly treated, and husbands are chosen by the father. 28. See 21. 29. 'the pangs of thy mother'. 31-40. Duties of religion. 31-35. To reverence and support Levites and priests is an act of the fear and love of God, and is commanded by the Law. 34, 35. The sacrificial portions prescribed for their support. 36-39. Works of mercy: to give alms, respect the dead, comfort mourners, visit the sick. 36. See Deut 14:28, 29; 26:11, 12, etc. 37b. 'And deny not respect to the dead.' 'Respect' was shown by mourning for them and burying them fittingly (38:16-18), by showing solicitude for their dependants and their good name, and—as revelation progressed (see 2 Mac 12:43)—by offering prayer and sacrifice on their behalf (see Tob 1:19 ff.). 40. 'Thy last end.' For Primary Text, the punishment which would overtake the sinner before death; for Secondary, death and subsequent judgement (see Eccl 11:9-12:7 and § 397j).

c VIII 1-22 On dealing with Various Classes of men—20. 'for they cannot keep thy secret'. IX 1-23. Cautions, mainly about women. 12. 'Sit not at table . . . nor recline upon the elbow with her.' Refers to reclining at table; DV mistranslates as 'bed' Vg cubitum which means 'elbow'. 13. 'And revel not with her . . . in thy blood thou go down to the grave': blood vengeance by the injured husband (see Lev 20:10; Deut 22:22). 14-23. Various social relationships. 17. 'Knowing that unto the grave he shall not go unpunished': the older view, retribution before death. 20. 'walking upon nets'. 21. 'cherish thy neighbour'.

d IX 24-XI 6 Human Greatness, false and true. 24 ff. Good government. X 5. 'the person of the leader'. 6-22. Pride goes before a fall. 7b. 'And all oppression is offensive to both.' 8. The fate of Babylonia, Persia, Macedonia, etc. (see 17-21). 11, 12. Heb. probably means 'A little sickness mocks the physician: a king today and tomorrow a corpse.' 13. 'inherit corruption and worms, vermin and creeping things' (see 7:19, Primary Text). 14, 15a. The temptation of rulers is to forget that they have a Ruler. To turn from God belongs essentially to pride, whilst in other sins it follows as a consequence. 15b. 'For the reservoir of pride is sin, and its well-head gushes forth wickedness.' From the reservoir which pride brings into being in the soul, all kinds of sin flow out. Vg is true to this sense: 'Pride is the beginning of all sin.' 16-21. God's dealings with the proud peoples of biblical history; a commentary on 8, parallel to 16:7-10. Sodom and Gomorrah, and the Canaanites, are in mind. 22. The moral: pride ill befits man's lowly origin. 23-27. True greatness is based on the fear of God, here taken in its broadest sense (see § 397c). 10:28-11:6. True greatness and false. 28. To be wise (god-fearing) is true nobility, 'and a prudent man will not murmur (at this)'. 29b. 'And boast not in the time of distress', about what might have been; the facts, as 30 adds, show the hollowness of such boasting. 33. 'glorified for his wisdom'. 34b. 'And he that is inglorious in wealth, how much more in poverty!' XI:1. See 39:4. 2-4a. Judge not by appearances: 2 whether 'looks', 3 or size (see 1 Kg 16:7), 4a or apparel. 4b-6. For God 400d can in an instant reverse the externals on which men's estimates are based. 5. 'Many downtrodden have sat' (see Ps 104:17-22; 1 Kg 9:21). 6. See 1 Kg 15:28, 35. XI 7-XIV 21 Miscellaneous Cautions—discretion in conduct, the poor and the rich, the certainty of death. 7-10. Meddlesomeness. 10. 'And if thou dost, thou shalt not escape the penalty.' 11-30. The possession of good things depends ultimately on God; he gives them in the long run only to the just. 11. 'There is a man that . . .'. 12. 'Again there is a destitute man.' 13, 14. Man's lot in this life does not ultimately depend on his own ability or efforts, but on the overruling providence of God. (15, 16. Secondary; see after 24.) 17. But in point of fact it is God's will to give them in stable fashion only to the just: 'and his good-pleasure grants lasting success'. 18-20. A little parable. Lk 12:16-21 is closely parallel. 21-24 draw the conclusion from 17, viz. 21. 'Be steadfast in thy task', i.e. of doing right, even in distress; 22 'marvel not' that sinners seem to prosper; 'but trust in the Lord and wait for his light', 23, 24 for he will redress the balance in the long run. 15, 16. Secondary addition, giving a deeper meaning to the traditional teaching on God's reward of the just as contained in the Primary Text. The addition is found in Heb. Vg Syr., and in Secondary Gk MSS. 15b. 'Love and upright ways are with him.' 16. 'Folly and darkness are formed for sinners.' Besides outward things like fortune, life, etc. (13, 14), there is an inward and spiritual 'gift' (17), which makes man what he truly is and gives him value in God's sight. This gift includes wisdom, moral training and character, knowledge of the Law, love of God, and 'upright ways' of conduct (15). These are not withdrawn irrespective of man's conduct and for inscrutable reasons, as material good things are. Their possession is related to man's conduct and character. From sinners, they are withdrawn, leaving them to folly, darkness, evil (16). When men use them well they abide with them and give them that success that is everlasting (17). 25-30. The thought of the Primary Text continued: good fortune and bad are essentially transient. 30. 'Call not any man happy before death, for a man is known by his end.' 31-36. Beware of strangers. 33b. 'And on what is praiseworthy he will lay a blot.'

XII 1-7 Discretion in Almsgiving. 8-19. False friendship—10b. 'For as brass his wickedness rusteth.' 13. 'Who will pity a (snake-) charmer struck . . .'. 14b. 'If thou go down he will not last.' 18b. 'Will trip up thy feet.' 19. 'Wag his head': a gesture of derisive triumph (see 13:8; Ps 21:8; Mt 27:39). 'Whisper', conspiring against thee. XIII 1-30. The poor and the rich: fellowship between them is ill-advised, as liable to be unequal and insincere. The 'rich' spoken of are the worldly-minded rich. 8. 'Kettle': a brass cauldron (see Ez 24:3, 6); hence the saying explains itself. 8. 'When he seeth thee he will pass thee by and wag his head at thee' (see on 12:19). 22. 'What fellowship hath a hyena with a dog?' There is a natural enmity between the shepherd's dog and the hyena that skulks about the flocks, on the watch for a straying sheep (see Job 30:1; Is 56:10). 26. 'When a rich man speaketh.' 27. 'The poor man speaketh.' 30b. 'And poverty is evil which is the consequence of impiety.' 31 ff. Sayings on joy and sadness.

XIV 3-10 The miseries of the niggard—8, 10. 'Evil eye' is Heb. idiom for envy (see Mt 20:15); here it is the miser's envy of others' wealth. 11-21. 'Death is not slow', therefore let us do good while we have time. 12b. 'And that the covenant of Sheol hath not been shown to thee.' You have not come to terms with Sheol (the grave, death; see on 17b) and it will inevitably claim you for its own. Contrast Is 28:15. 12c. 'And the everlasting decree is "Thou shalt surely die".' 16. 'And indulge thy soul': carpe diem. 17a. 'Before thy death do good'; doublet of 13a. 17b. 'For in Sheol there is no delight.' Sheol is the underworld of OT eschatology. According to the 400g older view here presented (but transcended in Secondary Text throughout), it was a place where all souls went after death, and remained in a state of suspended animation, unaffected by pleasure or pain (see § 397j).

401a XIV 22-XVI 23 The Pursuit of Wisdom; principles of moral conduct—14:22-27. The eagerness and perseverance demanded of the seeker after wisdom: a series of metaphors. 26. 'He sets his nest in her foliage and lodges in her branches.' 27. 'and dwells in her habitation'. XV 1-10. The benefits which wisdom will bestow on her follower. 1. 'He that feareth the Lord will do this, and he that holdeth fast the Law shall lay hold on her.' 2b. 'As a wife married of a virgin.' Some edd. of DV read 'from a virgin'. The expression corresponds to 'the wife of thy youth' in Prov 5:18; Is 54:6; Mal 2:14, 15: the wife whom a man marries in early manhood and with whom mutual attachment grows stronger as life advances. Such is the attachment between wisdom and her followers, resembling, too, the understanding guidance and support of 'an honoured mother'. 3c, 4a. 'And he shall be made strong by her . . . and he shall hold her fast . . . 7-10. Sinners and 'fools' (see on 6:21) shall not possess wisdom. 8. 'But men that speak truth . . . to end of the verse is Secondary, with its exalted view of the ultimate reward of wisdom, 'the sight of God' (see 6:23 and § 397j). 10a. 'Wisdom came not forth to him from God', i.e. was not imparted to the sinner, who therefore gives no true praise to God. 10b-c. 'By the mouth of the wise man praise is uttered, and he who masters (wisdom) shall teach her.'

b XV 11-21 Free Will and Responsibility for Sin—In not imparting wisdom to the sinner, is God responsible for sin? The answer follows, logically developed. Some of the points it presupposes are more fully indicated in 17:1-12—man's spiritual nature and faculties, God's making known to him of the moral law with its sanctions. 11a. The blame for sin is not to be thrown on God. 'Say not "From God is my transgression"'. 11b. For God hates sin, 'and he doth not the thing he hateth'. 12. His hatred of sin is not ineffective, as if he were constrained to cause or permit sin for providential purposes. 'Say not "It is he that caused me to fall"', for he hath no need of wicked men.' 13. On the contrary, he gives men help to keep clear of sin, and they who fear him can and do avoid it. 'The Lord hateth evil and abomination (), and to them that fear him he lets it not draw nigh.' 14. Nor can it be argued that God is responsible in that he created man with a nature already flawed. As he left the hand of God man was endowed with the good gift of free will. 'God created man from the beginning (), and set him in the power of his free will.' After beginning Heb. inserts 'and placed him in the power of that which carries him away (lit. his snatcher away)'. This is not found in Vg Gk Syr., and is apparently a gloss explanatory of the phrase which follows and from which it does not differ in meaning. 'Free will' is in Heb. yēser. The root verb means 'to form, devise, plan' or 'purpose'; cf. BDB s.v. The noun elsewhere in the Bible means the form or framing of a thing; and that which is devised or determined on by the mind. In New Heb. it 'is common in sense of impulse: . . . of good and bad tendency in man' (BDB 428). In rabbinical writings it usually means an inherent propensity to evil. But in the present context it has a 'neutral sense' (Box), best rendered by 'free will'. This translation is supported by Gk διαβούλιον 'deliberation, determination', and Vg consilium 'counsel'. As 16-18 show, this endowment places it in man's power to choose moral good or evil, and their consequences; and here lies the answer to the question posed. See more fully in § 397h. 15. In Vg only.

16. God gave man helps to use his free will to choose the morally good; he embodied it in commandments, which he made known to man. 'If thou wilt, thou shalt keep the commandments, and the practice of fidelity is his good pleasure.' For 'commandments' see on 17:9-12; 21:12. 17. As further helps God added sanctions to his moral law, rewards for observing it, punishments for breaking it. 'Water and fire are set before thee, stretch forth thy hand to which thou wilt.' Water and fire are figures of reward and punishment. Possibly Deut 28-30 was in mind. Cf. Deut 28:11, 12, 21, 24. The outlook is the older one, of material rewards and punishments. 'Fire' here has no eschatological significance. 18 continues the thought of 17: 'Before man is life and death (), that which he wills shall be given him.' The phrase 'good and evil' is a gloss; it refers to good and evil fortune as moral sanctions. Man is free to make his choice; but now, in choosing sin he also chooses its punishment, and in choosing good he chooses its reward. 19, 20. And these sanctions will inevitably follow, for God is wise to see 'every work of man' (20), and 'strong in power' (19) to requite. 21. Conclusion: the sinner's accusation of God (11 f.) is unfounded. God makes no one sin, commands no one to sin, gives leave or power to no one to sin. 'He commanded no man to sin, and he gave not strength to men for falsehood.' 'Falsehood' here is infidelity to the moral law, the opposite of the 'fidelity' of 16b.

15:22-16:6. The misfortune of having ungodly children. XVI 5. See Gen 15:5; Is 51:2. 16:7-23. The certainty of the punishment of sin. 7-11. Illustrated from biblical history (see 10:16-21). 7. 'And in a disobedient nation wrath flamed out' (see Num 16:35; Ps 2:12, 13). 8. The Flood (see Gen 6:4; Wis 14:6). 9. Sodom and Gomorrah (Gen 19:24 ff.; Ez 16:49 [their pride]). 10. 'He had not pity on the accursed nation': extirpation of the Canaanites. 11a. The murmurers during the Exodus (Num 14). On the figure 600,000 see § 197c, and cf. Num 1:45 f.; 11:21; 14:22 ff.; Eccles 46:10. 11b. Individuals too are punished. 'And if only one be stiffnecked, it is a wonder if he escape unpunished.' 15. 'Everyone that does rightly shall receive his reward, and every man shall receive from him according to his works.' 16-23. Folly of the sinner in thinking to elude judgement. Parallel to 23:25-29. 21 continues the thoughts of the fool: 'If I sin no eye beholds it, if I secretly deal falsely, who will know it?' 22. Still the reasonings of the sinner: requital is doubtful, or so far off as to be negligible. 'My works of justice who shall declare? What is there to expect? The sentence is far off.' Last phrase of this verse is Secondary: there is a final divine judgement (see § 397j). 23. All such reasoning is folly. 'He . . . thinketh these things, and the foolish . . . thinketh thus.'

XVI 24-XXIII 38 On Creation, and the Moral Nature of Man; admonitions—16:24-17:20. Creation of the world, and of man as a moral being. (Heb. is missing from 16:27 to 30:10, except for occasional fragments.) 24, 25. Prefatory. What follows is based on Gen chh 1, 2. 26-29. Creation of inanimate nature. 29. 'Or disobey his word.' 31. Creation of living things. 'Every living thing hath covered . . . XVII 1-4. Creation of man. 5b, 6a-b. Man's intellectual nature. Free will was probably spoken of in Heb. where Vg has consilium 'counsel' and Gk διαβούλιον, the words which translate yēser in 15:14, where see note. 6c. Man's moral nature. 'Both good and evil': referring to Gen 2:17. 7, 8. Man's power to know the Creator from his handiwork. 9-12. The moral law imposed on man. 10. Perhaps a reference to the promulgation of the Law on Sinai; but it can well refer to Gen 2:17. 11. The familiarity between God and man before the Fall (see Gen 2:16-22; 3:8). 12. The natural law which (as Gen 3:8 implies) man was aware of from the beginning. 13-20. Man's (and especially Israel's) moral responsibility to God, enforced by God's scrutiny of his conduct. 17. 'Their sins are not hid from him.' 18b. 'and he preserves the bounteous deed of a man'. 20. Repentance turns aside punishment. 'To the repentant he gives a return to justice and strengthens them that are losing hope.'

XVII 21-31 Exhortation to turn to God—on the value b

402b of repentance and of prayer as connected with it. 21-23. Repent, pray for forgiveness, and amend. 24. Secondary. (25, 26a-b. See after 27.) 26c. Since a dead man is 'as one that is not', 27 the time to repent and to praise God is before death. 25, 26a-b. Secondary addition, giving a loftier view of the state of the just after death. There is a 'holy age' or world (saeculum) after death, where men who have turned from 'the error of the ungodly' will 'live and give praise to God'. This interpretation of 'holy age' is supported by other Secondary Texts: 24:46; Syr. additions to 1:22 and 18:8. See § 397j. 28-31. God condescends to man. 30b-c. 'Yet it faileth; and how much more man who hath the inclination of flesh and blood!' (Box). The 'inclination' is the yēser in its bad sense of propensity to evil. Cf. § 397h.

c XVIII 1-14 Mighty and Majestic as the Creator is, he is tender and merciful to man—1-6. The greatness of the Creator. 1a. Vg. 'Qui vivit in aeternum creavit omnia simul', partly underlies the profession of faith of the 4th Lateran Council, repeated by the Vatican Council: Creator omnium . . . sua omnipotentia virtute simul ab initio temporis utramque de nihilo condidit creaturam, spiritualem et corporalem (Dz 428, 1783). St Augustine took simul to mean simultaneously (De Gen ad litt., 4:33, 34; 5:23; 6:3; cf. Knabenbauer, 205). But the Gk is κοινῇ, and the Heb. must be a construction of yahad; the meaning is therefore equally, all alike; God created all things without exception (see Jn 1:3). 1b. 'The Lord alone shall be justified', i.e., as Syr. implies, recognized as triumphantly supreme. 8 ff. See 43:29-37. 7, 8. Man's insignificance and transitoriness in comparison with the Eternal. 7. 'and what is his profit?' 8. Syr. adds 'So a thousand years of this world are not even as one day in the world of the Righteous'. 9-14. And yet God regards him with tender compassion. The first half of 10 is in Vg only; but probably from a Heb. original which mentioned man's evil 'proclivity' (yēser). The context is the same as 17:30; and in 37:3 Vg praesumptio represents yēser.

d XVIII 15-XXIII 38 Advice, chiefly on bridling the tongue—15-18. Graciousness in giving. 18:19-19:6. On taking thought beforehand. 22b. 'Delay not until death to be justified.' 22c. Secondary: the everlasting reward of the just man. 23. 'Before thou vowest prepare thy vows': against rash vows. 24. Death and judgement. 29. 'Words': wise sayings, proverbs. XIX 1. Heb. connects with 18:33, 'Be not a squanderer and a drunkard, or there will be nothing in thy purse. He that doth this shall not be rich, and he that contemneth small things shall become altogether naked'. The wage-earner, making little of his small daily earnings by squandering them in drink, will soon be in beggary. 7-12. Control of the tongue. 13-17. On administering reproof. 18-27. Wisdom and craft contrasted. 21 is notable in laying down that even 'understanding' does not of itself lead to fulfilling the Law. 24, last phrase: 'but when not observed he will outwit thee'. 26. 'when he meets him knows him by his countenance'. 28 belongs to what follows. XX: 1-29. Use and abuse of the tongue. 30-33. Miscellaneous proverbs. (32 f. recur in 41:17 f.) e XXI 1-11 Thoughts on Sin and Sinners—2-4. Three figures of the ever-impending and mortal danger of sin. 2. 'Flee from sin . . . near it, it will bite thee.' 3. 'Killing the souls of men', lit. 'destroying the lives of men'. 4. 'There is no remedy', i.e. humanly speaking; but 1 shows that by repentance, amendment and prayer, sin's effects may be undone. This verse, with 2, 3, may be an expression of the older view that sin is punished by temporal misfortune, sickness and death. But Catholic commentators tend to see in the passage a reference to the spiritual damage and death inflicted on the soul by sin. Perhaps we see here a dawning consciousness of the existence of a spiritual life in the soul which is destroyed by 'mortal' sin. Other points to note are: (1) Sin is personified; cf. Rom chh 5-7. (2) It lurks serpent-like within the soul in the form of a propensity to evil. (3) But it can be avoided or 'fled' from. (4) And its evil effects can be undone by God, through the sinner's repentance and prayer. On all this see § 397h-i. 6. See 35:16-21. 7b. 'will turn to him with all his heart'. 9a. Building up a fortune dishonestly. 9b. 'Is as he that gathereth stones for his tomb': is preparing his own destruction. 10, 11a-b. Primary text. Let sinners prosper as they may, their end will be disgraceful; their corpses are likely to be burnt as those of reprobates, and the oblivion of Sheol will engulf them. 11c. 'and darkness and pains': Secondary addition, showing the concept of Sheol as not a place of mere oblivion but of punishment. See § 397j. 12-31 The wise man and the fool—See on 6:21. 12. 'He that keepeth the law subdues his impulse.' Rendering based on Syr.; the reference is to the yēser as the evil tendency (§ 397h). To keep the Law is the way to control it. St Paul will show later that keeping the Law in the face of concupiscence is precisely the difficulty (cf. Rom 7). See § 397i. 16. See 24:40-47. 19. 'like a burden on a journey'. 23. Omit 'scarce'. 30. 'When the ungodly curseth the Adversary, he curseth his own self.' 'Adversary', lit. 'the Satan'. The sinner cannot blame an adversary outside himself for his sin; by his evil impulse he is his own Satan. Cf. § 397h.

XXII 1-5 Sluggards; and discreditable children. 6-23. Thoughts on fools. 12. Omit 'wicked' each time. 24-32. Friends and how to treat them. XXII 33-XXIII 6 A prayer for God's help against evil tendencies. 22:33 f. For help against sins of the tongue. 33. 'O for a guard upon my mouth and a cunning seal upon my lips.' The seal on the lips must not be the mere mechanical one of perpetual silence, but a deliberate 'cunning' control, knowing when to speak and when to be silent. XXIII 1. 'O Lord, father, and . . . ruler of my life', suffer me not to fall by them.' The phrase 'leave me not . . .' belongs to 4b only. 'Father' implies a tender interest in the individual soul's problems, going beyond even that of the 'shepherd' of 18:13. 'Ruler of my life' assumes a lofty theology in which grace, free will and the supremacy of God's providence fall into their proper places. 2-4. For help against darkness of the understanding, weakness of the will, and the propensity to evil which infects the higher parts of the soul. 2. 'O for scourges over my thought and a rod of correction over my heart, to spare not their ignorant doings and to let not pass their sins.' 'Heart' in Heb. often stands for the higher part of the soul, including both mind and will; when distinguished from 'thought' as here, it represents the will, and 'thought' the intellect. The prayer is that these faculties, infected by the tendency to sin, be both checked and purified by the rod of God. 'Ignorant doings' are sins into which a man is betrayed without obstinate malice. Contrast Num 15:22-29 with Num 15:30 f. 8. In the light of 4b the 'enemy' may be the 'Adversary' of 21:30, the personified 'sin' of 21:2-5, the evil impulse in man which inclines him to sin. 4a. See on 1. 4b. 'Devices' probably represents Heb. yēser as in 15:14. But here it is the evil yēser, sinful propensity. See § 397h. 5, 6. For help against pride and passion. 6. First phrase is a doublet of second. '() Let not the lust of the flesh and impurity take hold of me, and give me not over to a shameful () mind.' 7-20. Control of the tongue. 15. 'comparable to death'. 17. 'to unclean speech, for that is a sinful thing'. 21-33. Sinners against purity. 21. The three 'sorts' follow, viz. solitary sinners, fornicators, adulterers. 22 f. Solitary sin. 23. 'in the body of his flesh'. 24. The fornicator. 25-31. The adulterer. 27. 'and the eyes of men are his (only) fear'. See 16:16-23. 30b. Added by Vg. 32-33. The adulteress. 34. 'Inquisition' as to paternity. See Lev 20:10; Deut 22:22; Jn 7:53 ff. XXIV 1-XXXIII 6 Wisdom coming forth from God 403a and imparted to Man—Various practical counsels. XXIV 1-31 Wisdom praises Herself—1-4. Intro-

408a ductory. Wisdom, personified, is about to speak in her own name. For the personification of wisdom see §397m. 1. 'Wisdom praises herself and speaks her glory in the midst of her people', i.e. as pre-eminent in the midst of Israel, she makes known her glory. 2. 'She opens her mouth in the assembly of the Most High, and is honoured in the sight of his hosts.' Her glory is manifest also amidst the angels in the heavenly court (see Job 1:6; 2:1; 3 Kg 22:19 ff.), and throughout the 'hosts' or armies of being which fill the material creation (see Gen 2:1). 3, 4. Vg only; doublets of 1, 2. 5-11a. Wisdom's origin from God and her presence throughout creation. The passage is strongly influenced by Prov 8:22-31. 5a. Wisdom, originating within God, was externalized by his spoken word, i.e. his creative command and his revealed will. See on 1:5 ff. and §397l. 5b. 'The firstborn before all creatures', Vg only; perhaps a Christian gloss from Col 1:15. 6a. 'I made . . . faileth.' Secondary; but keeping close to Prov loc. cit. and Gen 1:1-4. 6b. 'and as a mist I covered () the earth'. 'Earth' here and 'heaven', 'abyss', 'sea' of 8, name all the departments of the visible universe. The 'mist' to which wisdom is compared may be that of Gen 2:6 (meaning uncertain); but more probably wisdom is identified with the 'spirit of God' of Gen 1:2, hovering cloudlike over chaos. 7. 'and my throne was on a pillar of cloud'. Wisdom was enthroned alongside of God himself (as in Wis 9:4, 10), 'in the high places', i.e. heaven, above the clouds, here pictured as the supports of God's throne (see Ps 96:2; 103:3). 8. 'Circuit': the 'firmament' of Gen 1:6-8. 9a. Omit 'have stood'. 9b-10. New sentence: 'And in every people and in every nation . . .'. Wisdom dominates the conscious creation also. See on 1:10. 11a. 'And by my power . . . high and low': Secondary. b 11b-15. Wisdom commanded by God to dwell permanently in Israel. 11b. 'And in all these I sought a resting-place, and (asked) "In whose possession shall I settle?"'. 12. 'Then the creator . . . commanded () me, and he that created me made my tent to rest.' In the last phrase Vg takes transitive as intransitive; see on 24 f. The sense is as in 1:10c, 16. 13-15. Wisdom obeys God's command to dwell in Israel: God entrusts his revelation of himself to Israel. See Rom 9:4. 14b. On wisdom's 'eternity' see §397l. 14c, 15. Wisdom's part in Israel's worship, first in the tabernacle, then in the temple. 'In the holy tabernacle I ministered before him; moreover I was established in Sion . . .'. An allusion to the pillar of cloud of Ex 33:9, 10; in 21 wisdom is compared to the cloud of incense-smoke in the tabernacle. 'Ministered': the Mosaic worship was the gift of God's revelation ('wisdom') to Israel. See 20, 21. 15b. 'And my authority was in Jerusalem.' Besides the laws of worship, moral and civil laws were contained in the revelation for which 'wisdom' stands. The 'authority' to interpret and apply it was in the hands of the priesthood in Jerusalem with the king's co-operation. See 17-19. 17-19. Wisdom's beneficent operation in and through Israel, described under the figure of flourishing and graceful trees; an expansion of 14, 15, which show wisdom bringing true worship and moral law to Israel. The trees figure the moral excellence which indwelling wisdom gives to Israel among the nations. See Ps 1:3. 18. Omit 'and my abode', etc. 17a. The cedars of Lebanon are proverbial for their majestic growth, and the beauty and durability of their wood. 17b. 'And as a cypress on the range of Hermon.' The qualities of the cypress parallel those of the cedar, as the Hermon range parallels the Lebanon. 18. 'Like a palm tree in Engaddi', on the west shore of the Dead Sea, celebrated for its palm groves. The 'rose plant' is the oleander, which is especially abundant about Jericho. 19. Omit 'in the streets'. c 20, 21. By imagery based on the description of the sacred anointing oil and the incense (Ex 30:22-36) it is shown that wisdom, by revealing to Israel the accept-

408e able way of worship, marks it out as a sacred and priestly nation. 20. 'Aromatical balm', lit. asphaltus. 21. ' () like galbanum and onyx and stacte, and as frankincense smoke in the tabernacle'. This last phrase gives the key to the imagery; see 14c. 22, 23. Wisdom's influence spreads out from Israel to other nations: the religious and moral influence especially of the Dispersion. 22. 'The turpentine tree' is remarkable for its far-spreading branches. 23. 'As the vine I put forth shoots of beauty, and my flowers became fruit of honour and riches.' See Ps 79:9-12; and especially Ez 17:5-15, where Judah in her relations with the Nations (Babylonia, Egypt) is figured as 'a spreading vine which grew into branches and shot forth sprigs'. The 'beauty, honour, riches' which these bear are the same as in 22. See 51:19, 36. 24 is Secondary, making clear the spiritual meaning of the fruit of wisdom. For wisdom as a mother see 15:2; Wis 7:12. 'Fear' is the characteristic fruit of wisdom; love, knowledge (faith?), hope, are the Christian triad. See 2:8-10. 25. In Vg only; a Christian gloss based on Jn 14:6. 24, 25, with Vg of 12, opened the way for the liturgical accommodation of this ch to our Lady. 26-31. Wisdom's invitation to all to gather and enjoy her fruits. Gentiles are not excluded. See on 22 f. 27. 'For to be mindful of me is sweet above honey, and to possess me is sweet above () the honeycomb.' See Ps 18:11, referring to the Law. 28. A doublet of 14b. 29. The appetite for wisdom grows by what it feeds on. Contrast Jn 6:35. 30. To 'hearken to' is to obey; 30a and 30b are synonymous. 31 is Secondary, stressing the reward of the teacher of wisdom. See Dan 12:3. The reward is, characteristically, 'life everlasting'; see §397j. XXIV 32-39 Wisdom in her Plenitude is contained in the Law. See §397b. 32. 'All these things are the book of () the covenant.' 33. 'The Law which Moses commanded.' 34. Vg addition, belonging rather to context of 45:3 or 47:11. 35 ff. For 'who read which'. The reference is to the Law. 37. 'Which poureth forth knowledge as the Nile': to the four rivers of Eden (Gen 2:11-14), the Jordan and the Nile are added to fill in the picture of the Law's abundance of wisdom. 38. 'The first had not perfect knowledge of it, and the last shall not search it out.' The students of the Law from the first to the last, will never fathom the fullness of its doctrine. XXIV 40-47 The author spreads abroad the knowledge of wisdom like a channel branching off from a river. 40. Secondary. Omit 'wisdom'; the author is speaking in person. 41a. Doublet of 41b. 'like an aqueduct came forth into a garden', to bring the waters of the Law to his own disciples (42). 43. But his work grew under his hand to unexpected proportions. 44. 'As far off'; the Dispersion. 45. Vg only. Generally taken as a Christian gloss, based on Eph 4:9; 1 Pet 3:19 f., implying that Christ is the wisdom spoken of, but Smend (Comm. CXVII f.) argues for a Heb. original. 46. Inspiration wells up within him as in a prophet; see 39:16; Am 3:8; Jer 20:9. 'Even to the holy age': Secondary; see on 17:25. 47. Also found (better) in 33:18. XXV 1-16 Miscellaneous Counsels.—4. 'And an old man that is an adulterer and lacking sense.' 16. Secondary. XXV 17-XXVI 24. On women, bad and good. 22. 'There is no poison worse than the poison of a serpent.' 33. The first recorded sin is that of Eve; the punishment that came on our first parents meant the exclusion of themselves and their posterity from access to the tree of life (Gen 3:22-24); therefore 'we all die.' See §397g. 36. Divorce her. 'Flesh' means family; before divorce they had been 'in one flesh' (Gen 2:24). XXVI 4. Omit 'if'. 18. 'On a headstrong daughter set . . . she use it for herself.' 16b. 'and shall fat his bones with her intelligence'. 17. 'A gift of God (18) is a wise . . .'. 22a. 'The holy candlestick': the seven-branched lampstand of the temple. 22b. 'So is the beauty of the face upon a stately figure.' After 24 a passage (found in AV 24:19-27)

f XXVI 25-XXVIII 14 Miscellaneous Counsels—XXVII 2. 'As a nail.' 17-24. Against disclosing secrets. XXVIII:1-9. Forgive and God will forgive you. See Mt 6:14 f.; 18:21-35. 7. '(Remember) corruption and death; abide in his commandments.' See on 7:40. 10-14. Against quarrelling. 15-30. The mischief of a wicked tongue (from which Ben Sirach himself had suffered, cf. 51:3-7). 16. The 'third person' is the slanderer, the other two being the one slandered and the listener. 19. His tongue 'hath cast out good wives' by causing divorce. 22. 'By the tongue'. 25. Subjection to slander is a living death; it is better to die outright and go down to the Underworld. 26a. 'Its power shall not be on the godly.' 28. 'Hedge in thy vineyard with thorns (), and make doors and bars to thy mouth.' 29. 'Lock up thy gold and silver, and make a balance and weight for thy words.'

XXIX 1-28. On lending, borrowing, giving, and standing surety. 1. 'and he that upholds him with his hand'. 8. 'But if not (able to repay)'. 12. 'The commandment': Deut 15:7-11. 14. 'Lay out thy treasure according to the commandments . . .' See 12. The text of 16-17, being merely a repetition of 17:18 f., is omitted in official Vg. DV, however, assigns the Nos. 16, 17 to what Vg calls 18; thus 19-35 of Vg correspond to 18-34 of DV. 18-26. Suretyship. An advance on Prov 6:1-5; 17:18. 25 refers to those who go surety for the sake of usury. 27-34. Poverty, but not dependence.

g XXX 1-13 On bringing up Children—1. 'that he may rejoice': that the father may have a happy old age. 7. 'He that pampers his son shall bind.' He fusses over the scratches of his darling. 11. (Heb. is available until 34:1.) 14-21. On health and sickness. 17. 'Everlasting rest': the older view of the Underworld, as a place of surcease. Cf. 28:25 and §397j. The requies aeterna of Vg, understood in the higher sense, supplies the Christian term for happiness in the next world. 18. 'Good things poured out for a mouth.' Good food is useless for the invalid who cannot take it. The next verses illustrate the same point. 22-27. Sadness shortens life, joy prolongs it. 24. 'Comfort thy own soul () and rest thy heart, () and drive away . . .' 28. At this point begins the displacement in Gk MSS which affects 30:26-36:18. See §396d.

XXXI 1-11 The right attitude towards wealth—2. Heb. repeats the thought of 1. 4. 'The poor man labours for lack of substance, and when he rests he suffers want': antithesis of 3. 8-11. How rare is the rich man who does not succumb to the temptations of wealth. See Mt 19:23-26. 8b. 'And that hath not gone astray after wealth.' 'Gold' of DV is māmôn in Heb. It is a loan-word from Aramaic, frequent in rabbinical Heb., but only here in biblical. See on Mt 6:24; Lk 16:9, 11, 13. 10. Interrogative. 'Who hath been . . . so that he shall have glory ()? Who is he that could have transgressed . . . ?'

31:12-42 Temperance in food and drink—27. 'In all thy works show restraint.' In 28 for 'faithful' and in 29 for 'true' read lasting. 30-42. Wine in moderation. 30a. 'At wine be not a champion.' 31b. 'So wine () proves the hearts of mockers': in vino veritas. 32. 'is a water of life to men'. 33. 'who is without wine?' 34. Mistaken doublet of 33. 42b. 'And quarrel not with him in company.'

h XXXII 1-17 Manners at a Banquet—1-3. The one who presides. 1. 'Ruler (of a banquet)?' See Jn 2:8, 9. 3. 'That thou mayest enjoy honour from them, and receive the crown due to good manners.' 4-9. Etiquette for elders. Music and song have their place at a banquet, as well as words of wisdom. 10-17. For younger guests. 18-28. The provident and god-fearing man contrasted with the sinner. 18. 'Early': diligently. 23. Doublet of 22. 27. 'In every work of thine watch thyself constantly.'

XXXIII 1-3. Keep the Law and it will keep thee.

1. 'Temptation': trial. 8b. 'And the Law is faithful to him as the Urim': it guides his life as surely as would a direct answer from the oracle of God. On Urim and Thummim see Ex 28:30; 1 Kg 14:41 f. 4-6. Steadfastness of mind. 6. 'The friendship of a fool is like a saddled horse.' As a horse just saddled, eager to be off, neighs happily no matter who mounts him, so a fool bestows his shallow 'friendship' on any chance acquaintance that suits his whim.

XXXIII 7-XXXIX 15 God's Wisdom in governing the World; the writer's purpose in studying it; guidance on many subjects.—33:7-15. Unity and diversity in creation. 7-10b. The calendar is ruled by one and the same sun, yet God wills that some days and seasons should excel others. 10c. So, too, all men are made of the same clay (11), yet God in his wisdom has 'distinguished them and diversified . . .' 12a. The race of Israel 'he has blessed and exalted', to be his Chosen People. 12b. And even within Israel some groups are honoured above others. The priestly family he sanctified in a special manner, and 'brought nigh' to himself. (See Num 16:5, 10.) 12c-d. Other nations he treated as aliens. The terminology is that of Gen 9:25-27, where Canaan is made inferior to Sem. The vigorous contrast between blessing and cursing is purely literary, not theological. (See on Gen 25:23; Mal 1:2; Rom 9:6-13.) The theological contrast is between a Chosen People and others not specially chosen. 13-15. And as with nations, so with individuals. All come equally from God's hand, but the lot assigned by him to each is different. (See Is 45:9; Jer 18:1-6; Rom 9:21.) 14a. 'All . . . ordering' ('offering' by misprint in some DV ed.) is a doublet of 14c: 'And he will allot to him according to his own decision.' It is not a question of final requital, but of the whole course of a man's life; God is the 'ruler' of it all, as in 23:1. 15. Good and bad fortune in the affairs of men, life and death in the physical universe, are needed in the world and arranged for by its Creator. Even the sinner has a place in it besides the good man. This must be read in the light of 15:11-21.

16-19. The author's work is based on that of earlier sages, and is destined for the teachers who will succeed him. 18. Same as 24:47. 19. 'ye great men of the people': it is instructors of Israelites he has in mind, in such schools as his own (see on 51:31, 37), and in those operated by the 'rulers of the congregation' in the synagogues which already at this date existed in the Dispersion.

20-33. Advice to the head of a house. 20-24. During life not to surrender property and independence. 25-30. Strict treatment for a lazy slave. 31-33. Kind treatment for a good one. XXXIV 1-8. The vanity of dreams and omens. 2. (Heb. is missing till 35:11.) 6. Allowance is made for God-given dreams, of which Scripture records many. 9-20. Experience is a good teacher, the fear of the Lord a better. 11. Doublet of 10. 12. Ben Sirach's own experience, enlarged by travel. See 39:5; 51:8. 13. 'and by these things I have been delivered'. His experience and wisdom helped to save his life. 'By the grace of God' is a Vg addition, expressing a true sense, as 51:1-17 testifies. 14-20. The fear of the Lord, even more than experience and skill, brings protection. 14. 'The spirit of those that fear God shall live': God will save them in danger. 19c. 'A defence from the burning wind' or simoom. See Is 25:4. 34:21-35:15. Sacrifice: 16-21. God hears the prayer of the distressed. 20. 'He that adoreth God in the way that pleases him shall be accepted.' 21. It is humility, the sense of 404c dependence on God, that gives wings to prayer: 'and till it come unto God it will not rest; and it will not depart till the Most High behold'. 22-26. God will therefore hear the prayer of distressed Israel. The oppression of the Jews alluded to here and in the prayer which follows (36:1 ff.) refers to a general situation, not to a particular tyrant. Ptolemy IV of Egypt (d. 205 B.C.) personally rode roughshod over Jewish susceptibilities, but Jews in his dominions were well treated. Antiochus III of Syria (223-187 B.C.), ruler of Palestine when Ben Sirach wrote, was favourable to them (Jos. Ant. 12, 3, 3). Two things, nevertheless, made even the kindest of Gentile rulers tyrants in Jewish eyes: (1) the fact that they were Gentiles, ruling, by right of force only, over the theocratic people; (2) the Hellenistic and therefore paganizing culture which was the inevitable concomitant of their rule everywhere it was exercised. The conditions which led up to the crisis of the Maccabean period were already perceptible in Ben Sirach's time. 24. 'according to their deeds, and () the works of man according to his presumption'. 25b. 'And () delight them with his mercy'.

d XXXVI 1-19 A Prayer for Israel—It contains many expressions which are found in the Eighteen Blessings of the Synagogue liturgy. 1, 2. Theme of the prayer: salvation for Israel, fear of God on the Nations. This 'fear' is not exclusively dread, but includes recognition of the truth about God, leading to worship of him. See §397c. 3-7. Enlightenment for the Gentiles through chastisement. 8. 'Lift up thy hand', to chastise them. 4. As thou hast shown the Gentiles how holy thou art by thy treatment of us—punishing our sins by subjecting us to the nations—so now show us how holy thou art by punishing the sins and tyranny of the Gentiles. See Is 10:5-21. 5. The happy result of the chastisement of the Gentiles. 6, 7. Renew the wonders wrought at Israel's deliverance from Egypt. A favourite theme in Is 40-66. 8-12. The crushing of Israel's particular enemies. 10. 'Hasten the end and take thought for the time, for who shall say to thee: "What doest thou?"' The reference is to the 'last time' or Messianic era, which God is asked to bring quickly, with its fulfilment of Israel's hopes. See 17, 18. 11. Not in Heb. If he escapes vengeance in one form, let him find it in another. See 3 Kg 19:17. 12. 'The head of the princes of the enemy': perhaps Antiochus III (see on 35:22-26). For 'enemy' Heb. reads Moab (traditional figure of Israel's enemies), but this may be a copyist's mistake. 13-14. Gather together as freemen in their homeland the scattered tribes of the chosen people. 13b. 'That they may () hold their inheritance as in the olden days.' 15-18. Glorify Jerusalem and the temple on Mount Zion, by fulfilling the Messianic promises. 16. 'Fill Zion with thy praise and the temple with thy glory': an allusion (as in 49:14) to the Messianic prophecy of Agg 2:7-9, which includes the conversion of the Gentiles. 17. 'Testify in favour of the first of thy works, and verify the prophecy spoken in thy name.' Vindicate Israel's position as thy firstborn and favoured son (see 14) by fulfilling thy promise made to him. 18. 'for thee, in that thy prophets be found faithful': reward the hopes of those who trust in thy promise by verifying it as thy prophets foretold. Last phrase in Vg belongs to what follows. 18c, 19. Conclusion of the prayer. 'according to thy goodwill towards thy people (), and let all the ends of the earth know that thou art God from eternity': i.e. the same God who of old chose Israel and gave him the promises.

e XXXVI 20-XXXVII 34 Discrimination—20-22. Discrimination in general. 23-28. Discrimination in choosing a wife. 25. 'a soothing tongue'. 26a. 'obtaineth a choice possession'. 26b. See Gen 2:18, 20. 28. A roving bachelor, 'that hath no nest', i.e. home of his own, with a wife. 'Rest', DV, is a misprint (Vg nidum). XXXVII 1-6. Discrimination in choice of friends. 2. Omit 'but' and 'shall be'. It continues the question of 1. 3. 'O wicked propensity wherefore wast thou formed': the evil inclination (yēser) that turns friendship awry. See §397h. 5 refers to a true friend; 'for his belly's sake' belongs to 4. 7-19. Discrimination in choosing counsellors. 12 at end: 'nor with a grudging man about benevolence'. 18. 'Watchmen': astrologers. 19. God is the best counsellor. 20-21d. Deliberation in plan, action and speech. 21e-29. False wisdom and true. 28. As long as Israel lasts, viz. for ever, the name of its sages will be kept alive. See 44:13-15. 30-34. Discretion in eating. 30. Learn by experience, 'and what is bad for thee, permit thyself not'. See 31:19-24.

XXXVIII 1-15 Physicians and Medical Care—1-3. f

The physician is to be treated with deference even by kings, because he is a minister of God, 'created', i.e. appointed by him for human needs. 4-8. The healing power of medicines is also from God. 5. The reference is to Ex 15:23-26. 6a continues 5: 'that he might make his power known to all men'. 7. 'He': the physician (Heb.). 'The apothecary' was by trade a perfumer (Ex 30:25; 37:29; 2 Par 16:14; Eccles 49:1) who also stocked salves and ointments. 7d, 8. 'That of his works there may not be an end, and health from God may be over all': apothecary and physician are provincial instruments for carrying on God's healing work. 9-11b. In time of sickness turn first to God, by 9 prayer, 10 repentance and 11 sacrifice (Lev 2:1-3). See 2 Par 16:12, where Asa's fault is that he neglected this. 11c-15. The physician must also be consulted, as God's appointed means of cure. But he himself depends on God and must pray to him. 13. 'For there is a time when success lies in his hand (14), since he also beseeches God to prosper his study and his healing treatment.' 15. Sin leads to sickness, either as a direct result or as a punishment sent by God. That it always does so, or that all sickness results from personal sin, is not asserted. 16-24. Mourning for the dead: it is a good work in itself, and convention demands it; but when unduly prolonged it is harmful to the living. 16. 'According to his due.' 19. 'Of sadness cometh harm, () and sorrow of heart boweth down the strength.' 20. Gk (emended): 'In misfortune sadness remaineth and sorrow (lit. 'a curse') of heart is a life of affliction'. Heb. omits. Possibly a gloss on 19. 23. 'Remember his lot . . . so: "Yesterday for me, and today for thee."' It is the common lot, and mourning will not change it; so, 24b 'comfort thee when his spirit departs'.

XXXVIII 25-XXXIX 15 Contrasting Pictures of the manual worker and the student of wisdom. g

25. Introductory: opportunity for study and reflection is necessary for the acquisition of wisdom. 26-34. The manual worker's occupations, demanding concentration for their proper performance, do not allow him this opportunity. Examples follow. 26, 27. The farmer. 28. The engraver. 29-31. The metal-worker. (Heb. is lacking till 39:20.) 32-34. The potter. 33b. 'And treads down its substance beneath his feet': kneading the wet clay by trampling; see Is 41:25. 35-39b. Such manual workers are essential to the well-being of the state, although not fitted for the higher public offices. 37. 'And where they dwell the people hunger not. Yet they shall not . . .'. 37b, 38. The tasks proper to the learned. 39b. 'And their mind is on the work of their craft.' 39c belongs to what follows.

XXXIX 1 (with 38:39c)-15 Picture of the Student of h

Wisdom—38:39c. 'Not so he that applies his soul to searching in the Law of the Most High.' XXXIX 1. 'He will seek out.' With preceding verse, enumerates the three divisions of the Heb. canon: Law, Prophets, 'wisdom of the ancients'. 2, 3. 'The sayings' are the oral wisdom of the Sages, passed on in schools such as Ben Sirach himself conducted (51:31, 37). 4. Actual service as councillor to some magnate is another school of wisdom. 5. So is the school of experience and travel. See 34:9-13; 51:1-17, 18. 6-8. Nevertheless, the scribe's wisdom is fundamentally religious, its source is the one true God of Israel, and prayer is its surest channel. 9-11. By this contact with God, he 404h himself will become a living well of wisdom. 12-15. The reward of the scribe: honour during life, lasting fame after death. See 37:26-29; 44:1-15. 13b. 'And his name shall live.' 14. The 'church' is the Hebrew community. See 33:18. 15. 'As long as he lives his name shall be honoured above a thousand, and when he dies it suffices for him': his name survives him and takes his place when he is dead.

405a XXXIX 16-XLIII 37 Eulogy of God's Wisdom in his governance of the Universe—with practical reflexions, and a hymn to the Creator. 39:16-20. Invitation to join with him in praising the Creator. 16b. 'I am filled as the moon at the full': full of the light of wisdom. Compare 24:41; 33:17. 17-20. Omit first phrase. He invites his fellow-Israelites to join him in his hymn. The imagery is that of 24:17-23. 20. (Heb. is in the main available for the rest of the book.) 21-41. 'All the works of the Lord are good.' 21-26. They all show forth his power and wisdom. After 21 Gk inserts the refrain which we have in 26, 40. 22 refers to Gen 1:6-10; see Ps 32:6, 7. 23. Paraphrase: By a word from him his will is done, and nothing can limit the good he wills. 24, 25. His eye is all-seeing and his wisdom all-pervading. See 16:16-22; 17:13-17; 23:26-29. 26. See on 21. Each work is good in relation to God's purpose for it. 27-29. Both his benignity and his severity manifest his goodness. 27, 28a. 'overflowed like the Nile, and like the River hath watered . . . The Nile and the River (i.e. Euphrates), on which whole peoples depend, are figures of God's goodness to the world. 28b, 29a. His punishment of sinners is equally effective. 'So doth his wrath disinherit nations . . . he turned a watered land into salt': Sodom and Gomorrah. 30-32a. Good things were created for the good. 32b-37. Punitive agencies were created for evil-doers. 33. 'Spirits': winds. 37. They obey God's will in punishing the wicked. 38-41. Conclusion echoing 16-21.

b XL 1-10 The Hardships of Human Life: reflexions on Gen 3:17-19. Though all God's works are good, man's Fall has brought suffering on himself. 1. 'hath God appointed for all men'. It is God's sentence on fallen men, Gen loc. cit. 'The mother of all': mother earth, from which man is formed. See 16:31 f.; 33:10. 8. 'Such things' refers to what follows, in 9 (omit 'moreover'). 10. 'Calamity is created . . . came destruction': an echo of 39:33 ff.

11-17. What passes and what abides. 15b. 'and are as unclean roots': fated to wither. 17. 'Grace', i.e. generous kindness. 18-28. Series of comparisons, with a refrain, exalting the fear of the Lord. 23. 'a wife of discretion'. 24. 'A brother and a helper in time of trouble, but righteousness is a deliverer above them both.' 28b. 'and its canopy is above every glory': the divine protection which the fear of God wins. See Is 4:5. 29-30. 'My son, lead not a life of beggary.' 31. 'Which to a man . . . is inner torment.'

c XLI 1-XLII 8 A Series of Contrasts—XLI 1-7. Death, welcome and unwelcome. 5-7. The older, naturalistic view of death, as in 38:21-24. 7. 'For in Sheol there is no inquiring concerning (length of) life': the older view—the Underworld is the end of all. See §397j. On Sheol see note on 14:17. 8-16. The memorials left by the wicked and the just: their children and their reputation after death. For the wicked, these decay; for the just, they prosper. 12. 'If you increase it will be for harm, if you have children it shall be for sighing; if you stumble—a lasting joy, if you die—an execration.' 16. See 37:28 f.; 39:12-15. 41:17-42:1c. Things to be ashamed of. 17b-18. Same as 20:32, 33. 20b. 'to keep every kind of shamefacedness'. 23b. 'And of (joining with) the foreigner in the place where thou sojournest.' Recommends exclusivism to Jews who dwell amongst Gentiles. 24a. 'Of breaking an oath or a covenant.' 24b. See 31:16-21. XLII 1c. 'So shalt thou be rightly shamefaced', refers back to all that precedes, from 41:19. 'To be ashamed of doing the disgraceful things mentioned is to be rightly ashamed.'

d XLII 1d-8 Things not to be ashamed of—1d. 'These things' which follow. 4b, 5. 'Of much or little profit, and of gain from the wares of merchants.' 9-14. The care of daughters. 12. 'Let her not show her beauty to a man, nor tarry in converse among (married) women': the seclusion of well-bred oriental young women. It is married women of disedifying life and conversation who are warned against, as the sequel shows. 13b. 'And from one woman the wickedness of another.' 14a. The wickedness of men (which the daughter will be on her guard against and shielded from) is not so dangerous for her as the corrupting friendship of the type of woman spoken of. 14b. 'And a shameful daughter is a source of reproach.'

XLII 15-XLIII 37 Hymn to God the Creator, concluding Part One of the book.—42:15-26. God's greatness in his works in general: his unique glory, his omniscience, his omnipotence. 15c-d. 'By the word of the Lord his works were done, and his will was accomplished by his decree.' See 1:5; 43:28; and §397l. 16. As the sun gives light to all things, God gives being, and all things reflect his glory. 17. 'The Holy Ones of God have not the power to declare all his wonderful works. It is God who gives strength to his hosts to stand in his glorious presence.' 'The Holy Ones' are the angels (Deut 33:2 f.; Job 5:1; 15:15; Ps 88:6-9, etc.). Even they could not endure to look upon the unveiled glory of God, did he not strengthen them to do so. Cf. Job 4:17, 18; 15:15 f.; Is 6:2. 18. He fathoms the unfathomable. See 24:8-11. 19. Past and future to him are present. 20. 'Word', i.e. thing. 21b-c, 22. 'And he is one from eternity.' He is one, eternal, self-existing, self-sufficient. 23. 'O how lovely': lovable as are his created works, they are but a spark compared with the blaze of his own loveliness. 24. All that he created is sustained and ruled by him. 25. 'All things are different, one from another; yet he hath made none of them without its purpose.' 26. 'One thing excels another in goodness, and who shall be filled with beholding their beauty?'

XLIII 1-28 God's Greatness in his Works in particular f
—1. The firmament, or visible vault of heaven. See Ex 24:10. 2-5. The sun. See Ps 18:6, 7. 6-9. The moon. The Hebrew calendar, year, months, and festivals were ruled by the moon. 6, end: 'And an everlasting sign'—as long as the world lasts. See Ps 71:5. 7b. Her light wanes after the full. 8b. 'How awe-inspiring in her changes!' 9. 'The signal of the cloud-army on high, she shineth gloriously': rallying the hosts of the clouds (lit. water-vessels, see Job 38:37 Heb.). 10-11. The stars. 'By the word of the Holy One they stand at their post': like sentinels on high. See Bar 3:34 f. 'Word': see 42:15; 43:28. 12, 13. The rainbow. 14-18. The storm. 14. 'His power writes the lightning (in the sky) and sets ablaze the flashes of his vengeance (15) for the sake of which his treasures are opened.' 'Vengeance', see 39:33-37. 'Treasures': see Deut 28:12; Job 38:22; Jer 51:16. 18a, 17, 18b. Read in that order. 19-24. The snow, frost and dew. 21b. 'And makes its flowers to flash like sapphires.' 24. 'A () remedy of all this is the dropping of a cloud, and the dew which alights for refreshment after drought.' 25-27. The sea. 25a. Doublet. 25b. See Gen 1:2, 6-10. 28. 'By reason of him his work succeeds, and by his word his will is accomplished.' 'By his word', see 1:5; 42:15; and §397l. 29-37. Conclusion of the hymn: 'The Almighty himself is above all his works.' 33. Paraphrased by Aquinas in his Quantum potes tantum aule quia maior omni laude. 35. 'Who has seen him that he may declare him? And who shall magnify him as he is ()?' The answer was yet future (Jn 1:18).

XLIV 1-15 The Praise of the Ancients of Israel— 406a
The Ancients are praised 'in their generations', i.e. in chronological order, beginning with Enoch and ending with Simon the high-priest, the author's contemporary. God's dealings with the Fathers and their response to his special providence are hymned as examples of that divine wisdom to whose exposition the book is devoted.

XLIV 1-15 Introduction—1. 'Let us now praise men of piety.' Cf. 10. 2. 'The Lord hath allotted them great glory, and his magnificence.' The various categories now to be mentioned won honour in their own day. 3a-b. Warriors and rulers, like Josue and David. 3c-d. 'Counsellors by their wisdom, and seers of all things by their prophetic skill', e.g. Elias, Isaias. 4a-b. 'Ruling over the Gentiles by their counsels and leaders by reason of their shrewdness', e.g. Joseph. 4c-d. Not in Vg: 'Wise in thought through their book-learning, and exercising rule through their functions'. The 'functions' are probably those of the priesthood (Peters); the 'book-learning' would be that of Scribes. 5a. Inspired psalmists. 5b. 'And set forth proverbs in writing': like Solomon. 6. 'Men well-off in wealth and strong in substance, living at peace': like the Patriarchs. 7. Conclusion of the sentence begun in 3. The honour some had after their own times he now goes on to speak of. 8. 'There are some of them who have left': some of the great men honoured in their own days left an honoured memory ever after; (9) others did not. The reason for the difference is given in ff. vv. Those who were not remembered after death were men prominent in their day by position and influence, but not by piety. Cf. 47:27-31; 48:18; 49:5-7. 10. 'But these were men of piety . . . will not fail.' 'Piety', Heb. hesed. Here and in 1 this word of many meanings (cf. BDB) is connected, by the examples given, with the idea of dutiful love of God and devotion to his service. The great men of the past who excelled in this will never be forgotten. Three things keep their memory alive: (1) 11-13, their posterity flourishes, generation after generation, worthy of their forbears; (2) 14a, the honourable graves in which they were buried, after a blessed death; (3) 14b, 15, their reputation for 'wisdom' as well as piety, which shall continue as long as Israel lasts. See 37:28, 29; 39:14.

b 16. Henoch. See Gen 5:22-24; Heb 11:5. 16b. 'a marvel of knowledge to all generations': i.e. a marvellous example of the high destiny to which perfect knowledge can serve to raise one. The unfinished notes on Adam, Seth, Enos, Sem, Joseph, grouped with another mention of Henoch in 49:16-19, suggest that Ben Sirach intended to fit in these other Ancients too, had his work received the final touches he had in mind. 17-19. Noe. 17. 'was made a renewal': from him, after the Flood, humanity was renewed. 19. 'An everlasting covenant was made.' See Gen 8:21; 9:9-17. 20-26. Abraham, Isaac and Jacob. 20b. 'And there was not found a stain in his glory.' See Gen 17:4-6. 21. 'In his flesh', by circumcision. See Gen 17:9-11; 24. 'In trial he was found faithful': Gen 22:1-12. 22, 23. See Gen 22:15-18. 'The River' is the Euphrates, as in 39:28; see Gen 15:18; Ex 23:31; Deut 11:24; Ps 71:8. 24. See Gen 26:3-5. 25, 26a. The blessings passed on to Jacob; Gen 27:27-29. 26b. See Gen 49:27. Belongs to what follows (Moses): 'And he brought forth from him a righteous man, that found . . .'

c XLV 1-8 (with 44:27). Moses.—2a. 'The saints.' Heb. is 'lōhim, which may mean angels (also called 'saints' or 'holy ones' in 42:17; the reference would be to Ex 34:29-35), or God (referring to Ex 4:16 [MT]); 7:1). 2c. 'He made prodigies come to pass'; the plagues of Egypt. 3c. 'His glory': Ex 33:18-34:8. 4. '() For his faithfulness and meekness he chose him': Num 12:3, 7. 5. Ex 20:21; 24:18. 6. 'Commandments face to face': Secondary, from Ex 33:11; Deut 34:10. 'Law of life and understanding': the Law whose observance brings life and wisdom; see Deut 30:15; 32:47; 4:6. 7-27. Aaron. For Ben Sirach's appreciation of the Aaronic priesthood see §397c. 7. 8. Aaron chosen as priest by 'an everlasting ordinance'. See Ex 29:9. 9-14. The priestly garments and adornments. See Ex 28. 12. 'Judgement and truth', i.e. Urim and Thummim; see on 33:3. 15-21. To Aaron and his descendants alone was given the power to offer sacrifice, to bless the people in God's name, and to teach and apply the Law. See Lev 10:10f.; Deut 17:8 ff. 22-24. The rejection of rival claimants. See Num 16. 25-27. Provision for the support of the priests. See Num 18. 28-31. The promise to Phinees. See Num 25. 31. Text corrupt. After 'seed' add: 'so the inheritance of Aaron is also unto his seed': the high-priesthood is as assured in the line of Aaron as the kingship in the line of David. See Jer 33:14-26. There follows an address to the living representatives of the Aaronic priesthood: 'And now bless the Lord who has crowned you with honour, giving wisdom into your heart . . . that your good things may not be abolished, and your glory for everlasting generations.'

XLVI 1-12. Josue and Caleb—1. 'Jesus the son of Nave': Gk form of Yēšua' ben Nun, as in Jos 1:1, etc. 'According to his name', which signifies the Lord is salvation. 2-8. Josue's leadership in the conquest of Canaan; see Jos 6-11. 9-12. The 'work of piety' of Josue and Caleb, and its reward. See Num 14:6-38. 10. 'Six hundred thousand': see on 16:11. 11. See Jos 14:6-14. 13-15. The Judges. 14b. 'May their bones sprout forth out of their place.' The same expression occurs in 49:12. It has not been satisfactorily explained. It is not a reference to the resurrection of the body, but a prayer that the merits of the Judges may be rewarded by an enduring spiritual posterity. See Is 58:11; 66:14. 16-23. Samuel. 16. 'Anointed princes': Saul and David, 1 Kg 10:1; 16:13. 17b. Text uncertain; perhaps: 'and the Lord visited Jacob', i.e. sent them a leader; see Ex 4:31. 18. 'And he was faithful in his words as a seer.' See 1 Kg 3:19 ff.; 9:6 ff. 19-21. See 1 Kg 7. 21a. 'And he crushed the princes of the enemy.' 22. See 1 Kg 12:1-5. 23. See 1 Kg 28:8-20.

XLVII 1-13 David—2. 'The fat': the portion not to be eaten but reserved for sacrifice; see Lev 3:3-5; 4:8-10. In the same way David was singled out as sacred. 3-6. See 1 Kg 17:34-54. 'Set up the horn': the common figure for triumphant prowess; see vv. 8, 13. 7. See 1 Kg 18:6 ff. 8. See 2 Kg 8. 9. David as psalmist. 2 Kg 22 (Ps 17) would be a case in point. 10. The emphasis on his love of God is noteworthy; the terms are those of Deut 6:5. 11, 12. See 1 Par 16:4; 25:1 ff. 13. See 2 Kg 12:13; 7:12-16. 14-20. Solomon's glory. 14. 'For his sake', i.e. David's, as 2 Kg 7:12. 15. See 3 Kg 3:1. 16. 'Thou wast filled like the Nile.' See on 24:37; 39:27. 17, 18. See 3 Kg 4:29-34; 10:1-13. 19. 'And thou wast called by the glorious name by which Israel is called', i.e. the name of Yahweh. Solomon's name originally was Yedidiah, beloved of Yahweh (2 Kg 12:25). 20. See 3 Kg 10:14-27. 21-25. Solomon's defection. See 3 Kg 11:1-13, 31-39. 24, 25. A firm assertion of the Messianic hope, 'He will give a remnant to Jacob, and to David a shoot': see Is 11:1, 10. 26-31. Denunciation of Roboam and Jeroboam. See 3 Kg 12; 13; 4 Kg 17:20-23.

XLVIII 1-12 Elias—1. 'Burnt like a furnace': prophesying the drought (3 Kg 17) and bringing down fire (3). 2, 3. See 3 Kg 17; 18:37 ff.; 4 Kg 1:10, 12. 5. See 3 Kg 17:21, 22. 6. His prophecies of doom: 3 Kg 21:21-24; 4 Kg 1:4; 2 Par 21:12 ff. 7. See 3 Kg 19:15-17. 8. 'Who anointedst kings for retribution': 3 Kg loc. cit. 'And a prophet as a successor': Eliseus, 3 Kg 19:16. 9. See 4 Kg 2:11. 10. 'Who art written down as ready for the time appointed, to appease . . .': i.e. in Mal 4:5, 6. 11. 'Blessed is he who sees thee and dies.' The reference seems to be to Elias's return as precursor of the Messias: blessed is he who will see thee thus before he dies. 12. Text uncertain; probably 'And blessed art thou, for thou livest on': Elias never died.

13-18. Eliseus, and subsequent generations. 13a-b. See 4 Kg 2:9-15. 13c-d. Earthly power did not overawe him. See 4 Kg 3:13 ff.; 6:16. 14a. 'Nothing was too wonderful for him (to do)'. 14b. 'Propheesied', i.e. exercised the miraculous powers with which prophets sometimes authenticated their mission. See 4 Kg 13:21. 16. The destruction of Israel. 17, 18. The survival of Judah as a kingdom for some time still. Those in it who 'did that which pleased God' will be noted in the verses which follow. 17. 'There was left but a small people unto Judah, but still a prince to the house of 406i David.' The Messianic promise still in process of fulfilment. 19-28. Ezechias and Isaias. 19. See 2 Par 32:5, 30; 4 Kg 20:20. 20-24. See 4 Kg 18; Is 36; 37. 26. See 4 Kg 20:1-11; Is 38:1-8. 27, 28. The reference is to the message and the prophecies of Is 40-66. It is clear that Ben Sirach attributes these chh to Isaias. See Is 40:1-11; 41:21-29; 42:9; 46:9-12; 61:1-7.

g XLIX 1-9 Josias and Jeremias, with a reference to Judah's evil kings.—1. As in 24:20, 21, the figure expresses chiefly zeal for the worship of God according to the Mosaic regulations. See 4 Kg 23:1-25; 2 Par 34; 35. 2. See 32:5-8. 5. Besides these three kings, Asa, Josaphat and Joas are also praised in Kg and Par, but with reserve. See 3 Kg 15:11-15; 22:43-47; 4 Kg 12:2, 3; 2 Par 19:2, 3; 20:37. 6, 7. The complement of 48:17. See 4 Kg 23:25-27. 8. See 4 Kg 25; Jer 36:29, etc.; 39. 9. See Jer 1:5-10; 37:38.

10-19. Brief notices of some other famous men. 10. Ezechiel. See Ez 1. 11. Job. 'And he made mention of Job, who kept right ways.' See Ez 14:14, 20. 12. The Twelve Prophets, the so-called 'minor prophets'. 'Their bones': see on 46:14. 13. Zorobabel. See Agg 2:24. 14. Josue ('Jesus'), son of Josedec. See Agg 1:12; 2:3; Esd 3:2. 'Everlasting glory': the reference is to Agg 2:7-10; see on 36:16. 15. Nehemias. See Neh 3-6. 16-19. Returns to the ancestors of the human race, with Joseph. See on 44:16. 16. 'Few men were born upon earth': Heb. thus leaves place for Elias, who was also 'taken up'. 17. See Gen 37:5-10; 42-47. 18a. 'Visited', i.e. providentially cared for, in accordance with prophecy. See Gen 50:23 f.; Ex 13:19; Jos 24:32. 18b. A gloss added from 48:14. 19. Seth and Sem and Enos obtained glory, but above every living thing Adam. Seth's glory was to be ancestor of the virtuous part of mankind before the Flood (Gen 4:25); Sem's, to be ancestor of the Chosen People after the Flood (Gen 10); Enos's, to have initiated 'calling upon the name of the Lord' (Gen 4:26). Adam's glory surpassed all these in that he was created directly by God without human parents; he was glorious 'by his origin' as Gk and Latin add.

h L 1-26 The High-Priest Simeon son of Jochanan ('Simon son of Onias'). See § 396h. He was a contemporary of Ben Sirach and held office c 219-196 B.C. 1. 'Great among his brethren and the glory of his people was Simon the high-priest.' This phrase is misplaced in 49:17 by Vg and Gk. 'In his life': he was dead when this was written. 1b-3. The renovations carried out in the temple. Their exact nature is not clear. That Antiochus the Great supported them is asserted by Josephus in Ant. 12, 3, 3. 3. The water-supply he provided is compared to 'the Sea', i.e. the great laver of Solomon's temple (3 Kg 7:23 ff.). 4. 'Delivered it from destruction': by his prayers when Ptolemy IV threatened destruction in 217 B.C. (see 3 Macc 2); and later by winning the friendship of Antiochus the Great (Jos. loc. cit.). 5a continues 4: 'He fortified his city against the enemy.' 5b-23. Description of the high-priest offering the burnt-offering on the Day of Atonement. The ceremonial is that of Lev 16, and Mishnah, Yoma 3 ff.; Tamid 7 (Danby's Eng. trans., 164 ff., 588 f.). 5b. 'How glorious was he when he looked forth from the tabernacle, and when he came forth from the holy place': after the ritual bath, vested for the sacrifice. 6-11. Eleven comparisons describing the impression of awe-inspiring majesty and the ecstatic thrill of worship which the high-priest's appearance produced. The figures are those used in 43:1-13 and 24:17-23 to convey the same ideas. 11c-d-12. The climax of this passage: 'when he went up to the lofty altar and made glorious the holy precincts'. 13-15b. His offering of the sacrificial portions, surrounded by the assistant-priests. 15c-17. The sacrifice completed by the libation of wine. See Num 28:7-10; Phil 2:17. 18-21. Trumpet-sound and choral song as the people bow down in prayer. See Num 10: 2, 10; 2 Par 29:27-30. (In v 20 some edd. of DV misprint 'sinners' for 'singers'.) 22, 23. The high-priest's final blessing. The formula was that of Num 6:24-27. 22c-d. 'And the blessing of the Lord was upon his lips and he glorified himself with the name of Yahweh.' The high-priest alone, on occasion of this blessing once a year, had the privilege of pronouncing the ineffable name 'Yahweh'. 23. 'And again they prostrated, to receive from him the blessing.'

24-26. Ben Sirach's prayer that God may continue to bless Simon in his priestly successors. 25a. 'May he grant you wisdom of heart': the leading idea of the whole work comes out strongly as it draws near its close. 26. 'May his love abide upon Simeon, may he keep in him his covenant with Phinees; may it never fail unto him and his offspring whilst the heavens endure.' 27, 28. In contrast with what precedes comes this reprobation of the Edomites, Philistines and Samaritans. 27. Omit 'which I hate'. Samaria 'is no people', i.e. no people of God; it has apostatized. See Deut 32:21; Os 1:9 f.; 2:24. 28. 'Mount Seir', the centre of Edom's power, south of the Dead Sea. The traditional enmity of the Edomites for Israel was particularly bitter at and after the Exile. See Abd 11-14; Mal 1:2-5; Ps 136:7; 1 Macc 5:65. 'The Philistines', another traditional enemy. In Ben Sirach's time their cities were strongholds of Hellenistic paganism. Shechem, the modern Nablus, in the centre of Samaria.

29-31. The author's subscription to his book. 29. His name in Heb. text is given as 'Simeon son of Yefua son of Eleazar son of Sirach'. But critics, with reason (Oesterley, xv) emend to 'Yefua' son of Eleazar son of Sirach, omitting mention of Simeon, as they do in colophon to ch 51. See § 396h.

LI 1-17 Appendix: a Prayer of Thanksgiving for Deliverance—Knabenbauer, after Rabanus, interprets it collectively, as spoken in the name of the Hebrew people. The common view is that it expresses Ben Sirach's own gratitude for deliverance from personal dangers. What the circumstances were is not clear. It seems that (probably during his period of service abroad, see 34:12, 13; 39:4, 5; 51:18) a slanderous conspiracy against him had put him in danger of his life; he turned to God in prayer and was delivered. 1. 'O King.' See Ps 144:1; Ex 15:2. 2. 'Name' stands for person as known and revered. Heb. continues 'sustainer of my life, for thou hast saved my soul from death'. 3a. Parallel to preceding. 'Destruction': the grave. 3b-c. Specifies the danger: deadly slander. See 28:15-27. 3d. 'In the face of them that stood against me, thou hast...'. 4b. 'From the snare of them that lay in wait to devour': his enemies planned to trap him like an animal for food. See Job 19:22. 5b. 'And from many afflictions thou didst save me.' 6b. 'And in the midst of the fire which I had not fanned': figurative; he had done nothing culpable to draw the attack upon himself. 7a. 'Hell', i.e. Sheol; God delivered him from going down in death. See Jon 2:3. 7d-e. 'From an unclean tongue, and from concocters of lies and the arrows of a deceitful tongue.' See Ps 51:2. 8. 'My soul drew nigh even to death.' 9. 'Hell'; Sheol, as 7. 10 ff. See Ps 21:5-22. 12. 'And savest them out of all evil.' 13. 'I sent up my supplication from the earth, and cried out from the gates of Sheol': when on the point of going to his grave, and figuratively standing on the threshold of the Underworld. 14-15b. He quotes the prayer he uttered in his anguish: 'And I cried "O Lord, thou art my father, for thou art the mighty one of my salvation. Do not leave me in the day of trouble." My father': see 23:1, 5. 15c, 16. Result of his appeal. 'And my prayer the Lord heard, and he gave ear to my appeal', etc. in third person. 17. After this verse Heb. inserts a hymn of praise, of 16 verses. Its authenticity is generally rejected. (English translation in Oesterley, 349 f.; Box, 514 f.)

LI 18-38 Poem concluding the Whole Book—It serves the purpose of a modern preface. It was originally an acrostic, the verses beginning with successive letters of the Heb. alphabet, but the surviving Heb. is defective. 18-24. The writer's zeal in seeking wisdom, praying for it, and practising it when found. 25-30.

406a His success in finding it. 26. Heb. adds 'My hand unlatched her door and I entered in and gazed upon her'. See 14:24-27. 30. With wisdom the Lord has given him a gift of self-expression, both in prayer and in teaching. 31-38. Hence his readiness to teach all who seek wisdom as he himself had sought it. 31, 32. An invitation to learners to frequent his beth midrash or 'house of instruction'. This is the earliest mention of the practice, which developed after the Exile, of experts in the Scriptures giving lessons in their own houses to groups of disciples. 32b. 'How long will ye lack these things?' 33. In his school they will find wisdom, not for money but for earnest application—a reference to the Scribes' custom of not charging for their lessons on the sacred text. 34. 'The yoke': see 6:25-32. 35, 36. The gains he himself has made: peace of soul

('peace to myself', 35), and abundant spiritual riches. 408a These are figuratively described as 'money' and 'gold' in 36. See Prov 3:13-15; 8:10-21; Wis 7:7-12. 37. 'Let your soul rejoice in my place of teaching': Heb. y'sibāh, lit. chair. From meaning the chair from which the teacher lectured it came to have the technical meaning of the class which he taught, and also the lecture-hall where it assembled.

After 38 Heb adds a colophon, which in all probability is a scribal addition. In it, the name Simeon is regarded as an unauthentic interpolation, as in 50:29. It runs: 'Blessed be the Lord for ever, and praised be his name for all generations. Thus far are the words of Simeon son of Yēšua' called Ben Sirach. The wisdom of Simeon son of Yēšua' son of Eleazar son of Sirach. Blessed be the name of the Lord from now and unto eternity.'

c The Prophetical Literature—This section of the Bible comprises the four major and the twelve minor prophets together with Baruch and Lamentations as an appendix to the book of Jeremias. The order of the four major prophets is chronological and that of the minor prophets was intended to be so, but the dates of some are uncertain. The writing of Baruch owes its place to the fact that he was secretary to Jeremias, Jer 36:4, the author of Lamentations as of the book which bears his name. The prose book of Jonas differs so widely from the other prophetic writings that at first sight it appears to be out of place among them. As a prophet, however, is one who announces to the people the message which God puts into his mouth (§ 409e), Jonas was a true prophet and his book in the right series. 409e On the other hand, the book of Daniel as well as Lam. has its place in the Hebrew Bible, not among the prophets but in the third division among the Hagio-grapha. (The Hebrew canon does not acknowledge the sacred character of Baruch.) This is not unreasonable as, though Daniel received divine revelations, he lived his life at a foreign court and was not charged with a divine mission to preach.

The Hebrew Bible, moreover, classes all those whom d we call prophets, with the exceptions of Baruch and Daniel, as 'the later prophets' and under the title of 'the former prophets' includes Jos, Jud, 1 and 2 Samuel, and 1 and 2 Kg (the last four being our 1-4 Kg). The explanation is that the history of the Chosen People was viewed as the story of God's relations with them through the intermediary of the series of prophets whom he had promised to raise up after Moses as his divinely authorized spokesmen, cf. § 409i. The distinction of the prophets into major and minor refers only to the length of their compositions, and has nothing to do with their authority, which is the same for all. The terms were used already by St Augustine: 'Propterea dicuntur minores quia sermones eorum sunt breves in eorum comparatione qui maiores ideo vocantur quia proluxa volumina condiderunt,' De Civ. Dei 18, 29.

The Essence of the Prophetic Office—The OT e prophet was an intermediary between God and the people. He received from God the message which God wished to be communicated, and then himself handed it on. He was God's mouth. This essential function of the prophet is clearly shown in the relation which God established between Moses and Aaron. When the former protested his inability to carry out the mission God was imposing upon him, on the ground of the defect of speech which afflicted him, God ordered Moses to put the divine words into Aaron's mouth for him to speak to the people in Moses' stead: 'He shall be thy mouth and thou shalt be for him a god', Ex 4:16. And that the function here assigned to Aaron is that of the prophet as between God and the people is shown by the parallel passage, Ex 7:1 f., where God says to Moses: 'Behold I have appointed thee the God of Pharaoh, and Aaron thy brother shall be thy prophet; thou shalt speak to him all that I command thee and he shall speak to Pharaoh'. As the function of Aaron was to deliver to Pharaoh the message Moses put into his mouth, so the function of the prophet was to deliver the message put into his mouth by God. This is the account which the prophets give of themselves. Jeremias says of his own appointment as prophet: 'The Lord put forth his hand and touched my mouth; and the Lord said to me: Behold I have put my words in thy mouth', 1:9. So Zach 7:12, 'They made their heart as the adamant stone lest they should hear the law and the words which the Lord of hosts sent in his spirit by the hand of the former prophets'; cf. Ez 3:17. The prediction of the future was a frequent but not a necessary part of a prophet's work. This was understood long ago by St Augustine, 'A prophet is just this, an announcer of the words of God to men', Quaest. 17 in Exod., PL34, 601. Similarly St John Chrysostom, 'The mouth of the prophets is the mouth

f Names used for a Prophet—In 1 Kg 9:9 it is said, 'He that is now called a prophet, in time past was called a seer'. The former name in Hebrew is the common word nābī, the etymological examination of which is not helpful. The root does not occur in Hebrew except in connexion with prophecy, and the word itself does not occur in the kindred languages. In accordance with the Assyrian nabū 'to call' a nābī could mean 'one called' as māšīah means 'one anointed'. The Hebrew word rō'eh, translated 'seer', is the present participle of the common word for 'to see' and takes its rise from the prophet's knowledge of distant or hidden events as of the fate of the lost asses sought by Saul, 1 Kg 10:2. A synonym of this word is another present participle hōzeh. It is not possible to establish diversity of meaning between the two. The three words occur in the order given above in 1 Par 29:29, 'Samuel the seer', 'Nathan the prophet', and 'Gad the seer'. Samuel and Gad are elsewhere styled prophets, 1 Kg 3:20, and 2 Kg 24:11. Hanani is called a prophet in 3 Kg 16:7, and is also designated by both the words for seer, 2 Par 16:7, 10 and 19:2.

g In the LXX nābī is always translated by προφήτης except where understood of a false prophet. This word well represents the Hebrew as it also signifies one who speaks in place of another as interpreter. In particular it was used of the interpreter of the oracles given by the mūvris at Delphi, Plato Timaeus 72a, Herodotus, 8, 36 f.

h As the prophets were charged to deliver the word of God they are aptly called his messengers, Is 44:26, Agg 1:13, Mal 3:1. By reason of his union with God a prophet is designated 'a man of God', Jos 14:6 (of Moses), 1 Kg 2:27 (unnamed), 9:6 (of Samuel), etc., and as doing his will they are his 'servants', Am 3:7, Jer 7:25; 25:4. As it was in virtue of 'the spirit of the Lord' which came upon him that a prophet uttered his prophecy, 2 Par 20:14, a prophet was 'a man of the spirit', Os 9:7. In the only passage where this phrase occurs it is actually used collectively of false prophets as is the word 'prophet' in the same place, so that the sense is 'he who is reputed by the people to be a prophet, a man of the spirit'. In virtue of his office a prophet is a watchman set upon the walls to warn of danger, Jer 6:17, Ez 3:17, etc.

i God's Promise of Prophets—God's promise to raise up a succession of prophets among his people is given in Deut 18:9-19. At Sinai the Hebrews were overwhelmed by the majesty of the theophany and implored God not to let them hear his voice again or witness the manifestations of the theophany. In answer God promised to deal with his people through the intermediary of prophets: 'I will raise them up a prophet out of the midst of their brethren like to thee, and I will put my words in his mouth and he shall speak to them all that I shall command him', v 18. The future prophets were not to be like Moses in all respects, for 'there arose no more a prophet in Israel like unto Moses whom the Lord knew face to face', Deut 34:10. They were to be like Moses in their essential function of being intermediaries between God and his people and of communicating to them the divine commands. They were to be Israelites but not of any particular family like the priests, Ex 28:1, 43, nor of a particular tribe like the Levites, Num 3:6 f., 45. God would appoint whomsoever he chose. By the presence in their midst of this succession of prophets the people would be safeguarded against the danger of imitating the evil practices of the Canaanites whose land they were to dwell in. Those pagan peoples had wizards, soothsayers and necromancers—all an abomination to the Lord and the Israelites were forbidden to have any dealings with them. They should consult God's own chosen representatives.

j Although the divine promise speaks in the singular of a prophet, it is clear from the whole context that this, in accordance with Hebrew idiom, is a collective singular and refers not merely to Christ himself but to the whole succession of prophets, which was to culminate in the king of prophets, Christ our Lord. As the immediately foregoing passages deal with judges, 16:18-17:13, with the institution of the kingship, 17:14-20, with the priests and Levites, 18:1-8, so our passage deals with prophets. The institution of prophets was promised to guard the people from imminent dangers, 14 f.; these dangers would not be met by the sending of a great prophet after many hundreds of years. Again, the promise was made in answer to the petition of the people for an intermediary, a petition which would not be met by the raising up of one in the distant future. Finally, the passage closes with a warning against false prophets, which would be unnecessary if the coming of only one great prophet were foretold. The patristic evidence is adequately dealt with by Cornely, 279. The passage makes it clear that the succession of prophets was not to be an organized institution. It was not to be hereditary like the priesthood. No one could make himself a prophet nor could one train another and induct him into the office. God himself would 'raise up', 18, as prophets those whom he should choose.

Historical—The passage we have been considering as well as Moses' whole career show that he was himself a prophet; cf. Os 12:13. His sister Mary is called a prophetess, Ex 15:20, for God spoke also by or through her, Num 12:2. Among the patriarchs Abraham is called a prophet and indeed by God himself, Gen 20:7, for Abraham had been made the intermediary of the divine revelation concerning the covenant with himself and his seed and concerning its outward sign, the sign of circumcision, Gen 17:10 f. The word nābī, used in the Pentateuch for prophet was not that in current use among the people in the days of Samuel, 1 Kg 9:9, and only became popular later, but that, of course, does not mean that the word was previously unknown and never used.

From the time of Moses to the cessation of prophecy the history of the prophets falls into two periods, the period preceding the reign of Jeroboam II, c 800 B.C., and that beginning with it. The distinction is based partly on the fact that the prophets of the second period produced a more abundant and still extant prophetic literature, and partly on a development of prophecy characteristic of the later period. At the beginning of the first period between Moses and Samuel little is heard of prophets. In the Gk and Latin texts of Eccles 46:1 Josue is said to have been the successor of Moses in the prophetic office, but according to the original Hebrew text he was 'the minister of Moses' in that office in accordance with Ex 33:11. Deborah, who was also one of the Judges, was a prophetess, Jud 4:4; cf. 4:6, 14. Jud 6:8-10 narrates how a prophet in the name of God let the people know that the sufferings inflicted on them by the Midianites were a punishment for their worship of local Amorite gods. This infidelity of the people was perhaps the reason why God did not send more prophets during this period, the divine promise to help the Chosen People with a succession of prophets being like all such promises accompanied by the tacit condition that the people do not make themselves unworthy of the favour. The only other prophet mentioned before Samuel is the 'man of God' who announced the divine sentence of reprobation against Heli and his house, 1 Kg 2:27-36. And it is explicitly remarked that 'the word of the Lord was rare in those days; there was no public vision', that is, revelation intended for the people at large, 1 Kg 3:1. There is some legitimate hyperbole in Jer 7:25 according to which God had sent prophets without intermission from the time of the Exodus.

It is in the time of Samuel that we twice read of 'a company of prophets', the one at Saul's home town of Gibeah, 1 Kg 10:5, and the other at Naioth in Ramah, 1 Kg 19:20. These men do not seem to have 410e been prophets in the strict sense which we have been considering hitherto. The first company was 'prophesying' to the accompaniment of various musical instruments, of which, however, there is no mention in connexion with the prophesying of the second group. The text does not indicate in what this 'prophesying' consisted. In 1 Par 25:1-7, however, where it is narrated how David set aside the families of Asaph, Heman and Idithun for the ministry of music and song at the tabernacle, their chants of praise and thanksgiving to God are called 'prophesying'. No doubt the prophesying of the companies of prophets also consisted in singing the praises of the God of Israel, but accompanied in these cases by some extraordinary psychic manifestations, some superexcitation of the faculties bordering on frenzy. It was owing to 'the spirit of the Lord' coming upon them that Saul and his messengers joined the bands in prophesying, 1 Kg 10:10; 19:20, 23. At Ramah, it should be noted, the spirit came upon Saul before he actually met the company. Something similar had happened when God took of the spirit which was in Moses and set it on the seventy elders, the newly appointed assistants of Moses. Not only those who had gone out with Moses to the tent of meeting, began to 'prophesy', but also two who, though nominated, had not gone out with the others, Num 11:25-27. These two examples show that the prophesying was not due to any contagious psychic influence. The extraordinary nature of the manifestations at Ramah is shown by what is said of Saul that 'he also,' he like the others, 'stripped himself of his garments and prophesied before Samuel and lay naked all that day and night', 1 Kg 19:24. That Saul stripped off his garments points to literal nakedness and not merely to the removal of his outer clothing. The frenzied character of this 'prophesying' is further indicated by the fact that the same form of the same verb is used when an evil spirit came upon Saul and he cast his spear at David with the intention of killing him. Here the meaning is that Saul 'raved' in his house, 1 Kg 10:10. (The passages where prophets are called 'mad' are sometimes quoted in this connexion, but their context makes such an inference from them precarious; 4 Kg 9:11 army officers speaking of a disciple of Eliseus, Os 9:7 of false prophets and in the sense that their utterances were foolish, Jer 29:26 used by the false prophet Semeias of true prophets.) Finally, it is to be observed that the mention of these companies of prophets in the time of Samuel is not made for its own sake, but only because they happen to enter into the history of Saul. Had they not entered in any way into the life of Saul, nothing probably would have been recorded of them. Inferences, therefore, drawn from the silence of Scripture about similar bodies before the time of Elias are at best ill-founded.

• The company of prophets at Naioth in Ramah was under the presidency of Samuel, 1 Kg 19:20, but their relation to him is not more accurately defined. It is in the time of Elias and Eliseus that we first read of 'the disciples of the prophets', lit. 'sons of the prophets'—an instance of the common Semitic idiom whereby any connexion, physical or moral, is expressed by terms denoting blood relationships. It is surprising how copiously it has been found possible to write on the basis of the scanty information given in the Bible concerning these sons of the prophets. The first mention of them is in 3 Kg 20:35-43 where one, who is also called a prophet, 38, delivers a message of rephension from God to Achab. They are found only in the Northern Kingdom, at Bethel, 4 Kg 2:3, at Jericho, 2:5, at Galgal, 4:38, by the Jordan where they prepare a more commodious dwelling, 6:1 f. Evidently they were numerous. Fifty are mentioned at Jericho, 2:7, 15 f., one hundred at Galgal, 4:43. Living in common they had also their meals in common, 4:38-44. Some are young, 5:22; 9:4; some are married, 4:1 (MT, LXX). They are sent on missions by Eliseus, 9:1 ff. However, Eliseus did not live with the disciples all the time, 4:38 (Galgol), as we find 410e him living on Mount Carmel, 2:25; 4:25, and in his own house in Samaria, 5:9; 6:32. After the time of Eliseus and the anointing of Jehu to be king we hear nothing more of organized bodies of disciples of the prophets, though whether this is accidental or because they ceased to exist it is impossible to say. Some have thought the protestation of Amos, 7:14, that he was not 'the son of a prophet', to imply the continued existence of these communities, but clearly a prophet might have one or two disciples without the existence of whole communities, cf. Is 8:16. St Jerome looked upon them as the monks of the OT, 'quos monachos in Veteri Testamento legimus', Ep. 125 ad Rusticum Monachum, PL 22, 1076. Also in Ep. 58 ad Paulinum, PL 22, 583. In the opinion of the Rabbis the institutions were colleges or schools, whence the now common appellation 'schools of the prophets', for which there is little justification in Scripture and which was unknown to the Fathers, Cornely 278. It is possible, or even probable, that the hundred prophets concealed by Abdias from Jezabel's murderous hatred were members of one of these associations, 3 Kg 18:4, 13. On the other hand, this cannot have been the case with the four hundred prophets who recommended Achab to undertake the proposed expedition to recover Ramoth Galaad and who were not prophets of Baal as they prophesied in the name of Yahweh. As Josaphat refused to recognize them as true prophets of Yahweh, they must have been prophets addicted to the illegitimate calf-worship of Bethel and Dan, 3 Kg 22:6-12. Since persecution strengthens the religious spirit in the strong and fervent as it tends to extinguish it in the weak and lax, it may be that the hostility to the true worship of Yahweh in the Northern Kingdom from the time of Jeroboam I was the driving force which led to the formation of these prophetic associations. On the other hand, as the mention of them is always incidental, generally to the story of Elias and Eliseus—they are never mentioned for their own sake—it would be hazardous to suppose that none such existed simultaneously in the Southern Kingdom. The outstanding prophets of this first period were Samuel, Elias and Eliseus. Others of less importance and fame were Nathan, Gad, Ahias and Micheas. They were consulted by the people about the affairs of daily life, as when Saul consulted Samuel about the lost asses, 1 Kg 9:6 ff.; Jeroboam I consulted Ahias about the sickness of his son, 3 Kg 14:1-13; Elias rebuked Ochozias for sending to consult Beelzebub, the god of Ekron (Accaron) whereas he ought to have consulted the God of Israel, 4 Kg 1:2-8; Benadad consulted Eliseus about his illness, 4 Kg 8:9 f. And the practice was common: 'In time past in Israel when a man went to consult God, he spoke thus, Come, let us go to the seer', 1 Kg 9:9. This favour of God to the people was in accordance with the partial purpose for which a succession of prophets had been promised, namely that they should not be tempted to go after the wizards and soothsayers of the Canaanites, Deut 18:10-15. Their predictions also had reference to important affairs of state. Samuel foretold the rejection of Saul from the kingly office, 1 Kg 15:26; Nathan foretold to David that he would be succeeded on the throne by his own son, 2 Kg 7:12; Ahias foretold the rending of the kingdom which was to follow the death of Solomon and Jeroboam's elevation to the throne, 3 Kg 11:29-39. They also took an important part in affairs of state, as was consonant with the fact that the monarchy was theocratic and the interests of Israel were the interests of the God of Israel. This is abundantly illustrated in the history of Samuel both before and after the election of Saul, in the position of Nathan at the court of David and his part in securing the election of Solomon, 3 Kg 1:11-30, in the anointing of Jehu as king at the order of Eliseus, 4 Kg 9:1-10. This activity even extended to the affairs of foreign states. Elias was ordered by God to anoint Hazael as king over Syria (Damascus), 3 Kg 411b 19:16. We do not read of the literal fulfilment of this command, and A Lapidé understands the anointing metaphorically. It is reported that Eliseus later announced to Hazael his coming accession to the throne, 4 Kg 8:13. Apart from one important prediction the Messianic idea received no further expansion during this period. This was Nathan's promise to David that the kingship should belong to his seed for ever, 2 Kg 7:12-16. No prophecy is more frequently referred to in the OT, Ps 88, Ps 131, 3 Kg 2:4, etc., and it was rightly understood to mean that the Messiah was to be of the Davidic line.

d As all the activity of the prophets was aimed at promoting the interests of religion, either directly or indirectly, so in particular they were defenders of the moral law and denounced failure in obedience to God and idolatrous or irregular divine worship. Thus an unnamed prophet denounced the worship of Canaanite deities, Jud 6:8-10; a man of God rebuked the high-priest Heli for allowing his sons to dishonour the sacrificial worship of the tabernacle, 1 Kg 2:27-36; Samuel reproved king Saul for disregarding the divine command and reminded him that God is not pleased with sacrifice accompanied by disobedience, 1 Kg 15:22 f.; Samuel won the people over from idolatry, at least for a time, 1 Kg 7:3 f., and encouraged them to the practice of true religion while reminding them of the penalties which would follow disloyalty, 1 Kg 12:6-25. Nathan fearlessly denounced to David the iniquity of his adultery and blood-guilt in respect of Urias and proclaimed to him the divine sentence of punishment, 2 Kg 12:1-15. 'A man of God out of Judah' publicly rebuked Jeroboam I for the illegitimate cult he had introduced into the Northern Kingdom, 3 Kg 13:1-5. For the same wickedness Ahias charged the wife of Jeroboam I with a stern message of condemnation and punishment to be delivered to her royal husband, 3 Kg 14:7-16. Equally bold and stern was the denunciation with which Elias met Achab for his guilt in the murder of Naboth and wrongful seizure of his vineyard, 3 Kg 21:17-24. Another royal offender rebuked by Elias was Ochozias of Israel. He had sinned by sending to consult Beelzebub, the God of Ekron (Accaron) 4 Kg 2-17.

e We have, further, records of literary activity undertaken by the prophets of this time. Annals, which, like the extant historical writings, will have been religious histories, were written by Samuel, Nathan and Gad, 1 Par 29:29. These contained the story of David's time. That of Solomon's reign was written by Nathan and by Ahias in his 'prophecy' as well as by Addo the seer, 2 Par 9:29. As the work of Addo was written against Jeroboam I, who prevented the people from making pilgrimage to the central sanctuary at Jerusalem and set up forbidden images of Yahweh at Bethel and Dan, and as it is called a 'Vision' like the writings of Isaias and Abdias, it must besides historical records have preserved some at least of his prophetic revelations. The same seer also wrote a record of the reign of Roboam, as did also the prophet Semeias, 2 Par 12:15. Addo, thirdly, wrote a history of Abia in his 'Midrash', 2 Par 13:22. Finally, Jehu, the son of Hanani, seer (2 Par 19:21) and prophet (3 Kg 16:7) chronicled the history of Josaphat, 2 Par 20:34. The titles 'Dibre of Nathan' (2 Par 29:29) and 'Dibre of Jehu' (2 Par 20:34) do not prove the exclusively historical character of these books as is shown by the introductory words of Amos, 1:1, 'the Dibre of Amos', and of Jer 1:1, 'the Dibre of Jeremias,' though it is hardly to be doubted that the proportion of historical to prophetic matter was higher in the books of the older prophets than in those of the later.

412a When the activities of these more ancient prophets are compared to those of the prophets who lived in the period of extant prophetic writings, it is found that the latter are essentially the same though with development and change of emphasis. In the first place the old names for 'seer' remain in use. Both occur in Is 30:10 and Amos is called a hōzeh, Am 7:12. Then there are still prophets who are not recorded to have put their message into writing. Such was Oded, a contemporary of Isaias, 2 Par 28:9, and Huldah (Holda), a prophetess contemporary with Jeremias, 4 Kg 22:14. Some of the apparent differences between the two periods may be due merely to the accidental circumstance that there was occasion to mention in the records of the older period what there was no occasion to mention in those of the later. As a fact, there is no further mention of companies of prophets nor of numerous disciples of prophets. It is almost certainly accidental that there is no mention of prophets being consulted about private affairs. Ezechias may, though it is not recorded, have asked Isaias about the issue of his sickness, 4 Kg 20:1. None of the examples mentioned in the older period was recorded for its own sake, but in each case on account of certain attendant circumstances. People still consulted wizards and soothsayers, Is 8:19, and it is very unlikely that none of the faithful consulted true prophets.

Predictions about affairs of state were common. Jonas foretold to Jeroboam II the restoration of the borders of Israel, 4 Kg 14:25. Isaias foretold to Ezechias the delivery of Jerusalem from the threatened attack of Sennacherib's forces, his return to Assyria and subsequent murder, 4 Kg 19:2-7, 32-34. Prophets in the time of Manasses predicted the coming destruction of Jerusalem on account of the wickedness of the king and the people, 4 Kg 21:10-15. And they frequently intervened in affairs of state. Osee condemned alliances with Assyria and with Egypt, 12:1. Similarly Isaias condemned the folly of placing trust in the help of Egypt, 31:1-3. And Jeremias had the unenviable duty of preaching the need of submitting to the hated foreign yoke of Nabuchodonosor, 27:12-17. This intervention extended even to foreign states. Jeremias sent messages through their royal ambassadors to the kings of Edom, Moab, Ammon, Tyre and Sidon telling them that God had created the world and its inhabitants, and had given them to Nabuchodonosor, and that therefore they should submit to him under penalty of suffering war, famine and pestilence, 27:3-8. Apart from such direct action, the series of prophecies directed against other peoples is peculiar to this second period. Amos has a series of prophetic threats against Damascus, Gaza, Tyre, Edom, Ammon and Moab, chh 1 and 2. A large part of Isaias 13-23 is occupied by forebodings of evil to Babylon, Philistia, Moab, Damascus, Egypt, Ethiopia, Arabia and Tyre. Jeremias, 46-51, has another similar list of prophecies concerning the nations. See also Ez 25-32. To Jeremias, indeed, at the beginning of his mission God had said, 'Lo, I have set thee this day over the nations and over kingdoms, to root up, and to pull down, and to waste, and to destroy, and to build, and to plant', 1:10; cf. 25:15. Characteristic among the themes of prophetic preaching in this period is the abundance of Messianic prophecy, which had been so scanty earlier. Some outline of this has been given, § 102h-o. Denunciation of iniquity also plays a far greater part in the mission of these later prophets than it had done with the earlier, as does likewise the annunciation of coming divine chastisement. Indeed, the duty most incumbent on the prophets was to denounce sin and to recall the people from their wicked ways to the true service of God: 'Cry aloud, cease not, lift up thy voice like a trumpet, and declare to my people their transgression and to the house of Jacob their sins', Is 58:1. To speak humanly, the patience of God was becoming exhausted. 'The Lord hath sent to you all his servants the prophets, diligently and persistently, and you have not hearkened, nor inclined your ears to hear', Jer 25:4. And, therefore, because they persisted obstinately in rebellious and wicked conduct, the hour of final chastisement was approaching. Though God was known to be 'gracious and merciful, patient and of much compassion, and easy to forgive evil', Jon 4:2, his justice demanded that iniquity should not go unpunished for ever. The reward of sin would be the foreign captivity of the nation 412f and the destruction of the capitals of Samaria and Jerusalem. This is the burden of the message delivered by the prophets from the time of Osee and Amos. The former addressing the Northern Kingdom wrote: 'The Lord shall enter into judgement with the inhabitants of the land; for there is no truth and there is no mercy, and there is no knowledge of God in the land; cursing and lying and killing and theft and adultery have overflowed, and blood hath touched blood', Os 4:1 f. Therefore shall come another time of bondage like that of Egypt, and Ephraim shall be taken captive to Assyria, Os 9:3. So too Amos castigates the injustice and heartlessness of the men of Samaria who 'oppress the needy and crush the poor', 2:6-8, 4:1, and their forbidden image worship, 4:4 f. And because they will not desist from such iniquities, 'now they shall go captive at the head of them that go into captivity', 6:7, 7:17. 'And I will make Samaria as a heap of stones in the field when a vineyard is planted,' Mic 1:6. So too in the case of Judah: 'Behold every one of you walketh after the perverseness of his evil heart, so as not to hearken to me; so I will cast you forth out of this land into a land which you know not nor your fathers', Jer 16:12 f. And more precisely: 'I will give all Judah into the hand of the king of Babylon, and he shall carry them away to Babylon,' Jer 20:4.

g But God had promised from the beginning that he would not utterly reject his people: 'When they shall be in the land of their enemies, I will not cast them off altogether neither will I so abhor them that they should be quite consumed and I should make void my covenant with them', Lev 26:44. The covenant was never to be wholly dissolved and its permanence involved the preservation of a faithful remnant even in times of the most absolute national infidelity and material disaster. This doctrine of the remnant became a commonplace in the prophetic literature. It was implicit in the Messianic hope and with the promise of return from captivity constituted the main ground for the prophets' words of encouragement and consolation. Thus Isaiah, 6:13, speaking of the nation under the figure of a tree felled to the ground, said, 'the stump thereof shall be a holy seed'. The nation would not be allowed to perish root and branch; sinful man could not completely thwart the plans of God. 'I will destroy (the sinful kingdom) from the face of the earth, but yet I will not utterly destroy the house of Jacob', Am 9:8. And the return from captivity would herald the restoration of the nation. 'I will bring back the captivity of my people Israel and they shall build the devastated cities, Am 9:14. 'I will set my eyes upon them to be pacified and I will bring them again to this land', Jer 24:6. And conjoined with this restoration is the future Messianic hope and all the glory of the Messianic kingdom; cf. § 418a.

h Certain other points of the prophetic teaching have been touched on elsewhere, their attitude to sacrifices, § 114f, their universalism, § 115g, their concern with foreign nations, § 412d. The question of personal responsibility cannot be satisfactorily treated in a few lines, yet all reference to it should not be omitted here. The problem is raised by both Jer 31:29 f. and Ez 18:1 ff. Both quote a saying current at the time, 'The fathers have eaten sour grapes and the teeth of the children are set on edge'. The complaint against God was that the generation of the time was being unjustly punished on account of the iniquities of their fathers. The occasion of the complaint was the announcement that God would make them an object lesson to the nations of the earth on account of the wickedness of Manasses, Jer 15:4; 4 Kg 24:3. The answer to the complaint is that each man shall die for his own sin. It must be recalled, firstly, that the penalties threatened and imposed for the greater part of the history of the OT were temporal only. Secondly, individual responsibility was recognized in the Covenant where the death of the criminal is imposed for certain crimes, Ex 21:14 ff. Thirdly, the words of the decalogue that God visits the iniquity of the fathers on the children, Ex 20:5, are not set aside. Jer 32:18, the 412h very next chapter, repeats them; Lam 5:7 declares 'Our fathers have sinned and are not, and we have borne their iniquities'; our Lord himself says that the principle would be applied to his own generation, Mt 23:35. No one is punished more severely than his own sins deserve. But the iniquities of the fathers may be visited on the children in the sense that prolonged persistence in wickedness may be the cause that the justice of God falls on a nation as it might not have done had it not been for the nation's long past of wickedness. And the solidarity of human society is so close that children inevitably suffer at times, though they are not thereby punished, for the transgressions of their forebears.

It is probable that the literary activity of this period 418a was motivated especially by its Messianic prophecies and by its predictions of the approaching destruction of both the Hebrew kingdoms in punishment for their persistent idolatry and moral iniquity. These messages were not addressed only to contemporaries. It was important that subsequent generations should have a record not only of the new revelations concerning the Messianic kingdom, but also a proof in the writings of the prophets that the destruction of their kingdoms and capitals had been foreseen and foretold and therefore understand that it was brought about by the divine government of the world; that the Assyrian was indeed 'the rod of (God's) anger', Is 10:5, and that the Babylonian had been called by him out of the north against all the cities of Judah, Jer 1:14 f.

Besides the extant prophetic writings one at least of b the prophets of this period wrote also historical annals as did several of their predecessors. 2 Par 26:22 refers for further information about the reign of Ozias to the history written by the prophet Isaiah. The other reference to a writing of this prophet in the same book, 32:32 (erroneously omitted in some copies of DV), is to his account of Ezechias, Is 36-39, 4 Kg 18-20.

A divine command to write is recorded of four prophets, e Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezechiel and Habacuc. The first was ordered to write concerning two individual prophecies, Is 8:1 and 30:8, and only in the latter case is the purpose indicated that it should be for a lasting memorial. The first command received by Jeremiah was also concerned only with one prophecy, 30:2-4. On the second occasion, however, the order was to commit to writing the whole series of prophecies which he had received from the first days of his ministry, 36:2. That the universal expression was not intended quite literally is evident from the fact that when king Joakim burnt the volume and Jeremiah was ordered to write it all again, 'there were added besides many more words than had been before', 36:32. Ezechiel's order to write also covered only part of his book, that namely dealing with the rebuilding of the temple, 43:11. The command given to Habacuc is recorded in 2:2 of his book. The fact that the prophets whose writings are preserved in the canon, all wrote under divine inspiration, does not necessarily imply that they received an injunction from God to write. A personal decision based on the conviction of the wisdom and utility of committing their prophecies to writing is quite compatible with their inspiration.

The chronological order of the prophets is mostly d indicated by the information given in the introductions to their books. This is lacking only in the case of Joel, Abdias, Jonas, Nahum and Habacuc. If Jonas is, as seems most probable, the prophet of the same name and parentage mentioned 4 Kg 14:25, he lived under Jeroboam II. From the contents of their writings, Abdias may be dated some time after the destruction of Jerusalem, Nahum some time before the destruction of Nineveh, 612, and Habacuc some time in the 7th cent. The indications given by Joel are patient of different interpretations and he has been dated both very early and very late. See the introduction to the books and also that to Daniel.

418e From Malachias there was a cessation of prophecy until the coming of St John the Baptist. Josephus was perhaps unwilling to acknowledge this complete cessation, as he says only that from the time of Artaxerxes I, 465-424, the succession of prophets had not been 'precise' or 'definite' (ἀκριβής), presumably meaning indubitable or universally acknowledged, Contra Apionem I 8. In the time of the Maccabees the absence of prophets is several times alluded to, 1 Mac 4:46; 14:41. And 1 Mac 9:27 implies that this cessation had lasted for a considerable time: 'there was a great tribulation in Israel, such as was not since the day that there was no prophet seen in Israel'. Where God has not revealed his mind, it is hazardous to attempt an explanation, but with due reservations the following considerations may be suggested. The series of Messianic prophecies had presumably reached the term intended by God. There was no further serious danger of idolatry. And the love of the law and of ancestral traditions which was characteristic of the period, and the labours of the Scribes, professional students of the law who first appear at this time, were adequate to keep the people in the main faithful to their religion. Finally, this prolonged cessation of prophecy provoked the keener admiration and a more ready willingness to listen when at long last a new prophet did arise proclaiming the near advent of the Kingdom of God and of the Messias. This cessation after the exile could hardly be due, it seems, to divine punishment, as in general the law was more faithfully observed and religion practised more zealously than previously. The comparative absence of revelation before Samuel's call may have been a punishment of the prevailing lawlessness when every man did what was right in his own eyes, 1 Kg 3:1, Jud 21:24. Among the calamities that were to come on the Northern Kingdom Amos mentions the impossibility of finding the word of the Lord 8:12. And similarly in punishment was foretold the cessation of prophecy at the time of the destruction of Jerusalem, Is 3:1 f., Ez 7:26. And the actual cessation is spoken of Lam 2:9, Dan 3:38 (DV), Ps 73:9. There is, however, here a legitimate hyperbole. Jeremiah was in Jerusalem up to its capture, but he was derided, persecuted and disbelieved.

f In later time the distinguishing garb of a prophet was a rough mantle woven of hair or a skin worn with the hairy side outwards, such as Zacharias says the false prophets shall no longer wear with intent to deceive, i.e. to pretend to be what they were not in fact, 13:4. Such was the sackcloth which Isaias was ordered to remove from off his loins, 20:2, on which passage A Lapidus adduces several arguments to prove that it was the prophet's only garment, so that stripped of it he was literally naked. Such was the mantle of Elias, 3 Kg 19:19, 4 Kg 2:13, for this seems to be the reason why he was described as 'a hairy man', 4 Kg 1:8 (DV, RV), lit. 'a possessor of hair'. It is there added that he had 'a girdle of leather about his loins'. This rough mantle of woven hair or hairy skin would appear not to have been the customary garb of prophets before Elias, as Ochozias was able to recognize Elias by the description, which he would not have been able to do if it had been already usual for prophets so to dress. We read of Joram of Israel wearing a garment of haircloth under his other clothes during the siege of Samaria, 4 Kg 6:30. Such was also the practice of Judith, 8:6. See also Heb 11:37, Mt 3:4; 11:8.

g There was no special rule of life common to the prophets. Their one rule was to carry out the mission entrusted to them by God. Some we know to have been married, as Isaias, 7:3; 8:3, and the prophetess Huldah (Holda), 4 Kg 22:14. So also Osee, 1:2-9; 3:1 f. Jeremiah, on the other hand, was forbidden to marry, 16:2. The reason given had nothing to do with the merit of celibacy, but was that the sons and daughters born in Jerusalem and Judah should die grievous deaths. The prophets' manner of life must to some extent at least have been influenced by the profession and state of life in which their call found them. The ministry of prophecy was not, of course, hereditary. Only in one case do we read of a prophet being the son of a prophet or seer, namely Jehu the son of Hanani, 3 Kg 16:1 and 2 Par 16:7. (In 3 Kg 16:7 it is probably Jehu who is called a prophet and not his father Hanani—so RV against DV.) Several were priests as Jeremias, 1:1, Ezechiel, 1:3, and Zacharias, 2 Par 24:20 f. Eliseus was a prosperous farmer, 3 Kg 19:19. Amos was a herdman who also looked after sycamore trees, fruit trees allied to the common fig tree, 1:1; 7:14.

However the details of their lives may have differed, h the prophets had in general an ungrateful and a dangerous calling. The least trial that befell them was to meet with disbelief and distrust, Is 7:1-13, to be told to stop prophesying and be gone, Am 7:12 f. Some it was sought to kill, as Elias, 3 Kg 19:2 f., and Eliseus, 4 Kg 6:31 f. Some were imprisoned as Hanani by Asa, 2 Par 16:10, as Micheas the son of Jemla by order of Achab, 3 Kg 22:26 f., and Jeremias, 32:2; 37:14; 38:6. Others were put to death. In the Northern Kingdom, in the words of Elias' prayer, 'they have slain thy prophets with the sword', 3 Kg 19:10, 14. The only one mentioned by name as put to death by the sword is Urias, son of Semei, killed by Joakim, Jer 26:23. Zacharias, the son of Joiada, was stoned by order of Joas in the court of the temple, 1 Par 24:20-22, Mt 23:35. The Jews had an ancient tradition that Isaias was sawn asunder by Manasses with a wooden saw. St Jerome on Is 57:1 calls this 'a quite definite tradition' of the Jews ('quae apud eos certissima traditio est'; first attested by Justin Martyr, Contra Tryphonem 120). There was also a tradition that Jeremias was stoned to death, St Jerome, Adv. Jovin. 2, 37, PL 23, 335. But, of course, the career of the prophets was not one of unbroken opposition. Under good kings, such as David, Ezechias and Josias they were held in honour, 2 Kg 7, Is 37-39, 4 Kg 22:14 ff. And even Jeremias met with protection from princes and people, 26:16.

The Call and Mission of the Prophets—The ministry of the prophets was not hereditary and was independent of any particular state of life, but it was not open to any man of good will to constitute himself a prophet. The revelation of God's will which it involved was purely supernatural, and therefore the call to the office could come from God alone. Only in a few cases, however, have we any details about the divine call and mission. Amos in support of his right and duty to prophesy appealed to the divine command: 'The Lord took me when I followed the flock, and the Lord said to me: Go, prophesy to my people Israel', 7:15. Eliseus was similarly engaged, ploughing with a yoke of oxen, when he received his summons through the intermediary of Elias. The latter had been ordered by God to anoint Eliseus as prophet in his stead. Elias fulfilled the command by casting his mantle upon his successor as a sign that he was called to the same prophetic office, 3 Kg 19:16, 19. Nowhere else except Is 61:1, which is certainly metaphorical, is there mention of anointing as was done in the case of kings and priests, and the manner in which Elias fulfilled his commission points to the conclusion that here also the anointing is to be understood metaphorically. Details of their calls are given by Isaias, ch 6, and by Jeremias, 1:4-10. Ezechiel, without mentioning his mission explicitly, gives details of the time and place of his first vision, 1:1-3, 'and the hand of the Lord was there upon him'.

As the original call was independent of the will of b man, so also was the reception of divine revelations and messages after the call. A prophet was not always in the prophetic state. Though the mission might be for life, the exercise of the office was intermittent and depended solely on the will of God. The prophet retained, of course, his free will, but it was not within his power to receive a message when he willed.

414b At times there was a cessation of prophecy (§ 413e) when God did not vouchsafe his favours. Often the word of God came unsought, Jer 33:6, Ez 1:3, etc. Sometimes it came at once in answer to prayer, Jer 32:16-25, 26-44; Dan 2:17 f., 19; 9:3-21, 22-27. Sometimes God instructed the prophet to pray and promised a revelation in answer to the petition, Jer 33:2 f. Sometimes a prophet waited for the word of God: 'I will watch, to see what will be said to me', Hab 2:1. Jeremias on one occasion had to wait ten days for God's reply, 42:4, 7. And, of course, if unworthy men requested a prophet to make enquiry of God for them, he might not deign to reply at all, Ez 14:3. The prophets, therefore, could make petition to God for light and in this sense prepare themselves for a divine revelation, but no natural means could induce a revelation. Musle had its place in the worship of God as an accompaniment of the liturgical chant, 2 Par 29:25, and could even excite the feelings, as perhaps in the case of the company of prophets, 1 Kg 10:5 (§ 410c). But it could also be used to calm a disturbed or irritated frame of mind, as in the case of Saul, 1 Kg 16:16, 23; 19:9, and this appears to have been the purpose of Eliscus in asking for the services of a minstrel after his angry interview with the wicked king of Israel, Joram, the son of Achab, 4 Kg 3:13-15.

c Divine communications could be made to man either in the sleeping or the waking state. In extolling the pre-eminence of Moses God mentioned dreams as one of the ways in which he would reveal himself to lesser prophets, Num 12:6, though the only one related as seen by a true prophet is that in Dan 7:1 ff. In some way which is not explained to us God would make it plain to the recipient that his dream was divinely sent. There is a reference to true prophets receiving such dreams in Jer 23:28. It was easy, however, to make a false claim to have been visited by God in this way, and the false prophets did not hesitate to do so: 'I have heard what the prophets said that prophesy lies in my name, and say: I have dreamt, I have dreamt', Jer 23:25; cf. Deut 13:1 ff., Zach 10:2. True dreams were sometimes sent by God to men who were not even Israelites and they required the help of a divinely instructed person to interpret them. We have examples in Pharaoh's two dreams interpreted by Joseph, Gen 41, and in Nabuchodonosor's interpreted by Daniel, Dan 2 and 4.

d Intermediary between the sleeping and waking states is the trance. In this condition a person is entirely unconscious of what is happening in the workaday world around him and loses for the time being the use of his external senses, but does not lose the use of his reason or clearness of mind. The word 'ecstasy' has the same meaning except that it is commonly understood to imply that the subject is in a state of supernatural bliss. The Hebrew language possesses no special word to denote this state, but I think there is no doubt that the word tardēmāh is used in this sense. This word and its allied forms properly signify a deep sleep, as in Jon 1:5 f. But this sense does not suit its use in Daniel, 8:18 and 10:9, whereas the idea of the prophet's being suddenly bereft of his senses at the words of the Angel fits the context perfectly. For this reason and because deep sleep is not suitable in Gen 15:12, I think that the revelation and vision there recorded were granted to Abraham in a state of trance. His state will have been the same as that of St Peter in ecstasy, Ac 10:10.

e According to Plato, speaking of the pagan world, no one ever obtains oracles while in possession of his mental faculties but only while asleep or under the influence of disease or frenzy, Timaeus 71e. All the evidence we have of the true prophets of Israel indicates the contrary. There is no reason for thinking that the companies of prophets in the time of Samuel, whatever their state may have been, were proclaiming divine oracles; § 410c, d. And whatever the significance of Balaam's description of himself as having his (mental) eye opened as he fell, he was not a prophet of Israel although made use of by God, Num 24:4, 16. Isaias's account of the vision of God upon his throne during which he received his mission is that of a man who may have been rapt out of consciousness of the material world about him but who was in full possession of his mental faculties, Is 6. The same is true of Jeremias's account of his call, Jer 1:4-10. This insensibility to the external world St Augustine calls 'mentis alienatio a sensibus corporis', Ad Simplicianum 2, 1, PL 40, 129.

i Certainly not all divine communications were received in a state of rapture or ecstasy. Samuel was asleep when the divine voice awoke him, apparently an externally audible voice, 1 Kg 3:3-8. And a state of rapture is not indicated in Ez 3:22 f., 'The hand of the Lord was upon me and he said to me: Rise, go forth into the plain, and there I will speak to thee; and I rose up and went forth into the plain'.

g The usual mode of communication was by vision. This is one of the modes which God announced that he would make use of with prophets subsequent to Moses, Num 12:6. And what they saw in visions is described by Isaias ch 6, by Jeremias, 1:11-15, and by Ezechiel, 1:4-28, etc. Moreover their entire books are described as visions by Isaias, 1:1, by Nahum, 1:1, and by Abdias, 1:1, although their contents are not confined to visual representations. This fact shows that the word 'vision' had become practically synonymous with 'revelation'. This is confirmed by the expressions 'the word that Isaias the son of Amos saw', Is 2:1, 'I will watch to see what will be said to me', Hab 2:1, 'The vision of Abdias: Thus saith the Lord', Abd 1:1. This usage is satisfactorily explained if visions were the normal means of divine communication, their predominance causing the term to be extended to other non-visual revelations. A vision might be external like that of the mysterious writing on the wall of Baltassar's dining-hall, Dan 5:5, 24 f., or of the burning bush seen by Moses, Ex 3:2 f. More often the vision was internal, as Ezechiel's vision of the plain scattered over with dead men's bones, ch 37, or Zacharias's vision of Jesus the high-priest standing before the angel of the Lord with 'Satan' as accuser, ch 3. Other revelations would be by intellectual vision, if the expression may be used after the example of St Augustine, without the image of any corporeal being ('totus animi conituitus aut in corporum imaginibus est per spirituales, aut in rebus incorporeis, nulla corporis imagine figuratis per intellectualem visionem', De Gen. ad lit. 12, 12, PL 34, 463). For the rest it is not possible to give any detailed explanation of the modality of these visions and revelations, for, as St John Chrysostom has put it, 'he only has any clear knowledge of the matter who has learnt it by experience', In Is 1, 1, PG 56, 14. And only he could know how God communicated the absolute certainty that the message came from him.

h In whatever way the word of God came to a prophet, he was under a moral compulsion to speak: 'The Lord hath spoken, who shall not prophesy?', Am 3:8. Indeed he was under a strict moral obligation to obey the divine behest: 'Whatsoever I shall command thee, thou shalt speak', Jer 1:7. And the prophet would be held responsible by God for any evil effects of his disobedience, Ez 3:18-20. As the threat given in this passage shows, the prophet retained his freedom, and it was within his power to withhold the word of God committed to him. In fact, so violent was the opposition Jeremias encountered and so bitter the derision which greeted his words that he yielded for a time, at least in thought, to the temptation to disobey: 'I will not make mention of him nor speak any more in his name', 20:9. But the word of God became as a burning fire in his breast, thus shut up in his bones; he grew weary with the effort to hold it in and found he could not, ibid. An instance of 414h disobedience and its punishment is related 3 Kg 13:20-26.

1 God did not leave to their natural strength and courage the prophets on whom he imposed what was so often a difficult and dangerous task. He gave special divine assistance: 'Be not afraid of them, for I am with thee to deliver thee', said God to Jeremiah, 1:8. And he gave not only external help, but internal gifts suited to the mission to be discharged: 'I am filled with strength . . . with judgement and power, to declare unto Jacob his wickedness and to Israel his sin', Mic 3:8.

415a Guarantees of Divine Mission—To the obligation incumbent on the prophets to announce God's word and to the divine authority belonging to their pronouncements corresponded on the part of their hearers an obligation to heed and obey their words. 'He that will not hear his words which he shall speak in my name, I will be the revenger', said God through Moses, Deut 18:19. An instance of the punishment of one who would 'not hearken to the word of the Lord' is given 3 Kg 20:35 f. And Amos foretold to Amasias, the priest of Bethel, what would befall him for his rejection of the divine message, 7:16 f.

b That this message had no natural and human origin in the prophets themselves is attested by the fact that they did not always fully understand their own prophecies, 1 Pet 1:10, and that their predictions were often quite contrary to their natural desires. Jeremiah, addressing God, protested, 'I have not desired the day of disaster; thou knowest', 17:16. His natural wish was that his own true prophecies of calamity and captivity should be false and the words of the false prophet Hananias true that the captives already in Babylon should return and bring back the temple treasures removed by Nabuchodonosor, 28:6. Had prophecy been the product of religious fervour and enthusiasm, there would have been prophets in the time of the Maccabees, when, on the contrary, they were looked for in vain. The kind of prophet produced by the natural stimulus of national danger has been well pointed out by Oehler, 2,266: 'It is a remarkable phenomenon, that as before the Chaldean destruction of Jerusalem, false prophecy was at its height, and bore a great share of the guilt of that terrible catastrophe, so also, in the dreadful days preceding the Roman conquest of Jerusalem, a number of false prophets again appeared, by whose worthless predictions the people were involved in ruin (Josephus, BJ 6, 5, 2 f.), while the genuine word of prophecy was despised'.

The power of working miracles was sometimes conceded by God to his prophets in attestation of the mission entrusted to them. Thus Moses received the power of producing prodigies by means of his rod and in other ways 'that they may believe that the Lord God of their fathers . . . hath appeared to thee', Ex 4:1-9, 28-31. To convince the people that they had done evilly, as Samuel had told them, God at his prayer sent thunder and rain during wheat harvest, when such phenomena are unknown in Palestine, 1 Kg 12:12-19. When Elias raised to life the son of the widow woman of Sarephta, it was to her a sign of the truth of his mission: 'Now indeed I know that thou art a man of God and the word of the Lord in thy mouth is true', 3 Kg 17:24. Again, when Elias was engaged in his contest with the priests of Baal on Mount Carmel, he prayed God to send fire to consume the holocaust 'that this people may learn that thou Yahweh art God'. And when the fire of the Lord fell, the people acknowledged that it proved the truth of Elias' teaching. 'They fell on their faces and said: Yahweh he is God, Yahweh he is God!' 3 Kg 18:37-39. As these examples show, a miracle might be worked either directly in proof of the reality of a prophet's mission, or directly in proof of the truth of his teaching or message and so indirectly in proof that he had indeed been sent by God. For other examples see 3 Kg 13:1-5; Is 7:11-14; 4 Kg 20:8-11; and cf. Is 38:7 f.

False gods have not the power of predicting the future. d 'Announce the things that are to come hereafter, and we shall know that ye are gods', Is 41:23. 'That is the exclusive prerogative of the one true God: "New things do I declare; before they spring forth, I make you hear them", Is 42:9; cf. 45:21. It is he alone who can say: "I am the Lord . . . that bring to pass the word of my servants and perform the counsel of my messengers", Is 44:24-26. And it is his servants alone who can announce with certainty the things that are to come. For a clear appeal to the supernatural character of prophecy and its distinction from knowledge which could be otherwise acquired see Is 48:1-8. Is 48:3 is an appeal to the fulfilment of ancient prophecies already come to pass: "The former things of old I declared and they went forth out of my mouth and I made them to be heard: I did them suddenly and they came to pass".'

The thunder and rain in the time of the wheat harvest already quoted as a miracle was also the subject of a prediction quickly fulfilled according to Samuel's words, 'Now then stand and see this great thing which the Lord will do in your sight', 1 Kg 12:16. Elias predicted to Ahab that there would be neither dew nor rain except according to the words of his mouth, a drought which lasted three years and six months, 3 Kg 17:1; 18:1, 45, Lk 4:25, Jas 5:17. Micheas the son of Jemla after foretelling disaster to Ahab if he undertook the proposed expedition to Ramoth Galaad added, 'If thou return in peace, the Lord hath not spoken by me', 3 Kg 22:28. The fulfilment of his prediction proved the truth of his mission. For other examples see 4 Kg 6:32 f.; 8:13-15; 4 Kg 19:32-36, Jer 28:16 f.

Many predictions concerned a more or less remote f

415f future, and the unbelieving took occasion from this fact to mock and profess their conviction that these predictions never would be fulfilled. So the iniquitous in Isaia's time spoke of the day of woe he foretold: 'Let him make haste and let his work come quickly that we may see it; and let the counsel of the Holy One of Israel draw near and come that we may know it', 5:19. So also the contemporaries of Jeremias, 'Where is the word of the Lord? Let it come!' 17:15, with the implication that its fulfilment never would come.

g The third guarantee of the reality of the prophets' mission was the lofty moral character of their teaching in agreement with our Lord's criterion, 'A good tree cannot bring forth evil fruit, neither can an evil tree bring forth good fruit', Mt 7:18. The true prophets never flattered the vices or weaknesses of the people, never foretold blessings and prosperity apart from strict reform of their evil ways, never encouraged them in the false belief that God would protect and favour them simply because they were the descendants of Abraham, his Chosen People, and privileged to have his earthly dwelling place in their midst. They thought that they could dwell securely in the shadow of the temple no matter what the wickedness of their lives, because God, they imagined, could never allow his shrine to be desecrated by a pagan foe. Jeremias disabused the people of such vain illusions. 'Trust not in lying words, saying: The temple of the Lord, the temple of the Lord, it is the temple of the Lord', 7:4. God would not tolerate injustice between man and his neighbour, oppression of the fatherless and the widow, murder, and idolatry. If they persisted in such evil courses, God would destroy the temple as he had already destroyed his shrine at Shiloh, ibid. 5-15. So Micheas quotes the bribe-stained judges, the priests who for money explained the law as men desired, and the false prophets whose divinations were guided by the craving of their purses: 'Is not the Lord in the midst of us? No harm shall come upon us'. And he answers them: 'Therefore because of you, Sion shall be ploughed as a field and Jerusalem shall be as a heap of stones', 3:11 f.

416a False Prophets—Such false prophets were, indeed, at times a plague in Israel, and it was probably not always easy for simple and ill-instructed folk to distinguish the pretenders from the true. If they prophesied in the name of heathen gods, only those could be deceived who were themselves tainted by idolatry. That Israelites did prophesy by Baal is attested by Jeremias, 2:8; 23:13, and the law ordained that prophets who attempted to lead men astray after strange gods or spoke in the name of strange gods should be put to death, Deut 13:1-5; 18:20. The same penalty attached to those who prophesied falsely in the name of Yahweh, Deut 18:20, but in their case detection might not be so easy. Sometimes they could be distinguished by the criterion laid down in Deut 18:22, 'Whatsoever a prophet foretelleth in the name of the Lord and it cometh not to pass, that is a thing which the Lord hath not spoken, but the prophet hath forged it in the pride of his mind'. An example is furnished by the four hundred prophets of Achab. They all answered in the name of Yahweh that Achab should undertake the expedition to Ramoth Galaad for 'the Lord will deliver it into the hand of the king', 3 Kg 22:6, 11 f. Micheas the son of Jemla foretold disaster. The death of Achab in battle against the Syrians proved which of the two parties really possessed the word of God. The criterion just quoted was negative. The failure of a prediction proved a prophet to be a pretender, but the converse was not necessarily true. A false claimant to prophecy might by chance make a correct guess as to the outcome of some affair. And it is laid down in Deut 13:1-3 that no heed must be paid to a prophet or dreamer of dreams who should attempt to lead people into idolatry by foretelling 'a sign or wonder and the sign or wonder which he spoke to you come to pass'. The reference here, however, is not to natural happenings but to some manifestation claimed to be a direct divine intervention. Such 'portents' might be due either to natural causes such as sleight of hand or, sometimes, to diabolic agency.

b The same passage warns the Israelites to give no heed to 'portents' in such a case, 'for the Lord your God trieth you that it may appear whether you love him with all your heart and with all your soul'. This does not, of course, imply that God himself worked the sign or wonder in question. It is in accord with the OT manner of speaking by which everything is ascribed to God without mention of secondary causes and without any distinction between his positive will and his permission. The truth which this way of speaking implies is that nothing happens in the world which escapes the overlordship of God. A stronger expression was used by the prophet Micheas the son of Jemla who told Achab that God had put 'a lying spirit' in the mouth of all that king's prophets, 3 Kg 22:23. When God said, Ez 14:9, 'When a prophet shall be deceived and speak a word, I the Lord have deceived that prophet', the words could also mean that on account of the prophet's presumption God had caused events to turn out contrary to the prophet's expectation. Some of these false prophets we know by name. There was Hananias the son of Azur who opposed Jeremias, 28:1-17, Achab the son of Colias, Sedecias the son of Maasias, and Semeias, who all three prophesied falsely in God's name to the captives in Babylonia, Jer 29:21, 31. Such men were guilty of lying, consciously proclaiming that to be the word of God which they knew God had not spoken. 'From the prophet even to the priest', said Jeremias 6:13, 'all are guilty of deceit', and again 8:10. 'They see vain things and they foretell lies, saying, "The Lord saith" whereas the Lord hath not sent them', Ez 13:6. The motive impelling these impostors was the simple one of making a livelihood, for the people recognized the material needs of those who helped them in religious matters and did their best to support them. This motive was hinted at plainly by Amasias, the priest of Bethel, when he bade Amos leave the Northern Kingdom: 'Thou seer, go, flee away into the land of Judah, and eat bread there and prophesy there', 7:12. And so Micheas of the prophets of Jerusalem in his day, 'Her prophets divine for money', 3:11. Indeed he goes further and in the name of the Lord accuses them of extorting money: 'Thus saith the Lord concerning the prophets that make my people err. . . . If a man give not something into their mouth, they proclaim a holy war against him', 3:5. It is not surprising to learn that men of such calibre were apt to be addicts of wine and strong drink, Is 28:7, and let themselves fall into the sin of adultery, Jer 29:23. Such men, as a matter of course, studied to please the people and, unfortunately, succeeded only too well: 'The prophets have prophesied falsehood . . . and the people love such things', Jer 5:31. For they fell in with the wishes of their hearers who said 'to the seers "See not", and to them that behold, "Behold not for us what is right; speak unto us pleasant things; see deceptions for us"', Is 30:10. Consequently they contradicted the true prophets who foretold calamity in punishment of iniquity: 'They healed the breach of the daughter of my people in frivolous guise, saying "Peace, peace!" when there was no peace', Jer 6:14, also 8:11. And again, 'The prophets say to them: "You shall not see the sword, and there shall be no famine among you, but he will give you true peace in this place"', Jer 14:13, etc. Such unconditional promises of prosperity were not in the spirit of the true prophets, who demanded obedience to God's law as the condition of divine favour and protection. That these professional prophets made no attempt to carry out the true work of a prophet by striving for the moral reformation of the nation hardly needs to be said. 'The prophets . . . have not laid open thy iniquity', Lam 2:14. On the contrary 'they strengthened the hands of the wicked that no man should return from his evil doings', Jer 23:14, an accusation made also by Ezechiel 13:22.

417a Characteristics of the Prophetical Literature—In general the prophetical books set down in summary form the substance of preaching and messages delivered over a course of many years. Parts, of course, like the historical sections in Isaiah and Jeremiah, were never spoken, and it has been suggested that the prophecies against the nations are literary compositions which were never spoken before an audience. They were not delivered to the nations concerned, but they may well have been proclaimed before suitable audiences in the Holy Land. Even so as they were not intended for delivery to the nations concerned, it is probable that their form is substantially that in which they were first composed. Addresses to the Israelites, on the other hand, which were often put into writing long after their delivery, in many cases probably preserve the substance only and not the form in which they were first put before the public. This opinion is confirmed by the literary and often poetic form in which they have been handed down. Poetic form, however, is no certain criterion, as it may have been judged suitable to the dignity of prophecy and more useful as more easily retained in the memory.

b The lack of chronological order apparent in the series of prophecies contained within a single book is patient of more than one explanation. An accidental displacement in the troubled times of the exile is quite possible. But it is also possible that the sequence of their prophecies in time did not seem to the writers themselves to be of such importance as necessarily to be followed in composition. That displacement, accidental or deliberate, did occur is plain from the fact that the prophecies against the nations occupy different positions in the Hebrew and Greek texts of Jeremiah, in the former occupying chh 46-51 and in the latter chh 25:14-31:44, where the prophecies against the nations are in a different order among themselves. Here are examples of the lack of chronological order may be mentioned that the call and mission of Isaiah are narrated only in ch 6 of his book and in Jeremiah, chh 35-36, which belong to the reign of Joakim follow chh 32-34, which deal with the reign of Sedecias.

c Among the causes of obscurity in the prophets is the unannounced change of speaker. This is not restricted to this class of literature and does not always lead to ambiguity. In 1 Kg 3:4-6 DV makes the sequence plainer by substituting 'he answered' for the original 'and said'. In Ps 133 the first two verses are an address of pilgrims to the ministers of the temple, and the last verse the answer of the ministers. Is 21:2a gives words of the prophet. Then follow the words of God spoken to him in vision, and in 3 Isaiah speaks again. Another example: Is 63:1 contains the prophet's question to and the answer of the Messiah followed by a renewed question in 2 and the answer 4-6 and then by the prophet's own words, 7 ff.

d It is important to remember the conditional character of prophecy even where the form of the announcement is absolute. And this is true whether destruction is foretold or blessing and prosperity. 'If that nation against which I have spoken shall repent of their evil, I also will repent of the evil that I have thought to do to them'; and, in the opposite case, 'If a nation shall do evil in my sight that it obey not my voice, I will repent of the good that I have spoken to do to it', Jer 18:8, 10. The preaching of Jonas in Nineveh provides a clear example: 'Yet forty days and Nineveh shall be destroyed', 3:4. But the story relates that on account of the repentance of the Ninevites their city was not destroyed. And Jeremiah quotes the prophecy of Micaiah, 'Sion shall be ploughed like a field', 3:4, and explains why it remained unfulfilled. It was because Ezechias and all Judah feared the Lord and besought his face. Therefore 'the Lord repented of the evil that he had spoken against them', Jer 26:18 f. In the light of history it may be said that the sentence had been suspended and found its fulfilment finally in the destruction of the city by the Babylonians. This example is especially instructive as apart from the authentic interpretation given by Jeremiah we should not have known that the prophecy of Micaiah would have been fulfilled earlier had it not been for the prayers of Ezechias and his subjects. It also shows that a prophet may set down a prophecy in his book without indicating whether it was fulfilled or set aside. This characteristic, which is sometimes overlooked, is of manifest importance in any discussion of the fulfilment of prophecy.

Another important fact in this connexion is the partial nature of the revelation made to the prophets. Prophecy and history are quite distinct, and the qualities appropriate to the latter must not be looked for in the former. God asks men for faith and he will not so order his words and his works that they present evidence so demonstrable that the assent of the mind is forced and no loophole is left for cavil. An adequate account of the Messiah and of his kingdom was to be left to the history of the NT; the OT was to offer an adumbration only and that not in one picture of the whole but in the separate delineation of its various features. Moreover, an accurate and instantaneously recognizable picture of the future would have occasioned a grave danger to men's exercise of their free wills when they found themselves actors in the events foretold. This partial nature of revelation made it extremely difficult, if not impossible, for the pre-Christian Israelites to acquire a true composite idea of the personal career and kingdom of the Messias. On the one hand, he is depicted as the warrior-king victorious over his enemies, and, on the other, as one despised, oppressed, and done to death. Later Rabbis have attempted a reconciliation of these diverse elements by postulating a victorious Messias ben David and a suffering Messias ben Joseph. But the NT has shown how both elements could be realized in one and the same person.

Further, the prophets did not always fully understand the revelations which they had themselves received. Even after Daniel had been given an explanation of the vision of the ram and the goat, he remained astonished at the vision and there was no one who could understand it, 8:27. On another occasion when Daniel did not understand a revelation made to him, his enquiry met with the response that the words were shut up and sealed until the time of the end when they would be fulfilled, 12:8 f. Zacharias did not understand the vision of the four chariots and the Angel explained that they were the four winds of heaven, 6:5, but, remarks A Lapipe, the prophet was not informed what were the winds or what was their nature, whether literal or parabolical and mystical, and implies that the vision remained obscure even to him, Proem. 2. St Augustine says succinctly that among the Hebrews Messianic prophecies were made 'by some with understanding, by some without', De Civ. Dei 7, 32. And A Lapipe was of the opinion that St John himself did not understand the meaning of all the symbols of the Apocalypse.

An important feature to be found nowhere but in the Bible is the 'compensation' of two persons or two events in the same discourse, namely, of the type and of the antitype. The compensation may be perfect and the words equally applicable to both the type and the antitype. Thus the prohibition 'You shall not break a bone of him', Ex 12:46, Jn 19:36, is equally applicable and in the same sense both to the paschal lamb and to Christ, the true Lamb of God. Or the compensation may be imperfect and the words, though applicable to both type and antitype, may be true of the type only in a lower and humbler sense and of the antitype in a full and sublime sense. Thus the words of God spoken through Nathan of Solomon and the theocratic kings, 'I will be to him a father and he shall be to me a son', 2 Kg 7:14, which were true of them only in the humbler sense of an adoptive sonship, are true of the type, Christ our Lord, in the sublime sense of eternal divine sonship, Heb 1:5. This, of course, is an inference from St Paul's teaching 417g implying that the words could not be used of an angel in the sense in which they are true of Christ. In yet another case, the compenetration may be such that the writer intermingles his utterances about the type and the antitype, some being applicable to the one and some to the other. The type and the antitype must have one or more, but not all, features in common; and in these passages it is as if the type and the antitype were depicted with very imperfect perspective on the same canvas, the one visible behind the other but in such a way that it is difficult to discern to which of the two certain features belong. It is in this way that St Augustine explains Ps 71 (72) of Solomon and of Christ, De Civ. Dei 17, 8, as does also St Jerome, who illustrates from this Psalm the similar treatment of Antiochus Epiphanes as type and Antichrist as antitype, Comm. in Dan 11:21 sqq. (PL 25, 565 f.). The general rule of interpretation in such examples of compenetration is that what cannot be sanely understood of the type in the literal sense is to be understood of the antitype.

b Chronological indications are sometimes given, but in general they appear to be deliberately vague. As our Lord said to the Apostles, 'It is not for you to know the times or moments which the Father hath put in his own power', Act 1:7. Often the indication is of the vaguest, 'in that day', Is 17:4, 'at that time', Is 18:7, 'in those days', Jer 3:16, 'in the last days', Is 2:2. Even an expression like 'yet a little while', Agg 2:7, is far less communicative than it appears at first and may cover a long period of time by ordinary standards. The number seventy does not appear to be given as an exact computation. Tyre is to be forgotten for seventy years, Is 23:15, 17. The king of Babylon and his nation are to be punished and made a desolation after seventy years, Jer 25:12, whereas according to Is 14:1 (MT 13:22) 'Her time is near at hand and her days shall not be prolonged'. Similarly it may be doubted whether the number three is intended as signifying more than a small number. The glory of Moab was to be brought low in three years, Is 16:14. The exact number 'three score and five' in Is 7:8 is widely recognized as an unjustified gloss; and it seems not improbable that the number of the fifteen years promised to Ezechias was also not part of the original text, Is 38:5.

c As not all the details of the Messianic kingdom were made known to the prophets, and still less all to any one prophet, many circumstances of the future had to be described in terms of the existing theocracy, whence arose a further difficulty of interpretation, especially in pre-Christian times. The centre of the new kingdom is spoken of as Sion, as in the celebrated Messianic prophecy of Is 2:2-4, Mic 4:1-3, 'The law shall come forth from Sion and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem'; cf. Ps 109(110):2. It is possible that this prophecy is conditional and that, had the Israelites remained faithful and not rejected the long-expected Messiah when he did come, Sion would have remained the religious centre under the New as under the Old Covenant. However, the clearly metaphorical character of Is 25:6, where the spiritual blessings of the Messianic kingdom are represented as a rich banquet prepared 'for all peoples' on Mount Sion, may suggest that the location is also not intended in the literal sense. Again, in the Messianic passage Jer 33:14-18 the perpetual priesthood of the Messianic kingdom and its perpetual sacrifice are spoken of in terms of the typical priesthood of the Old Law and its animal sacrifices. Similarly in Is 56:6 f.; 60:7. In this matter we are given a corrective in other passages which show that Levitical institutions are to cease and that, therefore, the mention of them in connexion with Messianic times is to be understood not in the literal but in the typical sense. Thus Jeremias, 3:15-17, foretells that the Ark of the Covenant shall no longer play any part in worship when all nations are gathered together to Jerusalem. Later, 31:31-33, he predicts the passing of the Old Covenant made at Sinai to be replaced by 'a New Covenant'; and with the passing of the Old Covenant would naturally pass its distinctive Levitical institutions. And God in Mal 1:10 f. rejects the Levitical priests and their offerings for throughout the world among the Gentile nations a pure oblation is to be offered to his name; cf. § 555j, k. These texts, like so many others, obscure before the time of Christ, have been illumined by their fulfilment in Christ.

The prophet Osee, 14:10, alludes to the obscurity of his message, 'Who is wise, and he shall understand these things? prudent, and he shall know these things?' Commenting on these words St Jerome alludes to the difficulty caused by the use of symbolical names. Examples are the names of Osee's own children, 1:4, 6, 9, and those of Isaias' sons, Shear-Yashub, 'A Remnant shall return', 7:3, and Maher-shalal-chash-baz 'Take away the spoils with speed, quickly take the prey', 8:1. The Messiah is spoken of by the typical name of David, Os 3:5; Jer 30:9; Ez 34:23 f.; 37:24 f. He is given the symbolic name Emmanuel 'God with us', Is 7:14, and the glorious names of Is 9:6. But Christ's own name of Jesus is nowhere foretold. This usage rests on the Hebrew conception of names not, as they are with us, as simply distinctive labels, but as connoting a person's function or office. This conception may be illustrated by the change of Sarah's name from Sarai, of Abraham's from Abram, of Israel's from Jacob, of Peter's from Simon.

Another characteristic of prophetic diction is the use of the perfect tense, the so-called prophetic perfect, to denote future events—for instance, in the Messianic prediction of Is 9:6: 'A child has been born to us, a son has been given to us'. 'This is the custom of all the prophets', wrote St John Chrysostom, 'to speak of what has not yet occurred as already accomplished; because they saw with mental vision what was to happen after many years, they narrated everything as they now saw it before their eyes', In Gen. 1 Hom. 10, 4, PG 53, 85. This usage, however, is not confined to the prophets, and is used by others speaking of what they regard as the certain future, e.g. in Gen 30:13, 'Women will call me blessed' (DV, future tense in agreement with the sense). St Augustine gives a more general explanation better in accord with this wider usage. He writes that the event foretold 'is as certain as if it had already happened', Enarratio in Ps 43, n. 9, PL 36, 485.

Unique Character of Israelite Prophecy — Sooth-saying, magic, omen-reading, necromancy, were all rife among the pagan neighbours of Israel, and this prevalence will surprise no one who reflects on the strange hold that superstition has on educated and supposedly enlightened people in our own day. And these practices had a strong hold on the Hebrew people. Even as late as the exile we find Ezechiel, 13:15-23, compelled to denounce the tricks of female sorcerers. But these avocations were no part of Hebrew religion. Indeed they were strictly prohibited, Deut 18:10-14. In general, however, as true religion degenerates, superstition prevails; and up to the time of the exile the Hebrew people as a nation had never been faithful to their religion for long. The nearest legitimate approach to such practices in Israel is illustrated by Saul's request to Samuel for information about his lost asses, 1 Kg 9:6 ff. The inference seems to be warranted that God condescended to make such matters known through his prophets in order to protect 418f men from the temptation to seek enlightenment through the operations of sorcerers and wizards.

PROPHETICAL LITERATURE

g The Scripture itself speaks of the existence of 'prophets' among the worshippers of pagan gods. Baal had many such in the days of Elias and of Jehu, 3 Kg 18:19, 4 Kg 10:19. But as the sacred books give the same title to the false prophets of Israel, the use of the name in connexion with false religions does not in any way imply recognition of the office. Moreover, the false prophets of Israel claimed to be prophets in the strict sense of communicating divine messages to man, whereas these pagan prophets appear to have had their counterpart in Israel in the companies of prophets of the time of Samuel to whom the title was given in a far wider sense; § 410c, d. In the case of both, devotion was accompanied by abnormal super-excitation. The prophets of Baal danced or leapt round the altar, thereby, no doubt, working themselves up into a state of frenzy as we read that they cut 418g themselves with knives, 3 Kg 18:28.

Nowhere among the other nations do we find men h comparable in character or office to the prophets of Israel who spoke in the name of and with the authority of Yahweh. Certain writers use the term 'prophet' when speaking of the Babylonian asipu, but this is apt to be misleading. W. Muss-Arnolt in his Concise Dictionary of the Assyrian Language (Berlin 1905) suggests rather 'enchanter' or 'diviner'. *Karl Marti in his book The Religion of the Old Testament (English trans., London 1907) 242 writes 'Outside of Israel no men arose who could be called prophets in the sense of the great Israelite prophets'. And the verdict of Eduard König is the same. There is no evidence, direct or indirect, 'of the existence of prophetic personalities comparable to the Hebrew prophets', EREH 10, 392 f.

Contents—The Book of Isaias contains three separate groups of prophecies addressed to three distinct groups of hearers who belong to different periods. Without prejudging the question of unity of authorship we must thus distinguish Isaias I, chh 1-39, addressed to the prophet's contemporaries, both Jews and Gentiles, c 736-700 B.C., Isaias II, chh 40-55, addressed to Jewish exiles in Babylon about a decade before the Restoration, and Isaias III, chh 56-66, addressed to Palestinian Jews recently returned from exile, c 538-520 B.C.

Isaias I contains an introductory prophecy, dated c 735 B.C., and five collections of prophecies: (1) Prophecies against Judah and Jerusalem prior to the Syro-Ephraimitic war (735 B.C.), chh 2-6, of which the last, recording the prophet's vocation, is earliest in date; (2) Prophecies, largely Messianic, connected directly or indirectly with the clash between the policies of Isaias and Achaz at a critical period of the Syro-Ephraimitic war, chh 7-12; (3) Prophecies against the Gentile Nations: Babylonia, Assyria, Philistia, Moab, Damascus, Kush, Egypt, Edom, Kedar, Tyre, chh 13-23; (4) The Apocalypse of Isaias, describing the judgement of the Gentile Nations and the establishment of the Messianic kingdom, chh 24-27;

419f (5) Further prophecies against Judah and Jerusalem, dating from the reign of Achaz before 726 B.C. to the Egyptian alliance 702 B.C., chh 28-35. The historical section which concludes Isaias I, chh 36-39, is excerpted from 4 Kg. These collections were not made by the author but by a later redactor. They overlap to some extent. The prophecy against the Northern Kingdom, 9:8-10:4, belongs more probably to the first collection and there is a prophecy against Judah and Jerusalem, 22:1-14, and one against an individual Israelite, Sobna, 22:15-25, in the third. It is doubtful also whether some prophecies in Isaias I, especially the last, 34:1-35:10, and those against Babylon, 13:1-14:23 and 21:1-10, were addressed to the contemporaries of Isaias. On the other hand objections made to Messianic passages should be disregarded. Isaias preaches Messianism in season and out of season. When he predicts the ruin of a nation he usually remembers and frequently mentions the Messianic remnant, the holy seed, which will save Israel from complete destruction.

g Isaias II has for its theme the deliverance of the Jewish exiles from Babylonian oppression which Yahweh will effect in the immediate future through his chosen instrument, Cyrus. The argument frequently takes the form of a judicial contest between Yahweh and the pagan deities. As in the past so also in the present Yahweh alone predicts and performs. The idols know nothing and do nothing. The work is divided into two parts, 40:1-49:13 and 49:14-55:13. In the first the prophet addresses himself to Jacob and Israel, in the second to Sion and Jerusalem. The new exodus from Babylon is celebrated in both parts but the future glories of Sion in the second replace the exploits of Cyrus and the fall of Babylon in the first. The unity of plan is remarkable and makes it easy to recognize that the four poems on the Servant of Yahweh, 42:1-7; 49:1-9a; 50:4-11; 52:13-53:12, are a subsequent addition, composed apparently by the author but inserted by a redactor. They depict the future Messiah, not as king and conqueror, but as worker and sufferer. The first two Servant songs interrupt very evidently the context of prophecies in which they were unskillfully inserted. The last two were located more naturally between separate prophecies with which however they have no connexion.

h Isaias III contains prophecies, partly consolatory, partly admonitory, suited to a situation considerably different from that of the exiles. Then the hearers were assured that deliverance from Babylon was at hand and that their sins were expiated and forgiven. Now they complain that final salvation is delayed and are told that their sins are the obstacle to its attainment. The new situation is that of the returned exiles in Palestine in the dark period of the early Restoration. Difficulties about and obstacles to salvation are first discussed, then Sion's future glory is depicted and finally a fervent appeal for divine aid is followed by a description of final judgement and final salvation. It is noteworthy that the Sion poems, chh 60-62, have been apparently subsequently inserted, like the two first Servant poems, in the middle of a prophecy. They contain citations from Isaias II in its final form.

420a Historical Background—The history of the periods mirrored in the Book of Isaias will be found in §§ 66a-b, and 121e-i. A brief résumé of important events will help the reader to understand the occasion of many prophecies and the historical allusions which they contain. Isaias began his prophetic career in the last year of Azarias, identified, 4 Kg 15:27, with the first year of Phacee, 736 B.C., but possibly a year or two earlier. Judah was then at the height of her prosperity. Azarias had strengthened her military defences, and by his victories over the Edomites and the Philistines secured rich trading outlets on the east and on the west. But foreign connexions and increased wealth had produced grave religious and social disorders, aggravated no doubt during the reign of Achaz, which Isaias denounces in his earliest prophecies.

The clash between the prophet's inspired policy of reliance on God alone and the king's policy of alliance with Assyria during the Syro-Ephraimitic war, 735 B.C., determined the next phase of the activity of Isaias. The danger of extirpation then incurred by the Davidic dynasty was the immediate occasion of the Emmanuel prophecy, the first announcement of the advent of the Messias. The predicted devastation of the Syro-Ephraimitic regions soon followed, 734-733 B.C. Damascus was taken and sacked, 732 B.C. The desolation of Galilee, which like Galaad and Sharon was made an Assyrian province, gave occasion to the second Messianic prophecy. The region of Palestine, first darkened by Assyrian oppression, would be enlightened by the life and teaching of the Messias. Judah and a diminished Ephraim were now vassals of Assyria. Isaias seals his public denunciations of the policy of Achaz, favoured by the people, and confines himself to the instruction of his disciples. One last prophecy during the reign of Achaz, 28:1-29, containing the prediction of the fall of Samaria and the promise of protection to Jerusalem, was mocked by the leaders of the people.

The accession of the pious king, Ezechias, who inaugurated his reign by a great religious revival, 726 B.C., introduced a new era in Judah. Ezechias followed the advice and policy of Isaias, and Judah, though burdened by tribute, was relatively prosperous until the invasion of Sennacherib. In the Northern Kingdom Osee, relying on Egyptian aid, refused tribute to Shalmaneser V, 727-722, son and successor of Tiglath-pileser III. Samaria was besieged and finally captured by Sargon II, 721-705, another son of Tiglath-pileser III, in January 721. A vassal state which revolted against Assyria usually had its principal inhabitants deported and was made an Assyrian province. To save Judah from such a calamity Isaias strenuously opposed rebellion and foreign alliance. The prophecy of the downfall of Assyria and the salvation of Jerusalem from Assyrian conquest was made some years after the fall of Samaria, most probably in the first half of the reign of Ezechias, and is closely connected with the third Messianic prophecy. Sennacherib's invasion had been already foretold in 735 B.C. as the punishment of the people's unbelief, 8:5-10. His failure to capture Jerusalem and the destruction of his army are now predicted. The year 713 B.C. is marked by the miraculous recovery of Ezechias from a mortal malady through the prophet's intervention, and a combined movement of revolt against Assyria in several subject states. Embassies from Babylon, then independent of Assyria and ruled by a native monarch, Merodach-Baladan, and from Egypt, where Kushite invaders had recently inaugurated the XXVI dynasty, sought the participation of Ezechias in the projected rebellion. Three prophecies, 18:1-7; 19:1-24; 20:1-6, are connected with the proposed Egyptian alliance to which Isaias was strongly opposed. As Philistia alone paid the penalty of rebellion it is probable that Ezechias was restrained from open revolt by the prophet's remonstrances. Isaias was less successful in his opposition to the Egyptian alliance and the rebellion which preceded the invasion of Sennacherib, 701 B.C. Three prophecies, 29:1-24; 30:1-33; 31:1-9, also denounce this Egyptian alliance. Judah and Egypt will suffer but Yahweh will save Jerusalem from the Assyrians. No personal activity of Isaias is recorded after the retreat of Sennacherib.

In Isaias II, chh 40-55, the scene changes from Palestine to Babylonia, the period from the 8th cent. B.C. to the last decade of the Babylonian captivity. The victorious career of Cyrus the Great, Yahweh's instrument in the liberation of his people, is the historical background of the prophecies. He was originally ruler of the Persian kingdom of Anshan subject to Media and having Susa, later called Persepolis, for its capital. A successful revolt from his liege lord, Cyaxares, whom he captured in battle, made 420e him monarch of Persia and Media c 550 B.C. Further campaigns in the east and west extended his empire from the Indus to the Halys. Croesus of Lydia was now in danger and formed a defensive alliance with Amasis of Egypt and Nabonidus of Babylonia in 547 B.C. But his kingdom was invaded before he could obtain aid from his allies and his capital Sardis was captured in 546 B.C. We may therefore date the fear of the coast land in particular (Lydia) and of the world in general (Egypt, Babylonia, etc.), recorded in 41:5, in or about 547 B.C. After the fall of Sardis Cyrus secured and extended his conquests in the north and east until 539 B.C. when he invaded Babylonia. Babylon was taken without a battle in July of that year. In the following year an edict of Cyrus, whose religious tolerance was also extended to the Babylonians themselves, allowed the Jewish exiles to return to Palestine, restored to them their sacred vessels and authorized them to rebuild their temple. The former predictions already fulfilled by Yahweh most probably refer at least in part to the early successes of Cyrus. Their fulfilment is a guarantee that the new predictions, the fall of Babylon and the return of the exiles, will also be fulfilled in the near future.

f The historical situation in Isaiah III, chh 56-66, is that of the recently returned exiles, 537-520 B.C. Their chief preoccupation is the struggle for existence in a small and devastated region encircled by hostile peoples. They have erected an altar to Yahweh immediately after their return but have not yet succeeded in rebuilding their temple or rewalling their capital. The prophet admonishes, consoles and encourages these mourners in Sion. He does not allude to external events of the period.

421a Authorship and Composition—The hypercritical theory that the Book of Isaiah is made up of fragments composed by authors of different periods from the 8th to the 2nd cent. B.C. and that about one-half at most of chh 1-35 may be attributed to Isaiah need not detain us. It arbitrarily minimizes the value of Jewish tradition and ignores the logical sequence of thought which the individual prophecies usually exhibit. It is undoubted however that the book as a whole owes its present form not to Isaiah but to a post-exilic redactor, to whom also introductory indications, when not autobiographical or narrated in the first person, usually belong. It is certain moreover that it contains explanatory glosses, easily recognizable for the most part, and some passages of uncertain authorship like 2:2-4. With slight reservations therefore the authenticity of chh 1-35 may be reasonably assumed. The late exilic and early post-exilic periods are too closely connected to raise any time difficulty against the unity of authorship of chh 40-55 and 56-66. Minor differences in language, style, and subject-matter are sufficiently accounted for by the different periods and the different situations with which the prophet had to deal.

b A more vexed question is the unity or diversity of authorship of chh 1-35 and chh 40-66. Jewish tradition strongly supports the unity of authorship by ascribing both collections, united in one book, to the same author, Isaiah. The author of chh 40-66 undoubtedly far surpassed all post-exilic prophets. How can it be supposed that he was ignored or forgotten by tradition while they were remembered, that he was not the very famous prophet to whom his works are ascribed? The Evangelists attribute to Isaiah citations from Isaiah II (cf. Mt 12:17-21) and Isaiah III (cf. Lk 4:17-19). Eccles 48:27 f. registers the same tradition. On the other hand the argument from differences in language, style and subject-matter is strong but according to a reply of the Biblical Commission does not establish diversity of authorship; cf. § 49f. A more cogent argument is the unique acquaintance and exclusive preoccupation with the exilic and early post-exilic periods attributed to a pre-exilic prophet. Isaiah however, unlike other prophets, may have received a special charism by virtue of which he lived in spirit in these periods. While arguments to the contrary are 421b indecisive it is imprudent to deny this possibility.

Isaiah and his Mission—Isaiah (Hebr. Yēša'yāhū 'Yahweh is Salvation') was born most probably shortly before 760 B.C. Though the Talmudic statement that his father, 'Amōš, was a brother of King Amasia is generally discredited he belonged undoubtedly to the noble and cultured class. He received his prophetic vocation most probably in the reign of Achaz. Joatham is mentioned, 1:1, merely as the successor of Azarias, but he reigned during his father's leprosy and probably died before him. The gloomy outlook of the early oracles reflects most naturally the impiety and unbelief of Achaz. The prophet realized that Israel as the people of the All-holy Yahweh should be just and holy, and especially denounced idolatrous practices and social abuses. He was particularly hostile to foreign alliances which led inevitably to religious contamination. His exhortations to repentance and trust in Yahweh were disregarded. And yet if Achaz had followed his inspired policy at a critical period of the Syro-Ephraimitic war the Assyrian would undoubtedly have relieved him of his enemies without the sacrifice of the independence of Judah.

The unbelief of Achaz and the danger incurred by the Davidic dynasty produced the Emmanuel prophecy, announcing and briefly delineating the promised Messias. Isaiah had previously predicted the advent of the Messianic kingdom, to be preceded by devastation, deportation and further purification. Only a remnant of the chosen people should inherit this kingdom. Justice and holiness, peace and prosperity are its essential characteristics. It is generally presented as a revival of the idealized kingdom of David. Such a presentation should not be taken too literally. Its realization moreover was conditioned by Israel's acceptance of the Messias. In the fuller revelation of the Servant poems the national element is definitely excluded. The figure of the Messias has some traits borrowed from descriptions of David and Solomon, but his chief characteristics made him in the words of the Psalmist, 8:6, 'little less than God'. He is Emmanuel, 'God-with-us', born of a Virgin Mother, Wonder-Counsellor (cf. 9:5 and 28:29), Mighty God (cf. 9:5 and 10:21), Father for ever, Prince of Peace. The spirit of Yahweh abides in him permanently, endowing him with Wisdom and Understanding, Counsel and Might, Knowledge and Fear of Yahweh. His reign will be eternal. It will be distinguished by judgement and justice, the foundation of Yahweh's kingship, Ps 89:15; 96:8, by kindness and fidelity, 16:5, characteristic attributes of Yahweh in his dealings with his people. Isaiah thus prepares the way for the revelation of Christ's divinity.

The accession of Ezechias in 726 B.C. opened a wide sphere of public activity to Isaiah. It cannot be doubted that the zealous prophet inspired and directed the great religious revival with which the pious monarch inaugurated his reign. He may also have saved Judah from participation in the revolt of 720 B.C. and was certainly actively opposed to that of 713 B.C. in which Judah apparently participated, but was saved from chastisement by prompt submission. His opposition to the revolt and alliance with Egypt in 702 B.C. was disregarded by Ezechias who seems to have acted without consulting him. He nevertheless supported the monarch during the critical period of Sennacherib's invasion with the constant assurance that Yahweh would protect his holy city from the Assyrian host. Most, though not all, of the prophecies against the Gentiles belong to the reign of Ezechias. Assyria and Babylonia as oppressors of Israel receive most attention, then Moab and Edom as encroachers on Israelitic territory. Isaiah felt deeply the oppression of the weak by the strong. Such oppression was an obstacle to permanent peace and prosperity on earth. Idolatry too should disappear that Yahweh alone might be worshipped by all his creatures. Hence the judgement and chastisement of the Gentiles were necessary for the f There is no trace of the prophet's personal activity after the invasion of Sennacherib. The Jewish tradition that he died a martyr in the early reign of the impious Manasses is inherently probable, if not fully assured. Nobility of character and religious zeal, eloquence and mastery of language and style all combine to stamp him as the greatest of the Hebrew prophets and writers.

422a The Servant Songs—The four Songs of the Suffering Servant of Yahweh, 42:1-4; 49:1-6; 50:4-9; 52:13-53:12, are the culminating point of OT prophecy. It is now generally admitted that they are a separate composition having a theme of their own, distinct from that of the collection of prophecies of the Restoration, addressed to the exiles of Babylon, in which they were subsequently incorporated. They depict four scenes of a drama in which the history of the Suffering Servant is gradually unfolded. In the first Song he is introduced by Yahweh as his Servant specially dear to him and charged with a mission of spiritual enlightenment to the Gentiles. We see him in the second Song undaunted by the complete failure of his efforts in a spiritual mission to Israel assigned to him by Yahweh. In the third Song a further stage of this mission is presented in which indifference and opposition have become hostility and persecution. In the fourth Song the Sufferings of the Servant are explained as the chastisement of our sins, then the third stage of his vicarious expiation, his Passion and Death, and the posthumous success of his mission to the Gentiles, a numberless spiritual progeny, are depicted.

b The remarkable unity of plan in the drama authorizes several important conclusions. All four Songs have the same author. The first three in particular are unintelligible without the fourth. The additions to the first and second Songs, 42:5-7 and 49:7-9a, were not made by the original author. He would not anticipate in 42:6 the mission to Israel, reserved for the second Song, nor in 49:7 the homage of the Gentiles, reserved for the fourth Song. The use of the perfect tense in the fourth Song does not imply that the Servant belongs to past history. His activity is clearly indicated as future in the first Song. The progressive stages of that activity must therefore be future. The perfects have quite a different explanation as a peculiarity of prophetic visions of future events; cf. 9:2; 14:4 ff., etc. and § 418e.

c The Jews with rare exceptions interpreted the Servant collectively as Israel, relying chiefly on the title, Servant of Yahweh, given to Israel in six Deutero-Isaian passages. The Church from the very beginning, as the Gospels attest, discerned in him a prophetic adumbration of the Redeemer. Only towards the close of the 18th cent., owing to the rise of Rationalism and the denial of supernatural revelation, did the Messianic interpretation begin to be abandoned. It has always been upheld by Catholic scholars and has always found adherents among non-Catholic believers. The critical approach to the problem differs from the Catholic in ignoring the NT and Tradition and seeking the interpretation of the Songs in the psychology of their author and the circumstances of his time. The collective Israel interpretation was at first more popular, usually in a modified form to avoid obvious objections suggested by the contrast in character between the Servant and Israel and the mission of the Servant to Israel. The Servant was assumed to be a part of Israel—the pious element or the prophets or the priests—or an ideal Israel conceived as at once identical with and yet distinct from the real Israel. Duhm's discovery in 1892 that the Servant Songs were not originally a part of Deutero-Isaiah deprived the Israel interpretation of its main support and brought individual interpretations into favour. The Songs were now supposed to contain history rather than prophecy and the Servant was identified in turn

d In reality the Anonymous Servant is contrasted with the Israel Servant. He is highly individualized and profoundly real. The new forms of the Israel theory are gratuitous expedients and raise fresh difficulties. Since the sufferings are assumed to be the sufferings of the exile, common to all, how can a part of Israel take on itself the sufferings of the rest or an ideal Israel take the place of the real sufferers? The drama moreover loses all its movement if the stages of the Servant's expiatory sufferings are only figurative descriptions of the sufferings of the exile. Against the historical interpretations it must be noted that the first Song places the activity of the Servant in the future and that the subsequent Songs depict progressive stages in his career. It is expressly stated in the fourth Song that he transcends all human experience. Individual traits of his description may be found in history but not the whole gigantic figure. The triumph of the Servant's mission to the Gentiles, won by vicarious expiation, promised in the introduction and announced at the conclusion, is the sum total of the drama. Only in the Messianic interpretation is this triumph realized.

e Recent Catholic interpreters like Vaccari and Fischer no longer resort to the expedient of textual transposition by which Condamin and Van Hoonacker sought to fit the Songs into the framework of Deutero-Isaiah. They recognize the Songs as an extraneous element interrupting the development of the main theme and having a separate theme and unity of their own. They attribute however the Restoration prophecies and the Songs to the same author. An excellent exposition of the arguments on which this conclusion is based will be found in C. R. North, The Suffering Servant in Deutero-Isaiah, 161-91. If the linguistic argument for the authorship of the fourth Song is inconclusive, it must be remembered that without this, the last of the series, the other Songs would be unintelligible.

f The one point on which there is still disagreement among leading Catholic authorities is the amplitude of the Servant's mission to the Jews. Was it conceived as entirely spiritual and Messianic or as also national and political so that it included the Restoration? The latter view must be held if with Fischer we attribute the verses immediately following the first and second Songs, 42:5-7 and 49:7-9a, to the original author. It involves no theological difficulty since the Restoration, like other gifts bestowed on the chosen people, was merited by the Messias and may therefore be ascribed to him. We have already noted, however, in § 422b, that from an artistic point of view 42:5-7 and 49:7-9a cannot easily be attributed to the original author since they contain announcements reserved for later Songs. The author moreover assigned repeatedly and with the fullest confidence the mission of the Restoration to Cyrus, the servant and instrument of Yahweh. It is not likely then that he subsequently assigned it to the Servant whose mission is contrasted with that of Cyrus. We prefer therefore to attribute the added verses to a redactor, and with Vaccari to regard the Servant's mission as entirely spiritual and Messianic.

g Text and Versions—For the text of Isaiah we were almost entirely dependent on the MT, no MS of which is prior to the 10th cent. A.D. In 1947 however a Heb. MS of Isaiah was discovered in Palestine and assigned by Albright to the Maccabean period. The fragments of ancient MSS and pre-Herodian pottery revealed by a subsequent investigation of the site established the genuineness of the discovery. The date of the MS is discussed in § 80m. It cannot be doubted that the text is pre-Masoretic. It is particularly valuable as a confirmation of MT with which it generally agrees. It enables us moreover to correct some minor errors, supply some missing words (usually attested also by LXX) but gives little help in establishing the text and determining the sense of the more corrupt and difficult passages. Only variants which affect the sense are here h There are many difficult problems in Isaiah on which esteemed commentators hold different views. In accordance with the scope of this commentary and the restrictions of space we have avoided minute discussions and expounded the views which seemed to us more probable. We are particularly indebted to Fischer's commentary and have often utilized Kissane's translation.

422g indicated. The MT, though not entirely free from omissions, corruptions and interpolations, is generally good. The Versions are not very helpful. The LXX translator was a poor Hebrew scholar. He renders freely, indulges in paraphrases and in difficult passages omits words and guesses at the sense; cf. 9:2. It is thus difficult to determine his Hebrew text when a knowledge of it would be most useful. The Syriac version is free and elegant. From the corrections of Vg in the commentary it will be seen that St Jerome was not too successful in rendering the more difficult passages. Our chief help in correcting textual errors is derived from the requirements of the context and the parallelism of verse members. Our knowledge of Hebrew metre is too vague to be helpful. Rigid strophic theories are always hypothetical and often difficult to reconcile with the logical sequence of thought.

423a I 1-31 Invitation to Repentance—This vision, though not the earliest of the visions of Isaiah, serves as an introduction to his teaching of which it contains the chief elements. Its occasion and date depend on whether the chastisement depicted, 5-9, is an actual fact or a future threat. The first alternative is preferable. The query 'Why will you be smitten more?' implies that a severe chastisement has been already inflicted. There is no future verb in the description of foreign invaders devouring (pres. part.) the fruits of the land before the eyes of its inhabitants. The sacrifices and prayers by which they vainly seek relief from chastisement are present not future. Only in 20 and subsequently is future chastisement indicated. The occasion of the prophecy is most probably the invasion of Judah by Israelites, Arameans, Philistines and Edomites in 735 B.C., described in 2 Par 28:6-19.

b The ingratitude, abandonment of Yahweh and manifold sins of Israel are first described, 2-4. Let them not increase by further iniquity the severe chastisement already inflicted which has reduced them almost to the condition of Sodom and Gomorrah, almost but not entirely, since a remnant survives and restoration may be hoped for, 5-9. Sacrifices, ritual observances and prayers by which they seek to avert disaster are not acceptable to God without a true conversion, 10-15. Let them repent, obey God, be just to their neighbours that their sins may be pardoned, their prosperity restored. Otherwise God will deliver them to the sword of their enemies, 16-20. Jerusalem, once faithful, is now a harlot. Her princes are thieves and oppressors. Chastisement is still needed to separate the dross from the silver, to re-establish justice and fidelity. Sion shall be purified and restored but the wicked will perish miserably in the process of purification, 21-31.

c 1-4. The date, indicating the entire period of the prophetic activity of Isaiah, makes this vision an introduction. 2. LXX has begotten instead of 'brought up' perhaps correctly. Israel's adoption by God and her special privileges add the burden of base ingratitude to her guilt. God's chosen people are inferior in knowledge to the ox and the ass which find their way unaided in the evening from their pastures to their masters' stalls. Only in an accommodated sense can this text be referred to the ox and the ass, popularly associated with the birth of Christ. 4. For 'ungracious' read 'depraved'. Isaiah frequently calls God the Holy One of Israel.

d 5-9. 5a. 'Why will you be more smitten, will you increase transgression?' God would prefer to spare them but must punish if they continue to sin. The rod of chastisement produced bruises and weals and fresh wounds. The wounds have not been pressed to remove foul matter nor bound up nor softened with oil to relieve pain. 7d. Replace 'enemies' by Sodom and render: 'And the desolation is like the destruction of Sodom'. 8. Read is for 'shall be', booth for 'covert' and besieged for 'laid waste'. 9. The seed or remnant from which a new nation can arise refers here to the national restoration of Judah.

10-15. 12. For 'appear before me' read 'see my face', a common expression for visit. The vocalization was most probably altered to exclude the suggestion of a divine image. Read 'a trampling of my courts', a contemptuous characterization of visits to the temple. 13a. Meal-offerings and incense are rejected. 13b. 'New Moon and Sabbath solemn convocation: I will not abide (the conjunction of) iniquity and sacred assembly'. Not sacrifices and ritual worship are here reprehended but unrepented sin which makes them unacceptable. 15. Hands were raised, palms upwards, in prayer. The new MS adds: 'and your fingers of iniquity' in parallelism with 'your hands are full of blood'; cf. 59:3.

16-20. Cleansing from past sins and amendment of life in dealings with God and with the neighbour are essential elements of true repentance and reconciliation with Yahweh. 18a. 'Come let us reason together'. The pardon is offered on condition of repentance. Scarlet and crimson as colours of guilt are suggested by hands full of blood.

21-31. This vision of the future shows that the condition attached to the offer of pardon was not fulfilled and that further chastisement will be necessary for the purification of Sion. The religious restoration of Sion and the destruction of the wicked are predicted. The relations between God and Sion are frequently assimilated by the prophets to the relations between husband and wife. 21. Harlotry is infidelity. For 'judgement' read justice and for justice 'righteousness'. 23. For 'faithless' read rebellious. 24. For 'I will comfort myself over' read 'I will take satisfaction from'. 25. For 'clean' read 'in the furnace', a slight but necessary correction of MT. 27. 'Sion by justice shall be redeemed and her converted ones by righteousness'. 28. Read 'shall be destroyed', required by parallelism. 29-30. Read the verbs in the 3rd pers. with LXX and Syr. 29. 'And they shall be ashamed of the terebinths in which they delight and confounded for the gardens in which they take pleasure', because the gods whom they worshipped in the trees and gardens were powerless to help them. 30. For 'oak' read terebinth. 'The strong one [DV 'your strength'] and his work' are the sinner and his evil designs or the idolater and his idol.

II 1-5 The Universal Messianic Kingdom—The title is an introduction to a collection of prophecies, most probably those of chh 2-6, which all belong to the early period before the Syro-Ephraimitic war. The artificial linking of the following prophecy on the judgement of Yahweh to the description of the Messianic kingdom, 5, seems to indicate the hand of a redactor rather than the more skilled artistry of Isaiah. There is no logical connexion between 6 ff. and 2-4. These three verses recur in Mic 4:1-3. It is impossible to determine with certainty who is the original author, Isaiah or Micah or an earlier prophet from whom both have borrowed. The context in Mic is more appropriate and an additional verse, Mic 4:4, completes the picture. On the other hand Mic has parallels to Isaiah in ch 5 which may suggest literary dependence. The universality of the Messianic kingdom is taught elsewhere by both prophets and is certainly pre-exilic. In this conflict of arguments the context is the surest guide. The passage is commented on in § 535b.

II 6-IV 6 The Judgement of Yahweh on Judah and Jerusalem—This section contains five prophecies so closely connected that they might be regarded as five parts of a single prophecy. The judgement is first announced as the necessary consequence of sin in general and idolatry in particular, 2:6-21. Its execution is then foretold, on the Israelitic state, ruined by the deportation of its leading citizens and consequent political anarchy, 2:22-3:7, on the men of the upper classes who have oppressed the poor and weak, 3:8-15, 423h on the women of the upper classes guilty of pride and luxury, 3:16-4:1. The happy lot of the remnant, who have survived the judgement, in the Messianic kingdom is finally described, 4:2-4:6. Judah is at the height of her prosperity, 7. The prophecies may therefore be dated in the earliest period of Isaiah before the Syro-Ephraimitic war.

I II 6-21 Announcement of Judgement—The prophecy is divided into three parts by the refrain. The ruin of Judah is the chastisement of idol worship, 6-11. In the day of judgement appointed by Yahweh the proud and the exalted shall be humbled, 12-19. In that day also idols shall be cast aside by their worshippers, 20. The brevity of the third part and the variations in the refrains are probably due to textual corruption.

J 6-11. 6. Verily thou wilt destroy thy people (the house of Jacob) because they are full of sorcerers and diviners like the Philistines and make alliances with foreigners. The perfect 'thou hast destroyed' is a prophetic perfect, by which a future event is more vividly indicated. 'The house of Jacob' is probably a later insertion to connect this verse with 5. Sorcerers is a correction required by the context. The last member is obscure but probably indicates trading alliances with foreigners as the source of material prosperity and religious corruption. Philistine divination as affecting Israel is exemplified in Ochozias, 4 Kg 1:2. Western commerce had to pass through Philistia to Judah. Ozias' successful war against the Philistines, 2 Par 26:6 f., must have secured him trading concessions. 7-8, Judah's riches and military strength and also her idolatry are the result of foreign alliances. The transposition of 9a before 8c is required by the parallelism: 'And mortal has bowed down and man has abased himself to what his fingers have made'. 9b. 'And forgive them not' is most probably a gloss. 10-11. In the refrain for 'pit' read dust and for 'are' shall be.

K 12-19. Not only the pride of man but also the pride of nature (trees and mountains) and of art (towers and ships) will be humbled in the day appointed for judgement by Yahweh. The destruction of God's creatures, abused by sinful man, adds to the terror of the day and manifests the majesty of Yahweh. 12. 'against all pride and loftiness and all that is elevated and exalted'. Exalted (LXX) is better than 'humbled' (MT). 13. 'Tall and lofty' is probably a gloss, interpreting the cedars as the arrogant. Bashan is the region east of the northern Jordan, famous for its forests and its cattle. 16. Tarshish ships correspond to our ocean liners since strong ships were needed for the long voyage to Tartessus in Spain. There is an allusion here to the big ships used by Ozias after re-establishing the Red Sea trade. Read (after 'Tharsis') 'and all the beautiful galleys'. 18. The reference to the destruction of idols, out of place in the middle of the refrain, belonged originally to the third part.

I 20-21. The idolaters take their gold and silver idols with them in their flight from the judgement, but finding them an encumbrance cast them away to the moles and the bats. The text is defective here.

424a 22-III:7 Judgement of the Israelitic State—No trust must be put in man, for Yahweh will deport from Jerusalem the leaders and counsellors on whom the nation's welfare depends, 2:22-3:3. Anarchy will follow, for none will accept the responsibility of rule, 4-7.

B 22-III:3. 22. The instability of man, whose life depends on the breath given him by God, is stated before it is illustrated. Omit the article before 'man' and render: 'for why should he be reputed?'. III:1. The verb used for deport indicates, 4 Kg 17:23, the deportation foretold by the prophets. The cities, especially the capital, and the upper classes suffered most. After 'Judah' render: 'the staff and the stay', which mean, not bread and water (a gloss), but men of action and men of counsel. 2. 'Heroes and warriors . . . soothsayers and elders'. 3. For 'captain of fifty' read army leader and for 'admirable in countenance' magnate. The last pair are skilled magicians and clever sorcerers. Magicians were influential advisers. 424b

III 4-7. 4. When the leaders are gone, upstarts take command and general anarchy follows. For 'the effeminate' read wantonness. 6-7. The example of the brother, who refuses to accept the responsibility of authority in his father's house through lack of material resources, emphasizes the general destitution.

8-15 Judgement of the Leaders—Sin is the cause of the ruin of the state according to the general law of retribution, 8-11. The sinners, whom Yahweh will punish, are the leaders who oppress the people by extortion and lead them astray by evil example, 12-15.

8-11. 9a. 'Their partiality has testified against them'. 9c. 'Woe to them for they have brought evil on themselves'. 10-11. The general law of retribution is clear, but one expects a closer parallelism.

12-15. 12. God denounces those who oppress his people and lead them astray. For 'women' read usurers. 13-14a-b. The prophet announces God's arising to judge his people (LXX, peoples MT) and his coming to execute judgement on the elders and princes. Judgement implies righting the wrongs of the oppressed and punishing the oppressors. 14c-d-15. God again denounces the oppression and robbery of his people by their masters.

16-IV 1 Judgement on the Ladies of Jerusalem—Their haughty and wanton deportment shall be punished by disfigurement, 16-17. They shall be stripped of their jewellery and fine raiment, 18-23, be clad in rags and sackcloth and branded as slaves, 24. Sion shall mourn for her sons; her daughters shall be husbandless, 25-4:1.

16-17. 16d-e: 'Because they walk with mincing gait and make a tinkling with their feet'. The anklets of 18 are apparently the cause of the tinkling. 17a. 'cover with scabs'. 17b. Some render 'will expose their shame', others, 'will make bald their foreheads'. Shaving the forelocks was a legal penalty among the Babylonians. There is no evidence for the meaning shame.

18-23. The ornaments were anklets, miniature suns, crescents, ear-rings, armlets, veils, tiaras, little chains (connecting the two anklets and shortening the steps), rich girdles, boxes of perfume, amulets (for protection from the evil eye and other baneful influences), signet-rings and nose-rings. The tiara was probably a band of gold like that of the high-priest. The rendering veils is uncertain. 18-21 mention only articles of jewellery. 22-23. The articles of clothing are robes, mantles, shawls, purses, gauze, fine linen, turbans and headveils. Note the similar enumerations in 2:13-16 and 3:2-3. 24c. 'baldness and instead of rich raiment a girdle of sackcloth, For instead of beauty (shall be) shame'. The pre-Masoretic MS makes the last member intelligible by supplying bōšet 'shame' omitted by MT and Vss. LXX and Vg also transfer 'beauty' to 25.

25-IV:1. 25. 'thy men': 'the men of Sion'; 'thy': 'her'. The misery of the daughters of Sion suggests that of Sion personified, their mother, and Sion's bereavement deprives her daughters of husbands who will take away their shame. Fecundity was highly esteemed and regarded as a mark of divine favour in OT times. The dearth of husbands recalls the dearth of rulers, 3:6-7, and is expressly attributed to foreign invasion.

IV 2-6 The Future Messianic Kingdom—Fertility of the land, holiness of its inhabitants, presence and protection of Yahweh, are its characteristics. 425a

2. The bud or growth of the Lord is parallel to the fruit of the earth and therefore designates not the Messiah but the rich harvests of Messianic times. This promise of fertility was conditional and was not fulfilled owing to Israel's infidelity. 3. The remnant are the holy who shall survive the final judgement of Yahweh and, purified by suffering, shall inhabit the new Sion. 4a. 'daughter'. Daughter of Sion = Sion (Genit. of definition). The 'blood' of Jerusalem is the blood-guilt or sin of Jerusalem. Burning implies purification. 5-6. Yahweh's protection is figured by

- 425a symbols derived from Exodus. 5. 'Sion and over its assemblies a cloud'.
- b V 1-30 Sin and Chastisement of the Vineyard of Yahweh—Judah and Jerusalem, compared to a chosen vineyard, have ill repaid the solicitude of Yahweh on their behalf and will consequently be abandoned to their enemies, 1-7. Six classes of sinners, introduced by 'Woe', are then denounced: landgrabbers, 8-10, drunken revellers, 11-16, blasphemers, 18-19, perverters of right and wrong, 20, worldly wise, 21, besotted and corrupt judges, 22-24. Finally the general chastisement of foreign invasion is announced, 28-30. 17 and 25 belong to another context. The former is best read after 10. The latter contains the refrain of 9:7-10:4, and is transferred to that poem.
- c 1-7. 1. 'I will sing about my friend, the song of his love for his vineyard. My friend had a vineyard on a fertile hill'. The fertile hill, lit. 'horn, son of fatness', indicates the advantages of fertility of soil and exposure to the sun's heat. 2. For 'fenced in' read dug up, prepared for planting. The tower was for the watchman. The winepress hollowed out of stone had two parts, one for pressing the grapes, the other at a lower level for receiving the grape juice. 'looked': 'hoped'; 'wild grapes': 'stinking things'. 4b. 'Why when I hoped that it would produce grapes has it produced stinking things?' 5b. 'wasted': 'grazing land'. 6. The briars and thorns are the result of lack of cultivation. 7c-d. 'And he hoped for justice and behold bloodshed, and for righteousness and behold oppression'.
- d 8-10. The Israelite could not be legally deprived of his land which, if expropriated, should be restored in the jubilee year. 8c-d. 'field until there is no room left, and you alone are settlers in the land'. 9a. 'In mine ears the Lord of hosts has sworn, Verily many houses shall become ruins, Big and fair they shall be uninhabited'. 10. The samed (DV 'acre') was the area ploughed by a yoke of oxen in a day. Bath and ephah were measures, corresponding respectively to nine gallons and a bushel. The homer contained ten ephahs. So unproductive shall the land be that ten sameds produce only a bath of wine and one homer only an ephah of corn. It must be abandoned to sheep and goats, 17.
- e 11-17. The sin of the revellers is punished by exile, hunger, thirst and death. Man will be humbled and Yahweh will be exalted on the judgement day. 11b-12. 'And tarry in the evening that wine may heat them. Absorbed by the lyre and the lute, the timbrel and the flute, and the wine of their banquets', they disregard the work of the Lord, 13, the threatened punishment. 14a. 'soul': 'maw'. 14c-d. 'And down shall go their splendour and their tumult and their din and their revellers therein'.
- f 18-21. The blasphemers of 18-19 are compared to oxen drawing loads of iniquity and sin. The ropes with which their loads are attached are their mockeries of the prophet's predictions. 20. The perverse have lost all moral sense. 21. Those who esteem themselves wise pay no attention to warnings and threats. These three 'woes' are brief because admonition is useless.
- g 22-24. Corrupt judges, valiant only in their cups, are finally denounced. 24b. 'and as chaff perishes in the flame'. The judges are held particularly responsible for the sins of the people.
- h 28-30. The Chastisement of Foreign Invasion—The invaders described, but not named, are summoned by Yahweh. 28a. 'nation'. For the Hebrews Mesopotamia was the end of the earth. 27a. 'There is none that is weary or stumbles among them'. 28. The wheels are the chariots, swift as the whirlwind. Horses, not being shod, needed hard hoofs. 29. Assyria is the lion, Israel his prey. 30. Text and position are doubtful. It seems to describe the judgement day: roaring like the roar of the sea, darkness on earth and in the heavens.
- i VI 1-13 Vocation of Isaias—The position of this vision after chh 1-5 is most probably due to the fact that it served as an introduction to chh 7-12. As the prophecies of chh 2-5 are earlier than those of chh 7-12 they were placed first when the various collections were united. Finally ch 1 became a general introduction.

- 425i The rabbinic explanation that the exercise of the prophetic gift was suspended from the sin of Ozias until his death and that ch 6 describes its resumption is without foundation and generally rejected. If the death of Ozias and the accession of Phacee occurred in the same year, 4 Kg 15:27, the vocation of Isaias must be dated 736. Phacee became king of Israel two years after Menahem paid tribute to Assyria in 738.
- The prophet first describes the vision of Yahweh which he saw, 1-4, then his purification, 5-7, and finally his mission, 8-11. The reflexion which concludes the prophecy contains the remnant doctrine, 12-13.
- 1-4. That the scene of the vision was the temple at Jerusalem may be deduced from the word bayit or house designating the two principal parts of Solomon's temple, the shaking of the door-posts, and the mention of smoke and altar. 1. The throne implies the kingship of God, explicitly indicated in 5. 'High and elevated' may be referred to 'throne', or to 'Lord' as in 57:15. The train probably signifies rays of light, Ps 103:1. 2. 'upon it': 'by him' (God). The radical sense of sārap is 'fiery'. The winged sārāp of Is 14:29 is a serpent. Serpents are seraphim or fiery, Num 21:6, probably owing to the inflammation caused by their bites. Here however the Seraphim are undoubtedly intelligent creatures, 3, in human form since they have face, feet and hands, 6, winged attendants of God who sing his praises and accomplish his commands. As they formed God's court they were not merely two individuals but two choirs. They veil their faces and the lower parts of their bodies through reverence. 3. The trisagion, triple repetition of 'holy', indicates that God is superlatively holy. Holiness in the OT means separation from what is base or impure. God's holiness is the unique pre-eminence which separates him from his creatures. Man becomes holy by nearness to God, either ritually as his minister or morally by observing his law. It is only by accommodation that the trisagion is referred to the Trinity. Hosts in the expression 'Yahweh of hosts' means armies. Yahweh of hosts is the leader of the armies of angels and also of the armies of Israel. In the second part of the song of the Seraphim the omnipresence of Yahweh is indicated. 4. The song causes the doorposts (or the foundations of the threshold) of the temple to quake. The smoke or cloud was the visible indication of God's presence.
- 5-7. 5a. 'Woe is me for I am undone'. The vision of God foreboded death in the OT. Here moreover God's holiness reminded Isaias of his sins and the sins of his people. He cannot join in the Angels' praises for his lips are unclean. Their cleansing is also necessary in view of his mission.
- 8-11. The mission must be freely accepted hence the query. Quick decision and firm determination are characteristic of Isaias. His mission is foredoomed to failure, so far at least as its immediate purpose is concerned. His people will not be converted but will be blinded and hardened by his preaching. To understand the language in which this message is conveyed it must be remembered that the sacred writers in tracing the designs of God in the history of mankind attribute to him, often without distinction, both what he directly intends and what he indirectly permits. The All-holy God does not directly intend to blind or harden his people. They blind and harden themselves by refusing to accept the graces which he offers. This refusal renders them less worthy of future graces and less disposed to co-operate with them but never puts them outside the pale of God's Infinite Mercy. Isaias like St Paul cannot believe that the anger of God with his chosen people will endure for ever. He therefore asks 'For how long, O Lord?' The reply announces foreign invasion and deportation.
- 12-13. The prophet reflects on the last words of Yahweh. The chastisement of deportation is certain. The remnant to be spared will be further purified and from it will emerge the holy seed of the Messianic 425o kingdom. 12b. 'And great shall be the emptiness in the midst of the land'. 13. 'And should there remain in it yet a tenth it will be again for destruction, like a terebinth and like an oak of which, when felled, a stump remains. From its stump will sprout holy seed'. The distinction of the remnant, the holy seed, from the survivors of the deportation is important.

p VII 1-XII 6 Trust in God not in Foreign Alliance—All these prophecies, except one, 9:7-10:4, which may be earlier, are interconnected. The clash between the policy of Isaiah, trust in God alone, and that of Achaz, alliance with Assyria, 7:1-13, determines the character not only of the Emmanuel prophecy but also of the others which follow. Yahweh will deliver those who trust in him but alliance with Assyria will be punished by foreign invasion and the devastation of Judah. This double prediction is the theme of the parallel prophecies, chh 7-8. The description of the future deliverer is then further developed, 9:1-6. This prophecy presupposes the Assyrian invasion and occupation of Galilee in 734. It is appropriately followed by the downfall of the Assyrian oppressor, 10:5-34. This prediction is later than the fall of Samaria in 721 but prior to the invasion of Judah in 701. It is closely connected with the third description of the Messias and his kingdom of peace which immediately follows, 11:1-16. The hymn of thanksgiving of the redeemed, ch 12, concludes the series.

q VII 1-25. The occasion of the Emmanuel prophecy is first narrated, 1-14a. The prophecy follows in two parts: a message of deliverance from the impending danger, 14b-16, and of chastisement for the sin of unbelief, 17-25. This is the traditional interpretation. The modern interpretation, first proposed by E. Reuss in 1874 and accepted by nearly all subsequent commentators, regards the whole prophecy without distinction of parts as a message of chastisement. Articles of Calés (1922), Vaccari (1937) and Feuillet (1940), cited in §419b, and Dennefeld's commentary (1947) mark a return to the traditional view. Readers will find a fuller discussion of the problem in IER 70 (1948) 289-304.

r 1-14a Occasion of the Prophecy—When Phacee usurped the throne of Samaria in 736 he altered the previous policy of subjection to Assyria, to an alliance with Damascus against Assyria. Achaz of Judah refused to join the anti-Assyrian league. Phacee therefore and Rason of Damascus plotted to dethrone Achaz and establish an Aramaean partisan, the son of Tabeel, on the throne of Judah. The enthronement of a foreign usurper practically implied, according to the manners of the time, the extirpation of the native dynasty; cf. Athalia, 4 Kg 11:1. Now God had promised to David by Nathan's prophecy that his dynasty should last for ever, 2 Kg 7:16, and the promise was fulfilled in the eternal reign of Christ. But it could not be fulfilled if the dynasty of David had been extirpated. Hence the advent of the Messias was a most appropriate sign of the failure of the plot. We can thus understand why the coming of the Messias was first predicted by Isaiah at this juncture. The news of the arrival of the Aramaean army at Samaria caused general consternation in Jerusalem. Isaiah was therefore sent by God to Achaz to assure him that the plot would fail. But Achaz had already decided to purchase Assyrian support by submission and tribute. The prophet warned him and the House of David that faith was necessary and offered him moreover the choice of a sign, no matter how extraordinary, to confirm the assurance of deliverance. As Achaz refused to accept the offer on the hypocritical pretext of a religious scruple, God declared through his prophet that he himself would give the House of David a sign.

s 1. The general situation is indicated by a citation from 4 Kg 16:5, 2, the particular moment by the news of the arrival of the Aramaeans at Samaria. 'The House of David' instead of Achaz emphasizes the danger to the dynasty. 3. Isaiah must take with him his son, Shear-Yashub ('a remnant will return'), 425a a Messianic sign, 8:18, to the end of the conduit of the Upper Pool, to the highway of the Fuller's Field, south-east of the city (cf. 22:11) and there announce deliverance to Achaz. 4. The hostile kings are called two tails of smoking firebrands to show that their end is near. Omit the explanatory gloss which follows. 5. 'Whereas Syria has planned evil against thee saying'. 6. For 'rouse up' read, with a slight correction, 'attack'. 7. Note the emphatic repetition. 8-9. Rason's rule is only over Syria and Damascus, Phacee's over Ephraim and Samaria. Neither will rule over Judah and Jerusalem. The gloss, 8c, interrupts the context and is erroneous, for Ephraim ceased to be a people 14 years later in 721. 9c. Note the plural verb to indicate not Achaz alone but the House of David. 10. 'again': 'further'. No second meeting of Achaz and Isaiah is implied. A prophetic sign is a supernatural manifestation—either a miracle or a revelation or both—by which a prophecy is confirmed. The sign is manifested usually before, sometimes after, the prediction is fulfilled. In the latter case, exemplified in Ex 3:12, its value for the recipient depends on his faith. God knew that Achaz would refuse to choose a sign and gave his own Messianic sign to the House of David indicated by the plural pronoun. Ezechias at least, the heir to the throne, had faith enough to profit by it, since he inaugurated his reign, nine years later, by a great religious revival.

14b-16 The Emmanuel Prophecy—'Behold the Virgin shall conceive and bear a son and she shall call his name Emmanuel. Butter and honey shall he eat that he may know to refuse the evil and to choose the good. Verily before he knows to refuse the evil and to choose the good, the tillage land, whose two kings thou loathest, shall be devastated'.

The prophecy has two parts: the sign of deliverance, 14b-15, and the promise of deliverance fulfilled before the manifestation of the sign, 16. The sign is the Word Incarnate, conceived and born of a Virgin Mother, receiving from her the symbolic name of Emmanuel 'God-with-us', and endowed from birth with the Messianic attributes of judgement and justice. The deliverance is the devastation of the tillage land of the two plotters against the House of David by the Assyrians two years later in 733.

14b. The Heb. word here translated 'virgin' is not the technical term, b'tûlâh, but its practical equivalent, 'almâh, which means an unmarried maiden of marriageable age, presumed to be a virgin by the strict moral code of the Hebrews. The word never designates a married woman and is sometimes rendered παρθένος 'virgin' by LXX; cf. § 375a on Prov 30:19 for the one use of the word where text and meaning are obscure. The imposition of the child's name by the mother, contrary to custom (cf. 8:3), confirms the conclusion of a virginal conception. Emmanuel necessarily implies by Hebrew usage God's omnipotent aid and consequently deliverance. The word 'behold', following the mention of a sign, naturally introduces it.

15 contains two members connected by a preposition which followed by an infinitive is usually final, 'that he may know', and very rarely temporal, 'when he shall know'. The word hem'ah may mean 'curds' or 'butter'. In the OT milk and honey usually mean excellent and abundant food. From this some conclude that 15a indicates a period of prosperity, the result of the deliverance announced in 16. Others on the contrary suppose that 15a indicates the absence of tillage and a period of adversity, the result of the chastisement, introduced into 16 by an alteration of the text, which makes Judah the land to be devastated. Both schools of interpreters understand 15b as attainment of the age of reason and connect the verse-members temporally. Emmanuel then would attain the age of reason shortly after the devastation of Samaria and Damascus in 733 or of Judah in 701. Thus the prophecy would determine erroneously the time of Emmanuel's advent and would contradict

428c 6:11-13 according to which the Messianic age will be preceded by the devastation of Judah, the deportation of its inhabitants and the further purification of the survivors. In reality the verse has been misinterpreted and simply attributes the Messianic dignity to Emmanuel. Without such an indication, supplied in the two subsequent predictions of the advent of the Messiah (9:1-7; 11:1-5), this prophecy would be incomplete.

d The attainment of the age of reason confers on a child only moral discernment by which he can choose or refuse both good and evil. Emmanuel receives a higher gift, a practical knowledge by means of which he chooses the good and refuses the evil. This is the gift of the ideal king who loves justice and hates iniquity and is therefore anointed by God with the oil of gladness beyond his fellows, Ps 44:8. It is the practical wisdom of Solomon, the sound judgement which enables a monarch to rule justly. To be instrumental in conferring this gift butter and honey must indicate not corporal but intellectual nourishment. We have an instance of this figurative use in the description of the spouse: 'Honey and milk are under thy tongue', Cant 4:11. The exact sense is expressed more clearly in an Arabic parallel: 'Thy discourse, if thou graciously favoured me with it, is like the honey of bees and the bestings of camels', I. Guidi in RB 12 (1903) 243. This parallel and the common origin and ties of language and customs which united Hebrews and Arabs suggest another Arabic parallel, first proposed by H. Lammens (ER 151 [1917, 2] 421) and accepted by J. Calès (RSR 12 [1922] 174), as an explanation of the words of Isaiah. The prophet alludes to the tahnik, lit. conferring of sound judgement. For this purpose the chief of the tribe or some very distinguished person rubbed on the soft palate of the new-born child either chewed dates or, as at Tāif (and in Palestine where dates are not common), a mixture of butter and honey. The custom must have been known to the prophet's hearers like so many other Hebrew customs unknown to us. The infant, who received from God at his birth the gift of sound judgement by means of which he is enabled to rule justly, is evidently the Messiah. Judgement and justice (or righteousness) are the foundation of God's kingship, Ps 89:15; 96:8, and fundamental attributes of the Messianic king, Ps 71:1; Is 9:7; 16:5; 28:17; Jer 23:5.

e 16. As the sing. often replaces the plur. in Hebrew, especially when a class is designated, the sing. tillage land is intelligible. The emphatic sense of kî is supported by the emphatic repetition in 7. The repetition of 15b is to inform us that the promise of deliverance will be fulfilled before the sign is manifested. The priority of the deliverance is also expressly indicated in Ex 3:12.

f Emmanuel is the Promised Messiah—(1) He is the descendant of David in whom the eternity of the Davidic dynasty will be realized. (2) His unique virginal conception and name, Emmanuel, suggest the promised Redeemer. (3) He receives from God the Messianic endowments of judgement and justice. (4) His dominion over Judah 'thy land, O Emmanuel', 8:8, while Ezechias reigns, can only be by Messianic right. (5) He is identical with the Messiah of 9:1-7; 11:1-5 and 28:16.

g The Emmanuel Prophecy a Threat of Punishment?—Achaz and his people were undoubtedly delivered once and for all from the two hostile nations whom they feared. This deliverance is predicted by Isaiah in the introduction, 7:7, in his address to the House of David, 7:16, and in his address to the people, 8:4. Nevertheless most modern commentators, Catholic as well as non-Catholic, alter the text of 7:16 so as to make Judah the land whose devastation is predicted and interpret Is 7:14b-16 as a threat of punishment. The foundation of this interpretation is the curds and honey on which Emmanuel is nourished, supposed to be a consequence of the absence of tillage and thus a sign of the devastation of Judah. It is assumed that 428g Yahweh substituted for the sign of deliverance rejected by Achaz a sign of the punishment merited by his infidelity. The popularity of this interpretation necessitates a brief discussion of the difficulties which it involves and the foundation on which it is based.

h The most obvious difficulty is the temporal association of the advent of the Messiah with the devastation of Judah which occurred many centuries earlier. The prophet would err if he predicted the actual presence of the Messiah on earth at the period indicated. It is suggested therefore that the presence predicted is either ideal—Emmanuel is conceived by Isaiah as present on earth and eating curds and honey—or hypothetical—if Emmanuel were present on earth he would eat curds and honey. It must be admitted that these interpretations of the prophet's Messianic prediction are forced and unnatural. Can we believe moreover that the sign so definitely promised in confirmation of the prophet's message was never actually given? Emmanuel, if not really present, did not eat curds and honey.

i The restricted horizon of these interpreters presents a further difficulty. They only contemplate the material catastrophe of the devastation of Judah then to be feared. They ignore the far more important spiritual danger of the extirpation of the Davidic dynasty and the consequent extinction of the Messianic hope. It is this danger which explains the character of the sign given by Yahweh, the real advent of the Messiah at an undetermined future period, a sign not of punishment but of deliverance by which the promise of salvation from imminent danger is appropriately confirmed. In the modern interpretation on the contrary the announcement of the advent of the Messiah at this particular juncture is unexplained. The sole connexion of the Messianic introduction with the rest of the prophecy is the sign of punishment which it is supposed to provide but which was never actually given.

j A third difficulty against the modern interpretation is that all the contents of the Emmanuel prophecy, if we abstract for the moment from the disputed question of Emmanuel's nourishment, definitely suggest not punishment but deliverance. The Messiah is a deliverer. He comes, as he himself tells us, not to judge the world but to save the world. His God-given name Emmanuel 'God-with-us' is the regular Hebrew indication of God's omnipotent aid and always implies success or deliverance. The devastation of the kingdoms of Judah's enemies manifestly indicates the deliverance of Judah. We expect moreover in the announcement, made not to Achaz alone but to the House of David, deliverance as well as punishment. In the introduction deliverance is promised, 7:7, and punishment is threatened, 7:9. In the parallel announcement to the people deliverance from present danger is first predicted, 8:1-4, and future punishment is then foretold, 8:5-10. In the prophecy of Nathan, with which the Emmanuel prophecy is very closely connected, an absolute promise of the eternal conservation of the Davidic dynasty is similarly followed by a threat of punishment in cases of infidelity.

k The sole foundation of the modern interpretation is Emmanuel's nourishment of curds and honey understood literally as a meagre diet and the sign of adversity and punishment. The literal sense of the expression is, however, rendered very doubtful by the context which indicates prosperity and deliverance and by the regular Hebrew use of milk and honey as a proverbial expression for excellent and abundant food. Support is sought for the literal sense in 21-22 where we read: 'It will come to pass on that day that every man shall keep one cow and two sheep and owing to the abundance of milk every man shall eat curds—yea curds and honey shall all eat who are left in the land'. The text is found in a description of the future devastation of Judah, but as interpolations and transpositions are not infrequent in Isaiah, its meaning must be determined primarily not from its present context but from its contents. It clearly 426k describes a period in which milk abounds to such an extent that each individual has a constant supply, and milk and honey are the food of all. Such abundance of milk cannot indicate adversity and punishment but is a characteristic of the Messianic period (Is 55:1; Joel 3:18). The passage thus appears to be a rabbinic picture of Messianic prosperity, originally a gloss on Is 7:15 explaining how the food of the Messiah will also be the food of his subjects. There are two indications that the text is rabbinic rather than Isaian. Such trivial provision for individual needs contrasts with the prophet's more dignified solicitude for the nation as a whole and suggests rabbinism. Milk and honey do not appear as the food of the blessed in the OT but subsequently in 4 Esd 2:19 and later Jewish writers. There is no doubt an element of conjecture in this tentative explanation of a difficult text. The fact remains however that universal ownership of cattle and abundance of milk are not a natural indication of adversity and punishment. The literal sense of curds and honey on which the modern interpretation is founded has little support in these verses.

1 Some writers try to solve the difficulties of the Emmanuel prophecy by compenetrations. Isaiah announces at the same time and in the same words two infants: the Messiah to be born in the distant future and an anonymous infant whose proximate advent is predicted. The text however only indicates one child who has Messianic attributes. The anonymous infant is a deus ex machina. In genuine cases of compenetrations such as an actual king and the Messianic king according to the Antiochian exegetes or the destruction of Sennacherib's army and the fall of Assyria, both persons or events are indicated in the text and are so interconnected in the prophet's mind that he passes naturally from one to the other.

Several positive proofs that Emmanuel is the Messiah have been already given. Other identifications of the child whose advent is predicted have been proposed by those who either refuse to admit that the prophecy is Messianic or regard the child as a type of the Messiah. It is not difficult to show that these are all exegetically untenable. 'Thy land, O Emmanuel', 8:8, defines Emmanuel as a single individual. Hence the interpretation of hā-almāh as every maiden and the multiplicity of Emmamuels cannot be admitted. Ezechias cannot be identified with Emmanuel as he was born several years before the prophecy and his mother, a married woman, could not be called almāh. Neither could the wife of Isaiah, called prophetess, as the wife of a priest (khūri) in modern Syria is called priestess (khūriyya), be styled almāh. In any case the sign given to the House of David, a scion of that house, naturally differs from the sign given to the people, a son of the people.

m 17-25 The Chastisement of Unbelief—The oracle is addressed to the House of David. The chastisement is twofold: Egyptian occupation and Babylonian devastation. There is no reference to the Assyrian invasion of Sennacherib by which the people were chastised, 8:5-10, but not the House of David since Yahweh intervened to save Ezechias and his capital. The chastisement is comparable only to the loss of the ten tribes in the schism, 17. Egyptians represented by flies which abound on the Nile and its branches and Trans-Euphrateans, here Babylonians, compared to the more voracious bees, will invade Judah. The Pharaoh, Necho, re-asserted Egypt's ancient claims to Palestine. His slaughter of Josias and subsequent Egyptian intrigues hastened the fall of the House of David.

n 18. 'hiss for': 'whistle to'. 19b-c. 'in the ravines of the precipices and in the clefts of the rocks and in all the thorn bushes and in all the watering-places'. 20. The more terrible invaders were the Babylonians who completely devastated Judah. They were the razor which Yahweh hired. Hair of the feet is a euphemism. 'feet and even the beard will it [the razor] sweep away'. In 17 and 20 'the king of Assyria' is a gloss. Another gloss, 21-22, interrupts the description of the devastation continued in 23; cf. § 426k. 23-24. The devastated vineyards become briars and thorns into which only 426a the hunter in search of game penetrates. 25. The hill terraces also cultivated, but not productive, when devastated, of briars and thorns like the plainlands, now become pasturage. It must be noted that the Assyrians colonised the provinces which they annexed and did not leave the land untilled. The Babylonians, after conquering Judah, did not colonize it. Isaiah depicts therefore, in vivid colours, not an imaginary Assyrian but the real Babylonian conquest of Judah which was the final chastisement of the sins of the House of David.

VIII 1-10 The Prophet's Announcement to the People 427a

—This prophecy like the preceding has two parts: a promise of deliverance and a prediction of chastisement. The solemnity of the prophetic announcement is attested by the great tablet, the ordinary script which the people could read, and the legal attestation of two trustworthy witnesses. The chastisement predicted is explicitly the Assyrian invasion of 701 B.C., a heavy calamity for the people of Judah, of whom 200,150 (prob. an Assyrian scribal error for 20,150) were deported.

1-4 The Promise of Deliverance—1. The inscription b like those on seals began with a preposition meaning 'belonging to'. The name is rendered 'Haste—booty—speed—spoil' and denotes the speedy discomfiture of Judah's two enemies explicitly mentioned in 4. 2. Urias is the high-priest, 4 Kg 16:10, Zacharias may be the father-in-law of Achaz, 2 Par 29:1, or the pre-exilic author of Zach chh 9-11. 3. The sign, a son with symbolic name, is similar to that of the Emmanuel prophecy. The father gives the name according to custom. 4. 'his' (before 'father and mother'): 'my'. Damascus was captured and sacked in 732, Samaria only in 721. The capture of these cities within two years is not here predicted but the devastation of their territories, as in 7:16, regarded as a spoliation of the capitals themselves. Cf. 28:1 where Samaria becomes a fading flower by loss of territory. 'strength': 'wealth'.

5-10 The Chastisement—Because the people of Judah e have despised divine aid, compared to the waters of Siloe which flow softly, and have melted with fear of Rason and Phacee, despite God's promise of deliverance, the Assyrians, whose aid they sought, compared to the turbulent waters of the Euphrates, will overrun the entire land, but the flood will only reach the neck, for Jerusalem, the head, will be saved. However numerous and strong the enemies may be their plans will not succeed 'for God is with us'. Sennacherib's invasion is here predicted. The waters of Siloe indicate an ancient aqueduct outside the east wall of the city conveying the waters of Gihon to the gardens in the valley.

6. 'taken': 'feared'. 7. 'many': 'mighty'; 'he': 'it'; 'his': 'its'. 8. 'And it shall sweep into Judah in a flood and it shall overflow till it reach the neck; and its spreading margins'. As Ezechias was then king of Judah it is by Messianic right that the land is Emmanuel's. He is not considered actually present, but the land of Canaan, granted to the chosen people in view of his coming, belongs to him. 9. 'Take note [LXX, preferable to 'be in uproar', MT] . . . and be dismayed. . . . Gird yourselves and be dismayed' (emphatic repetition). 10c. 'because Emmanuel' or 'because God is with us'. In either case the deliverance of Jerusalem from the wrath of Sennacherib is attributed directly or indirectly to Emmanuel.

11-IX 7 The Prophet's Announcement to his Disciples d

—This prophecy supposes the recent devastation of Galilee by the Assyrians. The league with Assyria, vindicated by its results, confirms the people in their reliance on human aid. Isaiah encourages his faithful disciples to trust in God alone and await patiently the hour of deliverance. He predicts the punishment of unbelief. His prophetic instruction of the people ceases and the formation of his disciples takes its place—a remarkable parallel to the teaching of Christ. By 427d fidelity to Yahweh they will be saved from evil to be finally dissipated where it began, in Galilee, by the advent of the Messiah.

11a. 'Verily so hath Yahweh spoken to me when his hand was strong upon me and he warned me not to walk'. 12. The warning forbids 'calling alliance all that this people calls alliance', and fearing what they fear. qeter may mean 'conspiracy' (against the state by reliance on God alone) or 'alliance' (with Assyria, the actual state policy). The latter interpretation is preferable as the fear also condemned is the fear of Samaria and Damascus. 13. 'sanctify': 'ally yourselves with', a correction suggested by the parallelism. 14. 'sanctification': 'sanctuary', place of refuge. The two houses of Israel are the Northern and Southern Kingdoms. 'ruin': 'trap'. There are several references to the stone of stumbling and the rock of offence in the NT (Lk 2:34; 20:17; Mt 21:42; Rom 9:32; 1 Pet 2:8). The exact construction of the verbs in 16 is uncertain. Isaiah has no more to say to the unbelieving people on the subject of reliance on God rather than on man and therefore binds up his testimony and seals his instructions now reserved for his disciples. 17-18. He will wait for the Lord, he and his two sons. Shear-yashub is the sign of the Messianic remnant. Mahershallahashbaz is the sign of deliverance from invasion. Isaiah himself ('Yahweh will save') bears equivalently the name of Jesus. 19-20. The disciples are warned to adhere to the testimony and instructions of 16 when people urge them to consult pythons and diviners saying: 'Shall not a people consult their gods, (consult) the dead on behalf of the living?' 20b-22 are corrupt and obscure. Vg gives the general sense of a time of calamity and distress, of the night preceding the dawn.

IX 1-7 Light after Darkness: The Reign of the Messiah—Galilee was the first part of Palestine to suffer deportation and become an Assyrian province in 734 B.C. Here in the latter days a light shall shine, joy shall abound, oppression shall cease, for the Messiah shall come to rule in peace with justice and judgement an eternal kingdom.

1-5. 1. 'Formerly he humiliated the land of Zabulon and the land of Nephthali, latterly he will glorify the way of the sea beyond the Jordan, Galilee of the Gentiles'. Nazareth was in Zabulon. Nephthali lay along the Jordan east of Zabulon. The way of the sea was the trade route from Damascus to the Mediterranean passing through Galilee. Beyond the Jordan means east or west of it according to the context. Here the trade route from Damascus gives the direction and thus indicates the west (Galilee). Some interpreters find in 1b an indication of the three Assyrian provinces recently established: Du'uru (Dor), the way of the sea, Gal'azu (Galaad), beyond the Jordan, and Magidu (Megiddo), Galilee of the Gentiles. But only Galilee's humiliation is mentioned in 1a. It is therefore Galilee's glorification by the life and teaching of the Messiah that is predicted in 1b. Dor and Galaad are ignored. 3a (slightly corrected): 'Thou hast made exultation great, thou hast made joy abound'. The greatest joys were those of victory and harvest-time. 4. 'For the yoke of his burden, the rod of his shoulder, and the staff of his work-master thou hast broken as in the day of Midian'. Staff is the staff of office. The terms indicate oppression in general. On the day of Midian cf. Jg chh 8-9. 5a-b. 'For every boot that tramped in tumult and every mantle rolled in blood shall be for burning, shall be consumed by fire'. War shall be no more.

6-7. 'For a child is born to us, a son is given to us, And sovereignty is on his shoulder, And his name is called: Wonder-counsellor, Mighty God, Father for ever, Prince of Peace. For the extension of sovereignty and for peace without end, On the throne of David and over his kingdom, To establish it and to sustain it in judgement and justice, Henceforth and for ever—The zeal of Yahweh of hosts will accomplish this'.

The Messiah and his reign are depicted as present. The indefinite futurity of the event was previously indicated by the distinction of times, 1. Sovereignty resting on the shoulder is most probably the kingly office imposing duties and thus a burden. The extension of sovereignty and peace without end express the teaching of Christ in 'Thy kingdom come' and 'Love one another'. The throne of David recalls Nathan's prophecy and thus identifies the child with Emmanuel. Judgement and justice are characteristic attributes of Emmanuel, 7:15, and of the Messiah. The eternal reign of the Messiah, implied by the prophecy of Nathan, is here first explicitly indicated.

The Names—Names in the Bible express nature or attributes; cf. the divine name, Yahweh, Ex 3:14. As the last two names are evidently composite and the second is composite in biblical usage, the first is also composite and there are four names each of two words. These names are an essential part of the revelation. The second word of the first name is a participle and may therefore be a verb or a noun. The sense is practically the same whether we render 'a counsellor of wonderful things' or 'a wonder of a counsellor'. Mighty God appears always in the OT and even in Is 10:21 as a name of Yahweh expressing his omnipotence. This divine attribute predicated of the Messiah implies his divinity. That Isaiah understood the implication is uncertain. His hearers probably interpreted the name as superhuman in might. The second part of the third name means either booty or eternity. 'Father of booty' does not express a permanent quality and scarcely suits the parallel, 'Prince of Peace'. 'Father of Eternity' may mean 'possessed of eternity', Eternal, or 'Father for ever', expressing the eternal solicitude of the Messianic king for his people's welfare. The last interpretation is the most satisfactory. Prince of Peace must be understood as implying, in accordance with the full sense of the Hebrew šālôm, a reign of peace and prosperity. LXX interpreted these names erroneously: 'And his name shall be called Angel of the Great Council. For I shall bring peace to the princes'. 'El' 'God' is 'Angel', 'abî' 'father' is 'I shall bring'. 'ad' 'eternity' is the preposition 'to' (cf. the Introit of the Feast of the Circumcision).

IX 8-X 4 + V 25 Sins and Chastisements of Israel 428a

—This prophecy narrates the sins and chastisements of the Northern Kingdom in the past and predicts the final chastisement of complete destruction. It contains five strophes each mentioning a particular sin and ending with a refrain on the necessity of further chastisement. The first part of the last strophe, 5:25, describing the sin, is missing. The date is difficult to determine as the events described are past history. The manner is more reminiscent of the early prophecies, chh 2-5.

8-12 Pride of Israel—The sin (of pride) is described. 9-10, its punishment, 11-12. 8. Jacob and Israel designate the Northern Kingdom. 9a. 'And all the people knew, Ephraim and the inhabitants of Samaria, saying'. Read his (Israel's) enemies and omit 'of Rasin'. The verb rendered 'bring in a crowd' means literally 'weave together', unite Israel's enemies: Philistines in the south-west and Aramaeans in the east.

13-17 Misgovernment in Israel—13. Chastisement has brought no amendment. 14b. 'Head and tail, palm-branch and rush' include everybody. 15 is clearly a gloss. 16 indicates the sin: 'They that guide this people are misleaders and the guided have been led astray'. 17. The chastisement must be universal. For 'have joy' read spare and for 'hypocrite' goddess.

18-21 Civil Strife in Israel—Civil strife is evidenced in Israel by the ten dynasties of the monarchical period as contrasted with the one dynasty of Judah. 18. Read after 'fire' 'that consumes' and after 'thorn' 'and kindles the thickets of the forest, and they roll up in a pillar of smoke'. 19. 'troubled': 'overturned' or 'enkindled'. 20. 'turn': 'cut off' (something to eat). Ephraim and Manasses were rivals.

X 1-4 Unjust Judgements in Israel—Oppression of the lower classes, especially widows and orphans, in the law courts was a common crime. Unjust laws are first reprehended, then unjust judgements. 1b. 'and to the scribes who write trouble'. 3. 'glory': 'riches'. The f V 25. The punishment is introduced by 'therefore' but the sin has disappeared. The place of this fragment in the poem is unknown.

g X 5-34 Chastisement of the Pride of Assyria—Assyria, here personified, is God's instrument in the chastisement of Israel. He believes, however, that he is the sole author of his conquests and that he can destroy Jerusalem as he destroyed other cities. His pride will be punished by his speedy downfall and his designs against Jerusalem will be defeated by Yahweh. The unity of the prophecy is indicated by the announcement of the design against Jerusalem in the beginning, 11, and its frustration in the end, 33-34. As Judah remained subject to Assyria, 20, long after the death of Achaz, the limits of date are 717, destruction of Carchemish, and 701, Sennacherib's invasion.

h 5-19. 5. Assyria is the staff of God's anger, the rod of God's wrath; 'he is in their hand'. 6. 'deceitful': 'godless'; 'prey' and to leave them to be trodden on'. The tenses in 6-7 are present. 8. 'He however thinks not so. And his heart considers not so'. 9. Calano is Kullane, east of Syrian Antioch, conquered with Arpad, north of Aleppo, in 740. Hamath on the Orontes was finally subdued in 720. 10. 'As my hand hath overpowered these kingdoms—and their idols were more powerful than those of Jerusalem'. The Assyrian assimilates Yahweh to an idol. 12. The description of Assyrian pride and its punishment is aptly introduced. 13. Read 'peoples'; omit 'of the princes'. 'as a mighty man I have laid low the inhabitants'. 14. 'strength': 'riches'. 15c-d. 'As if the rod should swing him who lifts it, As if the staff should lift him who is not wood'. 16a. The fat ones are the leaders. 'Instead of well-being a kindling shall be kindled like the kindling of a fire'. 17-19. A fever shall replace good health. The fire suggests God's wrath consuming the Assyrian warriors as fire consumes the trees of a forest. 18 (after 'flesh'): 'like the wasting away of a sick man'. Here as in 33-34 there is reference to the destruction of Sennacherib's army.

i 20-27 Messianic Interlude—The Assyrian remnant, 19, like the Philistine remnant, 14:30, suggests to Isaiah the remnant of Israel and the Messianic age. 20. Then will Israel rely, not as now on Assyria, but on God alone the 'Mighty God'; cf. 9:6. 22. No matter how numerous the Israelites then may be, only a remnant shall be converted for 'an extermination which overflows with justice [a purification] is decreed'. 23. 'For an extermination, as decreed, will the Lord Yahweh of Hosts accomplish over the whole earth'. The second verse extends the judgement to all nations. St Paul cites both verses, Rom 9:27 f., as predicting the small number of converted Israelites. 24-27. The people are warned not to fear the Assyrians from whose tyranny they will soon be delivered, as they were from Egyptian and Medianite oppression. For the rock of Oreb cf. Jg 7:25. 26. 'lift it up': 'take him away'. Yahweh will remove the Assyrian as he removed the Egyptian oppressor. 27. 'oil': 'fat'. The strength of the neck will burst the yoke laid upon it.

j 28-34 Invasion of Sennacherib—The abrupt commencement and the eastern deviation from the highway suggest a surprise attack on Jerusalem made by a northern enemy, the Assyrians. Of the places named Magron, Gallim, Laishah, Madmenah and Gabim are unidentified. Ayyath is Hai, et-tell, east of Bethel and 12 m. N. of Jerusalem. 28. 'into': 'through'. Machmas where the baggage is left is Muchmas, c 8 m. from the capital and separated from Geba by the Wady Suwēnit. 29a. 'They cross the pass (saying) Geba is our night-quarters'. Rama, er-Ram, 5 m. from Jerusalem on the main road, is in panic. Gabaa, Saul's capital, Tell el-Ful, east of Rama and 3 m. from the Holy City, is in flight. 30. 'Hearken Laishah, answer Anathoth'. Anathoth is Anata, 2½ m. from Jerusalem. 31. The inhabitants of Madmena and Gabim flee to the capital. 32. The invader halts for the day at Nob on Mt Scopus in full view of Sion which he threatens. 33. But God is there to destroy the Assyrians, compared to the trees of a mighty forest as in 18-19. 'earthen vessel': 'boughs'. The tall trees are felled by the storm wind, and, 34, the undergrowth is levelled by the axe. When we compare this prediction with its fulfilment we find a remarkable but instructive discrepancy. Sennacherib sought and failed to capture Jerusalem, but he invaded Judah after subjugating Philistia and consequently from the west. From this we learn that the graphic description of the line of march does not indicate the actual route of the future invader but is instead the poetical garb in which the prophecy is wrapped, and by which the invasion is more vividly depicted and the origin of the invader is insinuated; cf. Institutiones Biblicae (Romae, 1937⁴) 414 f. It is often difficult to distinguish between ornamental and essential details in a prophecy. There is however no other Assyrian invasion of Jerusalem to which this prophecy can be referred. On the destruction of the army of Sennacherib cf. 4 Kg 19:35. XI 1-16 The Messias, his Reign, his Subjects—This prophecy is closely connected with the preceding oracle. Just as the Assyrian remnant suggested the remnant of Judah, 10:19 f., so the destruction of the forest trees to which the Assyrians are compared recalls the downfall of the House of David and suggests the figure of a shoot or sapling to indicate the Messias. The Messias, 1-5, his reign, 6-9, his subjects, 10-16.

1-5 The Messias—'But a shoot shall grow from the stock of Jesse And a sapling shall sprout from his root, And the spirit of Yahweh shall rest upon him—The spirit of wisdom and understanding, The spirit of counsel and might, The spirit of the knowledge and the fear of Yahweh, And his joy shall be in the fear of Yahweh. Not by the sight of the eyes shall he judge, Nor by the hearing of the ears shall he decide, But he shall judge the lowly with justice And decide with equity for the poor in the land, And he shall smite the oppressor with the rod of his mouth And with the breath of his lips he shall slay the wicked, And justice shall be the girdle of his loins And fidelity the cincture of his reins'.

1. Both shoot and sapling indicate the Messias, a scion of the dethroned House of David. Jesse, father of David, is the root from which the Davidic dynasty sprang. 2. The spirit of Yahweh implies that Yahweh is operative as the author of the gifts, whose permanence is expressed by 'rest upon'. The gifts, mentioned in pairs, are intellectual: wisdom and understanding; practical: counsel and might; and religious: knowledge and fear of Yahweh. The distinction between wisdom and understanding is not clear-cut, but there is some foundation in Scripture for the explanation of St Thomas that wisdom is knowledge of things in their relation to God, their author and their end, while understanding is knowledge of things in themselves and in their mutual relations. Isaiah very probably alludes here to the kingly gift of a 'wise and understanding heart', bestowed by God on Solomon, 3 Kg 3:12. The proper exercise of these speculative gifts is assured by the practical gifts of counsel and might, already indicated in 9:6 by the Messianic titles: Wonder-Counsellor and Mighty God. The religious gifts, knowledge and fear of Yahweh, need no explanation. The last gift is rendered freely 'piety' in LXX and Vg, but literally 'fear of the Lord' in 3a. This is the origin of the seven gifts of the Holy Ghost. The original text has only six gifts, unless we assume, improbably, that the indwelling spirit, 2a, is intended as a separate gift. Some reject 3a as a repetition. It has no parallel member. 4-5. Judgement and justice, the special attributes of the Messianic king, appear in action. 4b. The Messias like Yahweh operates by his word and by his breath or spirit. 'Earth', 'ereb, is altered to 'oppressor', 'aris. 5. The girdle represents activity, hampered by long, loose garments.

6-9. The reign of the Prince of Peace will be a reign of peace. His subjects will be secure from all molestation and particularly from attacks of wild beasts. The peace depicted is to some extent idyllic. Carnivorous animals will not become herbivorous, but the animals created for man's use and benefit and become his 428n enemies in consequence of sin will return to their allegiance; cf. Rom 8:19 ff. This seems clearly stated in 9 where the wild beasts are declared harmless owing to the universal knowledge of God. 6. Omit 'and the sheep'. MT has 'fatling' for 'sheep' instead of a verb needed and supplied in Vg. 7. 'calf': 'cow'; supply 'together' after 'feed'.

10-16. The subjects of the Messias will be Gentiles and Jews returned from exile. The authenticity of these verses, especially the prose passages 11-12 and 15-16, has been questioned. No reasonable objection can be made to the conversion of the Gentiles, 11; cf. 2:2, or to the reoccupation of the promised land, 13-14. Nor is there sufficient reason to exclude a knowledge of the extent of the Diaspora, manifested in the prose passages, from the prophet's vision. 10. 'beseech': 'seek'; 'sepulchre': 'dwelling-place'. 11. 'set': 'lift up'; 'possess': 'acquire'. Patros is Upper Egypt, Elam Iran, Sennaar (Shinar) Babylonia, Emath Hamath, Islands coastlands and islands of the Mediterranean. 13. Domestic dissension and foreign molestation shall cease. Judah and Israel are reunited. 14. The shoulder of the Philistines indicates the foothills west of the mountains of Judah. 'fly': 'swoop down'; 'by the sea': 'to the west'. 15. 'lay waste': 'dry up'; 'strength of his spirit': 'heat of his breath'. 'Strike into' means 'divide'. Not only will the Red Sea be dried up, but also seven dry channels will be made in the river (Euphrates) for the returning exiles.

XII 1-6 Canticle of Thanksgiving and Praise—The authenticity of this canticle is doubted. The citation from Exodus (2b = Ex 15:2) suggests that 4: 'Praise ye the Lord', etc. is also a citation from the postexilic psalm 104:1. On the other hand the Holy One of Israel in 6 is Isaian. The canticle has two parts, 1-3 and 4-6, each provided with an introduction. As the song of the redeemed it aptly concludes the Messianic section.

1. 'I will praise thee Yahweh for though wrath with me thy wrath has turned and thou has comforted me'. 2. 'praise': 'protection'. 3. 'saviour's fountains': 'fountains of salvation'. 6. 'habitation of': 'dweller in', used collectively.

429a XIII 1-XXIII 18 Prophecies against the Gentile Nations.

XIII 1-XIV 27 The Chastisement of Babylon—The authenticity of this prophecy is disputed. The title is most probably due to the redactor. Its correctness, however, is shown by the subsequent mention of Babylon, 19, and the Medes, 17, also by the prediction of the restoration, 14:1-3, which was the sequel of Babylon's fall. Hence the theory that the prophecy originally referred to Assyria but was subsequently adapted to Babylonia deserves no consideration. From the literary point of view the second poem is a masterpiece and eminently worthy of the most grandiloquent of the prophets. It is argued that the Chaldeans of Babylonia were relatively unimportant during the lifetime of Isaiah and for a century afterwards and that the prediction of their destruction would have no interest for his contemporaries. On the other hand he had already foretold the brevity of Assyrian domination, 10:25, the Egyptian occupation of Palestine in 609, 7:18-19, and the Babylonian devastation of Judah, 7:23-25. It would seem therefore that the ruin of Babylon like the ruin of Assyria was within the range of his prophetic vision. It may be noted too that the Persians, unknown to history in the days of Isaiah, are not mentioned as the destroyers of Babylon but the Medes, their earlier known associates in world empire. Between the two prophecies against Babylon is a short description of the restoration, 14:1-3. A short prophecy against Assyria follows the prophecies against Babylon, 14:24-27. It is certainly Isaian and probably out of place here.

XIII 1-22 Destruction of Babylon—Muster of the armies of Yahweh, 1-5. The Day of Yahweh, 6-13. Panic in Babylon, 14-16. Massacre of its inhabitants, 17-19. Babylon a desert for ever, 20-22.

1-5. 1. The word rendered 'burden' means most probably pronouncement or oracle. 2. 'dark': 'bare'; 'lift up': 'wave'. After 'hand': 'and let them enter the gate of the princes', the gate of Babylon against which the army of Yahweh is mustered. 3. 'Sanctified' means dedicated to a divine mission. 'I have called my warriors for my wrath, My proudly exulting ones'. 4. 'Hark to the tumult on the mountains. . . . Hark to the uproar of kingdoms. . . . Yahweh of hosts musters a host for battle'. 5. 'to them that come': 'they come'; 'land': 'earth'. The judgement is first depicted as universal.

6-13. 6. 'howl': 'lament'. The day of Yahweh is the day when he shall judge all nations. 'With the might of the Almighty it comes'. 8a. The plur. verb has no subject. Read probably: 'And all the dwellers on the earth shall be dismayed'. 8c-d. 'They shall gaze at each other in dismay. Their faces shall be inflamed'. 9. 'cruel day in wrath and burning anger'. 10. 'brightness': 'constellations'. 11. 'I will visit the world for its evil and the wicked for their iniquity'. 'infidels': 'the haughty'; 'mighty': 'rulers'. 12. 'the finest of gold': 'the gold of Ophir', a land in or near South Arabia, famous for its gold. 13. 'Therefore shall the heavens tremble and the earth be shaken from its place'. The firmament was supposed to rest on the extremities of the earth which was itself supported on pillars. Both heaven and earth tremble before the wrath of Yahweh.

14-16. Babylon, a world centre, will have no defence on the day of judgement. The foreigners will flee from it but the natives will be slain. 14. Doe and sheep should be plural. 15. 'come to their aid': 'be captured'.

17-19. The Medes appear in western Iran in the 9th cent. B.C. whence they raided Mesopotamia and finally with their allies destroyed the Assyrian empire towards the close of the 7th cent. They were subjugated by the Persians in 549 B.C., but received a privileged position in the empire, being free from tribute. They are depicted as less civilized than the cultured Babylonians. The text of 18a is corrupt. 'And youths they slay and maidens they destroy' is suggested.

20-22. The prophecy was fulfilled but not immediately. The city was captured without a battle and continued to be inhabited for a considerable period. 20. 'founded': 'dwelt in'; 'rest': 'make their flocks lie down'. 21. 'serpents': 'owls'; 'hairy ones': 'satyrs'. These were goat-like demons. A poetical reference to them does not imply their existence. 22. 'owls': 'hyenas'; 'sirens': 'jackals'; 'temples': 'palaces'.

XIV 1-3 Messianic Interlude—The total destruction of Babylon suggests the remnant of Israel by a literary procedure previously noted. The restoration is indicated, 1-2a, then the Messianic age when Jerusalem is the rendezvous of the Gentiles, 2b-3. The connexion of this passage with what precedes and what follows is too close and natural to justify its attribution to the redactor. 1. Omit 'out of' after 'choose'. Israel becomes again the chosen people. 2. Read 'peoples', the Medes and Persians.

4-23 Chant over the Dead King of Babylon—The chant is called a marshal, byword or taunt. The king cannot be identified with any Babylonian monarch and may be considered a personification of Babylon as seems indicated 22-23. The Hebrews at this period had no conception of retribution in a future life, but expected that the justice of God would be vindicated on earth. The description of the chastisement of Babylon is not therefore a manifestation of personal or national vindictiveness, but an application of the lex talionis and a vindication of divine justice. The chant depicts the universal rejoicing at the death of the oppressor, 4b-8, his reception in the underworld, 9-11, the greatness of his fall, 12-17, the denial of burial to his corpse and of survival to his seed, 18-21, the absolute and final destruction of Babylon, 22-23.

4b-8. The tense of the verbs is the prophetic perfect. 4b. 'tribute': 'tumult'. 5. The plur. nouns indicate several kings or possibly refer to higher officials.

429f 6. 'an incurable wound': 'strokes without intermission'. 7b. 'Men burst forth into song'. 8a. 'The cypresses and the cedars rejoice'.

j 9-11. 9. 'Sheol beneath is astir . . . It arouses the shades for thee, all the chiefs of the earth. It raises up from their thrones all the kings of the nations'. 10b. 'wounded': 'stricken'. 11b. After 'hell': 'the music of thy harps'.

k 12-17. 12. The king is compared to the morning star, radiant star, son of the dawn, to depict the greatness of his fall. The comparison is based on the phenomenon of meteors. 13. 'covenant': 'assembly'; 'sides': 'recesses'. The ancient belief in a mount in the extreme north where the gods assembled is referred to in depicting the pride of the king who aspired to be like God. 15. The depths or recesses of the pit received him instead. 16. 'They that see thee gaze upon thee and reflect upon thee'.

l 18-21. 19. 'But thou art stretched out far from thy tomb like abominated carrion, covered up by the fallen, by those pierced by the sword (those who descend to the stones of the pit) like a trampled carcass'. 'Those who descend to the stones of the pit' is out of place and should be read before 20. It refers to buried monarchs from whose company this king is excluded. The death in battle without burial of Sargon II of Assyria may have suggested a similar fate for the proud King of Babylon.

m 22-23. Many commentators regard this passage as an addition of the redactor's. It seems preferable to consider it an authentic explanation and emphatic reiteration of the lesson of the chant. 23b. 'And I will sweep it away with the besom of destruction, saith Yahweh of hosts'.

430a 24-27 Chastisement of Assyria—Prophecies already pronounced against Assyria are briefly reiterated here. 25. 'In my land': in Judah. There is thus reference to the destruction of the army of Sennacherib. The outstretched hand recalls the refrain of 9:8-10:4. The purpose of the prophecy seems to be to include Assyria in the judgement executed on all the nations of the earth, clearly indicated in 26.

b 28-32 Chastisement of Philistia—This prophecy is historically important, because it establishes the date of the accession of Ezechias, and still more religiously important, because its literal fulfilment is established beyond all doubt by the Assyrian records. The discovery of the father of Sargon II in 1933 is particularly helpful. The fact that he was not a usurper but the son of Tiglath-pileser III enables us to interpret 'Seed' in its natural sense as 'son' or 'descendant'. To understand the oracle we must first correct Vg and read after 'basilisk': 'And his fruit shall be a flying serpent'. 29. Philistia has suffered from an invader, compared first to a rod and then to a serpent, who has just died. She is not however to rejoice at his death because from the serpent comes a basilisk and from the basilisk a flying serpent to complete the work of destruction. The serpents come from the north, 31, and are therefore Assyrian kings. As these must be father, son and grandson they are easily determined. Only four kings are in question: Tiglath-pileser III, his two sons, Shalmaneser V and Sargon II, and Sargon's son, Sennacherib. Of these Shalmaneser must be excluded because no son succeeded him. Tiglath-pileser invaded Philistia in 734, Sargon in 720 and 713, and Sennacherib in 701. Tiglath-pileser died in the month of Tebet, Dec.-Jan. 727-726. Ezechias therefore became king in 727 or 726. The years ascribed in 4 Kg to the kings of Judah from Ezechias to Sedecias fill exactly the period from 726 to the fall of Jerusalem in 587. The date of the prophecy may be due to the redactor, but the occasion was evidently the death of the first mentioned Assyrian monarch. Winged serpents are mentioned 27:1 and 30:6, also in the Räs-Shamra tablets. Tree serpents which pass from one date-palm to another are supposed to have originated this popular belief. All the Philistine cities suffered from the invasions though not at the same time.

c 30a-b. The total destruction suggests here as elsewhere the Messianic ferment in Judah. 'the first-born of': 430e (with a slight correction) 'on my mountain'. 30c-d-31 depict the ruin of Philistia. 'is thrown down': 'tremble'. Render (after 'north') 'and there shall be no straggler in his ranks'. 32. The Philistines apparently proposed an alliance with Judah against the common enemy, Assyria. All such proposals were anathema to Isaias whose policy was to trust in Yahweh alone. Ezechias who had just succeeded Achaz followed the prophet's advice and abandoned the foreign alliance policy of his father.

XV 1-XVI 13 Oracle on Moab—Moab is the region d between the Dead Sea and the Arabian desert, divided into two parts, northern and southern, by the river Arnon. At the coming of the Israelites northern Moab was part of Sehon's kingdom and was allotted chiefly to Reuben. Southern Moab, subjugated by David, became a vassal state of Israel at the division of the monarchy. Mesha, prince of Dibon, 4 m. N. of the Arnon, organized a revolt against Israel c 853 B.C. and succeeded in wresting all northern Moab from the Israelites. He commemorated his victories by a long inscription (cf. § 80j) in which he boasts of his annexation of Israelitic cities to Dibon, his slaughter of Israelites in Nebo and dedication to his god Chemosh of their sanctuary of Yahweh. Isaias must have been acquainted with the famous inscription to which he apparently makes several references. The Moabites are the only people whom he accuses of boasting, 16:6, exemplified by the inscription of Mesha. He refers to Dibon, Mesha's capital, first as a city, 15:2, then as a capital, 15:9. He represents Yahweh as ironically assigning additions to Dibon and expresses additions by the participle of the verb which Mesha used for 'annex'.

The invasion, 15:1-4, begins with a surprise night e attack on the two Moabite cities south of the Arnon, Ar and Qir. Dibon, Nebo, Medaba, Hesbon, Eleale, Yahas, all in northern Moab, are next attacked. The order of mention is without exception from south to north. Yahas alone is unidentified. But it was the headquarters of the Israelites during Mesha's revolt, was captured by him after Medaba, Astaroth and Nebo and is associated in geographical lists with cities in the extreme north. The Assyrian invasion is similarly described, 10:28-32. Gray (in the ICC) is undoubtedly right in holding against most commentators an invasion from the south. The Edomites were Moab's southern neighbours and Amos, 2:1-3, had predicted the chastisement of Moab for having burned to ashes the bones of the king of Edom. The flight of the fugitives before the invaders is next described, 5-8. Their temporary refuge in the Jordan valley also indicates an attack from the south. The oracle, 9, ironically assigning additions to Dibon: Edom for the prisoners and Judah for the refugees, is a third proof of an Edomite invasion. Finally envoys are sent from Sela', the Edomite capital, to Sion to dissuade the king of Judah from sheltering the fugitives, 16:1-4a. The rest of the prophecy contains a Messianic interlude, 4b-5, a lament over Moab, 6-12, and a later oracle, 13-14.

XV 1-4 The Invasion—1. 'because': 'yea' (em- f phatic particle); 'silent': 'undone'. 'Wall' is a rendering of Qir, el-Kerak. Ar is er-Rabbe. 2a. 'The daughter [inhabitants] of Dibon hath ascended the high places to weep, On Nebo [en-Nebo] and on Medaba [Mādaba] Moab cries aloud'. Tearing of hair and shaving of beard are signs of mourning also indicated in 3. 'shall howl': 'cry aloud'. The laments of Hesbān and El-'Al in the extreme north are heard by their neighbour Yahas. 4b. 'Therefore are the loins of Moab broken, Her spirit faints within her'.

5-8 The Fugitives—'My heart laments for Moab, her g fugitives flee to So'ar (the third Eglath). Yea on the ascent to Luhith, they wait as they ascend, Yea on the road to Horonaim they raise cries of distress. Yea the waters of Nimrim have been made desolate; Dry is the grass, all the herbage, there is no green. Therefore have they made ready their 430g remnant and their store, They carry them across the Torrent of the Poplars. For the cry hath encircled the boundary of Moab, To Eglaim her plaint, to the Well of the Terebinths her plaint. The fugitives flying northwards find a temporary refuge in the Jordan valley where a mountain barrier shields them from their pursuers. The latter however have encircled them and already devastated the Nimrim valley in the north. That is why they take their belongings over the Torrent of the Poplars in the south to reach the ford of the Jordan at el-Goraniyeh for Judah is their last resort. The difficulty of this passage is geographical. The commentators relying on the Onomasticon of Eusebius locate Luhith, So'ar and Horonaim in the SW. corner of Moab. They are thus obliged to ignore all indications of an invasion from the south and assume instead an Assyrian invasion from the north. In reality however all the streams and towns are in the NW. corner of Moab where traces of the ancient names still survive. Of the eastern affluents of the Jordan Wady Nimrim = Waters of Nimrim and Wady Gharbeh or Poplar Wady (local name of the confluence of W. Hesbān and W. Kefrēn, south-eastern boundary of Israel under Jeroboam II who reconquered Galaad Am 6:14; cf. Bi 10 (1929) 216.

h Of the towns Luhith is located by a Nabataean funeral inscription, ignored by the commentators, CIS Aram —196, discovered in Madaba and commemorating a Nabataean general and the captain of a Nabataean military camp at Luhith 'in the place where they held office'. Luhith is therefore near Madaba, probably El-Mheyyet, an ancient fort 5 m. NW. of Madaba guarding the mountain-pass from Moab to the Jordan valley. Horonaim according to Meša's inscription is the last city taken in the revolt after a descent. It is thus very probably Beth-Haran, Tell er-Rame, in the Jordan valley. The local termination aim and the West-Semitic alteration of ā to ō explain the later form of the name. Tell-Iqtanu at the eastern end of the valley exhibits an Aramaic equivalent of So'ar, Qatan 'small' with a prothetic vowel and the Nabataean noun-ending u. Formerly many scholars located So'ar on biblical evidence in the Jordan valley. The gloss on So'ar, Eglath-Shalishah 'the third calf' was apparently suggested by Eglaim, 8, interpreted as 'the two calves'.

1 9 The Oracle—The waters of Dibon are full of blood. Verily I shall assign additions to Dibon: for the fugitives of Moab, Ariel, and for the remnant, Edom. The h added to Edom in MT belongs to the following word and Ariel must be read with LXX instead of MT 'aryēh. The omission of l by haplography left 'aryā corrected to 'aryēh. Ariel, lit. 'Hearth of God', is an Isaian name of Jerusalem, ch 29. The ar'l 'altar-hearth' of the Meša inscription is probably the same word. The pre-Masoretic MS reads Dibon, MT Dimon, a later form of the same name. St Jerome attests the use of both forms in his time. A recent suggestion that Dimon may be distinguished from Dibon must be disregarded. It was not an obscure city, but Meša's capital, to which he made additions at the expense of Israel. Using the figure of speech called oxymoron Isaiah ironically declares that the God of Israel will also make additions to Dibon: Judah, place of exile for the fugitives, and Edom, place of captivity for the remnant. The slain were accounted for, 9a. What more appropriate additions could be assigned as a punishment to Dibon? We shall find another example of oxymoron in this prophecy, 16:9.

431a XVI 1-4a Negotiations between Edom and Judah—1. They have sent the lamb of a ruler over the land from Sela' in the desert to the mountain of Sion. Sela', lit. 'rock', is Petra, the Edomite capital. There is question therefore of an embassy and tribute sent by the king of Edom to the king of Judah. Edom was subject to Judah in the early period of Isaiah but joined her enemies in the Syro-Ephraimitic war. Tribute was paid in kind. Lamb may be collective. 2. The envoys were evidently charged with proposals against Moab, but owing to a textual omission we have only the conclusion of their message. The dismay of the Moabites (lit. daughters of Moab) at the fords of the Arnon is best explained by a proposed occupation of southern Moab by Edom and northern Moab by Judah. 3-4. The prophet's opposition to the Edomite proposals is emphatic. 3b-4a. 'Conceal the outcasts, Reveal not the fugitives, Let the outcasts of Moab find guest-right within thee.'

4b-5 Messianic Interlude—Sion's king, consoler of the distressed, suggests to Isaiah the future Messiah: 'For the extortioner shall perish, the spoiler shall vanish, The oppressors shall evacuate the land, And with kindness shall a throne be established And with fidelity shall sit thereon in David's tent, A judge who pursues judgement and is swift in justice.' Note the two pairs of attributes, both divine and Messianic, kindness (hesed) and fidelity ('emet), judgement (mišpāt) and justice (sedeq). The child of 7:15 is portrayed as a reigning monarch.

6-12 Lament for Moab—The sins of Moab are pride and boasting (Meša's inscription). 6. The last member: 'Her boasting is unjust.' 7-10. Their punishment is the devastation of her famous vineyards. 7b. 'For the raisin-cakes of Qir Hareheth [cf. 4 Kg 3:25] shall they wail; they are all struck down.' 8. 'For the fields of Hesbon languish, the vines of Sibma, Whose choice plants prostrated the lords of the gentiles. To Jazer [Gazzir] they reached, to the desert they wandered, Their branches spread abroad, they passed over the sea.' Sibma is unidentified but near Hesbon. Qir is the most southerly, Jazer the most northerly of the cities of Moab. The vines exported in all directions were strong enough to prostrate foreign potentates. 9c-10. 'For upon thy fruits and thy harvests the huzzah has fallen, And joy and gladness have gone from the garden, And there is no singing, no rejoicing in the vineyards, And there is no treading of grapes in the wine-press, And the huzzah is stilled.' Note the oxymoron as in 15:9. The hēdāg, rendered 'huzzah' by S. R. Driver, is properly the joyous cry of the vintagers, stilled in 10, but the same word indicates also the battle-cry of the invaders, which stills it in 9. Cf. *S. R. Driver, Isaiah: his Life and Times (London, 1910) 90 n. 3. 11. 'sound': 'mourn'; 'brick wall': 'Qir Hareheth'. 12. 'wearies herself . . . and goes . . . it will not avail her.'

13-14 Later Oracle on Moab—The new oracle, later than the previous one referred to in 13, where 'from that time' should be rendered formerly, predicts the (Assyrian) conquest of Moab after three full years. The addition to the prophecy is not dated, nor can we date precisely the Assyrian conquest of Moab, certainly earlier than 713 B.C.

XVII 1-14 Oracle on Damascus (Samaria and Assyria)—Only 1-3 predicts the fall of Damascus. The fall of Samaria is foretold 4-6 and 9-11. The customary Messianic interlude is 7-8. Finally the fall of the Assyrian oppressor is prophesied 12-14. The date is therefore in the period of the Syro-Ephraimitic alliance c 735.

1-3 Damascus—2. As Aroer is a city of Moab, her cities for ever (LXX) or the cities of Hadad (the tutelary god of Damascus) should be read. 3. 'aid': 'the bulwark'. Damascus, defence of Ephraim against Assyria, shall share the fate of Israel.

4-6 Samaria—4. Jacob is a synonym of Israel. 'be made thin': 'diminish'. 5-6. 'And it shall be as when the reaper gathers the cornstalks and his arm reaps the ears, as when one gathers ears in the Vale of Rephaim [SW. of Jerusalem], and only gleanings are left therein, as when one beats an olive tree and two or three berries (remain) on the top of a bough.' The meaning is that survivors will be few.

7-8 Messianic Interlude—'groves and temples': 'wooden poles and stone pillars'. The poles were set up to Ashera, the pillars to Baal; cf. RB 55 (1948) 151 f. 9-11. 9 (corrected after LXX): 'In that day thy strong cities shall be abandoned as those of the Hivites and the Amorites were abandoned before the children of Israel, and there shall be a wilderness.' The extirpation of the j 12-14 Assyria—The spoiler of Israel and Damascus will be himself despoiled. 12. 'Ah, the uproar of many peoples, they roar like the roaring of the sea. And the booming of mighty nations, they boom like the booming of waters'. The Assyrian empire included many nations. 13. Omit the first member, a repetition of 12a. 'whirlwind': 'whirling things'. 14a. 'At eventide behold destruction, before morning he is no more'. The reference is probably to Sennacherib's army.

k XVIII 1-7 Oracle on Kush—Kush extends indefinitely southward from the Egyptian boundary at Aswan. Its capital was Napata, its rivers the Blue Nile, the White Nile and the Atbara. As insects swarm about these rivers Isaiah calls it the land of the buzzing of wings. The Kushites, long subject to Egypt, established there a Kushite dynasty c 720 B.C. which ruled until the Assyrian conquest. The Kushite king Shabaka, c 716-701, proposed to Ezechias a revolt from Assyria. Isaiah, opposed to foreign alliances, calls on the envoys to go forth and announce to their people that the hour of deliverance was not yet, but would be indicated when Yahweh's Assyrian harvest was ripe.

l 1. 'beyond': 'beside'. The land lay on both sides ('ēber = side) of its rivers. 2. Sea may indicate either the Nile or the Mediterranean. On the papyrus boats cf. Ex 2:3. (After 'waters'): 'Go forth, swift messengers, to a nation of long bodies and gleaming faces, a nation to be feared henceforward, a nation of trampling [?] and treading, whose land rivers divide'. The Kushites were tall, especially as compared to Egyptians, and their dark faces gleamed like polished bronze. Their recent conquest of Egypt is recognized and assures them courteous treatment. 'Go forth' is more forcible and dignified than 'return'. 3. They and all are informed that the fall of Assyria will be clearly indicated by signal and trumpet, 4-5, but not before she is ripe for the harvest of Yahweh. 4b. He is not only 'like glowing heat in sunshine and dew cloud in harvest heat', which ripen the grapes, but, 5, is the pruner and tender of his vineyard who 'before the harvest, when growth is ended and the berry becomes the ripening grape, will cut off the tendrils with pruning-knives and remove and lop off the branches'. 6. The Assyrian corpses will be the food of birds of prey in summer and wild beasts in winter. 7. The Kushites will then send a thank-offering to Yahweh in Jerusalem. Sargon II was aware of simmerings of revolt in Philistia, Judah, Moab and Ammon, incited by Shabaka. He assailed the chief offender, Philistia, in 713 B.C. and captured Ashdod in 711. If Judah actually revolted, contrary to the advice of Isaiah, she was saved from chastisement by prompt submission.

432a XIX 1-24 Oracle on Egypt—This prophecy first announces the ruin of Egypt, its subjection to a hard ruler and the causes of its downfall, 1-15, then the gradual conversion of the Egyptians in Messianic times, 16-24. In the lifetime of Isaiah Egypt emerged from a long period of decadence and eager to recover her old influence in Palestine posed as the champion of the smaller states in their resistance to Assyria. Egyptian intrigue at Samaria led to a revolt which ended in the destruction of the Northern Kingdom in 721 B.C. The Kushite envoys of ch 18 sought to foment a similar revolt in Judah. It is natural to connect the present prophecy with this project. Far from releasing Judah from the yoke of Assyria, Egypt would share her fate. The prophecy may be dated 713 B.C.

b 1-4 Conquest of Egypt—Yahweh is the author of the disaster, provoked by internal discord and lack of counsel, and subjects Egypt to a cruel master, the Assyrian king, Esarhaddon. 1. 'ascend': 'ride';

'be moved': 'tremble'. 2. Egypt frequently suffered from weakness of central authority and consequent revolts and quarrels of local chiefs. 3. 'cast down': 'confuse'; 'wizards': 'spirits of the dead', evoked by necromancy. 4. 'master'.

5-10 Bondage of Egypt—The drying up of the Nile, source of all Egypt's prosperity, is not intended literally but symbolically to indicate devastation. Such a phenomenon would affect the fishing, flax and corn industries and produce universal misery. 6-7a. 'The streams shall become foul and Egypt's Nile-arms shall diminish and dry up; The reeds and rushes shall decay, the papyrus beside the Nile shall droop'. The exact sense of 7a is uncertain. 9b. 'The combers and the weavers shall grow pale'. The combers are women, the weavers men. Egypt was famous for its fine linen. 10. 'And her nobles [lit. foundations] shall be crushed, and all workers for hire shall be depressed'.

11-15 Folly of Egypt—The wisdom literature of the Egyptians was known to the Hebrews, and the maxims of Amen-em-ope have left their imprint on the book of Proverbs to which additions were made during the lifetime of Isaiah, Prov 25:1; cf. § 316e-f. The prophet denies them practical wisdom. 11. 'wise': 'wisest'; 'will': 'do'. Tanis in the north and Memphis in the south of the Delta region were ancient capitals of Egypt. 13b. (After 'Egypt') 'the chiefs of her tribes'. 14. 'giddiness': 'deceit'. It is Yahweh who has caused the Egyptians to fail in counsel. 15. All their efforts shall be vain. On 15b cf. 9:14.

16-24 Conversion of Egypt—In that day, repeated five times, means in the Messianic age. Five reappears in the five cities, 18, and must be a round number; cf. 1 Kg 17:40; 21:3. The conversion recalls that of the Gentile nations, Ps 86, who become citizens of Zion by a spiritual rebirth. Egypt becomes a land of Yahweh, another Judah, 24.

16-17. The fear of Yahweh and of Judah where he manifests himself is the beginning of the conversion. Then comes the adoption of the sacred language and revealed religion of Judah in several cities, one of which is particularly holy, like Jerusalem, and called symbolically the city of justice. This name, attested by LXX, is critically the most probable. City of the sun (Heliopolis) has little support in the MSS, and city of destruction (MT) is inappropriate. 18. Egypt has an altar like Judah on which sacrifices are offered to Yahweh and also a memorial stone at its boundary to indicate that it is the land of Yahweh. 22. It is treated like Judah, smitten for the healing of its sins and, 20, relieved from oppression when it repents. 23. The reconciliation of Egypt and Assyria depicts the peace of the Messianic age. 23c. 'And Egypt shall serve (Yahweh) with Assyria'. 24. The fulfilment of the promise made to Abraham that the Gentiles will be blessed in his seed is indicated when Egypt, my people, Assyria, the work of my hand, and Israel, my inheritance, are equally blessed.

The authenticity of 16-24 is usually denied. But the medium, prose, and the theme, conversion of the Gentiles, are both Isaian. The only indication of date is the reference to Hebrew, the language of Canaan, which must be prior to the adoption of Aramaic as the spoken language and the translation of the Pentateuch into Greek. There can be no allusion therefore to Leontopolis and its temple.

XX 1-6 Oracle on Egypt and Kush—From the Assyrian records we learn that Sargon II invaded Philistia in 713 B.C. to chastise the citizens of Ashdod for having deposed Mitinti whom he had made their king and enthroned a certain Yamani in his stead. Yamani fled to Egypt but was handed over to Sargon by Shabaka. Gath, Ashdudimmu and Ashdod were taken and sacked. Ashdod however only fell in 711 B.C. From Isaiah here we learn moreover that the siege of Ashdod was not prosecuted by Sargon himself, whose stay in Philistia was brief, but by his Tartan or second in command. The order to represent symbolically the subjection of Egypt and Kush to Assyria was given to 432h Isaias when the Tartan arrived at (DV 'entered into') Ashdod and the three years, estimated in Hebrew fashion, probably coincided with the duration of the siege 713-711. The symbolic action of Isaias impressed more deeply on his people the folly of reliance on Egypt and Kush, doomed themselves to subjection.

- 1 2. 'Naked' means without an outer garment. Hair-cloth was usually worn next the skin for mourning. The longer garment cast off must be distinguished from the shorter loincloth retained or subsequently assumed. 3b. (After 'barefoot') 'for three years, a sign and a portent concerning Egypt and Kush'. 4. 'captivity': 'exiles'. 'The shame of Egypt' is probably a gloss. 6. 'isle': 'coastland', as Philistia is indicated.

433a XXI 1-10 Oracle on Babylon—The mention of Babylon, 9, shows that the fall of that city is here predicted as in chh 13-14. The capture of Babylon, capital of Merodach-Baladan, by Sargon II in 710 B.C., is excluded because the Assyrians were then the enemies, the Elamites the allies of the Babylonians. Here the assailants are Medes and Elamites or Persians, since Cyrus the Great occupied Elam before the fall of Babylon. It is moreover the fall of Babylon in 539 B.C. which, 2, made all mourning cease. The compassionate prophet was deeply moved by the terrible calamity; cf. 15:5; 16:9-11. The title: Oracle of the desert of the sea (or, of the deserts) is probably derived from the subsequent mention of the desert, from which the invaders came. The calamity is compared to whirlwinds from the desert region south of Judah.

- b 2. God speaks: 'The robber robs and the spoiler spoils; Invade, Elam, besiege, Media, I have made all mourning to cease'. 3-4. (After 'labour') 'I am prostrated by what I hear, dismayed by what I see. My heart is bemused, shuddering hath seized me. The twilight which was my refreshment he [God] hath made a terror to me'. The evening twilight is meant. 5. 'They lay the table, spread the carpets, eat and drink. Up ye princes, oil your shields'. The capture of Babylon during a banquet is recorded Dan 5:30; Herodotus 1, 190; Xenophon, Cyropaedia 7, 5, 15, but not in the Babylonian inscriptions. Banqueters reclined on carpets. Shields were oiled to preserve them from moisture and offer less hold to missiles. 6. The prophet is ordered to appoint a watchman who, 7. 'when he sees riders in pairs, one on an ass [the Persians] and one on a camel' [the Medes] will pay particular attention. 8. The watchman expresses his constant vigilance by day and by night. Lion is most probably a corruption of watchman, 'aryeh for hārō'eh. 9. 'And behold there came riders, pairs of riders', the destroyers of Babylon and her idols. The watchman is a dramatic personification of the prophetic vision, an indication perhaps that the prophecy will not immediately be fulfilled. After the prophet dies the watchman remains to see and announce the fulfilment. The prophecy ends with a reference to Babylonian oppression of Israel. 10. 'My trampled one, my threshing-floor son'. The threshing of the corn by hooves and sledges is referred to.

- c 11-12 Oracle on Edom—In the title Dumah is probably corrupt. Seir is a mountain range in Edom. The subject of 'calleth' is indeterminate, a caller. The inquiry is: how far has the night gone? Is the calamity from which Edom suffers nearly over? The answer apparently is: the calamity will soon end, but other nights or calamities are still to come. The watcher has no more definite announcement to make and so adds: 'If you want to ask, ask; come again'.

- d 13-17 Oracle on Arabia—The oracle is on Kedar, a desert people east of Moab and Edom. Arabia in the title is derived from 'arābāh 'steppe' in 13. 13-14. 'Caravans of the Dedanites who camp in the grove in the steppe, Bring water to meet the thirsty. Dwellers in the land of Tema, Meet the fugitives with bread'. Dedan (el-'Ela) and Tema were oases in the north Arabian desert. Grove (DV 'forest') may indicate an oasis with its palms. 15. The fugitives are the more northerly Kedarites who flee 'from the desolate places, from the whetted sword, from the bent bow, from the pressure of battle'.

17. 'And the bow-men shall be a small remnant. The warriors of Kedar shall be few'.

XXII 1-14 Oracle on the Valley of Vision—The title, Valley of Vision (cf. 21:1 and 13) is taken from 5. The introduction, 1-2a, gives the occasion of the prophecy, the rejoicing of the citizens on the housetops on the receipt of good tidings, an alliance with Egypt in 713 or less probably the retreat of Sennacherib in 701. Isaias cannot rejoice for he foresees the deportation of the civil and military leaders of Jerusalem and the ruin of the city, 2b-4. The invasion on the day of Yahweh is depicted, 5-8a, then the preparations of the citizens on that day to resist the invaders, all useless owing to their abandonment of Yahweh their protector, are described, 8b-11. Lastly their refusal to obey Yahweh calling them on that day to repentance, their senseless rejoicings and their final impotence are deplored, 12-14. 'On that day', 8b and 12, clearly refers to the day of Yahweh, 5. Thus the whole prophecy (except the short introduction) refers to the future and predicts the conquest of Judah and Jerusalem by the Chaldeans in 587 B.C. The citizens should not rejoice but mourn since the fall of Jerusalem is only postponed. Penance and trust in Yahweh is their only hope.

- 1-4. The citizens assemble on the housetops not for mourning but for rejoicing. 2. 'populous': 'boisterous'. 3. 'All thy chiefs are fled together, taken captive without bow, All thy strong ones [LXX] are taken captive together, they are fled afar off'. Flee here means depart and being predicated of captives implies deportation; cf. 3:1; 6:12. There was no pitched battle with the Babylonians and Jerusalem was taken after a long siege. 5-8a. 5. 'For a day of tumult and trampling and turmoil has the Lord Yahweh of hosts. In the valley of vision crashing of walls and on the mountain battle-cry'. Mountain and valley indicate all parts of the city. 6. 'And Elam takes the quiver, puts [āsar for ādām] horses to the chariots, And Qir uncovers the shield'. Qir is the ancient home of the Aramaeans in south-eastern Mesopotamia. The Elamites were allied, the Aramaeans subject to Babylonia, and both were represented in her armies. 7. The enemies are in the valleys and at the gates of the cities. 8a. Judah is unveiled or without defence.

8b-11. The preparations of the citizens for the day of doom are described: provision of weapons in the armoury, the house of the Forest of Lebanon built by Solomon, 8b, strengthening of the city walls, 9a and 10, and assurance of water-supply, 9b and 11a. These preparations, contrasted with the only efficacious defence of reliance on Yahweh, 11b, belong to the past, but in the day of doom their uselessness appears. 1 The Old Pool, 11a, is the Upper Pool, mentioned 7:3; 4 Kg 18:17, which received immediately the waters of Gihon. Two canals at different levels conveyed its waters along the east side of the city to the gardens in the east and south. Achaz turned the waters of the upper canal into the city by a tunnel. The Lower Pool resulting is the modern Birket el-Hamra. It was between two ramparts, most probably the earlier wall, enclosing the SE. hill, and the later wall of the SW. hill. Ezechias made the Upper Pool and outer canals inaccessible to besiegers and constructed a subterranean canal which conveyed the waters of Gihon into the city. The issue of this canal was more northerly and at a higher level than the reservoir of Achaz. There is apparently no reference here to the canal of Ezechias not yet completed, since the basin at its mouth could not be called the Lower Pool. Thus the two references to the water supply 9b and 11a, originally united, describe two parts of a single operation: the conveyance of the waters of Siloe, 8:6, by an underground aqueduct into the city and the construction of a basin to receive them in the central valley. It may be assumed that these precautions taken in view of foreign invasion were relatively recent. The presence of King Achaz at the southern end of the Siloe canal, 7:3, may thus be explained by the fact that he was planning or inspecting the operation described above.

- 12-14. The refusal of the citizens of Jerusalem to obey 433] God's call to penance before the judgement overtakes them will be assuredly punished. The warning is doubtless intended also for the revellers on the house tops.

434a 15-25 Oracle on Sobna, Prefect of the Palace—Deposition and exile of Sobna, 15-19. Exaltation of Eliacim, 20-23. Eliacim's descendants, 24-25. Sobna and Eliacim are mentioned elsewhere only in the narrative of Sennacherib's invasion. Sobna was then the scribe or secretary, Eliacim the Prefect of the Palace. It is not certain that the Sobna seal discovered at Lakish belonged to this Sobna.

b 15-19. 15-18. Read 16b, where Sobna is described, before 16a, where he is addressed: 'Go, get thee unto that minister Sobna, the prefect of the palace, who is hewing himself out a sepulchre on high and carving in the rock an abode for himself. What hast thou here and whom hast thou that thou heuest thyself here a tomb? Behold Yahweh will cast thee violently [lit. with the cast of a strong man], wrapping thee well and winding thee well around like a ball, into a wide land. There shalt thou die and thither shall thy splendid vehicles be borne, thou shame of thy master's house'. 19. The sentence of deposition follows. Sobna will be cast into exile as a stone is cast from a sling.

c 20-23. Eliacim receives the office of Sobna. 21. 'strengthen': 'gird'; 'power': 'office'; omit 'as'. The key is the symbol of office. Being of wood and much bigger than our keys it was borne on the shoulder; cf. note on Jg 3:23. 23. The peg is either a tent-peg, on which the stability of the tent depends, or a peg or nail in a wall, on which vessels are hung. The epilogue, 24-25, supposes the latter sense, also recommended by the fact that Isaiah considers length of office, not importance of services.

d 24-25. 24. 'And should they hang upon it all the glory of his father's house, the offspring and the offshoot, all the small vessels from the wash-basins even to the pitchers, it shall fail to support on that day'. This is a prediction that while Eliacim's house, his proximate descendants, will inherit his glory, the smaller vessels or remote descendants will not, for Jerusalem shall fall and its citizens be exiled in the day of Yahweh.

e XXIII 1-18 Oracle on Tyre—The oracle contains a poem on the fall of Tyre, 1-14, and a prose addition on its recovery and conversion, 15-18. The authenticity of the addition is generally denied. The seventy years' interval between the fall and the recovery is supposed to be derived from the similar period assigned to the Jewish exile by Jeremiah. Tyre, though less ancient than Sidon, was the richest and most important of the Phoenician trading cities. It was built partly on the mainland and partly on an island and sustained many sieges before the island city was finally captured by Alexander the Great in 333 B.C. Phoenicia lost its long monopoly of trade in the Mediterranean. The text requires emendation, but not the substitution of Sidon for Tyre with some commentators. The mentions of Sidon are shown by the context and the sequence of thought to be references to the mother city representing Phoenicia in general. The date of the prophecy is uncertain.

f 1-5 General Consternation at the News of Tyre's Fall—1. 'Lament, ye ships of Tarshish, for your haven is destroyed. As they came from the land of Kittim the news was revealed to them'. Tarshish is Tartessus in Spain, Kittim Citium in Cyprus, both Phoenician colonies. The fall of Tyre deprives the big ships of the haven to which they are returning. Your haven is restored from the repetition of this verse in 14. 2-3. 'Stupefied are the inhabitants of the coastland, the Sidonian merchant who crosses the sea, whose messengers are on mighty waters, whose harvest is the grain of Shihor and whose revenue is the grain of nations'. 'Have filled thee' is a corruption of messengers and 'the river' is a gloss on Shihor (waters of Hor), a branch of the Nile. Note the parallelism of Sidonian merchant and inhabitants of the coastland (Phoenicians). 4. 'Be ashamed, Phoenicia [lit. Sidon] for the sea hath said: "Thou hast not gravailed nor brought forth nor reared up youths nor brought up maidens"'. Sidon is the mother city of Phoenicia, become childless. 'Haven of the sea' inserted after 'sea' in MT is most probably a gloss. 5. 'The Egyptians shall writhe when they hear of Tyre's fall'.

6-10 The Fall of Tyre: Yahweh its Author—6. 'the seas': 'to Tarshish'; 'howl': 'lament'; 'island': 'coastland'. 7. 'Is this your joyous city whose origin is of long ago, whose feet have carried her to sojourn afar off?' Tyre's antiquity and colonies are commemorated. 8-9. Yahweh has humbled her pride. 10. 'Pass over to thy land (like the Nile), daughter of Tarshish, thou hast no haven [MT, girdle] more'. 'Like the Nile' is unintelligible. The ship without a haven returns to where it sailed from.

11-14 All Phoenicia is Threatened—Phoenicia was called Canaan by the Phoenicians themselves. 12. 'Rejoice no more, oppressed virgin, daughter of Sidon'. Here again Sidon alternates with Canaan. Sidon sailing to Cethim may refer to Lulu, prince of Sidon, fleeing to Cyprus from Sennacherib in 701. 13. 'Behold the land of the Chaldeans—that is the people not Assyria—which he founded for the wild beasts. They have erected his siege-towers, razed its palaces. He has made it a ruin'. The rendering is literal, the sense disputed. There is probably a gloss after Chaldeans and the ruined city is the Chaldaean capital, destroyed by Sargon II in 710. So shall Phoenicia be destroyed.

15-18. Tyre is here compared to a harlot who recovers her trade after a period of interruption. Trade is not condemned. The sanctification of her gains supposes her conversion to Yahweh. 16. 'many a song': 'loudly'. 17. (After 'Tyre') 'and she shall return to her hire'. 18. 'and be clothed splendidly'.

XXIV-XXVII The 'Apocalypse' of Isaiah—The unity of these chapters, generally admitted, has been contested by some critics who also regard them as post-exilic. The subject-matter is eschatological: judgement of the nations of the earth and establishment of the Messianic kingdom. The poems contain lyrics, regarded by some as interpolations. Only two lyrics are universally recognized: 25:1-5 and 26:1-6. The latter appears appropriately as the conclusion of the first poem, 24:1-26:6. The former, on the contrary, interrupts the description of the city on the mountain. As it addresses Yahweh in the second person it may originally have introduced the supplication to Yahweh with which the second poem, 26:7-27:13, begins. Condamin proposed this transposition here adopted. The prophecies are distinctly Isaian in character. References to peoples and events are, perhaps designedly, obscure and give no indication of date. The chief reason for denying Isaian authorship is the a priori assumption that all references to the judgement and conversion of the Gentile nations in pre-exilic prophets are later additions.

XXIV 1-XXVI 6 Judgement of the Nations and Establishment of the Messianic Kingdom—The prophecy may be divided as follows: Devastation of the earth and punishment of its inhabitants, 24:1-6. Banishment of joy from the earth, 7-13. Salvation of the just and destruction of the wicked, 14-18a. Shaking and breaking up of the earth, 18b-20. Judgement of the host of heaven and the kings of earth, 21-23. Joy of the nations in the kingdom of Yahweh on Mt Sion, 25:6-8. Yahweh helps his people and humbles Moab, 9-12. Confidence in Yahweh who humbles the proud, 26:1-6.

XXIV 1-6. 1. The earth will be devastated, the works of man destroyed, its surface upset and its inhabitants scattered. Eschatological descriptions are not to be taken too literally. 2. The opposition of priest and people appears also Os 4:9 and is not post-exilic. 3. The announcement is prophetic. 4. 'The earth mourns, decays, the world languishes, decays, both heaven and earth languish'. 5. 'changed the ordinance': 'violated the precept'. The everlasting covenant is the covenant made with Noe, Gen 9:10 ff., and his descendants which binds all nations. Hence the reference to a new deluge by the opening of the flood-gates of heaven, 18.

- 435e A covenant is a bi-lateral contract imposing obligations not always explicitly indicated. The shedding of blood brought a curse on the earth, Gen 4:11, and was particularly forbidden by this covenant, Gen 9:5. 6. 'sin': 'pay the penalty'; 'mad': 'consumed'.
- d 7-18. The general misery is indicated by the lack of wine and of the singing and music of revellers. 7. 'vintage': 'must', new and strong wine. Alter future to present in 9 and 11. 10. 'city of vanity': 'city of desolation'. Cities in general are deserted. The citizens have perished in the day of judgement. Only a remnant is left as on the olive tree after the gathering and on the vine after the vintage. 12b. 'and the gales are smitten into ruins'.
- e 14-18a. The joy of the saved is first depicted, 14-16a, then the fate of the wicked, 16b-18a. 14b-15. 'They shall exult in the majesty of Yahweh. Therefore exult in the west, praise Yahweh in the east, praise Yahweh, God of Israel, in the islands of the sea'. 16b. 'And I said: Wasting to me, wasting to me, woe is me. The spoilers spoil, with spoiling the spoilers spoil'. The repetitions are emphatic. Isaiah regards the sins of the world as a personal affliction. 'Secret' (Vg) supposes an Aramaic text. 17-18a. Punishment is inevitable.
- f 18b-20. The earth, man's abode, perishes under the weight of his sins. The waters from above pour down on it as at the deluge. The supports on which it is raised above the waters shake. The earth itself shakes and breaks, staggers like a drunken man and finally collapses. Since this catastrophe precedes the establishment of the Messianic kingdom for all the nations on Mt Zion it cannot be understood literally. The judgement is the prophetic message, the description is ideal and poetical. 20. (After 'man') 'it shall rock to and fro like a (frail) hut'.
- g 21-23. The heavenly bodies, sun, moon and stars, are involved in the chastisement of their worshippers and must disappear for a time, after which they will be again visited and apparently reinstated. With them are associated here as elsewhere the kings of the earth who usurped God's prerogatives and even claimed divine honours. The sun and moon are put to shame by the glory and majesty of the divine king. The personification of the heavenly bodies does not imply that they were regarded as living beings. 22. 'one bundle': 'prisoners'. 23. The ancients are the subordinate authorities.
- For 25:1-5 see after 26:1-6.
- h XXV 6-8. The Messianic kingdom is depicted as a rich banquet for all nations united together on Mt Zion, as a kingdom of peace and happiness free from bloodshed and oppression. 6b-c. 'A banquet of rich viands, a banquet of choice wines—Of rich viands full of marrow, of choice wines well refined'. 7b. 'the veil that veils all nations and the screen that screens all peoples'. All now form one united nation. 8. The removal of death means most probably the common Messianic blessing of cessation of wars and bloodshed, usually coupled with freedom from oppression.
- i 9-12. The reference to Moab has caused surprise. Some commentators read instead ôyēb 'enemy', others reject the whole passage as a later addition. In reality however the reference is clearly suggested by 'the reproach of his people', 8. Moab had conquered and appropriated Israelitic territory. Its capital is, for Isaiah, Meša's capital, alluded to in 10 by the word magmēnāh 'dung-heap', whose radical letters dmn suggest Dimon, the alternative form of Dibon, 15:9. The removal of the reproach of his people from all the land requires the chastisement of Moab and the destruction of Dibon. 10b. 'And Moab shall be crushed in its place as straw is crushed in the cesspool' (lit. waters of dungheap). 11. Moab's efforts to escape by swimming in the cesspool (DV 'under him') shall be vain for Yahweh 'shall lay low his pride despite the cunning of his hands'. 12. 'And the secure fortress [Dibon], its [MT 'thy'] walls he [Yahweh] shall raze, lay low, hurl to the ground, even to the dust'.
- j XXVI 1-6. The strength of Zion, the justice and fidelity of its citizens and their trust in Yahweh are celebrated, 1-3. This trust is secure and eternal, 4-6. 1b. 'A strong city have we, for protection hath he set [or, have been set] walls and rampart'. 2. 'the truth': 'faith'. 3-4. 'Our steadfast purpose thou wilt preserve in peace because we trust in thee. Trust in Yahweh for ever because Yahweh is a rock for ever'. 5. 'high city': 'secure city'. XXV 1-5 and XXVI 7-XXVII 13 Israel and the k Messianic Kingdom—The preceding prophecy predicted the judgement of the Gentiles and the incorporation of their remnants in the Messianic kingdom, the present is concerned exclusively with Israel and its destiny. The designs of Yahweh are explained and vindicated. The punishment of the proud and mighty is the necessary preparation for the reign of justice on earth, 25:1-5 and 26:7-13. The people are few and grievously oppressed but let them be patient for a little while and Yahweh will restore their numbers and destroy their oppressors, 26:14-27:1. Israel is the vineyard of Yahweh. His chastisement of his people is for their good and the expiation of their sins, but their oppressors will be chastised without mercy, 27:2-11. Israel will recover her ancient territory and worship Yahweh on his holy mountain, 27:12-13. XXV 1-5. 'The designs from afar, faithful and true' indicate the general theme, vindication of God's plans. From afar means from of old. 2. 'to ruin the citadel of the proud', reading zēdīm for zārtīm 'strangers'. 4c. 'For the breath of the mighty is like a winter [MT 'wall'] storm'. 5. 'Like heat on a desert land thou shalt subdue the clamour of the proud, like heat in the shade of a cloud the paean of the mighty shall be checked'. XXVI 7-13. The just man ardently desires the manifestation of God's justice and its establishment on earth. Injustice must be punished that justice may prevail and that Yahweh alone may rule his people. 7. 'right': 'straight'; 'is right to walk in': 'straight is the path which thou openest to the just'. Straight means unimpeded. The general principle of retribution is stated. 9. 'In the morning' (Vg) may be correct against 'within me' (MT) but the tenses are present. 10. 'When the wicked is spared he learns not righteousness. In the land he perverts the right and regards not the majesty of Yahweh'. LXX renders b: 'Let the wicked be removed from the face of the earth and see not the majesty of Yahweh'. 11. 'Yahweh, thy hand is exalted, but they see not. Let them see and be confounded at thy zeal for thy people. Let the fire for thy enemies devour them'. 12-13. The final appeal is based on the mutual love of Yahweh and his people. XXVI 14-XXVII 1. The prophet laments that the people are few and oppressed, 26:14-18. Yahweh replies that their number will increase and their oppressors will soon be judged, 26:19-27:1. 14. The dead are clearly those of 19 and therefore Israelites. 'The dead shall not live, the shades [inhabitants of Sheol] shall not rise'. The sense of 'therefore' is that they may not rise again. 15. It follows that the verb 'multiply' ('Multiply the people Yahweh, multiply the people, show thyself great, extend the boundaries of the land') is a petition, not a statement, and lū must be supplied before the verb to give the perfect this sense. 16 (slightly corrected): 'Yahweh, with trouble were they visited. Distress and oppression were thy chastisement for them. 17-18. The pangs they suffered were those of a fruitless childbirth. 18b. 'We do not work salvation on earth and the inhabitants of the earth do not perish'—a lament for the delay of the judgement on the nations. 19. 'Thy dead shall live, my corpse shall arise, They shall awake and exult that dwell in the dust, For thy dew is a dew of light And the land of shades thou overthrowest'. This, understood literally of a corporal resurrection, would contradict the remnant doctrine according to which the survivors alone inherit the Messianic kingdom. It indicates therefore a national resurrection and the expression, my corpse, meaning my dead nation, is intelligible. 20-21. Patience is enjoined for the judgement will soon be manifested. XXVII:1. Leviathan, the flying serpent, and Leviathan, the tortuous serpent, appear together as mythical monsters in a Rās-Shamra tablet; cf. Bi 19 (1938) 444 f.

- 436b They are revealed in 12 as Assyria and Babylonia, and the sea dragon as Egypt.
- c XXVII 2-11. Israel will be the fruitful, not the unfruitful, 5:1-7, vineyard of Yahweh, 2-6. Her chastisement, tempered by mercy, was for the expiation of her sins, 7-9. 2. 'In that day (shall be) a delightful vineyard, sing to it'. MT has 'of wine' instead of delightful (LXX). 3. 'suddenly': 'constantly'. 4. 'I am not wroth with it. But what am I to do with briars and thorns? I must march against it in combat, I must burn them together'. 5. 'Or let it cling to my protection, make peace with me, make peace with me'. 6a. 'In days to come Jacob shall take root'. The world's salvation is from Israel. 7. 'Has he [Yahweh] smitten him [Israel] like the smiting of his [Israel's] smiter? Or has he [Israel] been slaughtered like the slaughter of his [Israel's] slaughterers?' Israel was chastised less severely than her oppressors.
- d 8. The chastisement may be specified as the exile. Text and meaning of a are uncertain, but 'the violent wind on a day of scirocco' in b, as a figure of Yahweh's action, supports this view. 9. This chastisement will expiate the sins of Israel; the instruments of her iniquity: altar stones, incense altars and Ashera posts will be destroyed. 10-11. The severer chastisement of the Gentiles, cities and people, is described. 'City' here means every city as in 24:10, 12. Read after 'desolate' 'an abode forsaken and abandoned like a desert'. 11a. 'When the branches dry they are broken off: women come and set fire to them'. The threat of 11b cannot refer to Israel.
- e 12-13 The Restoration of Israel—The ideal boundaries of Israel, in the north the Euphrates, and in the south the torrent of Egypt, Wady el-'Arish, will be realized in the Messianic period. 12. 'strike': 'beat out' (the ears of corn), a reference to the most ancient method of threshing. All Israel is the harvest. The inclusion of the exiles, lost in Assyria and dispersed in Egypt, in the congregation may be a later addition. The great trumpet calling to judgement, Jl 2:1; Soph 1:16; Mt 24:31; 1 Cor 15:52; 1 Thess 4:16, is not mentioned elsewhere by Isaiah.
- 437a XXVIII-XXXV Further Prophecies against Judah and Jerusalem.
- XXVIII 1-29 Warning to Jerusalem from Samaria's Fall—Imminent Fall of Samaria, 1-4. Yahweh Defender of Jerusalem, 5-8. Mockery of the prophet's message and substitution for promise of salvation of threat of destruction, 9-13. Futility of human measures of defence without reliance on Yahweh, destroyer of the wicked but saviour of the just, 14-22. The plan of Yahweh illustrated from husbandry, 23-29. The prophecy is a unity and is dated by the mockery of the rulers in the reign of Achaz between the Assyrian annexation of Galilee and Galaad, 733, and the accession of Ezechias, 726. Revelry in Samaria would be prior to the siege, 724-721.
- b 1-4. Samaria was built on a hill in the middle of a wide valley. The crown of pride refers to the strong natural position of the city and the splendid adornment to its military defenders, weakened by the loss of Sharon, Galilee and Galaad, and thus likened to a fading flower. 1c. (After 'joy') 'which crowned the hill-top of the rich valley of the wine guzzlers'. 2a. 'The strong and mighty one sent by Yahweh' is the Assyrian who, 2c, 'casts down to earth with violence', 3, tramples on the crown of pride of the drunken Ephraimites, 4, and seizes the fading flower of its splendid adornment as one seizes and devours an early fig. The early figs appear before the leaves, only on some trees, and are particularly delicious.
- c 5-8. 5-6. 'On that day [when Samaria falls] Yahweh of hosts will be the crown of splendour and the strength of adornment to the remnant of his people [the inhabitants of Judah] and a spirit of justice for him who sits in judgement [Ezechias] and strength for those who rebel attacks at the gates'. Yahweh here promises through his prophet to take the place in Judah of the natural and military defences which failed to save Samaria. The definite time indication and the attacks at the gates show clearly that the passage is not Messianic. Remnant, 5, is also definitely indicated by these also, 7, as the inhabitants of Judah, not the Messianic remnant. 7a. 'But these also reel with wine and stagger with strong drink', like the Ephraimites. 7d. 'They err in vision, they fall in judgement'. 8. Absorbed in the pleasures of the table they see not in Samaria's fall the lesson of reliance on Yahweh.

9-13. 9. Mockers deride the prophet and his message. They deny his claim to revelation and liken him to a stammering child only just weaned. 10. They mimic his words repeating four times saw 'command', and qaw, 'measuring-line' or 'rule', and adding twice a little one is there to suggest that the monosyllabic sounds are the stammering utterances of a child. saw and qaw probably summarize the prophet's teaching in infantile speech. 11. Isaiah replies: 'Verily with stammering lips and in foreign tongue will he [Yahweh] address this people'. Foreign invasion is implied. 12. His message to them was: 'rest, give rest to the weary and refreshment and they would not hear'. 13. He will now speak to them like an infant for their destruction.

14-22. 14. The deriders are the rulers, Achaz and his court. 15a. They say: 'We have made a covenant with Death, We have made vision with the Underworld'. The words covenant and vision are suggested by the prophet's appeal to Yahweh's covenant and his own visions. They consulted not Yahweh but the Underworld by necromancy, a common practice against which Isaiah specially warned his disciples, 8:19. The scourge is Assyrian invasion. Refuge in lies and shelter in falsehood characterized Achaz's policy, 7:12. 16. The corner-stone, the foundation-stone, set by God in Zion is undoubtedly Emmanuel. The demand for faith: 'He that believeth shall not be anxious' recalls 7:9 just as, 17a, 'judgement and justice' re-echo 7:15. 'And I have made judgement my measuring-line and justice my plummet'. 17b-19. Defence measures of the deriders are futile. 19c. 'And it will be sheer terror to understand revelation'. 20. Too short a bed and too narrow a coverlet are popular indications of defective measures. 21. The anger of Yahweh, directed against the Philistines in David's time, 2 Kg 5:20-25; 1 Par 14:8-17, will now overwhelm his own people. Mountain divisions here replacing Baal divisions, Baal-Perasim, is Râs an-Nâdir, NW. of Jerusalem.

23-29. Yahweh is here compared to a husbandman in his dealings with his people. 24. He ploughs and harrows—temporary operations which prepare the ground for sowing. 25. He sows fennel (DV 'gith') and cummin and wheat and barley; but puts spelt (DV 'vetches') on the borders of the wheat and barley as less valuable. Omit 'millet'. 26. 'For he instructs him rightly, his God teaches him'. 27. He has different ways of threshing: the flail, used with fennel and cummin, 28, the oxen and the threshing-sledge, used with wheat and barley, but not in such a way as to crush the seed but to separate it from straw and chaff. 29. His knowledge comes from Yahweh of Hosts 'wonderful in counsel and great in wisdom'. As the husbandman has the harvest always in view and acts accordingly, so Yahweh has his Messianic harvest in view, not his people's destruction, in the process of purification by chastisement.

g XXIX 1-24 Ariel Besieged, Blinded and Blessed—Isaiah first predicts the siege of Jerusalem by Sennacherib and its marvellous deliverance, 1-8, then depicts the blindness of the people, the insincerity of their worship and the perversity of their designs, 9-16, and finally describes the new dispensation in the Messianic age, 17-24. The prophecy must be dated before Sennacherib's invasion, 701, very probably in 702; cf. 1b.

1-8 Siege and Deliverance of Jerusalem—1. 'Alas, Ariel, Ariel, city where David encamped! Add year to year, let the feasts go round'. Ariel undoubtedly means Jerusalem. The interpretation, hearth of God, not lion of God, is practically certain. It designates the altar of holocausts in Ez 43:15 f. and here, 2b, where 437h the city is compared to an Ariel on which the victims of the siege are immolated. The circle of annual feasts defines the added year as a single year. 2a. 'Then will I distress Ariel and there shall be sorrow and sorrowing'. 3. The siege is described: 'Yea I shall encamp against thee in a circle and hem thee in with siege-works and erect walls against thee'. 4. Ariel will be so humbled that her voice will resemble that of a shade called up by a necromancer from Sheol. The weak voice indicates extreme distress not destruction or death. 5. It is her enemies who perish. 'them that fan thee': 'them that distress thee'; 'ashes': 'chaff'; after 'multitude' render 'of savage assailants'. They perish in an instant. 6a. 'By Yahweh of hosts thou shalt be visited with thunder', etc. Visit may imply chastisement or deliverance. 7. Here it is deliverance for the terrible besiegers vanish like a dream. The dream clause b should follow c: 'and all her assailants and siege-works [sic] and oppressors'. 8. The multitude of the Gentiles indicates the various nations in the Assyrian army.

1 9-16. The prophet now reproaches his hearers for their unbelief and threatens them with the chastisement of increased blindness and insensibility. 9a. 'Stupefy yourselves that you may be stupefied, Blind yourselves and be blinded'. 10. 'For Yahweh hath poured out on you insensibility. He hath closed your eyes and veiled your heads'. 11-12. All vision becomes a sealed book when its meaning is hidden. 13-14. The punishment of lip-worship without heart-worship will be the withdrawal of wisdom and understanding from the men of counsel on whom public welfare depends. Our Lord applies 13 to the Jews of his time, Mt 15:7-9. Ezechias had revived and imposed the ritual laws, but it was through human respect, as man's command, rather than with sincerity of heart, as God's command, that the people observed them. 15-16. Finally these unwise counsellors plan in secret and imagine that Yahweh does not know. They forget their dependence on him. The reference is apparently to the intrigues with Egypt and the revolt from Assyria which provoked Sennacherib's invasion. 16. 'How perverse you are! Is the potter to be estimated as the clay? Does the work say of its maker: He has not made me? Does the pot say of the potter: He does not understand?'

1 17-24. The great change in the Messianic age is depicted. 17. The alteration of forest to fruitful valley (DV 'charmel') and vice versa is a figure of this change. 18-21. Lofly are depressed, lowly exalted; deaf hear, blind see; wicked are cut off, poor and lowly rejoice. 20a. 'For the tyrant shall cease to be, the scoffer shall disappear'. 21. 'They that made a man fail in a suit, that laid a snare for the arbiter at the gate, that turned aside the just unredressed'. 22-24. Israel will be happy and holy. 'be ashamed': 'grow pale'. There shall be no ignorance or sin. 'the law': 'knowledge'.

438a XXX 1-33 Oracle on the Egyptian Alliance—The secret plotting of the diplomats of Jerusalem was denounced in the preceding prophecy, 29:15. Here the plot is revealed as an alliance with Egypt in process of formation. In the following prophecy, 31:1-9, it is an accomplished fact. The three prophecies belong to the same year, 702. The alliance is sinful and futile, 1-7. Judah's disregard of Yahweh's prophetic warnings will be punished by ultimate ruin, 8-17. Yahweh will finally establish his people in holiness and prosperity, 18-26, and chastise the Assyrian oppressor, 27-33.

b 1-7. 1. The rebellious children make a plan and form an alliance not sanctioned by Yahweh who has prohibited foreign alliances. 2a. 'They are on their way down to Egypt without consulting Yahweh'. 'My mouth' probably means 'my prophet', Ex 4:16. 2b. 'to seek refuge in the refuge of Pharaoh and shelter', and, 3. all to their own shame and confusion. 4. 'His [Judah's or Ezechias'] princes have been in Tanis and his messengers are approaching Hanes'. Tanis was the first port of call of the ambassadors, where Taharka was probably in command. They continue southwards to Herakleopolis south of Faiyum to meet the Pharaoh, Shabaka.

438b 5. 'all shall be'. 6. The difficulties of the ambassadors' journey through the desert, separating Judah from Egypt, and the costly presents are all in vain. Omit 'the burden of the beasts of Negeb', an interpolation; cf. 21:1, 13; 22:1. 'in': 'through'. 7b. 'Therefore do I call her the sitting dragon'. Egypt, covered by the Nile, is the inactive sea-dragon, Rahab.

8-17. 8. The prophet is now ordered to write it (Egypt the sitting dragon; cf. 8:1 Mahershallahashbaz) on a tablet in their presence and record it documentarily as a perpetual attestation. 9-10. The attestation is needed for the people are rebellious and deceitful preferring false to true revelations. 11. They bid their prophets: 'Turn aside from the (right) way, decline from the (right) path, remove from our sight the Holy One of Israel'. 12-14. The punishment of rejecting Yahweh's word and trusting in what is perverse and false will be sudden and complete ruin. The breach swelling out in the wall expresses the suddenness, the broken vessel the completeness. 15. Conversion to Yahweh and submission to Assyria are essential. 16. 'And you say: No, but on horses shall we fly—Therefore shall you flee—On swift steeds shall we ride—Therefore shall your pursuers be swift'. Their courage will fail without Yahweh's aid. 17. 'for fear': 'before the attack'; insert after 'five' 'a myriad'. 'mast of a ship': 'post'.

18-26. 18. Deliverance is delayed because Yahweh is a judge who must punish sinners. 'be exalted sparing you': 'tarry to show you mercy'. 19a. 'Because, O people who shall dwell in Sion, you shall weep no more'. Omit 'Jerusalem'. 20. 'Should the Lord give you bread of affliction and water of distress, no more would your teachers [the prophets] be thrust aside but your eyes would look to your teachers'. The converted remnant will have unlimited trust in their prophets. 21. The sense is similar. 22. Idols shall be cast aside even though plated over with silver or covered with gold. 23. Rich harvests, abundant pasturage, will be assured. The early rain in October–November and the late rain in March–April were uncertain but most necessary for good harvests. 24. 'mingled provender', etc.: 'salted fodder'. 25. Water will be abundant everywhere 'in the day of the great slaughter when the towers fall', the day of judgement. 26. Light will abound.

27-33. 27-28. The theophany or manifestation of Yahweh come to judge the nations is first described. Name is manifestation. The thunder is his voice, the lightning his fiery wrath. The torrent to which his breath is compared reaches to the neck. He comes 'to shake the nations with a sifting of emptiness and put a bridle of error in the jaws of the peoples'. Sifting and bridle are for chastisement, not for purification and guidance. 29. The Israelites will sing as on the festive night and rejoice as pilgrims ascending to Mt Sion to the sound of the flute. The festive night is most probably that of the Pasch on which sacred songs, later the Hallel, were sung. 30-33 depict the chastisement of the Assyrian oppressor. 30. 'terror': 'descent'; 'the threatening': 'a frenzy'. After 'fire' read 'tempest and rain-storm and hail-stones'. 31. 'being': 'he shall be'. 32. 'And every stroke [lit. passing] of the rod of punishment [MT 'appointed rod'] with which Yahweh strikes him shall be to the sound of timbrels and harps and in battles of waving will he combat him'. Waving may refer to the sifting of 27 or to the ritual waving of a sacrificial victim. 33. Assur will finally be consumed by fire. 'For long since is his burning-place made ready, that too is prepared for a king, Deep and wide is its pit, fire and wood abound, the breath of Yahweh like a torrent of brimstone enkindles it'. Topheth, burning place, was the site in the valley of Hinnom (Gehenna), where human sacrifices were offered to Moloch. That place is not directly indicated here but king (mlek) alludes to Moloch to whom Achaz sacrificed a son, 4 Kg 16:3. This passage may have contributed to the later use of Gehenna for hell-fire.

XXXI 1-9 Second Oracle on the Egyptian Alliance—

488g This oracle denounces alliance with Egypt and abandonment of Yahweh, 1-3, who nevertheless will save Jerusalem from the Assyrians, 4-5. Let Israel be converted for on that day idols shall be put to shame and Assyria shall fall, 6-9. Reinforcements of horses and chariots were the chief object of the alliance.

h 1. 'trusted in': 'looked to'. 2a. 'Yet he too is wise and has brought calamity and not withdrawn his word'. God's wisdom requires that sin be punished. 3. Egypt and Judah will perish together. 'put down': 'stretch out'. 4-5. Though Judah is doomed the time is not yet and Yahweh will protect his holy city from the approaching invasion of the Assyrians. Like a lion defending his prey from a multitude of shepherds (the Assyrian hosts), like birds protecting their young, he will save Jerusalem from Sennacherib. 'upon' (after 'whelp'): 'over'; 'their multitude': 'their shouting'. 6. The call to repentance is motivated by the promised protection. 'as': 'to him from whom'. 7. That day is the day of judgement, similarly described elsewhere as the day when the worthlessness of idols is manifested. It might be referred also to the day of the destruction of Sennacherib's host, a day of judgement for Assyria. 8. The negative particle after 'flee' is not original. The sense is that whoever escapes the sword will be put to forced labour. The sword is the sword of God, the real author of Assyria's fall. 9. 'Strength' is lit. 'rock'. The fire and furnace most probably refer to the altar of holocausts, Ariel. There is some obscurity in the prediction, probably due to compensation. Isaiah depicts together two distinct future events, the destruction of Sennacherib's host and the final downfall of Assyria.

i XXXII 1-8 Justice and Folly—These verses hardly belong to the preceding or the following prophecy. They seem to embody moral considerations, the contrast between justice and folly. The mention of a king implies a pre-exilic date.

j 1-5 Portrait of Justice—The whole passage has been interpreted as a conditional sentence: protasis 1-4, apodosis 5. But the construction is grammatically doubtful and more practical consequences than a correct estimation of folly and deceit might perhaps be expected from a reign of justice elaborately depicted. The tenses are present. The princes are the subordinate rulers. 2a. 'And each (prince) is a refuge from the wind and a shelter from the rainstorm'. A great rock alone affords shade in the desert. 3-4. The subjects are neither blind nor deaf nor unintelligent. 5. Folly and deceit are no longer thought noble and honourable.

k 6-8 Portrait of Folly—6. The fool not only speaks folly but 'devises iniquity to practise impiety and speak error about Yahweh'. MT has 'does' for 'devises' against the pre-Masoretic MS and the Vss. He fails to relieve his neighbour's hunger and thirst. 7. The knaveries (DV 'vessels') of the deceitful are false accusations of the meek and false testimonies against the poor. 8. 'The noble devises what is noble and by his nobility prospers'.

489a 9-20 Oracle on Sennacherib's Invasion, the Ruin of Judah and the Messianic Kingdom—The prophecy may be dated in 702 B.C. Lament for the ruin of Judah, 9-14. Prediction of ultimate salvation, 15-20.

b 9-14. 9. 'rich': 'at ease'. 10. 'Days on a year' apparently means after a year and some days. 'For the harvest time has passed but no harvest is gathered'. 11-14a. Let the women discard their raiment, put on sack-cloth and beat their breasts over the devastation of the land and the abandonment of pleasant homes and joyous cities. 14b. 'For fortified hill and watch-tower are become like caves for ever'. Ophel (fortified hill) is generic, not the acropolis of Sion. It indicates the acropolis of Samaria, 4 Kg 5:24, of a Moabite city (Meša inscription). Sennacherib captured many cities of Judah but not Jerusalem. For ever is modified by until in 15.

c 15-20. 15. It is God who introduces the Messianic age and the new dispensation; cf. 29:17. 16. Everywhere shall be judgement and justice, 17-18, peace and security for ever. 'beauty': 'abode'; 'wealthy': 489c 'untroubled'. 19a. 'When the forest shall fall headlong'. The reference may be to all the Gentile nations or to Assyria in particular often compared to a forest. 20. Israel will be blessed with the rich harvests of the Messianic age. On the abundance of water cf. 30:23. The ox and the ass are the harvest workers of 30:24. XXXIII 1-24 Prayer for and Promise of Messianic d Salvation—A prayer for deliverance from oppression, 1-9. Coming of Yahweh to judge the nations and purify his people, 10-16. The Messianic kingdom, 17-24. There is no indication of date unless the covenant is a pact made with an earthly monarch, variously identified with Sennacherib, Artaxerxes Ochus, Antiochus Eupator. It is practically certain however that the covenant of Sinai is meant and that Yahweh who does not save his afflicted people is regarded as not fulfilling his promises. He is similarly regarded as violating his promise to David, Ps 89:40. It is easier to supply Yahweh than an earthly monarch as the omitted subject of the verbs in 8, where moreover he regards not man suggests God as subject. The language and concepts of the prophecy are Isaianic. The devastation of Judah, 8, implies that the prophet contemplates a future period of Israel's history.

1-9. 1. The people are oppressed. 'Woe to thee, destroyer, not yet destroyed, spoiler whom they have not yet despoiled'. 2. They pray for deliverance, recording Yahweh's ancient benefits to his people. 3-4. 'At the noise of a tumult the peoples fled, at thy rising up the nations were scattered. And they [Israel] gathered spoil as locusts gather, as locusts leap they leaped upon it'. 5-6 depict Sion in the ideal reign of David, full of judgement and justice. The Messianic kingdom will be a revival of David's. 7-9. The present distress is contrasted with the ancient security. 7. The parallelism suggests Salem (Jerusalem) for Šālôm (peace). 'Behold the men of Ariel cry without, the messengers of Salem weep bitterly'. 8. Israel is exiled and oppressed because Yahweh 'has annulled the covenant, has rejected the testimony, regards not man'. 9. The devastation is not particularized. Only famous places, Lebanon, Sharon, Bashan, Carmel are mentioned. 'shaken': 'made bare'.

10-16. The prayer receives a dramatic answer. f Yahweh comes to judge the world and separate the dross from the precious metal by fire; cf. 1 Cor 3:13. The judgement of the Gentiles is first announced, 11-13. 11. 'You conceive chaff, you shall bring forth stubble'. Read my breath. 12. 'ashes after a fire': 'burnt like lime'. 13. All nations will hear of Yahweh's judgement and recognize his omnipotence. 14-16. The chosen people also will be judged. 14. The fire is the fire of judgement, not of hell or purgatory, consuming the wicked but sparing the just. 'of you': 'of us'. 16. 'highness': 'stronghold'.

17-24. The New Sion, its beauteous king and its extensive territory suggest reflections on the past, 17-19. 17. 'his eyes': 'thy eyes'. 18. 'meditate fear': 'muse on the terror'. 'Where is the reckoner? Where is the weigher? Where is the counter of towers?' The reference is to the tribute paid by weight to the oppressors, 19, the fierce people of deep unintelligible speech, of stammering senseless tongue. 20. Sion is like a tent whose ropes and pegs are ever secure. 'solemnity': 'assembly'; 'rich': 'secure'; 'nails': 'pegs'. 21a. 'Nay there Yahweh will be to us a boundary, rivers of wide streams'. Yahweh protects Sion like wide rivers surrounding it through which no warships shall pass. 22. 'lawgiver': 'chieftain'. 23. 'If thy ropes be loosened, they shall not fix a flag-staff nor spread a pennant'. The ropes are tent-ropes, the flag-staff and pennant signals calling for assistance. No attack is to be feared. The blind (conjecturally inserted) and lame considered a sufficient garrison for Jebusite Jerusalem are probably alluded to. 24. Finally 'no inhabitant shall say: I am sick, and all iniquity is forgiven'. Sickness is regarded as the punishment of sin.

XXXIV 1-XXXV 10 Final Judgement and Final Sal- h vation—The unity of this prophecy is admitted but its 439h Isaian authorship is usually denied. Ch 34 closely resembles ch 13. Marked hostility to Edom is usually post-exilic. The authorship is a wider problem; cf. § 421a. Judgement of the nations, 34:1-4, of the Edomites, 5-8, Edom a desert for ever, 9-17. In Israel salvation, 35:1-4, healing of evils, 5-7, return of exiles, 8-10.

I XXXIV 1-4. 1-2. The wrath of Yahweh in the coming judgement is announced to all the nations of the earth. 'killed': 'doomed' lit. banned. 3. The bodies of the slain remain unburied and the mountains stream with their blood. 4. The heavens are rolled up, like pages of a book-roll, and their hosts, objects of idolatrous worship, fade away.

J 5-8. 5. 'When my sword'. Edom is 'the nation doomed by me for judgement'. 6. 'Yahweh's sword shall be filled with blood, made rich with fat, with the blood of lambs and he-goats, with the fat of the kidneys of rams, for there is a sacrifice to Yahweh in Bosra and a great slaughter in the land of Edom'. In all sacrifices the blood and fat of the victims were sacred to Yahweh. Their mention here implies the figure of a sacrifice subsequently expressed and located. Bosra, el-Busêre, was an important city of Edom. 7. The wild oxen (DV 'unicorns') and the bullocks with the bulls are the nobles. 8. The day of vengeance and year of retribution indicate the time at which Yahweh will avenge Sion and punish Edom. 'of the judgement': 'of the cause'.

K 9-17. Edom shall become a burning-place; cf. 30:33. 9b. 'And the land shall become a fire burning night and day'. This is during the actual devastation. Subsequently Edom shall be barren and uninhabited, the home of wild beasts and fabulous monsters like Babylon, 13:21-22. 11. The bittern and ericin may be the pelican and the porcupine. The ibis is the owl. 'And (Yahweh) will stretch over it the measuring-line of desolation and the plummet of devastation'. 12. 'Of kingship they shall speak no more and all her princes shall disappear'. 'Nobles' is probably a gloss on princes. 13. Palaces shall grow thorns, fortresses thistles and nettles. 'dragons': 'jackals'. 14. 'demons and monsters': 'wild-cats [?] and hyenas'; 'lamia': 'lilith', a female night-phantom of popular belief. 15a. 'There shall the arrowsnake make her nest and lay and hatch and brood her eggs'. 16. 'Search in the book of Yahweh and read'. The book probably represents God's decrees.

I XXXV 1-4. 1. 'Let the wilderness and the steppe rejoice, and the desert exult and bloom'. The verbs are jussives. Join 'like the crocus' (DV 'lily') to 2. This early flower marks the end of winter. Israel shall have a luxuriant vegetation like Lebanon, Carmel and Sharon. They, 2c, are the inhabitants of the land, bidden, 3-4, to take courage for God's vengeance on their enemies and their salvation is at hand. 'Your God comes as an avenger, God is a recompenser'.

M 5-7. Corporal evils: blindness, deafness, dumbness, lameness will be healed in the Messianic age, 5-6. These verses foretell the healing miracles of Christ, Mt 11:5; Mk 7:37; Lk 7:22. 6. 'be free': 'sing'. 7b (slightly corrupt): 'In the place where jackals lay down will be an enclosure for reeds and sedges'. The desert will be irrigated.

N 8-10. The holy way, more exactly sanctuary way, will be there, namely in Palestine. It leads to the sanctuary, is free from the intrusion of wild beasts and is found by the least intelligent. Only the pure will travel by it. 8c. 'My people shall travel by it and (even) the simple shall not go astray'. This via sacra in Palestine has no connexion with the way from Babylonia to Palestine. 10 is repeated literally 51:11. Here undoubtedly it completes the picture of the New Sion by describing the return of the exiles.

Appendix to Chh 1-35

440a XXXVIII 9-20 Canticle of Ezechias—Chh 36-39 have been commented in 4 Kg to which they originally belong. The Canticle of Ezechias however is only found in Isaiah. It is called a miqtāb or writing, generally corrected to miqtām, a psalm title of uncertain meaning. It commemorates the miraculous healing of Ezechias from a fatal malady in 713 B.C., describing his sentiments before, 10-14, and after, 15-20, the prediction of recovery.

10-14. 10. 'I said: In the noontide [lit. quiet] of my days I must go, To the gates of Sheol I have been assigned, For the rest of my days'. Ezechias was then thirty-nine years old. 11. To see God means to visit his temple. 'rest': 'the world'. 12a. 'My abode is plucked up and taken from me like a shepherd's tent', when the shepherd moves elsewhere to find pasturage. 12b-c. 'I have rolled up my life like a weaver, He is cutting it off from the thrum, From day to night he delivers me to pain' (or, 'he makes an end of me'). Man rolls the web of his life but God cuts off the piece of cloth when life ends. From day to night means all day long if pain, in the course of a day if death is meant. 13a. 'hoped': 'cry out'. 14a. 'I twitter like a swallow, I moan like a dove'.

15-20. 15. 'What shall I say? For he has told me [the prediction] and he has accomplished it [the recovery]. I shall go through all my years after [or, notwithstanding] the bitterness of my soul'. 16. 'Those whom God guards live, And (to everyone) among them is the life of my spirit, Thou hast healed me and kept me alive'. The verse is intelligible if 'to everyone' be omitted. 17. 'He has changed [mar] for me bitterness [mār] to wellbeing'. 'that it should not perish': 'from the pit of corruption'. The dead could not then praise God by public and solemn cult or expect temporal benefits from him. 18-19. The tenses are present. 'truth': 'fidelity'. Look for thy truth means expect promised benefits. 20a. 'Yahweh will save us'.

XL-LV Consolation for the Exiles in Babylon.

XL 1-31 The Hour of Deliverance is Near—This chapter is an introduction to Isaiah II, chh 40-55. The scene is changed. Instead of the inhabitants of Judah (8th cent. B.C.) the Jewish exiles in Babylonia (6th cent. B.C.) are addressed. The tacit references to Cyrus imply that he has already begun his victorious career but has not yet defeated Croesus of Lydia, 547, or captured Sardis, 546. Proximate deliverance is foretold, 1-11, and Yahweh, the deliverer, is celebrated, 12-31.

1-11. Let the prophet and his adherents console (DV 'be comforted') the people of Yahweh with the announcement of speedy deliverance. 2. 'evil': 'servitude' (MT lit. military service). Double is a poetic hyperbole suggested by compassion and implying severe but not unmerited or vicarious punishment. 3-5. A herald proclaims the new Exodus, accompanied like the Egyptian Exodus by a manifestation of the glory of Yahweh. A straight and level way must be prepared according to the ancient custom of building a road to welcome a king or conqueror. 'In the desert' should follow 'prepare ye'. All four Evangelists understand the herald typically as John the Baptist. Literally an angel seems indicated. 3. 'the paths of': 'a highway for'. 5. 'that': 'for'. 6-8. A second herald orders the further proclamation that all flesh passes away like grass but the word of Yahweh endures for ever. The spirit or breath of Yahweh is the hot east wind which withers the grass, his word is the promise of deliverance. 9-11. Finally Sion and Jerusalem personified announce from a mountain top to the cities of Judah the return of Yahweh with the exiles. 9. Sion and Jerusalem are vocatives. 10. The exiles are the recompense (DV 'work'). The shepherd simile shows God's loving care. He carries the lambs, he gently leads the suckling ewes.

12-31. 12. Yahweh is magnificently delineated as supremely competent to fulfil his promise. He is the all-powerful and all-wise creator of all things without assistant or adviser. Weighing with the hand and estimating the earth at a shalish (third of an ephah) emphasizes the comparative littleness of creatures. 13. 'forwarded': 'regulated'. 15-17. He is the lord of nations and peoples, mere drops of water, particles

441c of dust, grains of corn before him. The islands are the lands in and around the Mediterranean. All the trees and beasts of Lebanon would not suffice for a burnt-offering worthy of Yahweh. 18-20. He is exalted immeasurably above all other gods, particularly idols. The description of their fabrication emphasizes their impotence. 19. The craftsman first casts the idol out of base metal. The goldsmith then overlays it with goldleaf or silver plating. Two misplaced verses, 41:6-7, are usually inserted here. 41:7. 'The craftsman encourages the goldsmith, The tapper with the hammer (encourages) the striker of blows, saying of the welding: It is good. And he fixes it firmly with nails'. 20 describes the poor man's wooden image, made of sound wood by a skilled carpenter. 21. Yahweh's exaltation is known to all by revelation from the beginning (from the time of Abraham) and through his creatures from the foundation of the earth. 22. The globe of the earth is the firmament, 'nothing': 'fine cloth' or 'veil'. 23. Princes and rulers he sets up and deposes at will. 'searchers of secrets': 'princes'. 24a. 'Scarce were they planted', etc. 24b. The tenses are all past. 25-28. Yahweh is exalted incomparably over the heavenly bodies, worshipped by man. (After 'see'): 'Who hath created these? He brings forth their host'. 27-31 set forth the conclusion. Yahweh's chosen people must believe in his providence and trust in his Power and Wisdom. However discouraged they may be, if they hope in Yahweh they shall renew their strength. 27c. 'my cause is overlooked by my God'. 30. 'shall': 'may'; 'fall by infirmity': 'totter'.

d XLI 1-29 + XLII 8-12 Yahweh arraigns the Gentiles and their Gods—The first of the Servant poems, 42:1-4, is not a part of this prophecy. The close connexion in thought between 41:27-29 and 42:8-9 shows that the intervening verses interrupt the context. Their contents, commented in §441i-k, have nothing in common with this prophecy. The argument takes the form of a legal process in which Yahweh arraigns the gentile nations, 41:1-20, and their gods, 41:21-29 + 42:8-9. The matter in dispute is: Who has raised up the world conqueror, the still unnamed Cyrus, Yahweh's instrument in the destruction of Babylon and the restoration of Israel, and who has foretold his coming and his exploits? The answer is: Yahweh alone. The process ends with a paean of victory in which the Gentiles praise and glorify Yahweh, 42:10-12.

e 1-5. 1. The islands (Mediterranean peoples) and the nations (here apparently eastern peoples) are called to judgement by Yahweh. 'Hearken to me in silence, ye islands, Wait upon my plea, ye peoples. Let them [the pleaders] approach and then speak, Let us come together to judgement'. 2-5 announce the matter in dispute. The mention of the isles (Mediterranean coast lands) implies that Cyrus' conquest of Lydia has begun. The fear of these lands in particular and the vast military conquests recorded exclude the view of a few commentators that Abraham not Cyrus is referred to. 2. 'Who hath raised up from the east one whose steps straightness meets? Hath delivered up nations before him and subdued kings? His [Cyrus'] sword makes (them) as dust, his bow as driven stubble'. sedeq is straightness; cf. Ps 22 (23) 3 where paths of sedeq = straight paths. The answer to the query is given in 4. Yahweh is the author of world history from the beginning and likewise to the end. 5. The nations and especially the 'islands' (Croesus of Lydia) fear the conqueror. 'They drew near and came' is a gloss.

f 8-20. 8-10. Israel, Yahweh's servant, his chosen people, the seed of his friend, Abraham, must not fear like the Gentiles. Her salvation is at hand. 'Servant' is practically equivalent to 'chosen'. 9. Omit 'in whom'. 10b. 'I strengthen thee, yea I help thee, yea I support thee with my righteous [or, victorious] right hand'. 11-14. Through his instrument, Cyrus, Yahweh chastises and extirpates Israel's enemies especially the Babylonians. The tenses of fight, strive, 11, resist and war, 12, are past. 14a. 'Thou worm Jacob, thou maggot Israel, I am thy helper'. The epithets worm and maggot indicate Israel's helplessness without Yahweh's aid. 15-16. Israel will crush her enemies like a threshing sledge and scatter them like a winnowing fan. This is usually interpreted as a conditional prophecy of the future military might of Israel, not fulfilled because she rejected the Messias. It may however indicate the victories of Cyrus, attributed to Israel as the exploits of Yahweh. 17-20. The new Exodus follows the military exploits. 18. 'high hills': 'bare heights'; 'plains': 'valleys'; 'impassable': 'arid'; 'streams': 'springs'; 19. 'thorn': 'acacia'. The description of the Exodus is based on the Egyptian prototype.

21-29 + XLII 8-9. The gods are now arraigned and their ignorance and impotence are demonstrated. 21-24. 21b. 'bring hither your proofs'. 22. The gods are challenged to show their previous knowledge of the former things (which Yahweh previously foretold) and of the future things (which Yahweh now foretells). 23. Such knowledge, even activity for good or evil, would be some defence of their cause. 24. But they are nothing and do nothing and to choose them as gods is an abomination. 25. The call and the victories of Cyrus are then foretold. He comes from the north as well as from the east because his empire was north and east of Babylonia. Instead of 'he calls my name' (MT) we should probably read I call his name as in the parallel passage, 45:3. Cyrus was not a monotheist. 26. Who foretold the victories of Cyrus? 'thou art just': 'he is right'. No idol foretold them. 27. 'I first announced it to Sion, gave a bearer of good tidings to Jerusalem'. 28-29. The false gods cannot advise or answer questions and thus show their falsity. XLII:8-9. To me Yahweh belongs the glory of having predicted former things which came to pass and of now predicting new things before they happen. The new things are the mission of Cyrus to destroy Babylon and restore Israel. The former things include very probably earlier and less definite predictions of the conquest of Babylon: Is 13:17 ff.; 21:2 ff.; Jer 51:11 ff. or possibly lost oracles.

XLII 10-12. The Gentiles celebrate the victory of Yahweh over the false gods. The prophet anticipates the accomplishment of the new predictions by which Yahweh's sole divinity is manifested to them. 10. Omit 'that go down to the'. 11b. 'Ye tent-dwellers that inhabit Cedar'. The futures, 11-12, are imperatives. Cedar and Edom in the east declare God's glory to the islands in the west.

XLII 1-4 The Servant of Yahweh and his Mission—The Servant here introduced is the future Messias, represented not as king and conqueror but as worker and sufferer. Yahweh who upholds him has chosen him, endowed him with his spirit and appointed him instructor of the Gentiles. His mission will be characterized by meekness and sympathy, fidelity and constancy, and will be crowned with success.

1. 'Behold! My Servant whom I uphold, My chosen one in whom I delight! I have endowed him with my spirit, He shall announce judgement to the nations'. 'Behold' may be addressed to the prophet, to Israel or to the Angels. 'Servant' is an honorary title like 'chosen'. 'Uphold' implies attachment and support. On the bestowal of the spirit cf. 11:2. Judgement is moral and religious discernment, knowledge of right and wrong, a Messianic attribute; cf. 7:15. The voice from heaven heard at Christ's baptism and transfiguration (Mt 3:17; 17:5 and parallels) alludes to this verse.

2-4. 'He shall not cry nor make any clamour, Nor let his voice be heard in the street; The bruised reed he shall not break And the dim wick he shall not extinguish. Faithfully shall he announce judgement, Not burning dimly nor himself being bruised, Until he have established judgement on earth; And for his instruction the far coasts wait eagerly'. The procedure of the Servant in his mission is contrasted with that of a military conqueror like Cyrus. His strength of character is contrasted with the weakness of those whom he instructs and uplifts. The parallelism between judgement and instruction confirms the Messianic sense of the former word. The far coasts (DV 441k islands) are the lands in and around the Mediterranean. Mt 12:17-21 cites this prophecy as fulfilled.

1 5-7 seem to be a later insertion, not an explanatory afterthought of the original author. 5. The praise of Yahweh could be intended to emphasize the divine origin of the Servant's mission. Such praises however are often inserted in prophetic discourses without regard to the context. 6. As Light of the nations means enlightener of the Gentiles, so Covenant of the people means mediator of a covenant between God and Israel. Thus the Servant's mission to Israel, reserved for the second Song, is here unnaturally anticipated. 7. The darkness could be spiritual, referring to the Gentiles, or material, referring to the Jews in exile. The reference to the exiles, more usually understood, would imply a political mission.

m The first section of Isaiah 40-55, ended with a canticle of praise, 42:10-12. The second has a similar termination, 44:23. This section describes Yahweh's Zeal, impeded by Israel's Blindness, 42:18-25, Yahweh, Israel's Helper and Redeemer, 43:1-15, Yahweh's gifts to Israel, unmerited and unexhausted, 43:14-44:5, Yahweh the Only God, Vanity of Idols, 44:6-23.

n XLIII 13-25 Yahweh's Zeal impeded by Israel's Blindness—Yahweh's designs are benevolent.

13-17 Yahweh's Zeal—13. Yahweh is a mighty warrior, eager for the fray. 14. Like a woman in travail, forced by her pain to cry out, he can no longer restrain his battle cry. For the MT 'from of old' (DV 'always') read 'at their wickedness'. Render the last member: I will gasp and pant together. His breath is the fire of his wrath. 15. The land of his enemies will be devastated. 'islands': 'arid land'. 16. Ways in the desert and light in the darkness insinuate a new Exodus from Babylonia. 'These are the things which I shall accomplish and which I shall not neglect'. 17. Idolaters shall turn back and be ashamed at the impotence of their idols.

o 18-22 Israel's Blindness—18. Those deaf to Yahweh's words and blind to his exploits are the people of Israel. 19. 'Who is blind but my servant, and deaf (like my messenger whom I send? Who is blind) like the covenanted one (and blind like the servant of Yahweh)?' This is the only passage of Isaiah in which Israel is a messenger to the Gentiles. The triple repetition of blind is not original. The rendering 'covenanted' is uncertain. The bracketed words are probably interpolated. 20. 'wilt thou': 'dost'. 21. 'Yahweh wished for his loyalty's sake to make the law great and majestic', to make Israel a mighty nation. 22. Infidelity reduced her to bondage and exile. Yahweh's antecedent designs like prophetic promises and threats may depend for their fulfilment on man's free will. 'the snare of young men': 'ensnared in holes'.

p 23-25 The Exile—The prophet earnestly exhorts the people to believe his words, to realize that Yahweh delivered them into bondage for their sins and not to regard the exile as an inexplicable calamity. 25. (After 'upon him') 'the heat of his wrath and of fierce war, which burned him'.

442a XLIII 1-13 Yahweh, Israel's Helper and Deliverer—The time of Deliverance has come, 1-2. The Price of Deliverance shall be paid in full, 3-4. All the Exiles shall be delivered, 5-7. Israel shall bear witness before the nations that Yahweh alone is God and Saviour, 8-13.

b 1-2. But now indicates a new period when God's wrath gives place to his mercy. Fire and water are figuratively used for dangers of the gravest kind; cf. Ps 65:11.

c 3-4. The nations enslaved to form the Persian world-empire are the price of Israel's redemption. Their subjection is necessary for the release of the exiles whom they detain. The release of Babylonian exiles was announced, 40:1-11. Egypt is next in importance. The existence of a Jewish colony at Elephantine on its southern border explains the inclusion of Egypt's southern neighbours Saba and Kush in the Diaspora regions. Egypt was subjugated by Cambyses. The prophet is however not chronicling conquests of Cyrus but regions of the Diaspora. There is no question of the Egyptian Exodus here. Egypt was not then sold or subjected as the price of Israel's deliverance. 3. 'atonement': 'ransom'. 4. 'Because thou wert precious in my eyes, honoured so that I loved thee'. 'people': 'peoples'.

5-7. All exiles shall be able to return. 7. All called by my name means all the people of Yahweh.

8-13. The nations and their gods are again arraigned before Yahweh's tribunal as in ch 41. Israel, though blind and deaf, is called to witness on behalf of Yahweh. 9a. 'Let the nations be assembled and the peoples be gathered together', and 9c, 'Let them produce witnesses to justify their plea, to announce and say: It is true'. 10. For 'my servant' some read the plural and understand my servants as Israel. Others suppose more probably that a new witness, Cyrus, is adduced. 'I myself am': 'I am He'. 11a. 'I, I am Yahweh'. Repetitions are a peculiarity of the author's style. 12b. (After 'heard') 'and no strange god among you'. 13a. 'Henceforth also I am likewise God' (lit. I am he). 'turn away': 'prevent'.

XLIII 14-XLIV 5 Yahweh's Gifts to Israel Unmerited and Unexhausted—Fall of Babylon the Oppressor, 14-15. The Old Exodus and the more wonderful New Exodus, 16-21. Israel's Unworthiness, 22-23. New Era of Prosperity and Increase in Numbers, 44:1-5.

XLIII 14-15. The solemn introduction and conclusion are clear, but the account of the city's fall is obscure. MT reads: 'For your sake have I sent to Babylon and brought down all the fugitives [or bars] and the Chaldeans who rejoice in ships'. The fugitives could be runaways or Jewish exiles, the bars city defences. The text seems corrupt and incomplete.

16-21. The Egyptian Exodus is first recalled. 17. (After 'horse') 'the army and the mighty one together', and after 'again': 'They are extinguished, gone out like a wick'. The mighty one is apparently the commander. The former things and the new thing are not here predictions but exploits. The new Exodus will surpass the old. 19. 'thing': 'things'; 'them': 'it'. Kissane's alteration of n'hārôt 'rivers' (MT and Vss) to n'šibôt is confirmed by the pre-Masoretic MS. 20. 'dragons': 'jackals'.

22-28. 22. Israel has not invoked Yahweh or troubled herself about him or, 23-24a, offered him undemanded sacrifices or other costly gifts, but only, 24, burdened him with her sins and wearied him with her iniquities. The slaughter offerings (DV 'victims') were the peace-offerings of which the fat only was burned. The oblations were the unbloody food offerings. Incense was both mixed with these and offered separately on the incense-altar. Sweet cane seems to be associated with the incense offering. Sacrifice was undemanded because it could only be offered in Jerusalem. 25. Yahweh's forgiveness of Israel's sins is entirely gratuitous. 26. Let Israel plead her cause, prove that she has not deserved her chastisement. 27-28. She sinned from the beginning and her chastisement was just and inevitable. 'teachers': 'mediators'. The common view is that the mediators who sinned were Moses and Aaron and that the first father was Jacob. The holy princes are the descendants of David now dethroned and so profaned. Israel was put under the ban and subjected to blasphemous insults.

XLIV 1-5. 1-2. But now indicates a change in the attitude of Yahweh. He created Israel, formed her from the womb (made her into a full-grown nation) and helps her. Let her not fear. Jeshurun (DV 'most righteous') is a pet-name of Israel, used also in Deut, meaning probably 'righteous' (possibly 'straight', 'well-formed') and opposed to Jacob, the supplanter. The Israelites were few. 3-4. Yahweh here promises to them fertility and fecundity. 'among the herbs': 'like grass'; 'willows': 'poplars'. 5. Foreigners will also become Israelites. Some refer this prophecy to apostate or Diaspora Jews, but the assumption of Israel as a new name implies a foreign origin. 'with his hand': 'on his hand', a reference to the branding of slaves.

442k 6-23 Yahweh Alone is God, Idols are Vain—In this prophecy the contrast between the God of Israel and the gods of the Gentiles is developed. Wisdom and Power of Yahweh, 6-8, Vanity of Idols, 9-17, Folly of Idolaters, 18-20, Conclusion and Hymn of praise, 21-23.

1 6-8. 6. Yahweh Alone is God. 7. 'Whoever is like me let him call out and announce it and set it before me. Who hath announced from of old the things to come and revealed to us what will come to pass?' The text of b is corrected from the context. 8. Yahweh alone has foretold the future and Israel is his witness. Read after 'besides me': 'There is no rock that I know. Rock frequently indicates God as omnipotent.'

m 9-17. 9. Idolaters have no profit from their idols. Their witnesses, as contrasted with Yahweh's, are confounded, seeing no exploit, knowing no prediction of their gods. 10. And yet 'Who forms a god and casts an image except for profit?' 11b. 'Let (idolaters) all assemble and take their stand (for judgement), they shall fear and be confounded together.' 12-17. The inferiority of the idols is not surprising when their origin is considered. 12. The smith labours with fire and hammer, feels the strain, becomes hungry and weak and if he has no water to drink collapses. The idol cannot help its maker. 13. The carpenter uses a measuring line to fix the dimensions, a pencil to mark the outline, a knife to carve the wood and thus produces the figure of a man. 14 names the various trees used. 15. The same species is used indifferently for fuel and for idol. 16-17. This idea is now expressed more graphically. Half a piece of wood is used for firing, the other half for an idol.

n 18-20. The folly of idolaters is explained: 18. He (Yahweh) has veiled their eyes from seeing and their heart from understanding. 19. They should have concluded that combustible wood cannot be a god. 20a. 'He shepherds ashes: A deluded heart has led him astray.' To shepherd ashes or wind, Os 12:2, is to prize what is worthless, the combustible idol, also called lie.

o 21-23. Israel must take these words of Yahweh to heart, remember his benefits and return to him who has blotted out her sins. 21. 'forget me not': 'thou shalt not be forgotten by me'. 23. All created things are invited to rejoice and praise Yahweh for Israel's redemption. 'hath shown mercy': 'hath done it'.

443a The third section of the first part of Isaiah II, 44:24-49:12, ends like the others with a short canticle of praise, 49:13. It contains more definite announcements of the new exploits of Yahweh. Cyrus, Yahweh's instrument for Israel's deliverance, 44:24-45:25, Powerlessness of Babylonian Idols, Omnipotence of Yahweh, 46:1-13, Babylon Dethroned and Enslaved, 47:1-15, Recapitulation of Oracles and Warnings, 48:1-22 + 49:9b-13. The second Servant poem, 49:1-9a, is inserted in the last prophecy.

XLIV 24-XLV 25 God's Salvific Design, Cyrus h's Instrument—Cyrus is introduced, 44:24-28, his mission is announced, 45:1-8, murmuring against a foreign deliverer is condemned, 9-13, consummation of the design in the conversion of the Gentiles, 14-25.

b 24-28. 24-25. Yahweh's love for Israel, Omnipotence and Omniscience are first emphatically affirmed. 26. He fulfils the prophecies of his servants (sing. in MT) and messengers, 27, dries up waters, the Red Sea with possible allusion to the Euphrates. 28. 'He says to Cyrus: "My shepherd who shall fulfil all my desires"; to Jerusalem: "Be built"; to the Temple: "Be founded"'. Cyrus is Yahweh's shepherd faithfully guarding his flock, the exiles.

c XLV 1-8. 1-2. Cyrus is God's anointed as accredited with a divine mission. It is Yahweh who subdues nations before him, ungirds the loins of kings, opens the doors and gates of cities, prepares his way and levels the mountains (pre-Masoretic MS and LXX) before him. When long robes are worn activity is difficult without a girdle, which also usually contains weapons. Hence ungird is weaken, gird strengthen. 3. While Yahweh desires to make himself known to Cyrus by his gifts and exploits—a clear indication that Cyrus is not a monotheist (cf. 41:25)—it is not for his own sake but for Israel's sake that he has chosen him as his instrument. 'call': 'called'. 4. 'made a likeness of thee': 'given thee titles', shepherd, anointed, etc. 5b. 'I will gird thee though thou knowest me not'. 6. Yahweh makes himself known to the Gentiles by his exploits for his people through Cyrus. A similar design explains the wonders of the Exodus, Ex 7:3-5; 9-16. 7. There may be a refutation here of the Persian belief in two principles, one of light and good, the other of darkness and evil. 8. Yahweh produces on earth justice and salvation, personified in Vg. The blessings are Messianic, but are here more immediately associated with the Restoration.

9-13. Murmurs against a foreign instead of a native deliverer are rebellious and unreasonable. Creatures are as clay in the hands of the potter and must submit to their creator's designs. Cyrus will exact no ransom for their deliverance. 9b. After 'making' (slightly corrected): 'And to its maker, thou hast no skill' (lit. hands). 11b. 'Do you ask me to my face about things to come?' 12-13. Yahweh can and will accomplish his design fully and gratuitously.

14-25. The ultimate object of the mission of Cyrus, 5, was to spread the knowledge of Yahweh over the whole earth. Hence the conversion of the Gentiles appropriately concludes his mission. They shall be subject to Israel and Israel's God. The prophecy of subjection to Israel was fulfilled spiritually but not literally because Israel rejected the Messiah. Egypt, Ethiopia and Saba are specially mentioned as sold for Israel's ransom, 43:3. 14. 'Sabaim': 'the Sabaeans'; 'worship thee': 'pay thee homage'. Omit 'thee' after 'besides'. That the downfall of his people should lead to the conversion of the Gentiles illustrates, 15, the mysterious character of the God who conceals himself. 16. Idols bring shame on their worshippers. 17. Yahweh saves his people. Never more shall they be put to shame. 18. He has not created the earth to be a desert but to be inhabited. 19. He has not spoken in secret in some dark place like pagan oracle-gods but publicly. He has not asked Israel to seek for nothing him, the remunerator. He has not announced what is unrighteous or untrue. 20. Let the Gentiles assemble before him. 'Those who carry their wooden idol in procession and invoke a god who cannot save are without intelligence'. 21. Let them plead, advance proofs, take counsel together. Yahweh alone foretold the future. He alone is God of truth and salvation. 22. Let all the ends of the earth then be converted to the one true God. 23. Nay more, Yahweh hath sworn: 'Before me every knee shall bend and (by me) every tongue shall swear'. 24. 'Only in Yahweh, man will say, have I righteousness and strength, Unto him shall come in confusion all those who were incensed with him'. 25. 'Through Yahweh shall be just and shall be glorified [by the converted Gentiles] all the seed of Israel.'

XLVI 1-13 Powerlessness of Babylonian Idols, Omnipotence of Yahweh—Idols are carried, Yahweh carries his people, 1-4. Yahweh is Incomparable, Supreme, Idols are creatures, helpless, motionless, useless, 5-7. What Yahweh has foretold he will assuredly perform through his instrument Cyrus, 8-13.

1-4. 1-2. Bel is bowed down, Nebo is stooped, Animal and beast of burden carry [lit. have] their images. Their [MT your] burdens are weighty, a load for the jaded, they bow down, they are stooped together, They cannot save their burden, they themselves go into captivity. Beasts are laden with the humiliated idols and go with them into captivity. Note that carry repeated five times, 1-4, is emphatic, suggesting the obvious contrast. Bel, ancient god of Nippur, was identified with Marduk when Babylon became powerful. Nabu, god of Borsippa, was considered the son of Marduk and highly honoured in Babylon. 3-4. Unlike the gods of Babylon, who must be carried, Yahweh has carried his people from the beginning and will carry them to the end. From 443h infancy (after 'carried' 3) and from the womb mean from birth as a nation.

I 5-7. 5. 'To whom will you liken me and equal me and esteem me similar that we may be like each other?' 6. Not to idols made by men. The subject is they (indeterminate). 7. The idol is carried, is motionless, cannot hear or help its devotees.

J 8-13. 8. Rebellious Israelites are warned to take to heart the real nature of the idols which they worshipped, and 9, to remember the ancient predictions and exploits of Yahweh, the only God, 10, whose counsel is firm, whose word is fulfilled. 11. Cyrus is compared to a bird of prey swooping on Babylon. 'created': 'planned'. 12. Those stubborn Israelites who are far from salvation are warned that it is near.

K XLVII 1-15 Chant over Babylon Dethroned and Enslaved—The Queen becomes a Slave, 1-4. Her Mercilessness is requited, 5-7. Childlessness and Widowhood is her portion, 8-9. Her Ruin is Sudden and Inevitable, 10-11. Her Astrologers cannot aid her, 12-15. Cf. Is chh 13-14 and Jer ch 50.

I 1-4. 1. 'Sit on the ground without a throne, Daughter of the Chaldaean'. Babylon is called virgin as hitherto intact, daughter as youthful. The Chaldaeans were Aramaean immigrants from the west who became rulers of Babylon in the 7th cent. B.C. 2. The grinding of corn was the task of the housewife in humble homes, but of slaves among the nobles. (After 'meal'): 'Remove thy veil, strip off thy train'. The baring of the legs was for the fording of rivers and canals frequent in Babylonia. 3a is regarded by most commentators as a gloss.

m 5-7. 5. Babylon after dictating to others must be silent, after ruling others must lie in a dark prison. 'lady': 'queen'. 6. The Babylonians like the Assyrians, 10:5 ff., abused their mandate as Yahweh's instrument for the chastisement of his people. 7. They expected to rule for ever and gave no thought to a day of reckoning.

n 8-9. Babylon thought herself secure against widowhood and childlessness, now come upon her. 'barrenness': 'childlessness', loss of children previously possessed. 9b. (After 'widowhood') 'In their full measure shall come upon thee, despite the multitude of thy spells, despite the binding-power of thy charms'. The pagans tried to avert misfortunes by incantations and magical formulae. Such remedies will not save Babylon.

o 10-11. 10. Babylon thought that her oppression of other peoples would be unpunished. 11. But evil which she cannot charm away, calamity which she cannot avert by payment, unsuspected ruin will come suddenly upon her.

p 12-15. 12. Babylon is now ironically invited to make use of her customary charms (DV 'enchanters') and spells. 'Perhaps thou wilt be able to profit from them, Perhaps thou wilt inspire terror by them'. 13a. The Heb. word for 'counsels' is generally vocalized to read counsellors. These are described as measurers of the heavens (DV 'astrologers') stargazers and New Moon announcers. The astrologers divided up the heavens into zones, according to the signs of the zodiac, and from the movements in these zones of the sun, moon and planets foretold the fate of nations and individuals. They observed the courses of the stars and forecast from them future events. They made monthly calendars of lucky and unlucky days. 14. But now the astrologers themselves will burn like stubble in the destructive fire of judgement. 15. 'So have they become to thee with whom thou hast laboured from thy youth. They have erred, each in his own way, there is none to save thee'. 'Merchants' is probably a gloss.

444a XLVIII 1-22 + XLIX 9b-13 Recapitulation of Warnings and Prophecies—This prophecy concludes the first part of the second book. It is a final warning against unbelief and a final announcement of proximate deliverance. After a solemn introduction, 1-2, Yahweh explains his designs in his former revelations, 3-6a, and in his new predictions, 6b-11. He then again announces the mission of Cyrus, 12-16, exacts obedience as a condition of salvation, 17-19, and proclaims the new 444a Exodus, 48:20-22 + 49:9b-13.

1-2. The people are solemnly addressed: Men of b Israel of the tribe of Judah whose God is Yahweh by whom they swear and whom they invoke but without loyalty and righteousness. 'waters': 'body', indicating tribal origin. 'Yea they are called by the name of the holy city and put their stay on the God of Israel, Yahweh of hosts'.

3-6a. Yahweh foretold the former things before c their accomplishment because of the obstinacy and perversity of his people who would otherwise be inclined to attribute his exploits to the idols which they worshipped. Pre-exilic idol worship is chiefly referred to but exilic idolatry is included; cf. 46:8. The text of 6a is doubtful: 'And you, will you not announce?'

6b-11. 6b. 'Now I announce to thee new things, hidden d things which thou didst not know'. 7b. 'before the day when': 'formerly'. The new things are the fall of Babylon and the return of the exiles. These were entirely unknown before the oracles of ch 40 ff. that their effect on Israel might be all the greater and the intervention of Yahweh more apparent. 8-9. It is not through any merit of Israel, completely faithless and called rebel from the womb, that Yahweh has patiently spared her but for his name's sake. 10. He has refined Israel but not as silver for the dross has not been removed. 'I have tested thee in the furnace of tribulation'. The exiles have not been fully purified and are thus distinguished from the Messianic remnant. 11. The ultimate reason of the restoration is God's glory. The reproofs addressed here to Israel re-echo those of 43:22-28.

12-16. Israel is here consoled after being reproached e and the destruction of Babylon by Cyrus is again announced. 12. Yahweh is eternal and, 13, omnipotent. 'When I called them (into existence) they [the heavens] stood together'. 14. The nations are again called to judgement. 'Among them': among the false gods. 15. The rise of Cyrus belonged to the former things, his capture of Babylon to the new things. 16. Omit the gloss 'and now . . . spirits'.

17-19. Before announcing the Babylonian exodus, f Yahweh again proclaims his goodwill towards his chosen people, hampered in the past by their disobedience to his commands. If only they had hearkened to his commandments they would be now a great and prosperous nation. 19b. 'And his name shall not be cut off nor destroyed before me' is not part of the apodosis but an independent statement, probably a gloss.

20-22 + XLIX 9b-13. 20. The deliverance from g Babylonian captivity is again foretold in a command to the exiles to flee from Babylon and the Chaldaeans and a jubilant proclamation of their deliverance. 21. In the new Exodus through the desert they shall not suffer from thirst but like their ancestors shall be miraculously supplied with water. 22 is a gloss derived probably from 57:21. The description of the new Exodus is clearly continued in 49:9b, after the second Servant song, inserted in a prophecy like the first. It is not the Servant but Yahweh, the Merciful, the Shepherd of Israel, who leads his people and supplies their needs in 49:9b-11 as in 48:21. 12. The return of the Jews of the Diaspora is suggested by the new Exodus. The land of the Sinites (DV 'the south country') is not China but Syene, Assuan. 13. The short canticle of praise marks the end of a section.

XLIX 1-6 The Missions of the Servant of Yahweh— h The second Servant poem resembles the first in interrupting the context of the prophecy in which it is inserted. The Servant's address to the far coasts which have just been described as waiting eagerly for his instruction marks this poem as the second scene in the drama. The concealment of the sword and arrow indicate that his mission to the Gentiles will not be fulfilled immediately. The failure of his efforts is the first stage of the vicarious satisfaction to be subsequently revealed as the means by which his mission to the 444h Gentiles will be accomplished. His mission to Israel, so far a failure, is now first announced. His all-important mission however is to the Gentiles, not the political mission of the Restoration, assigned to Cyrus, which would be unworthy of him.

1-2. 'Hearken, ye far coasts, unto me, And give attention, ye distant peoples! Yahweh hath called me from the womb, From my birth he made mention of my name, And he made my mouth like a sharp sword, In the shadow of his hand he hid me; And he made me a polished arrow, In his quiver he concealed me'. 1. The calling and the naming indicate dedication to a particular mission. 2. The sword and the arrow symbolize the power and penetrating effect of the prophetic word. They are kept hidden or reserved until the time appointed by Yahweh for their use.

3-4 & 5c. 'And he said to me: My servant art thou, Israel by whom I will get myself glory. So was I honoured in the eyes of Yahweh, And my God became my strength. But I said: I have laboured in vain, For nought and to no purpose have I spent my strength. Yet surely my cause is with Yahweh and my recompense with my God'. 3. The apparent identification of the Servant with Israel seems to imply that in 5 Israel has a mission to Israel which is impossible. It must be noted however that Israel is here qualified as the means of the glorification of Yahweh. It was in view of the Messiah that Israel was chosen and by the Messiah that Israel glorified Yahweh. Thus Israel here is not the people but the Messiah. In an analogous sense an absolute monarch can say 'L'Etat, c'est moi'. Some less probably consider Israel an interpolation as in LXX 42:1. 5c. This verse seems to have been misplaced. Its transposition after 3 improves the sequence of thought without altering the sense.

5a-b-6. 'And now saith Yahweh, Who formed me from the womb to be his Servant, To restore Jacob unto him, And that Israel to him should be gathered: Too little is it that thou shouldst be my Servant To raise up the tribes of Jacob, And bring back the survivors of Israel; So I have made thee a light to the Gentiles, That my salvation may reach to the end of the earth'. 5a-b. The common scribal error of lō 'not' for lā 'to him' has introduced a negation, excluded by the parallelism, into the Vg rendering of the last member. The mission here assigned to the Servant is clearly spiritual, to bring back Israel to Yahweh. In 6 on the other hand a political mission, the restoration of the exiles, seems to be indicated. Many assign both missions to the Servant. It is more natural however to conclude that the political mission, previously assigned with the fullest confidence to Cyrus and here declared unworthy of the Servant, did not form part of his mission to Israel. This mission, whether only spiritual or also political, is subsidiary to the all-important mission to the Gentiles.

7-9a. 'Thus saith Yahweh, The Redeemer of Israel, his holy one, To him who is deeply despised, Abhorred by all, A slave of rulers: Kings shall see and arise, Princes (shall see and) prostrate themselves, On account of Yahweh, who is faithful, the Holy One of Israel, who has chosen thee. Thus saith Yahweh, In a time of favour have I answered thee, And in a day of salvation have I helped thee, And I form thee and make thee The covenant of the people, To resettle a land, to re-people desolate inheritances, Saying to the prisoners "Come out", To those who are in darkness "Be enlightened"'. 7. The anticipation of the homage of the kings, reserved by the author for the fourth Song, marks this verse as a later addition. 'Despising' (MT) must be read despised. Deeply is literally 'in the soul'. Kings, being seated, stand up, princes, who are standing, prostrate themselves to do homage. 8. The text assigns to the Servant the mission of the Restoration. But the words 'And I form thee and I make thee the covenant of the people' are a literal citation of 42:6b and seem to be interpolated. If they are omitted the pronouncement is more naturally understood as a prophecy of the Restoration addressed to the exiles and inserted here to facilitate the transition from the Servant Song to the regular theme of the Restoration.

XLIX 14-LV 18. In this second part of Isaias II the oracles are addressed no longer to Jacob-Israel but to Sion-Jerusalem. The theme is the future glorification of Sion. Predictions of the New Exodus interconnect both parts. Two more Servant poems appear, 50:4-9 and 52:13-53:12.

XLIX 14-L 3 Yahweh is Mindful of Sion and his b People-Sion will be rebuilt, 14-17, and repopulated, 18-21, and the exiles will return, 22-23, for Yahweh is Almighty, 24-26, the Saviour of his people, 50:1-3.

14-17. Yahweh is ever mindful of Sion as a mother of her child, as a bridegroom who still in the east may have the name of the bride tattooed on his hand. Sion's rebuilders are coming in haste and her destroyers and devastators are leaving her.

18-21. 18. The exiles are depicted as already returned. They are the rich raiment, the bridal girdle with which Sion is adorned. 19a. 'For thy wrecks and thy ruins and thy wasted land I shall re-establish'. 20. Sion, too small for the returned exiles, asks in wonder whence they have come to a mother so long childless and barren. 21. Exiled and rejected (DV 'led away and captive'), not in LXX, is probably a gloss. 'I was destitute and alone': 'I was the sole survivor'. Sion here is the childless mother and rejected bride in Palestine.

22-23. The return of the Jews of the Diaspora is the answer to Sion's query. Their masters will free them and honour them. Kings and queens will do homage to them (DV 'worship') as citizens of the capital of the Messianic kingdom. Sons and daughters are babes in general, borne first in the arms, later on the shoulders.

24-26. 24. For saddiq 'just' (MT) read arš 'tyrant' (DV 'mighty') with the pre-Masoretic MS. Deliverance may seem impossible, but what is difficult to man is easy to God. 25. 'captivity': 'captives'; 'judge': 'content with'.

L 1-3. 1. The complaint of discouraged exiles that Yahweh has abandoned them, 49:14, is unfounded. His repudiation of Sion, his bride, is only temporary. His sale of his people into slavery is also temporary, not the payment of a debt to Babylon but the punishment of their sins. Children were sold into slavery in payment of a father's debt. 2. Lack of response from Israel to his visitations and the warning of his prophets made the final chastisement of the exile inevitable. But now as formerly he is mighty to deliver. He controls the forces of nature, can dry up seas and rivers and, turn light into darkness.

4-9 The Suffering Servant: His Obedience, Constancy, b and Confidence in Yahweh-The third Song depicts a further stage in the Servant's mission to Israel, marked by persecution and suffering. It is a necessary link between the second and the fourth Songs in which the relation between mission and suffering will be revealed. Now that the dramatic character of the Songs is recognized few commentators follow St John Chrysostom in regarding this one as a record of its author's personal experience. Its resemblance to the other Songs is moreover too obvious to be ignored, and it is attributed to the Servant in an appended comment.

4-6. 'The Lord Yahweh hath given me A disciple's tongue, I That I may know in due season A word for the weary. Morning by morning he awakens my ear That I may hear as a disciple. The Lord Yahweh himself hath opened my ear, I was not rebellious, I turned not back, I gave my back to the smiters, My cheeks to them that plucked my beard, I hid not my face From insult and spitting'. The text of 4-5 is slightly corrupt but the general sense is clear. For in due season (MT) we find 'how to answer' in LXX. It was in obedience to his Father's will that Christ voluntarily submitted to the scourging, the spittle, and the insults of his Passion.

7-9. 'But the Lord Yahweh helps me, Therefore am I not] confounded, Therefore did I make my face like flint, And knew that I should not be put to shame. Near is my Vindicator, Who will take proceedings against me? Let us stand up together. Who is my adversary? Let him draw near unto me. Behold! The Lord Yahweh himself will help me! Who then can secure a verdict against me? Behold! They 445j shall all wear out as a garment, Moths shall consume them'. The Servant here proclaims his supreme confidence in Yahweh and in the justice of his cause. He provokes his adversaries to a legal contest before Yahweh who will decide in his favour.

k 10-11 are a comment on the Song of uncertain origin commending obedience to Yahweh and his Servant. 10. Read let him hear for 'that heareth' and he who walks for 'that hath walked'. 11. Those in darkness must seek light from Yahweh, not from the flames of their own kindling. My hand is the hand of Yahweh. This indicates the punishment of disobedience: In pain shall you lie down.

l LI 1-16 Yahweh encourages the Faithful of Israel—The prophecy is a dialogue between Yahweh and his faithful followers who need encouragement in their pagan environment. Yahweh's two addresses, 1-8 and 12-14, are connected by the petition of the faithful that he manifest his might on their behalf as in the days of old, 9-10. There are several interpolations: 4-5, 11, 15-16.

m 1-8. 1-2. Let the faithful exiles, preoccupied by the smallness of their numbers, remember their great ancestors to whom Yahweh miraculously gave a nation for their posterity. Abraham is the rock whence they were hewn, Sara the quarry whence they were dug out. 3. Sion will be rebuilt, her waste places will become fertile, her inhabitants will rejoice. 'a place of pleasure': 'Eden', Gen 2:8. 4a. For MT sing. people, nation the versions have plur. in agreement with nations, 4b, peoples, and islands, 5. It is clear that an address to the Gentiles has been interpolated. 6. Though the heavens and the earth with its inhabitants must finally perish Yahweh's salvation and justice will last for ever. 'in like manner': 'like gnats'. 7-8. The faithful are further exhorted not to fear their enemies who shall perish, while Yahweh's salvation and justice are eternal. It may be implied here that those finally saved will live for ever.

n 9-10. Yahweh is asked by the faithful to display his Might as in days of old when he saved his people from the bondage of Egypt. Rahab is Egypt; see note on 27:1. On the interpolated verse 11 see note on 35:10.

o 12-16. 12. The repetition of I in 12 is the answer to the repetition of Was it not thou? in 9-10. 'It is I, even I, who comfort thee' thus begins Yahweh's reply. He admonishes the faithful not to fear man nor forget their Creator nor tremble at the rage of the oppressor whose time is short. 13. 'As he is prepared to destroy, where is the rage of the oppressor?' 14-15a. 'Speedily shall the captive be set free, He shall not go down to the pit of death, Neither shall his bread fail. I am Yahweh thy God'. 15b = Jer 31:35a. 16 cites from 59:21; 49:2; Os 2:25 and strangely assigns as mission to the Servant, Israel: 'to stretch forth the heavens and found the earth and say to Sion: Thou art my people'.

p LI 17-LII 12 The Glad Tidings of Sion's Deliverance—Sion will no longer drink the cup of God's wrath, 17-25. Let us rejoice in Yahweh her Saviour LII 1-6. The glad tidings and the New Exodus, 7-12.

q 17-25. Jerusalem is exhorted to wake up from sleep after draining to the dregs the chalice of intoxication. She has none to help her among the sons she has borne and reared, all exiled or slain. She has lost her possessions by devastation, her inhabitants by famine and the sword. She has seen her sons lying senseless at the street corners like an antelope caught in a net. But now Yahweh tells her that the cup of his wrath, chalice of intoxication, shall be transferred from her hand to that of her oppressors. Prostration under the feet of the victor was an eastern custom; cf. Jos 10:24.

r LII 1-6. Sion is invited to put on festive garments, to rise from the dust of degradation, to loose the fetters of bondage. She was sold into slavery gratis, she will be redeemed gratis. She suffered Egyptian bondage, Assyrian oppression, Babylonian captivity. Yahweh's name is blasphemed as an impotent God. Now therefore will be proclaim his Might by delivering his people.

7-12. A messenger brings to Sion the tidings of salvation saying 'Thy God is king', foreign domination is ended. Sion's watchmen rejoice to see Yahweh's return to his repudiated spouse. The ruins of the city rejoice in the rebuilding of its walls and houses. Yahweh has manifested to all his Might and Salvation. The scene now changes abruptly from Jerusalem to Babylon. Let the exiles free themselves from contamination and undertake the new Exodus, bearing with them their sacred vessels restored by Cyrus. Yahweh, as in the Egyptian Exodus leads the van and protects the rear of the travellers.

LII 13-LIII 12 Passion, Death, and Triumph of the Servant of Yahweh—As the Sion theme of 51:17-52:12 is resumed and developed in 54:1-17 the fourth Song like the others has no connexion with the context. It begins like the first with the words 'Behold! My Servant' and announces his future triumph. It then alludes to the second and third Songs in explaining the cause of his failure and sufferings in his mission to the Jews. Next comes the last scene of the drama, the passion and death of the Servant. Finally the conversion of the Gentiles is announced as the recompense of his vicarious sufferings and sacrificial death. The connexion of all four Songs and the final character of the fourth are clearly manifested.

13-15. 'Behold! My Servant shall prosper, He shall be lifted up (and elevated) and greatly exalted. As many were appalled at him, For his appearance was debased beneath that of man, And his form beneath that of the sons of men, So many nations shall be amazed at him, Kings shall shut their mouths, Because what had not been told them they see, And what they had not heard they perceive'. The future triumph of the Servant is first announced and then contrasted with his previous degradation. The contrast moreover is between persons as well as periods. Nations and kings clearly indicate the Gentiles. The many who were appalled are the Jews among whom the Servant lived and suffered. 13. And elevated, not in LXX and metrically superfluous, should probably be omitted. 14. MT 'at thee' after 'appalled' must be read at him. 15. Shall be amazed (LXX) is a good parallel to were appalled. MT reads: He shall sprinkle (many nations). This spoils the parallelism and 'sprinkle' alone can hardly mean 'purify'.

LIII 1-3. 'Who believed what we heard? And the arm of Yahweh—over whom was it manifested? And he grew up before him like a sapling And like a root from an arid soil. No form had he, no majesty that we should regard him, And no appearance that we should delight in him. Despised was he and forsaken of men, A man of sorrows and familiar with sickness, And as one from whom men avert their gaze, He was despised and we esteemed him not'. 1. Who are the 'we' who esteemed him not, the speakers in 1-9? Obviously the Jews who were appalled at his degradation, or at least the better element among them who subsequently recognize their error, not the Gentiles who were amazed at his achievement. This conclusion is confirmed by the equivalence of our rebellions in 5 and the rebellion of his people in 8. The Servant and the Jews are clearly distinguished. Cf. citations in Jn 12:38 and Rom 10:16. This is a regretful confession that the Jewish contemporaries of the Servant neither believed the revelations of Yahweh about his Servant nor perceived the manifestations of his Might. 2. Before him means before Yahweh. The sapling and the root echo the sapling from the root of Jesse, 11:1. The suffering Servant is the Messianic monarch. 3. The man of sorrows is described in general terms. Here as elsewhere the details of the prophetic picture are not all to be understood literally. Sickness is not ill-health, but one of the chastisements of sin. The Servant bore our sicknesses, the chastisement of our sins.

4-6. 'Yet ours were the sicknesses which he bore, Ours the pains with which he was laden. Though we accounted him stricken, Smitten by God and humiliated, Yet he was pierced through for our rebellions, Crushed for our iniquities; Chastisement which made us whole was inflicted upon him, And in his stripes was our healing. We all like sheep strayed, We 446d turned each his own way, And Yahweh laid on him the iniquity of us all'. The doctrine of vicarious expiation, not found elsewhere in the OT but taught by Christ and his Evangelists and especially by St Paul, is the great novelty of this prophecy. 4. 'Stricken' is a general term and does not imply leprosy (Vg). 5. The Servant was crushed by weight of blows. šālôm means peace (Vg) but also soundness, well-being, a better parallel to healing.

6 7-9. 'He was harshly treated but humbled himself, And opened not his mouth. Like a sheep led to the slaughter, And like a ewe before her shearers, He was dumb and opened not his mouth. After arrest and sentence he was taken off, And on his fate who reflected? Yea, he was cut off from the land of the living, For the rebellion of his people stricken to death. And they made his grave with the wicked, And with the rich man his sepulchre; Although he had done no violence, Nor was any deceit in his mouth'. 7. In his Passion above all the Servant showed himself 'meek and humble of heart'. 8. The rendering arrest is deduced from the verbal sense of ōser which usually means 'oppression'. An alternative rendering is 'by an oppressive [or, unjust] judgement'. A third possible rendering, 'without oppression or judgement', is excluded by the context, for a criminal's grave implies a judicial sentence and execution. The Heb. dôr usually means 'generation' in the sense of life-time or contemporaries, but cannot indicate the act of generating, the eternal or temporal generation of Christ. Driver's rendering fate, adopted here, is deduced from the radical sense of the word, but is not found elsewhere. To death for MT 'to them' is based on LXX and parallelism. His people for 'my people' (MT) exemplifies the frequent interchange of w and y in Aramaic script. In the pre-Masoretic MS of Isaias these letters are practically identical in form. 9. His sepulchre for the impossible 'in his deaths' is suggested by the parallelism. Usually rich man is similarly changed to evil-doers, but this detail of Christ's Passion may have been revealed. 9b predicts Christ's sinlessness, 1 Pet 2:22.

f 10-12. 'Yet Yahweh was pleased to crush him with sickness; Truly he gave himself as a guilt-offering. He shall see seed that prolongs days, And the purpose of Yahweh shall prosper in his hand. After his travail of soul he shall see light; He shall be satisfied with his knowledge. My (righteous) Servant shall make many righteous, And their iniquities he shall bear. Therefore will I assign him the many for his portion, And numberless shall be his spoil, Because he laid bare his soul unto death, And with the rebellious he was numbered; But he bore the sin of many. And for the rebellious he intercedes'. 10. By reading 'emeš šām for 'im tāšim we preserve the parallelism of verse members. The correction 'im yāšim ('if he give') suggested by Vg leaves the first member without a parallel. Guilt-offering implies that the Servant's death is sacrificial and expiatory. Seed is understood figuratively as frequently in the OT—a spiritual progeny. 11. 'See light' means 'live'. Light, not in MT, is from LXX. The pre-Masoretic MS of Isaias has 'ôr 'light' after 'see' where an object is expected. The resurrection was not part of Jewish belief at this period, but the resurrection of the Messiah is insinuated in Ps 15:10. Righteous before 'Servant' is probably due to dittography. 12. Both raḥ and 'āšum can mean 'many' or 'mighty', but raḥ means 'many' four times elsewhere in this Song. Rabbim is apparently a technical term in language relating to substitution when the one is contrasted with the many. Cf. Dan 11:33; 12:3; Mt 26:28; Mk 10:45; Rom 5:19. For persons as spoil cf. Gen 14:21. The reward of a portion among the mighty would be unworthy of the Servant. Christ was numbered with the wicked, Lk 22:37. The change of tense from 'bore' (perf.) to 'intercedes' (imperf.) may have no significance but more probably indicates Christ's perpetual intercession, Heb 7:25.

g The Prophet's Message—This prophecy is unique among the oracles of the OT. Its Messianism is entirely spiritual without admixture of national elements. It reveals not merely the fact but the manner of the Redemption. The Redeemer will expiate by his sufferings and death the sins of mankind. The personal character and virtues of the Messiah are depicted more fully than elsewhere. His teaching will be rejected by the Jews but accepted by the Gentiles. Though sent to the Gentiles, he lives and labours, suffers and dies, among his own people. Only after his death will his teaching reach those for whom it is primarily intended. The marvellous realization of this complex picture in the Christ of the NT has won for the artist the title of Evangelist.

LIV 1-17 The New Sion—This prophecy develops the theme of 51:17-52:12 in which the salvation of Sion was announced. It predicts not only the Restoration but the future glory of the New Sion in Messianic times. The disgrace of Sion's unfruitfulness is removed, 1-3. She becomes once more Yahweh's beloved spouse, 4-6. New and eternal alliance between Yahweh and Sion, 7-10; restoration, salvation and security of the New Sion, 11-17.

1-3. Sion is bidden to rejoice in the numerous progeny that Yahweh will give her now that the period of her abandonment is ended. 1. 'bearest': 'barest'. 2. Her tent must be enlarged, its coverings widened, its cords lengthened, its pegs strengthened; for, 3, she must extend her boundaries, conquer foreign nations, rebuild ruined cities.

4-6. The shame of Israel's youth, most probably her subjection to various neighbouring nations in the Judges' period, and the disgrace of her widowhood, the Babylonian exile when Yahweh abandoned her, must now be forgotten, for the Omnipotent Yahweh, her Creator and her Redeemer, has taken back his repudiated spouse. 6b. 'And the wife of one's youth how could one cast her off [lit. that she be cast off!] saith thy God'.

7-10. The separation and reunion of Yahweh and Sion are depicted as a quarrel and reconciliation of husband and wife. Only for a moment, only in a fit of anger, did Yahweh abandon Sion. His reunion with her will be eternal. As he swore to Noe, so he now swears to Sion never again to be angry with her. Yahweh's solemn covenant with Noe was equivalently an oath. 10a. 'Though the mountains shake', etc.

11-17. 11b. The foundations of the New Sion will be of malachite, her walls of sapphire. This is the common interpretation suggested by, 12, the turrets (?) of rubies, gates of crystal and border of precious stones. MT reads: 'I shall lay thy stones in antimony [for mortar] and found [or, build] thee with sapphires'. Suns may be turrets or windows. Border is most probably city-wall. The sapphires would then be the material of the buildings within the city. The description is poetical. The magnificence of the New Sion is spiritual rather than material. 13. Her children will all be Yahweh's disciples, faithful to his teaching and therefore prosperous. 14. By righteousness will she be protected from oppression and from fear. 15. 'If any one assail, it shall be without my will, Whoever assails thee shall fall because of thee'. 17b. 'This is the lot of the servants of Yahweh and their salvation from me saith Yahweh'. Here first in Isaias 'servants' (plur.), not 'servant' (collective sing.), indicates the people of Yahweh.

LV 1-18 Exhortation to accept Salvation—Ch 55 is an epilogue as ch 40 was a prologue to Isaias II. The exiles are finally exhorted by Yahweh to accept the salvation which he offers. Invitation to a new covenant with Yahweh, 1-5. Conversion alone is necessary for Yahweh is omnipotent, 6-11. Last announcement of the new Exodus, 12-13.

1-5. Salvation is here proposed under the figure of food and drink, offered gratis to the hungry and thirsty. 1. 'buy': 'buy corn'. 2. Yahweh alone can satisfy his people. 3. If they accept his offer he will make a new covenant with them and give them the faithful blessings of David, that is, gifts promised to and bestowed on David. 4-5. These gifts are defined as those of Ps 17:44: 'Thou makest me the head of nations, A people whom I knew not serves me'. The very word, David, means 'leader', as we learn from the Mari

h 6-11. 6. The exiles are exhorted to seek Yahweh now when he can be found, to call to him now when he is near. 7. Let sinners abandon their ways and plans and be converted to Yahweh who is rich in mercy and forgiveness. 8. They are then warned against mistrust in Yahweh, whose ways and plans are very different from and, 9, far superior to man's ways and plans, and, 10-11, whose word is all powerful to execute what he announces. The word is compared to the rain and the snow sent down from heaven and accomplishing their mission of making the earth fruitful and providing food for man.

i 12-13. 12. The Exodus from Babylon will be joyous and peaceful. Let all nature rejoice in it. 13. Let thorn-bushes become cypresses and nettles myrtles. The prophet does not intend these statements literally. Personifications of natural objects are figurative. 13b. 'And it [the new Exodus] will be to the glory of Yahweh, an eternal memorial that will never be destroyed', because by it Yahweh's Omnipotence will be marvellously manifested to Jews and Gentiles.

448a LVI 1-LXVI 24 Consolation for the Mourners in Sion

—In 55:11-12 Babylonian exiles, in 56:1-8 Palestinian residents are addressed. This change in situation alone explains the different character of the prophecies in Isaias III. The exiles were assured that salvation was at hand, that sins were expiated and forgiven; the residents complain that salvation is delayed and are told that their sins are the obstacle to its attainment. Salvation, however, in the first case was deliverance from Babylonian captivity and exile, in the second the peace and prosperity of the Messianic age. The exiles on their return found large parts of Judah occupied by foreigners from neighbouring regions especially Edomites. These had introduced strange gods and idolatrous cults. The Jews who had remained in the land would for the most part have abandoned Yahweh or contaminated his worship by heathen practices. Material conditions were equally bad. The land was untilled, the houses in ruins, the neighbours hostile. It is not surprising that the religious spirit of the returned exiles was damped by the difficulties and dangers which surrounded and almost overwhelmed them. The prophecies of Isaias III, partly consolatory, partly admonitory, most probably belong to the dark period of the early Restoration 538-520 B.C. Difficulties about, and obstacles to salvation are first discussed, 56:1-59:20 + 63:1-6. Sion's future glory is depicted, 60-62. Yahweh's help is fervently invoked, 63:7-64:11. Final judgement and Sion's salvation make a fitting conclusion, 65-66.

b LVI 1-8 Consolation for Aliens and Eunuchs—Aliens were non-Israelites residing in Palestine. They could become Israelites by adoption. The Deuteronomic legislation excluded all Canaanites from this privilege, conceded to Egyptians and Edomites after three, to Moabites and Ammonites after ten generations, Deut 23:2-8. Eunuchs were excluded from the community of Yahweh, Deut 23:1. These barriers are now removed, for salvation is universal. My house, says Yahweh, shall be called a house of prayer for all peoples. Righteousness and obedience to Yahweh's commands are the sole requirements for admission. The final oracle of Yahweh: Others will I gather with those already gathered, implies the existence of a nucleus of returned exiles in Judah at this period.

c 1. Judgement and justice are necessary for salvation. 2. Sabbath observance became particularly important in the exilic period when sacrifices and temple ritual ceased. 3. The eunuch, compared to a dry tree, will receive, 4, for his fidelity, 5, a better reward than offspring. 7. The holy mount to which the aliens shall be brought is Sion where Yahweh is worshipped. The references to temple and altar are in the future and do not affect the date.

LVI 9-LVII 13 Denunciation of the Leaders and People of Israel—The Israelites addressed in this prophecy have been variously adjudged to be pre-exilic, exilic and post-exilic. The exiles are excluded by the character of the land, 57:5-7, whose valleys, projecting rocks and mountains indicate Judah rather than Babylonia, and by the reference to the surrounding nations coming to devour it, 56:9. The iniquities denounced were committed certainly in the pre-exilic and perhaps also in the early post-exilic period. The earlier date is favoured by the contents, the later by the context. A pre-exilic oracle is neither expected nor elsewhere suspected in Isaias III. The prophecy may be divided into: the iniquity of the leaders, 9-12, the fate of the just, 1-2, and the sins of the people, 3-13.

9-12. Through the sins of her leaders Israel is not protected from her enemies figured as wild beasts coming to devour her. The leaders are called watchmen (usually prophets). They are blind and unintelligent, dumb dogs unable to bark, dreamers who lie down and love to sleep. These dogs are greedy, never satisfied, shepherds without intelligence, seeking their own gain, absorbed in feasting and carousing.

LVII 1-2. 1. The death of the righteous and the pious man should be noticed. God saves him by a peaceful death from imminent calamity, the chastisement of sin. 'because': 'and'. 2 (slightly corrected): 'He enters (his tomb) in peace. They rest in their beds who walk straight-forwardly'.

3-13. The people are now addressed. 3. They are children of a sorceress, brood of an adulteress, because their ancestors practised sorcery and adored false gods. 5. They themselves worship Baal and Astarte in the woods, Moloch in the valleys. Unchaste practices were associated with the former cult, human sacrifices with the latter. The only site of Moloch worship known to us was in the Hinnom valley. 'who seek your comfort in idols': 'Ye that lust among the terebinths'. 'high rocks': 'projections of the rocks'. 6. 'parts of the torrent': 'smooth ones of the valley', probably idols according to the context. The change from 'you' to 'thou' is common and has no special significance. 7. Worship in the high places is denounced. 8a. The memorial set up behind door and door-post was some idolatrous emblem. 8b-c. Israel's infidelity to Yahweh is assimilated to adultery. 'discovered': 'uncovered'; 'near me': 'away from me'. 9. She worshipped not only Moloch in the Hinnom valley but gods who were far away and gods of the underworld. 'wast debased': 'didst go down'. 10. Her persistency in her evil ways is described. 'I will rest': 'all in vain'; 'asked': 'grown weak'. 'Life of thy hand' seems to mean fresh strength. 11. Whom did Israel fear so that she forgot Yahweh and did not fear him? The answer is obvious. She feared her oppressors and worshipped their gods. 12. Yahweh will now expose her heathen righteousness and unprofitable works. 13. Her idols will not save her or themselves. Only those who trust in Yahweh will possess the land, attain salvation. The last three verses reveal the source of Israel's infidelities and indicate trust in Yahweh as the sole means of salvation. It is not implied that all the Israelites addressed were idolaters.

14-21 Consolation for the Contrite and the Humble—

14. The call to prepare the way is addressed, 40:3, to the Babylonian and, 62:10, to the Diaspora exiles. That the call here is to the latter seems to follow from 19b: 'Peace, peace to him that is far away [the exile] and to him that is near' [the resident]. Jerusalem is apparently the central point from which the distances are reckoned and the proclamation is made. 15. Yahweh's titles: High, Exalted, Enthroned for ever, Holy, differ

448l from those in Isaiah II. 'Though he dwells in the height and is holy [exalted above man] he is (nevertheless) with the contrite and humble of spirit to enliven the spirit of the humble and to enliven the heart of the contrite'. 16. His wrath is not eternal. 'For the life-spirit would faint before me and the life-breaths which I have made'. 17. Man's sin provoked God's anger at which man rebelled. For 'covetousness', unexpected here, read 'for a short time', qualifying God's anger. 18. Yahweh has seen man's evil ways and will now heal him, guide him, console him. 19. 'To his mourners I shall produce fruit of the lips', joy and thanksgiving. Peace and healing to all except, 20 l., the wicked who like a troubled sea cannot rest.

449a LVIII 1-LIX 15a Denunciation of the Sins of Israel—The prophet addresses an established community having its own administration of justice. There is no indication of temple cult nor have walls and ruined dwellings yet been rebuilt, 58:12. Preoccupation about the observation of fast days suggests a situation like that indicated in Zach 7:3, where justice and charity are enjoined as more pleasing to God than fasting. The prophecy thus belongs to the early post-exilic period. Not fasting but justice and charity will bring salvation, 58:1-14. Injustice and oppression are the obstacles, 59:1-15a.

b 1-3a. The prophet is ordered to announce the sins of the community who ask Yahweh daily why salvation is delayed and like a righteous people call on him for just judgements and help and complain that he disregards their fasting. The four fast days specially instituted to commemorate the fall of Jerusalem are apparently meant; cf. Zach 7:3 ff.; 8:19.

c 3b-7. 2b-4. The prophet replies that their fasting is disregarded because accompanied by trafficking and slave driving (or exaction of debts), by quarrels and strife. 'You do not fast so far in such a manner that your cry reaches to heaven'. 5. 'Is it thus the fast of my choice, A day in which a man afflicts himself? If a man bows his head like a reed And makes his bed in sackcloth and ashes, Do you call the like a fast And a day of good-pleasure to Yahweh?'

6-7. The fast which Yahweh desires is repentance, avoidance of injustice, works of charity. 'bundles that oppress': 'shackles of perversity'; 'burden': 'yoke'; 'despise': 'hide thyself from'. 'Thy own flesh' is thy neighbour. Fasting is not condemned but the far greater importance of repentance, justice and charity is emphasized.

d 8-12. 8. The fast desired by Yahweh will bring salvation, compared to the light which dispels the darkness of misery and the new flesh which grows on an old wound. 'justice': 'salvation'. 9. Negative conditions of salvation are first mentioned, then, 10, positive. 'chain': 'oppression' (lit. yoke). To stretch out the finger means to do evil deeds. 11. Fulfilment of these conditions will assure Yahweh's constant guidance and, 12, the rebuilding of the ruins of Judah. 11a. 'Yahweh will guide thee continually, And will satisfy thy desire [for water] in the dryland, And will strengthen thy bones'. The antiquity of the ruins is relative, 587 B.C. 12. 'rest': 'habitation'.

e 13-14. 13. Sabbath observance is also a condition of salvation. The Sabbath is here spoken of as in 56:1-8. 'If thou turn away thy feet from the Sabbath [no longer trample on, i.e. profane, it] and cease [LXX, not in MT] to do thy business on my holy day'. 14. The reward of Sabbath observance will be delight in Yahweh, the Saviour, and full possession of the promised land. 'lift thee up above': 'make thee ride over', give thee. The returned exiles only possessed a relatively small part of Palestine.

f LIX 1-3. It is not because Yahweh lacks might or is deaf to prayer that salvation is delayed. The sins of Israel have put a barrier between the people and their God. It is vain to stretch out blood-stained hands to Yahweh or pray to him with lying lips.

g 4-8. The prophet now proclaims aloud the sins of Israel. Violence and injustice of various kinds are denounced. The law-courts are corrupt. Nobody sues in righteousness or pleads in truth. The wicked designs conceived and the evil deeds brought forth suggest the figures of adders' eggs and spiders' webs, which illustrate the unprofitableness of injustice, for the eggs are poisonous and the webs cannot be made into garments. Their hands execute deeds of violence and their feet hasten to shed blood. They plan mischief and destruction. They follow crooked paths, not the ways of peace and rectitude.

9-11. It is because of these sins of the people that judgement is not established and salvation is delayed. Light has not yet come. They resemble the blind feeling their way in the dark. 10b. 'We stumble at mid-day as by twilight. In health we resemble the dead'. 11. The complaints and longings of the people are likened to the groans of bears and the sighs of doves.

12-15a. 12. The prophet speaks as representing the people and makes a public confession of their many sins which bear witness against them. 13. The sins are declared in less detail than previously: unfaithfulness to Yahweh, deceitfulness to the neighbour, 14, lack of judgement and justice, of truth and sincerity. 15a. The conclusion seems to mean that practice of virtue and avoidance of evil have alike disappeared.

LIX 15b-20 + LXIII 1-6 Yahweh's Judgement on the Gentiles and especially on Edom—The removal of oppression is an essential requisite for the attainment of salvation and is coupled with it in 59:9. Yahweh's judgement on the Gentiles has for its object to secure Israel from oppression. There is no connexion however between the absence of rectitude in Israel, 59:1-15a, and the judgement of the Gentiles. Hence 59:15b introduces a new theme. The judgement on Edom in particular is part of the judgement on the Gentiles and thus 63:1-6 continues the theme of 59:15b-20. It would seem therefore that the Sion prophecies, chh 60-2, which have a unity of their own, according to most commentators, were inserted in the middle of a prophecy like some of the Servant songs. Yahweh is represented as a warrior before the battle, 59:15b-20, as a vintager after the battle, 63:1-6. In both passages he fights alone on behalf of righteousness to take vengeance on his enemies and redeem Israel. Another indication of interconnexion is the almost literal reproduction of 59:16 in 63:5.

LIX 15b-20. 15b. Yahweh saw that there was no justice for Israel oppressed by the Gentiles. 16a. 'And he saw that none was there And was astonished that none intervened', not to oppose himself (DV), but on behalf of Israel. His support was in his own Might and Justice. Cyrus, whom the exiles knew as Yahweh's instrument, did not aid them after their return. 17. Yahweh's armour comprises the breastplate of justice, the helmet of salvation, the tunic (MT 'garb') of vengeance and the mantle of zeal. Note the parallelism, vengeance in the cause of justice and zeal for the salvation of Israel, and cf. the adaptations in Wis 5:17-20 and Eph 6:14-17. 18. 'According to their deserts so will he repay, Wrath to his adversaries, requital to his enemies'. 19. West and east mean everywhere. Vengeance is likened to a pent-up stream driven on by Yahweh's breath. 20. To Sion alone Yahweh comes as deliverer. 21 is usually regarded as a later prosaic addition. It interrupts the sequence of thought and re-echoes passages in Deutero-Isaiah; cf. 42:1; 51:16.

LXIII 1-6. A victorious warrior advances from Edom whose garments are red with blood and who proclaims himself speaker of righteousness, mighty to save. Edom was the chief usurper of the land of Judah during the exile and was a bitter enemy of the returned exiles. She represents Israel's Gentile oppressors after the fall of Babylon here and ch 34. We first learn whence the warrior comes. 2. To the query why his garments are red he replies, 3, that he has, unaided, crushed his enemies like grapes in the wine-press and so stained his garments. 4. For the time of Yahweh's vengeance on sinners and of Israel's deliverance from oppression has come. 5-6. Yahweh alone is the conqueror of the Gentiles.

LX 1-LXII 12. The literary unity of these three prophe-440m cies on the future glory of Zion is generally admitted. References to the ruins, city walls and temple as still unbuild assign their date to the exilic or early post-exilic period. Some commentators prefer the former date and regard them as belonging to Isaiah II. Others find indications, admittedly inconclusive, of residence in and tillage of the homeland. Literary allusions to Isaiah II and more particularly to the Servant poems favour the post-exilic date. They suggest that Isaiah II existed in its present form before these prophecies were written. The first, a poetic masterpiece, depicts the glorified Zion as the religious centre of the world. The second is a message of consolation to afflicted Israel. The third expresses the prophet's intense longing for the glorification of Zion. There is no direct connexion between these prophecies and the one which precedes and follows them. The Gentiles are here depicted not as judged or to be judged but as dwelling in darkness and coming to Zion for light. The prophet presents an aspect, not a complete picture, of Messianic times.

450a LX 1-23 Glorified Zion the Religious Centre of the World—Zion illuminated by the glory of Yahweh, 1-2. The Gentiles thronging to Zion, 3-9. Glorious rebuilding of city and temple, 10-14. Riches and well-being of the new Zion, 15-18. Yahweh Zion's eternal light, 19-20. Righteousness, prosperity and fecundity of Zion's citizens, 21-22.

b 1-2. 'Arise, be enlightened, for thy light is come, And the glory of Yahweh shines upon thee; For, behold, darkness covers the earth And gloom the peoples, But upon thee Yahweh shines And over thee his glory appears'. Light indicates knowledge and well-being; darkness, on the contrary, ignorance and misery. Zion enlightened by Yahweh is the centre and source of religious knowledge and salvation.

c 3-9. 'And the nations shall walk to thy light And kings to the brightness of thy shining. Lift up thine eyes round about and see, They are all assembled, they come to thee; Thy sons come from afar And thy daughters are borne on the hip. Then shalt thou see and be radiant, Thy heart shall throb and expand, For the wealth of the sea shall be turned to thee, And the riches of nations shall come to thee. A multitude of camels shall spread over thee, Young camels of Madian and of Ephah. From Sheba they all come, Gold and frankincense they bring And the praises of Yahweh they announce. All the flocks of Kedar are gathered to thee, The rams of Nebayoth are at thy service, They come up with acceptance on my altar, Yea, the house of my glory will I glorify. Who are these that fly like a cloud, Like doves to their coes? Yea, to me the isles are gathered And the ships of Tarshish lead the van; To bring thy children from afar, Their silver and gold with them, For the name of Yahweh, thy God, For the Holy One of Israel, thy glorifier'. The Gentiles recognize the religious leadership of Zion and consequently bring back with honour the Jews of the Diaspora to their homeland and also bring their most precious possessions to acknowledge by gifts their debt to Zion and the glory which she has received from Yahweh. Various Arab peoples dwelling east and south-east of Palestine and particularly the rich merchants of Sheba in south Arabia are first mentioned. Bedouin have only flocks to offer. Then the western lands in and about the Mediterranean, led by Tarshish at the mouth of the Guadalquivir, appear like a cloud in the distance bringing exiles and rich gifts. It is Yahweh who has made Zion the recipient of this homage.

d 10-14. 'And strangers shall build thy walls And their kings shall minister to thee, For though in my wrath I smote thee Yet in my mercy I had compassion on thee. And thy gates shall be always open, Day and night they shall not be shut, To admit to thee the wealth of nations, Under the leadership of thy kings. (For the nation or kingdom that will not serve thee shall perish and the nations shall be utterly devastated.) The glory of Lebanon shall come to thee, The cypress and the elm and the box-tree together, To adorn the place of my sanctuary, And the place of my feet will I glorify. And the sons of thy oppressors shall come to thee bowed down, And they that reviled thee shall prostrate themselves at the soles of thy feet; And they shall call thee "City of Yahweh", "Zion of the Holy One of Israel"'. Foreigners willingly offer their services and resources for the rebuilding of the city walls and the temple. There is no mention of the altar erected immediately after the return. 11b. As these services are voluntary it follows that the kings are conducting the convoys, not being led prisoners, and that the prosaic 12 is a gloss. 13a. The trees of Lebanon, borrowed from 41:19, are variously identified.

15-18. 'Instead of being an abandoned (bride), A hated (city) with none passing through, I shall make thee glorious for ever, A joy from generation to generation; Thou shalt suck the milk of nations, Thou shalt suck the breasts of kings, And thou shalt know that I am Yahweh, Thy Saviour And thy Redeemer, the Strong One of Israel. Instead of bronze I shall bring gold, And instead of iron I shall bring silver. And instead of wood bronze and instead of stone iron. And I will make Peace thy prince And Righteousness thy ruler. No more shall violence be heard of in thy land, Devastation and destruction within thy borders, But Salvation shalt thou call thy walls, And Praise thy gates'. The figures of bride, 15, and infant, 16, are lost sight of in the description. Note that 16a is an echo of 49:23a and 16b a literal citation of 49:26b. Some consider 17b (bronze for wood and iron for stone) an interpolation. Prosperity shall abound, Peace and Righteousness shall reign in the new Zion for ever. It is to praise Yahweh that strangers will pass through her ever open gates.

19-20. 'No more shall the sun be to thee light by day, Nor the moon with its gleam give thee light by night, But Yahweh shall be to thee an eternal light And thy God shall be thy adornment. No more shall thy sun set, Nor thy moon disappear, For Yahweh shall be to thee an eternal light And the days of thy mourning are ended'. 19. The pre-Masoretic MS and LXX have by night, not in MT. As light gives comfort and happiness its appearance marks the end of mourning. The sun and moon become seven times more brilliant in Messianic times, 30:26. Apocalyptic descriptions are not always intended literally. The truth conveyed here is that God is at once the source and the guarantee of the eternal happiness of the blessed; cf. the heavenly Jerusalem, Apoc 21:23.

21-22. 'Thy people shall all be righteous, For ever shall they possess the land, The shoot of my planting, The work of my hands for my glorification. The least shall become a clan And the smallest a mighty nation. I Yahweh will quickly bring it to pass in due time'. The land is Canaan, promised by God to Israel. The returned exiles were preoccupied by the smallness of their numbers. Marvellous fecundity in God's own time is promised them. The prophecy, in its literal application to Israel as a nation, was conditional and depended on their acceptance of the promised Messias.

LXI 1-11 Consolation for Zion's Mourners—The Prophet announces his mission of consolation, 1-3, describes the future glory of Zion, 4-9, and exults in the happiness to come, 10-11.

1-3. The announcement contains echoes of the Servant songs. Some have considered the passage (cited as Messianic in Lk 4:17-19) a Servant song. But it is the prophet who speaks. He is not the Messias but a type of the Messias, announcer of good tidings to the afflicted. 1. 'Anointed' means 'dedicated'. 2. The acceptable year of the Lord is an allusion to the Sabbatic year and the Jubilee year in which slaves were liberated. The day of vengeance is the day of judgement on the Gentiles to end oppression. 3. 'appoint': 'give joy'; 'crown': 'adornment'; 'spirit of grief': 'despondency'; 'mighty ones': 'terebinths'.

4-9. Ancient ruins shall be rebuilt (cf. 58:12) with the aid of strangers, 60:10, who shall also be shepherds, ploughmen and vinedressers, that the people of Israel may be devoted entirely to the service of Yahweh. They shall be enriched with the wealth of the Gentiles and as their shame was doubled (cf. 40:2b) so shall their reward be doubled. Yahweh will make with them an eternal covenant and all shall recognize them as the people whom he has blessed. 6. 'pride yourselves': 'array yourselves'. 7a. 'Instead of their shame which was

k 10-11. The prophet expresses his jubilation in salvation, conceived as already attained, by a lyrical outburst. In 10 at least he represents the community, clad in the garments of salvation and the mantle of righteousness, compared to the turban of the bridegroom and the wedding dress of the bride. The joy of salvation is the joy of the wedding day. As surely as the earth brings forth its fruits so surely shall Yahweh produce in Israel the fruits of righteousness and renown.

l LXIII 1-12 Longing for the New Sion—In his ardent desire for Sion's glorification the prophet cannot refrain from repeating his announcement. He describes the glory of the New Sion, 1-5, appoints watchers to remind Yahweh of his promise, 6-7, confirmed by oath, 8-9, predicts the return of the Diaspora, 10-12.

m 1-5. 1. The prophet cannot be silent until he sees his predictions fulfilled. Vg personifies justice and salvation. 2. Sion's glory will be admired by all nations and celebrated by new God-given names. As names express nature and attributes, new names are needed to describe the new Sion. 3. She shall be a beautiful crown, a royal diadem in God's hand. So Samaria is the proud crown of Ephraim, 28:1, and the city outline is inscribed on Yahweh's hand, 49:16. 4. No longer shall she be called 'Forsaken' and 'Desolate' but 'My delight in her' and 'Espoused'. These are not the God-given names, but indications of Sion's altered state. 5. Yahweh will delight in Sion as the bridegroom in his bride; cf. 54:6.

n 6-7. Watchers are appointed by the prophet over the walls of Sion to remind Yahweh incessantly of his promise to rebuild them. Here as in 21:6 ff. the watchers are a literary device and therefore undetermined. Sion is still unestablished, 7, and at least incompletely walled.

o 8-9. Yahweh has sworn that there shall be no oppression in the new Sion and that his people shall enjoy without molestation the harvests which they have planted. The tillage is done by foreigners, 61:5, who serve the Jewish landowners. The mention of the courts of the sanctuary is proleptic.

p 10-12. The first two verses combine several citations from Isaiah II. The way to be prepared might be a sanctuary way in Palestine or a way home from exile. The gates however are more probably those of the centre of interest, Sion, than of unmentioned Babylon. It is therefore the returned exiles who are exhorted to prepare a via sacra for the Diaspora Jews. The names in 12 indicate the holiness, happiness and glory of the new Sion.

451a LXIII 7-LXIV 11 Appeal to Yahweh from his Afflicted People—This appeal was composed after the ruin of the temple in 587 B.C. and before its reconstruction 520-515. It belongs to the early post-exilic period. The people are distressed and discouraged, conscious of sin and not expectant of proximate deliverance. Yahweh is praised for his mighty deeds in the past, 65:7-14, and appealed to for aid as the Father of his people, 15-19, and the God of Miracles, 64:1-5a. Confession of sins follows, 5b-7, and renewed appeal to God and Father, 8-11.

b LXIII 7-14. The prophet praises Yahweh in the name of the people. 8. Yahweh chose them as his people and expected obedience from them. 8b-9a. 'He became their saviour in all their affliction. Not a messenger nor an angel but he himself delivered them'; cf. Ex 33 where Yahweh proposes an angel as leader, but eventually leads himself. 'His face' means his presence, himself. On 'carried' cf. Deut 32:11. 10-11. 'the spirit of his Holy One': 'his holy spirit'. Frequently in the OT God is conceived as operating by his spirit and as imparting his spirit to man to increase man's strength. The rebellions of Israel in the past and their punishment are commemorated. 11. 'They [MT 'he'] remembered the days of old, Moses his servant [MT 'people']

451b Where is he who brought up from the sea the shepherd of his flock? Where is he who put within him his holy spirit? God's Might (lit. arm) guided Moses and divided the waters of the Red Sea. In 13b-14 the Exodus is further commemorated.

c 15-19. Yahweh is now called upon to manifest his mercy as in the days of old, to glorify his name by saving his people. 15b. 'multitude': 'commotion'. Commotion of bowels is compassion. 15c. 'Restrain not thy mercies'. God is their father. 16. He alone, not their earthly fathers, Abraham and Israel, can save them. 17. He is regarded as author of what he could have prevented but did not prevent, error and hardness of heart. He is asked to turn or return, show himself gracious and merciful. 18 (slightly corrected): 'Why did the wicked possess thy holy mountain and our enemies trample on thy sanctuary?' 19. Yahweh seems to have abandoned them. 'We are become as a people over whom thou didst never rule'.

LXIV 1-5a. Yahweh is now appealed to as a wonder-worker to descend in a theophany and save Israel from her enemies. 2a. 'As when fire kindles brushwood, as when fire makes water boil'. Fire, in particular lightning, accompanies a theophany. 3-4 (omitting the repetition of 1b): 'Shouldst thou do terrible things which we did not expect, which have not been heard of from of old. Nor ear has heard, nor eye has seen a God besides thee who workest for those who hope in thee'. The work is redemption; cf. 1 Cor 2:9. 5a. Thou carest for the just who remember thy ways.

d 5b-7. 5b. 'Behold thou wert angry and we sinned. Thou didst murmur at our iniquity, and we did evil'. When Yahweh punished them, instead of repenting they continued to sin. Sin takes away a people's strength, makes them like faded leaves before the wind. As past sins are confessed the tenses are past.

e 8-11. 8. The stressing of the fatherhood of God foreshadows the 'Our Father' of the Gospel. 10. 'the city of thy sanctuary': 'thy holy cities'. 11. Other cities besides Jerusalem are in ruins and the magnificent temple is reduced to ashes. Divine aid is urgently implored.

f LXV 1-LXVI 24. These two chapters are closely related in style and subject-matter and form a fitting conclusion to the whole book. Two classes of Israelites are distinguished, the rebellious who shall perish in the final judgement and the faithful who shall enjoy the Messianic blessings. The purification of Israel and the salvation of a remnant predicted in the prophet's inauguration, ch 6, shall thus be accomplished. The prose passage, 66:18-24, describes Sion as religious centre of the world and predicts universal worship of Yahweh.

g LXV 1-25 Final Purification of Israel: Chastisement and Reward—Yahweh threatens the rebels with chastisement, 1-7, promises the Messianic kingdom to the faithful, 8-10. Contrast of the doom of the rebels with the lot of the faithful, 11-16. Happiness of the elect, 17-25.

h 1-7. These threats against the wicked cannot be a reply to the humble petition which precedes and are moreover contrasted with the promises subsequently made to the good, 8-10. They begin therefore a new prophecy.

i 1a. 'I was accessible to them that asked me not, I was available to them that sought me not'. The rebellious Jews neither asked nor sought Yahweh always ready to help them. St Paul abandons the literal sense when he applies this text to the Gentiles, Rom 10:20. 3b. They are accused of sacrificing in gardens, offering incense on bricks, evidently to false gods, 4a, frequenting graves and holes, practising necromancy, 4b, eating swine's flesh and other unclean meats, 5a, saying: 'Stand off, touch me not lest I sanctify thee' (apparently practising mystic rites which made them taboo to the uninitiated). 5b-6. These outrages provoke Yahweh's anger and cry out for retribution. 'Bosom' means 'receptacle'. Not only the sins of the rebels but those of their ancestors will be punished.

451j 8-10. The Messianic remnant is here represented as a few good grapes (DV 'grain') in a cluster, not cast aside with the others because there is a blessing in them. These are Yahweh's servants. They shall possess his mountains, that is all Palestine. Sharon, 10, may be a corruption of Yeshimōn, a desert west of the Dead Sea.

k 11-16. 11-12. The rebellious who forsook Yahweh and worshipped Gad and Meni will be slain. Gad is the god of good fortune. Meni is probably identical with the Arabian goddess, Manat, and may be the consort of Gad. 'upon it', 11: 'to Meni'; 'will number', 12: 'destine'. 13-14. The lots of the faithful and the rebellious are contrasted. In 15 'The Lord God shall slay thee' is probably a gloss. Names are used in imprecations when a person or nation becomes a marsh, byword or type of misfortune. Hence Israel's old name must be replaced by a new one. 16. In blessings and in oaths only the true God will be invoked. MT reads God of Amen (fidelity), LXX God of Truth.

i 17-25. 17. The New Heaven and the New Earth indicate a transformation of the universe in which wickedness and oppression will be replaced by righteousness and happiness. Past evils shall be forgotten. 18. All shall rejoice and, 19, none shall weep. 20. There shall be no sickness, no premature death. 'Infant of (a few) days' means 'shortlived'. Death of a mere centenarian would then be considered premature like the death of an infant or the sudden death of a sinner. 22. The tree is a figure of longevity. 24. There will be perfect harmony between Yahweh and his people and, 25, peace between man and beast. The Messianic kingdom here depicted is material rather than spiritual. The picture is incomplete.

m LXVI 1-24 Final Judgement and Final Salvation—Oracle on the rebuilding of the temple, 1-4. Judgement a surprise to the rebellious, 5-6, and to the just, 7-9. The happiness of the just, 10-14. Fate of the wicked, 15-17. Sion religious centre of the world, 18-24.

n 1-4. The returned exiles were prevented from rebuilding the temple immediately by lack of resources and the hostility of their neighbours. Yahweh consoles the zealous. He does not require a temple for the heavens are his abode, the earth his footstool. What he requires is obedience to his commands. Cult is not rejected but subordinated to obedience. 2. 'were made' (MT): 'are mine' (LXX). The just are contrasted with the wicked, 3, 'who sacrifice oxen but also slay their fellow-men, who slaughter sheep but also break the necks of dogs, who combine meal-offerings with swine's blood and incense offerings with idol-worship'. Dogs and swine were unclean. Sacrifice without conversion, not sacrifice in general, is vain. Altar of sacrifice without temple indicates an 451n early post-exilic date.

5-6. The just are warned not to heed the mockery of their wicked brethren who deride them saying: 'Let Yahweh glorify himself that we also may see your joy'. The mockers will be confounded by the sudden manifestation of Yahweh their judge thundering in the city and temple (rebuilt before the final judgement). 6. 'Hark to the tumult in the city, hark to the temple, hark to Yahweh dealing retribution to his enemies'.

7-9. 7. The just in the day of salvation are compared to a mother bearing a child without suffering the pangs of childbirth. 8. The land (DV 'earth') is the mother, its inhabitants the child. 9. Yahweh who enables mothers to bear children will not himself be childless.

10-14. 10-11. The prophet is so sure of the future glory of Sion that he invites not only future blessed but present mourners to rejoice with her. 'abundance of her glory': 'breasts of her riches'. 12. The immediate source of Sion's well-being is the riches of the Gentiles who will honour her for Yahweh's sake. 13. Yahweh will be as a mother to his people and 'they [lit. you] shall be comforted in Jerusalem'. 14 (after 'rejoice'): 'and your bones shall sprout like grass'.

15-17. The last judgement is briefly depicted. Yahweh appears in fire and judges by fire. He is also a warrior whose chariots resemble a whirlwind and who slays many with his sword. 16a. Read the whole earth with LXX after 'judge'. 17. The rebellious Jews also 'who sanctified and cleansed themselves for the gardens [where they worshipped false gods] . . . ate swine's flesh and abominations [perhaps creeping things] and mice' shall be consumed.

18-24. This passage is generally regarded as a later addition. It predicts the return to Sion of the Diaspora Jews and the conversion of all nations to Yahweh. Their works and their plans, 18a, shall be consumed, 17c. Omit 'them together with', 18b. Yahweh comes to Jerusalem where the Gentiles assemble to see his glory. 19. He puts a sign on these and sends those who have escaped (the judgement) to the nations: Tharshish (in Spain), Put and Lud (in North Africa), Mesech, Rosh (?), Thubal (in Asia Minor), Yawan (Greece), to make his glory known to them. 20. They bring back the Jews of the Diaspora with rich presents. 21. Some of them are made priests and Levites. 22-23. There will be a new heaven and a new earth for Israel and all flesh will adore Yahweh. 24. The corpses of the apostates will be seen in Gehenna outside Jerusalem where their worm dies not and their fire is not extinguished. This text, in its literal sense, does not teach the eternal punishment of the lost in the next world. Typically, however, it is so interpreted by our Lord, Mk 9:47 f.

JEREMIAS

b Chronological Scheme—In order that the prophecies of Jeremias may be followed intelligently, it seems necessary to rearrange them for the most part in chronological order. The scheme follows the reigns of the kings. The chronology followed is that of the section on the Chronology of the OT.

- Part I Josias : 641/640 B.C. : chh 1-20 except 12:7-13:27; §§ 456-8.
(Joachaz : 609 : nothing)
- Part II Joakim : 609 : chh 26; 22-23; 25; 36; 45; 35; 12:7-13:27; §§ 459-60.
(Joachin : 598 : nothing)
- Part III Sedecias : 598.
(a) warnings : chh 24; 29; 27-28; 51; 59-64; § 461.
(b) promises of restoration : chh 30-33; § 462.
(c) the siege : chh 21; 34; 37-39; § 463.
- Part IV After the fall of Jerusalem in 587 : chh 40-44; § 464.
- Part V Prophecies against the nations : chh 46-51; §§ 465-7.
- Part VI Historical appendix : ch 52; § 468.

453a The Prophet: his Name and Person—The meaning of the name Jeremias is uncertain. He was the son of Helcias (1:1) but it is very improbable that this was the Helcias who discovered the Book of the Law (4 Kg 22:8), for this would almost certainly have been indicated, and there is no hint of the prophet having close relations with the temple authorities. He was a priest (1:1), a native of the priestly city Anathoth (Jos 21:18), the modern Anata, about 2½ m. NE. of Jerusalem, which was also the home of the high-priest Abiathar, from whom he may have been descended.

b His History—Prophecy essentially comprises a revelation and a mission. Jeremias' mission was chiefly to king and people, his revelation was chiefly that of the coming destruction of Jerusalem. He exhorted them not only to repent, but to submit to the overwhelming power of Babylon, with a promise of merciful treatment if they did so, and also in any case of ultimate restoration. The tragedy of his life lay in his not being believed, in the evils coming to pass which he had foretold, in his being treated as a false and disloyal prophet of evil. King Josias he praised (22:15-16) :

against Joakim, who probably meant to kill him (36:26), his language is severe (22:13-19) : the weak Sedecias he tried earnestly to save (38:14-23, etc.).

After the Capture of Jerusalem Nabuchodonosor gave orders that he should be treated well (39:11-12). After the murder of Godolias, the Jew appointed to govern his countrymen under the Babylonians, Jeremias tried to persuade the Jews to remain peacefully in Palestine, but they fled to Egypt, fearing Babylonian reprisals, and forced Jeremias and Baruch to go with them (chh 41-3). The rest of the book is taken up with rebukes and prophecies uttered against the Jews in Egypt and the Gentiles. He was probably stoned to death by the Jews in Egypt. Tertullian (Adversus Gnosticos Scorpiace, ch 8: PL 2, 137) states that he was stoned. St Jerome (Adversus Jovinianum, 2, 37 : PL 23, 335) writes that he was stoned by the people when proclaiming the captivity, an evident slip about the time : on Isaia (PL 24, 342) he writes that Jeremias and Baruch died before Nabuchodonosor invaded Egypt, so that the Jewish tradition that the king took him and Baruch to Babylon probably sprang up later. Our Lord may have had Jeremias in mind when he spoke of Jerusalem stoning those sent to her (Mt 23:37; Lk 13:34).

The Lachish Ostraca—Nothing has here been said of the ostraca (jar-fragments used, after the manner of the time, for letters) found in 1935 at Tell ed-Duweir, about 25 m. between SW. by W. and WSW. of Jerusalem, probably the ancient city of Lachish. They belong to the last days of Sedecias, and may offer some evidence of a movement in favour of surrendering to Babylon, which was what Jeremias preached; there is also mention of a prophet, but with no real clue to his identity. It must be enough here to refer to 'The Prophet' in the Lachish Ostraca, by Prof. D. Winton Thomas (Tyndale Press, 1946), where a bibliography will also be found.

The Prophetic Office of Jeremias : his Sufferings—To appreciate the divine purpose of the message, we must take into account the peculiar character of the messenger, and seldom more than in this case. His was a life of intense suffering, led by one peculiarly sensitive to it. He was naturally emotional and tender-hearted, struck with horror at the fate which it was his duty to proclaim for his beloved city, the chosen city of Yahweh. Often he cries out in pain and bitterness (e.g. 8:18; 9:1). His life was in danger, even from his fellow-townsmen (11:21). Conscious that his cause was the cause of God, he could pray for vengeance upon his enemies, and, with poetic instinct like the psalmist's, picture what their overthrow would be likely to be in actual fact (e.g. 18:21-23); but his prayer did not reach out beyond the grave.

His Faithfulness—At all times he remains true to God; even in his grief he avers that 'thy word was to me a joy and gladness of my heart' (15:16), and the frequent revelations made to him show that he enjoyed a true intimacy with God. This intimacy, indeed, shows itself at times in a strange manner, perhaps due in part to his disturbed frame of mind : sometimes it is not easy to distinguish his own words from those of God. Thus in 4:19-22 it is Jeremias' heart that is troubled, but God who complains that 'my foolish people have not known me'. Other examples are 454b 9:18; 13:20-27; 16:19-21. The prophet also at times makes it difficult to distinguish precisely between himself and his people; e.g. in 10:17-25 it is generally agreed that at least 19-20 must be assigned to Jerusalem (or Judah in general).

c His Divine Commission—Thus far we have been considering the more subjective aspect of the prophet's ministry; we may now look at the more objective side, and analyse the characteristics of his prophecies as such. We begin, as the book of Jeremias itself begins, with his divine commission, only stopping to notice that he seems by a rare privilege to have been sanctified in the womb, like the Baptist. This would mean that he was freed from original sin and received sanctifying grace even before birth. This appears to be the more likely interpretation of 1:5, though Père Condamin (ad loc.) argues that it need only mean 'consecrated for the prophetic office', quoting in support important Catholic authorities. Ecclus 49:9 in LXX and Vg favours this view, but he is mistaken in supposing that the newly discovered Hebrew text of Ecclus necessarily implies it. Such passages as Jer 31:31, and still more Ez 11:19; 18:31 suggest sanctifying grace; but of course there is no strictly systematic theology in the OT.

Neither his mission nor his revelation is limited in any way (1:7): the former was to include not only Judah and Jerusalem and the kings (17:20) and Israel (31:10) but the Gentiles (1:10), special groups of Jews (42:19), and individuals, e.g. Sedecias (37:16).

d His Inspiration—The book of Jeremias is more than a record of history and prophecy; it is also a book of Holy Scripture, written under the divine impulse given to the sacred writer's intellect and will, and with a special providence providing for the writing of it. Such a book need not in whole or part record an antecedent revelation; in the present case much revelation is embodied, and much mere narrative. There is much sheer prediction, though this again is not essential to inspiration or revelation or even to prophecy as such. Nor of course is it necessary that all prophecy should be recorded; evidently much OT prophecy, and much prophecy by Jeremias, has not been recorded. Much exhortation is found here, as in the prophetic books in general, with threats and prophecies.

e His Secretary—It is unlikely that Jeremias wrote his prophecies with his own hand; he is bidden write in 36:2, but actually he dictates to Baruch (36:4, 32). There is also record of his writing in 29:1 and 51:60. It may well be that Jeremias used Baruch as his regular secretary, and this may help to account for the mention of Jeremias in the third person; such an explanation is not really needed, however, for the use of the third person by the prophets is fairly common, perhaps to insist that their words are primarily God's: cf. Is 7:3; Agg 1:13, etc.

f False Prophecies—Some further light is thrown upon the prophetic office of Jeremias and its difficulties from the consideration of the false prophets. He inveighs against them fairly frequently. In 14:14 Yahweh explicitly denies that they have either revelation or mission: cf. 23:16, 32. Most important is the Hananias incident, where also revelation and mission are denied (28:15). In his letter to the captives in Babylon Jeremias attacks the false prophets there also (29:9).

g Prophetic Symbolism—In Jeremias' ministry, as in OT prophecy in general, a conspicuous part is played by symbolism. It may be enough to point to the two symbols of God's impending action shown him at the outset (1:11-14), and to the Hananias incident (27:2-3; 28:10, 13). And the prophet himself may well be reckoned a symbol or type of the suffering Saviour, the Man of Sorrows who likewise wept over Jerusalem (Lk 19:41-44).

455a The Text: its Arrangement—The time of Jeremias' ministry was a time of great turmoil, and he himself was likewise in a great turmoil; and this turmoil is reflected in the text as can be seen at once from the chronological arrangement in § 452b. The fact that there has been no systematic rearrangement is an argument that we have it in its primitive state. The several portions were probably collected soon after the prophet's death, and it is natural to assign the work of redaction to Baruch.

The Septuagint—This seems to represent an alternative arrangement, for it differs considerably from MT, thus giving us a more valuable check upon the text than it usually provides, and also pushing back the date of the original compilation, the ancestor of both texts. The internal evidence also favours an early date: there is a vivid reality alike in the narratives and the discourses which a later inventor is not at all likely to have achieved.

The Authorship—The tradition of authorship, too, is constant. It is not the manner of OT books, or of NT books either, to quote each other explicitly (though NT often quotes OT); but this lends additional force to the explicit appeal in Dan 9:2 and 2 Par 36:21-22 (cf. Esd 1:1) to the prophecy of the return from the Babylonian captivity after seventy years. There is also an implied reference to much in Jeremias in Ecclus 49:8-9. NT references are numerous, and are mentioned in their place; it may be enough here to mention Heb 8:8-12, from 31:31-34.

The Poetry—That much of the text is in poetry is certain; but the precise character and extent of the poetry is a thorny question, which cannot here be pursued at length, any more than that of textual criticism. In general it seems true to say that the set prophetic utterances are in poetry, while the narratives and God's private communications to Jeremias are in prose.

Note. Jeremias often speaks of the 'Chaldaeans' where he means the Babylonians, and sometimes of 'Chaldaea' where he means Babylonia. The Chaldaeans, originally a distinct race from the Babylonians, were at this time, as the result of long encroachment, the ruling caste among them, and thus the prophet applies their name to the fusion of the two races, and to their common country.

Part I Josias King: 641/640-609 B.C.: chh 1-20, except 12:7-13:27. There does not seem to be any solid reason against assigning these chapters to the reign of Josias, who is mentioned in 1:2; 3:6. That much evil already prevailed is clear from this prophecy itself, which is confirmed by 4 Kg 22-23; 2 Par 33-34; but punishment was postponed out of regard for Josias himself; cf. 4 Kg 22:18-20.

I 1-19 The Call of Jeremias—1. For Helcias and Anathoth, see § 453a. 6. His plea that he is a child refers to his lack of skill in speech (cf. Moses in Ex 4:10-16), and 8 betrays a certain shrinking fear. He receives encouragement and a symbolic confirmation of his call, based upon a play on the words. 11. Jeremias sees 'a branch of an almond tree'. 12. God answers, 'I will watch over my word', the word 'watch' being practically the same in Hebrew as 'almond tree'. 13 seems best rendered, 'I see a caldron blown upon', i.e. over a fire blown upon, 'from the north'. 14. God answers, literally, 'from the north shall evil be blown upon all the inhabitants of the land', like a fire being fanned. 'The north' indicates already the Babylonian invasion. With the call of Jeremias compare that of Isaias (Is 6) and Ezechiel (Ez 2). The call came to Jeremias in 628 B.C., the 13th year of Josias (1:2); he thus had forty years of ministry before the city's fall in 587. 'to whomsoever' (with LXX) is a more likely translation. LXX may be right in omitting 'to waste and to destroy' in 10, and 'the land' and 'the priests' in 18; but the omission of 'the priests' may be to avoid disedification, as sometimes elsewhere in the book. 17. 'Be not dismayed at them, lest I dismay thee before them'; cf. Ez 3:18-20.

There is a reference to 1:7-8 and 1 Par 16:35 in 456b Ac 26:17, and to 1:8 (among other OT passages) in Ac 18:9-10.

c II 1-VI 30 The Call to Repentance—The main theme is the faithlessness of Judah, represented as a faithless wife, with invitations to repentance and prophecies of coming doom. Jerusalem, the capital, is prominent, as usual. The years in the desert are represented as the betrothal-time of Yahweh and Israel, when she followed him with love; though we gather from the Pentateuch and some passages in the prophets (e.g. 7:24-25; Ez 20:13) that even then her conduct left much to be desired. His benefits at that time should be remembered.

d 2. 'I have remembered the affection of thy youth'. 3. 'Israel was holy . . . whoever devoured him was held guilty: evils did come'. 7. 'into a fruitful land', though the word is the same as 'Carmel', to which it was especially applied. 8. The 'pastors' or shepherds are the rulers. 'by Baal', a word properly meaning 'owner' or 'lord', but a title commonly applied to the local gods of the Canaanites. It probably has a collective sense here, as in Os 2:8; for the plur. see Jer 2:23; Os 2:13. 'idols', lit. 'things that do not profit'; in the sing. in 11; cf. 16:19. 9. God will 'contend' (the same verb is repeated) against them as though an accuser in court. 10. 'Cethim' (Kittim) is probably derived from Kition, the modern Larnaka in Cyprus, whence the name spread. It may here represent the West generally, and Cedar (a nomad tribe) to E. of Jordan; cf. 49:28; Ps 119:5, etc.) the East. 11. 'their glory' is God himself; cf. Deut 10:21.

e 14-19. The Punishment of Idolatry—Israel was not a slave, purchased or homeborn, that he should otherwise have met with such treatment. 15. The lion was a symbol for Assyria, which had already destroyed the Northern Kingdom (Israel in the narrow sense). 16. Memphis (Heb. Noph or Moph, Egyptian Mennufer) the ancient capital of northern Egypt, not far from Cairo, and Taphnes (Tahpanhes), the modern Defneh (from Gk. Daphnai) at the NE. of the Delta, stand for Egypt: mentioned again in 44:1; 46:14. The translation is uncertain: perhaps, 'shaved the crown of thy head', a shaven head being a disgrace (cf. 47:5; 48:37). 18. 'the troubled water' is really a name of the Nile, Shihor, as in Is 23:3. In Jos 13:3 ('the troubled water') and 1 Par 13:5 ('Sihor') only the easternmost branch is meant. The etymology is uncertain. 'the river' is the river par excellence, the Euphrates. The Hebrews vacillated between Egypt and Assyria 'like a silly dove' (Os 7:11) in the effort to find security, but rather (19) should have looked to Yahweh. 20. The 'high hills' and 'green trees' were the centres of idolatrous worship, represented as adultery against Israel's true husband, Yahweh, and all the more fitly because of the impure practices carried on there. 22. Though she wash herself with 'lye' (washing-soda), and use much 'soap', the stain of sin will remain. 23. 'the valley' is 'the valley of the son of Hinnom'; see on 7:31. In her adulterous desire for the Baalim she has run after them like 'a swift young she-camel entangling her ways', running wildly hither and thither, (24) like a wild she-ass panting with desire: 'in her heat, who shall turn her back?' Her lovers (the Baalim) need not trouble themselves; at her mating time she will herself seek them eagerly. 25. The prophet cries to her: 'Do not run till thy sandals are worn out, and thy throat parched!' But the answer is a despairing refusal to give up the 'strangers', the foreign gods. 26-27. The 'stock' is the wooden pole (the 'Asherah') and 'the stone' is the obelisk or pillar, both representing false gods and called 'father', but they would prove of no avail. 28b is repeated in 11:13a. LXX adds 11:13b here, which Condamin on metrical grounds thinks correct.

g 30. Israel has refused Correction: 'your sword hath devoured your prophets like a destroying lion'. 31. 'O generation that ye are, behold Yahweh's word'. He has not proved to them a mere desert, or 'a land of thick darkness'. 32. For 'stomacher' render perhaps 'sashes'; Yahweh is the true glory of his bride. 33. 'How cleverly thou contrivest to win love! Even the bad women thou hast taught thy ways'. 34. 'And in thy hands is found . . . not in burglary didst thou find them', when it would have been lawful to kill them (Ex 22:2), 'but by every terebinth'. The reference is to the sacrifice of children at the sacred trees; cf. 19:4-5. 36. Israel has cheapened herself 'in changing thy way'; see on 18. 37. 'thy hand shall be upon thy head', a gesture of disappointment and disgrace (cf. 2 Kg 13:19), because 'Yahweh hath rejected those in whom thou didst trust'.

The Faithless Wife—In the Heb. III:1 begins simply with the word 'saying'; it seems most likely that there was a definite reference to Deut 24:1-4, which forbade such a return and is certainly in question. 'many lovers; and wouldst thou return to me? saith Yahweh'. 2. 'Lift up thine eyes to the bare heights' ('bare-heights' is a favourite word of Jeremiah), where she prostituted herself to the Baalim, waiting to court them 'as an Arab' in the wilderness of northern Arabia (cf. 25:24) lies in wait for travellers. 3. The reference to the rains is in the spirit of much of OT, e.g. 5:24. 4. 'Hast thou not but now cried unto me, "My father, thou art the friend of my youth"?' She uses the language of wheedling affection, even while going after other gods. God is often spoken of as the husband of Israel, but also (to give a fuller idea of the relationship) as her father, (e.g. Mal 1:6. 5. 'Will he retain (his anger) for ever', she asks, 'will he keep (it) to the end?' 'Behold, so thou hast spoken', answers Yahweh, 'but thou hast done evil things, and hast had thy way', lit. 'and hast been able', i.e. to carry out thy purposes. 6. Here, as sometimes elsewhere, Israel is distinguished from Judah as the Northern Kingdom (subdued by the Assyrians in 721 B.C.); but it could always be used for the whole people. 'high mountain', etc.: see on 2:20. 9. Judah defiled the land by her reckless readiness for idolatry. 'stones and stocks': see on 2:26-27. 11. Judah had less excuse with temple and liturgy, priests and Levites, kings of the line of David, and the warning example of Israel. 14. The rest of the chapter is an appeal to Judah and Israel together. 'I am your' true Baal: see on 2:8. He will restore them to Sion, but only a 'remnant' (cf. 31:7), one from a city, two of a clan (the large units within the twelve tribes).

16. In the Glory of those Days even the Ark will be forgotten, 'neither shall they miss it, neither shall it be made any more'. 18. 'the land of the north' designates in general the lands to which Assyria took the captives of Israel, and Babylonia those of Judah. 19-20. How is all this possible with such perversity? They must call Yahweh 'father' and be faithful to him (cf. 1 Pet 1:17). 21. But now upon the 'bare heights' (cf. 2), where they had sinned, 'is heard the suppliant weeping' of the Israelites, who are being punished for forgetting their God, but (22) accept his invitation to return. 23. The hills where they sacrificed have proved a delusion, and 'the uproar on the mountains' of their orgies. 24. 'The shameful thing', Baal, has been their curse. 25. 'Let us lie down in our shame, and let our confusion cover us', by reason of our sins.

IV 1. Again comes the Invitation to Repentance: k 'and if thou wilt put away thy detestable things (i.e. idols), and wilt not wander far from me, (2) and wilt swear in truth and judgement and righteousness, "As Yahweh liveth", then shall the nations bless themselves by him', using his name in invoking blessings on themselves, 'and in him shall they glory'.

3. After a preliminary warning not to sow among l thorns, (4) and to circumcise (not only their bodies, but) their hearts (cf. 6:10; 9:28, etc.), the prophet turns to his main theme, the doom of Judah and Jerusalem, though exhortations to a saving repentance never cease. 5. The opening of the invasion produces

456 l a rush to the fortified cities. 6. 'Set up a signpost' to guide the fugitives 'toward Sion: take refuge' from the Babylonian invader, (7) the lion, 'the destroyer of nations': (9) all shall be panic-stricken. 10. 'And they shall say', i.e. especially the false prophets of 14:15, etc., who complain that the prophecies which they claimed to be uttering from Yahweh have not been fulfilled. MT reads 'And I said', but Jeremias would never have spoken thus; the translation follows the Alexandrian MS of LXX 'thou hast deceived'. 11. The invasion is 'a burning wind from the bare heights' (cf. 3:2) in the wilderness in the way to the daughter of my people', a poetical personification for 'my people' simply, used also with names of cities.

m 'not to fan nor to cleanse', because such a sirocco would blow away the grain along with the chaff and straw from the threshing-floor, whereas a gentle breeze would leave the grain behind. The 'fan' was a long wooden fork with five or six prongs, used along with a wooden shovel to throw the mixture of grain, chaff and straw against the wind, thus also 'cleansing' the grain. 12. 'A wind too strong for these things', for such winnowing, 'shall come for me' at my command; 'now will I also myself utter judgements against them'. 13. The horses are swifter than vultures. 15. One messenger brings news of the enemy from Dan in the north; another 'announceth calamity from the hills of Ephraim', only 8-10 miles away. 16. 'Say ye to the nations, publish concerning Jerusalem that besiegers . . . are roaring' like lions (cf. 7). 17. They are putting up improvised shelters round Jerusalem like those of the guardians of cattle in the open country. 18. 'surely it is bitter, surely . . .' 19. 'My bowels, my bowels! Let me writh!' The walls of my heart! My heart moaneth within me' as it batters against them. 20. 'My tents' and 'tent-hangings'; the people's are meant. 26. 'the fruitful land was a wilderness'; see on 2:7. 27. Yahweh himself now speaks, but with the intimation that the destruction is not to be final (cf. 5:10, 18; 12:15; 30:11), which is later (25:11-12; 29:10) developed in the promises of return from the Babylonian exile after seventy years. 28. 'The heavens shall be dark'.

n 30 'thy lovers' (as in 22:20; 30:14) are Egypt and the other nations (cf. 27:3) inclined to side with the Hebrews against the Babylonians, whom Judah therefore was inclined to court. 'though thou enlargeth thine eyes with antimony', blackening the edge of the eyelids above and below in order to increase by contrast the lustre of the eyes and make them look larger. 31. Here instead will be 'the anguish as of her that bringeth forth her first child'. 'daughter of Sion', see on 4:11. 'gasping for breath', and crying with outstretched hands, 'Oh, woe is me, for my soul is fainting because of murderers'.

o V 1. If even one man can be found in Jerusalem that acts justly and makes faithfulness his aim, then will I forgive her (cf. Gen 18). 4. The prophet thought that poverty and ignorance might explain the general wickedness, but (5) found that even the great men had shaken off the yoke of the Lord. 6. The animals are the Babylonians. 7. God himself speaks. 10. 'Go up into her vine-rows and destroy'. Judah is represented as a vineyard; she is not to be quite exterminated (see on 4:27). 12. Israel and Judah even deny that God has spoken; (13) according to them the prophets such as Jeremias 'shall become wind', prove mere windbags. 'So be it to them!' with a gesture expressing destruction. 14. 'you' is Israel and Judah, 'thy' is Jeremias.

p 16. The Babylonians are deadly archers; (17) they shall destroy sons and daughters, but there is no suggestion of cannibalism. 21. cf. Is 6:9-10; Ez 12:2; Mk 8:18, etc. 24. God 'preserveth the appointed weeks of the harvest', seven in number (Deut 16:9), when there was usually no rain (1 Kg 12:16-19). 31. 'the priests bear rule under their control': the people love to have it so'.

q VI 1. 'Flee for safety, children of Benjamin, from out the midst of Jerusalem', which was in Benjamin, the tribe of Jeremias. 'Sound the trumpet in Thecua' (Tekoa), 456q about 12 m. S of Jerusalem, to indicate a place of refuge. 'Bethacarem' (Beth-hachcherem) may be the 'Frank' mountain 3 m. NE. of Tekoa. The 'standard' or signal would probably be a beacon for the same purpose. 2. 'The daughter of Sion . . . will I cut off'. 3. 'The shepherds with their flocks' are the hands of invaders; 'they shall feed every one of them, upon what is at hand', which shall be so abundant that they will not have to look elsewhere. 4-5. The enemy are discussing their plans. 7. 'cold', i.e. fresh. 9. 'They shall thoroughly glean as a vine the remnant of Israel'. The gleaner is bidden turn back his hand upon the tendrils, to make sure of leaving nothing behind. In 10 Jeremias speaks, but God in 11c ('pour it out'). 14. 'they would heal' her ruin 'lightly', as if nothing were easier. 15. 'They shall be confounded . . . are not . . . know not'.

17. The 'watchmen' are the Prophets. 21. Yahweh 'will lay stumbling-blocks'. 22-24 are adapted to Babylon itself in 50:41-43. 25. 'terror on every side', a kind of refrain in the prophecy: again in 20:3, 10; 6:25; 46:5; 49:29; Lam 2:22; Ps 30:14. 27. 'a trier' (omit 'strong') or assayer, to test them. 28. 'They are all utter rebels, going about with slanders'. 29-30. The figure from refining metals is resumed from 27; though 'the bellows blow fiercely, and the lead' which has been mixed with the alloy containing the silver 'is consumed', i.e. oxidized, the alloy is so inextricably mixed with the silver that the lead fails to carry it away, and 'the wicked are not separated: rejected silver', because still impure, 'men shall call them'.

VII 1-X 25 Temple Prophecies—2. God sends Jeremias to utter menaces at the temple gate, probably that leading into the inner court (20:2; 26:10; 36:10). It was built by King Joatham (4 Kg 15:35). 6. The shedding of innocent blood probably refers to the sacrifice of children in the temple, though 'the valley of the son of Ennom' (Hinnom) seems to have been the more usual place; cf. 30-31. 7. 'I will cause you to dwell in this place . . . for ever and ever'. 9-10. 'Will ye steal . . . and then come and stand before me?' 11. Cf. Is 56:7; Mt 21:13, etc. 12. For Shiloh, cf. Jos 18:1; Jg 18:31; 21:12. The destruction is also mentioned in Ps 77:60; it doubtless took place after the Philistine victory of 1 Kg 4. 16. The prophet is forbidden to pray for his people, as in 11:14; 14:11. God's purpose is fixed. 18. 'The queen of heaven' (again, 44:17-19) is Astaroth (probably Ashtart), 'the idol of the Sidonians' (4 Kg 23:13), worshipped by the Phoenicians and (as Ishtar) by the Assyrians and Babylonians. The Greek name was Astarte. In 22-23 we have the Hebrew idiom of relative denial; God's essential requirement was obedience to his voice, not mere sacrifices in themselves. See the present writer in JTS 42 (1941) 155-165. In 21, therefore, he is ironical: let them multiply their holocausts, and even eat the flesh (a proceeding forbidden by the Law in the case of these sacrifices) for all he cared; it was not these outward rites that he really had at heart. 29. To cut off the hair was a sign of mourning: 'a lament on the bare heights' such as that of Jephthe's daughter (Jg 11:37-38). 30. They have set up their idols even in the temple. 31. 'The valley of the son of Ennom', the vale of Hinnom, W. and S. of Jerusalem. 'The high place' (sing.) or idol-sanctuary 'of Topheth', the site of the burning. 32. It shall be used for burials 'for lack of room'.

VIII:1-2 Even bones of the dead shall be desecrated, b being spread out before the heavenly bodies which they had adored. 7. 'The stork in the heaven knoweth her appointed times' of migration; and similarly the turtle and swift and (perhaps) swallow; but 'my people' do not realize what Yahweh has appointed for this time. Cf. Is 1:3. 8. 'Lo, certainly unto delusion hath wrought the deluded pen of the scribes'. They put too much confidence in the possession of the 457b Mosaic Law which they copy out, and thus delude others also. 10b-12 practically repeats 6:13-15. 13. 'I will utterly consume them': they are like vines bearing no grapes, etc. 'I have appointed those who will carry them off' into exile: so Condamin, emending a difficult and uncertain text. 14-15 give the dismayed remarks of the people: 'let us perish there, for Yahweh our God hath caused us to perish'. 'gall', i.e. bile, often used for bitterness of some kind: perhaps 'water of gall' is the bitter and poisonous juice of the poppy (from which opium is prepared). 16. The invaders 'are come and have devoured the land': prophetic anticipation often represents the future as present or past. 17. 'basilisks', perhaps the 'daboia xanthina', a beautifully marked yellow viper, the largest and one of the most dangerous in Palestine. 19. The 'far country' of the Babylonian exile.

c IX 1-26 The whole chapter seems spoken by Yahweh, except 1, which rather belongs (as in MT) to ch 8. 2. 'adulterers', i.e. idolaters. 7. 'melt', i.e. smelt by severe discipline. 9 repeats 5:9, 29. 10. 'take ye up . . . for the pastures of the wilderness . . . the voice of the cattle'. 11. 'a lair of jackals'; cf. 49:33. 12. A new sentence begins with, 'Why hath the land perished'. 15. 'wormwood' or absinth, a generic name for the bitter-tasting 'artemisia': often used metaphorically. 'water of gall', see on 8:14. 17. 'mourning women' were 'wise' or skillful at composing and reciting dirges. 18. The use of the 1st person offers a striking example of the occasional lack of clear distinction between Yahweh's words and the prophet's own: cf. § 454b. 24. Cf. 1 Cor 1:31; 2 Cor 10:17. 25. 'I will punish all them that are circumcised in their uncircumcision' of heart. 26. Cf. Rom 2:25-29. These nations practised circumcision, including some Arab tribes who, contrary to Hebrew usage (Lev 19:27) cut the hair off their temples, probably with religious significance (mentioned again 25:23; 48:45; 49:32). Omit 'in the flesh' with MT. It is more especially Israel (in view of her spiritual privileges) that is uncircumcised in heart.

d X 1-16 is very probably out of place and perhaps 9:23-26 as well; the connexion is broken between what precedes and what follows. Jeremias may have written these words to the exiles at a later date. A more surprising sign of the disturbed state of his text (cf. § 455a-b) is 11, which is in Aramaic, and originally was probably a marginal note. With 3-5 and 8-9, cf. Is 44:12-17; Wis 13:10-14:1. The purpose is mockery of idols, by telling how they are produced. 5. 'They are like a pillar in a cucumber-garden, and speak not', i.e. like a scarecrow: cf. Bar 6:69. 9. 'Tharsis' is probably Tartessus in Spain; 'Uphaz' (or better, with some versions, 'Ophir') is probably SW. Arabia, with perhaps some of the neighbouring African coast. 12-16 are repeated in 51:15-19: 16. 'Israel is the tribe of his inheritance' (and in 51:19). e 17-25 continues from 9:26 (or 9:22). 17. 'Gather up thy bundle from the ground' in preparation for exile, 'thou that dwellest in the besieged city' of Jerusalem. 18. perhaps, 'that they may feel it'. In 19-25 (see § 454b) the prophet seems to be speaking for Jerusalem. 19b. The sense appears to be, 'But I [=Jerusalem] had said [=thought, as often in Hebrew], 'Well, this is just another misfortune of mine, and I must put up with it'. But it proved far worse than she anticipated. 20. 'My tent is despoiled', all its supporting cords are broken, there is no one to erect it any more, or to set up the tent-hangings. 22. 'a lair of jackals'; cf. 49:33. 25. Cf. Ps 78:6.

f XI 1-XII 6 The Covenant—There is an emphasis on the Mosaic covenant in 11:3, 6, 8, which may well be connected with the reforms following upon the discovery of the 'Book of the Law' in the temple in the 18th year of Josias (623-2 B.C.: 4 Kg 22:3, 8). 3. Judah and Jerusalem are to be reminded of the curses contained in Deut 27-28; cf. 8. 4. Egypt was the furnace of their suffering; cf. Deut 4:20. 5. Palestine 'flowed with milk', chiefly from goats, and wild 'honey' from the rocks; the expression is frequent (e.g. Ex 3:8) and implies other advantages. Arabs and Turks have been a blight on the land. 13a repeats 2:28b. Judah has 'set up altars to the abomination', the Baalim. 14. See on 7:16. 15 probably means: 'What business hath my beloved [Judah; cf. 12:7] in my house [the temple], seeing that she hath wrought wickedness with many [the Baalim of 13]? And the hallowed flesh [the temple sacrifices] shall pass from thee. When thou dost evil, then thou rejoicest'. 16. 'with sound of great storm he hath kindled fire upon it', striking the fair olive-tree with his lightning.

What follows (11:18-12:6) has no obvious connexion with the preceding: God reveals to Jeremias the plot of his fellow-townsmen against him and their punishment. The prophet is perplexed at the prosperity of the wicked; but God prepares him for still greater trials, such as must befall the elect for their sanctification. 19. 'Let us destroy the tree with its sap'. 20. 'Yahweh', Lord 'of the angel hosts', 'reins' (kidneys) stands for feelings, 'hearts' rather for understandings. The prophet is fully convinced that his cause is God's, whom he calls upon to vindicate it. XII:1. Even after a favourable answer he remains perplexed, like the psalmist in Ps 38, 72. The Book of Wisdom (with 2 Mac 7, etc.) definitely sets forth an other-worldly view, which our Lord stressed still more strongly. 3. Jeremias prays for strong divine intervention, but worse is to follow: (5) 'if in a land of peace thou hast no assurance, how wilt thou do in the Jordan fringe' amid thick bushes and luxuriant vegetation, haunted by lions? (cf. Zach 11:3).

(For 12:7-13:27, see § 460f-j.)

XIV 1-XV 21 The Drought—A drought can still be a terrible disaster in the East. We do not know the date of that here in question. 1. 'word' in Heb. can mean 'matter, affair': 'concerning the drought'. 2. 'Judah mourneth, and her gates [=inhabitants] languish, they are in mourning garb upon the ground. . . . 4. The tillers of the ground are dismayed. 6. . . the wild asses . . . pant for air like the crocodile', coming out of the water to breathe, 'their eyes fail', looking in vain for food. The prophet appeals to Yahweh: 7. 'act for thy name's sake. . . . 9. Why shouldst thou be as a man surprised . . . thy name is called over us', we are thine. But Yahweh answers (10) that 'this people . . . have loved to wander. . . . 11. Pray not for this people': see on 7:16. 13. Jeremias lays the blame on the prophets, to whom (14-15, 18) Yahweh promises punishment, but without excusing the people. 17. The term 'virgin daughter' is often applied in OT to a people, especially to Israel (in Is 23:12 to Sidon), perhaps in the sense of not having been subdued by an enemy.

The prophet, appalled at the message which he is to deliver (i.e. 17-18) pleads still more earnestly (19-22): but his plea is rejected even more decisively (XV 1-9). 3. 'I will visit them with four families' of evils. 4. 'I will make them a consternation to all the kingdoms'. For Manasses' evil reign (698-697 to 643-642 B.C.) see 4 Kg 21; 2 Par 33. 6. 'I am weary of repenting', in the sense of changing my line of conduct, in this case so as to spare; cf. Gen 6:6. 7. 'I will winnow them with a winnowing-fork' [see on 4:11-12] in the gates [the cities] of the land'; it is implied that the inhabitants have proved worthless chaff: cf. Mt 3:12, etc. 8. 'I will cause agitation and dismay to fall upon her suddenly'. 9. Even the mother of seven is to become childless before reaching the evening of her life. 'The residue' probably refers to the population in general.

10. Jeremias now bursts out into a lament for himself; e he has incurred general hostility through no fault of his own. 'I have not lent, neither have men lent to me'. The Hebrew might exact interest from a Gentile, but not from a fellow-Hebrew (Deut 23:19-20); but even if this law were observed (which it was not always; cf. Ps 14:5) friction might arise. 11-14 are difficult;

458c 13-14 are addressed to the people, and break in harshly here: they are repeated substantially in 17:3-4, where they seem to belong. 12. 'Can one break iron, even iron from the north [indicating the irresistible Babylonians] and bronze?' But when they come (11) 'verily I will strengthen thee unto good; verily I will cause thine enemy to make supplication unto thee in the time of evil and in the time of trouble', as in 38:14, etc. Jeremias still entreats for himself: (15) 'Avenge thyself for me on my persecutors; take me not away in thy long-suffering towards them . . . (17) I have not sat in the assembly of merry-makers and rejoiced: because of thy hand [thy compelling power] I have sat alone, for thou hast filled me with indignation'. Finally he receives a more propitious answer: (19) 'If thou return to me', in the sense of being better-minded, 'then shall I bring thee back', helping thee in this amendment; 'thou shalt stand before me' as my minister. 'And if thou bring forth the precious out of the vile [his own or the people's vileness], thou shalt be as my mouth'.

d XVI 1-XVII 27 Jeremias must prepare for Disaster, trusting in Yahweh: the Sabbath—6. It was forbidden in Deut 14:1 to mourn for the dead by cutting oneself or making oneself bald; but the latter practice, at all events, was common (47:5; 48:37; Am 8:10, etc.). 18. In exile they 'shall serve strange gods day and night' in serving the Babylonian worshippers, 'for I will grant you no favour' in the way of help. 14-15 are repeated in 23:7-8, where they obviously belong. 18. 'I will recompense their iniquity and their sin double': omit 'first'. The idols are called 'carcasses' in scorn. In 19 the prophet speaks of the Gentiles, but Yahweh in 21 of Judah, whose sin (XVII 1-3) is written deep in their heart, and 'upon the horns of their [idolatrous] altars, where their children were sacrificed upon the altars of their Asherahs [false goddesses] by the green trees upon the high hills, the mountains in the fields'. 2 is difficult; the translation is based on the present writer's note in ET 60 (1948-9) 52-3. Mention of the sacrifice of children (7:31; 19:5; 32:35) is to be expected in a passage such as this. 3-4 partly repeat 15:13 f., where the words 'for ever' are missing, and in view of such promises as 4:27 (see note) should probably be omitted here also. 8. 'because of sin'. 6. The 'tamaric' is probably the dwarf juniper tree, whose 'gloomy stunted appearance, with its scale-like leaves pressed close to its gnarled stem, and cropped by the wild goats' (Tristram, Natural History of the Bible [1911] 358) forcibly contrasts with (8) 'the tree planted by the waters' of Ps 1:3. 11. 'The partridge heapeth together' eggs, laying a large number (Tristram found 26 in a nest, ibid., 225), but they are eagerly sought and easily found, chiefly by men, so that 'she doth not bring forth' young. 16. 'But I', the prophet protests, 'have not hastened after thee with evil purpose' against my countrymen (such seems the best text); 'neither have I desired the day of man', the day of man's punishment. 17-18. But his actual persecutors are the enemies of God; let him vindicate himself and his prophet!

e The chapter concludes with a commission to Jeremias to urge the religious observance of the Sabbath, probably unconnected with the preceding. 20. 'kings' in the plural, for the royal family in general, or for future kings: similarly 19:3. The sanctifying of the Sabbath (Ex 20:8-11; Deut 5:12-15) was ordered under pain of death (Ex 31:12-17); cf. Neh 13:15-22.

h XVIII 1-XIX 15 The Potter's Vessel—Israel is in God's hand as a potter's vessel (6); if the vessel be marred, he can make another (4). As Jeremias is to break the vessel, so will God 'break this people and this city' (19:11). The potter (3) 'was doing a work on the stones', two circular stones on the same vertical axle rotating horizontally, the lower one worked by the foot, the upper and smaller supporting the clay. 4. 'And if the vessel which he was making of the clay was spoiled in the hand of the potter, then he would make it again into another vessel'.

Two great truths are set forth: (1) God is the supreme author of history: He knows what sort of man or nation he is producing and how they will act (6); (2) on the other hand a nation is responsible for its own actions, according to which God will treat it (7-10). God is here speaking of his dealings with nations upon the principle of solidarity, which has such deep roots in human nature, and without reference to the next life. The individual is regarded in 17:10, etc. 11. The divine call to repentance is to all and each, only (12: cf. 2:25) to meet with obstinate perversity. 14-15. The snow of Lebanon never fails, nor the streams which descend from it; but Judah is inconstant and fickle, 'sacrificing to nothingness', i.e. to idols. 18. The people resent such language and plot against Jeremias, believing that priest and wise man and prophet will always be there to counsel them. 20. The prophet had pleaded for them, but now (21-23) in utter disgust he makes the divine purpose of punishment, such as it must prove in the concrete, his own.

This divine purpose, and the crimes that have led to it, are now to be proclaimed more emphatically, and (XIX:1) a potter's vessel is still the symbol. 2. 'The Potsherd Gate' led into 'the valley of the son of Hinnom'; see on 7:31. 8. Every passer-by 'shall be appalled' and (as we might say) 'whistle'; cf. 49:17. On 9 cf. Deut 28:53; Lev 26:29; Lam 4:10. 13. 'The host of heaven' are the stars; see on 8:1-2. 14. The outer court of the temple, here and in 26:2. XX 1-18 The Persecution and Complaint of the Prophet—He is put into the stocks, and upon release foretells evil to Phassur and Judah, and bemoans his own lot. 1. Phassur, perhaps the father of Gedelias of 38:1, was in charge of the temple; see on 35:4. 2. 'The stocks' were probably a pillory, with four holes for hands and feet, and a collar; see on 29:26. 'the upper gate of Benjamin' is probably that of 7:2. 3. 'Terror on every side', Magor-missabib, the refrain of the whole book and prophecy; see on 6:25. 6. Phassur was one of the false prophets.

In the rest of the chapter the prophet gives free vent to his emotions. 7. 'Thou hast beguiled me, Yahweh'. The verb need not mean more than 'persuaded' (as in Prov 25:15), but usually implies enticement of some kind into an unpleasant situation. 8. 'For as often as I speak, I cry out: I cry "Violence and spoil!"' Cf. Is 8:3. He is reproached and derided for pointing to the impending evils. 9. 'But if I say, "I will think no more" [of the word of the Lord] . . . then there cometh to be in my heart as it were a burning fire . . . and I am weary . . . (10) for I hear the whispering of many . . . "Denounce him, we will denounce him", from all my familiar friends, who watch for my stumbling. "Perchance he will be beguiled [e.g. into saying something that can be construed as treason] and we shall prevail against him"'. But now (11) he rises to the strong conviction that God will succour him. 'My persecutors . . . shall be put to utter shame, by reason of their failure—an everlasting reproach, which shall not be forgotten'. 14. Nevertheless grief overwhelms him once more, so that he expresses a wish that he had never been born; cf. Job 3. As Knabenbauer remarks, these imprecations (14-18) are to be understood not literally, but psychologically; they express an overwhelming anguish at the bitterness of life. 16. 'the cities which Yahweh overthrew' are Sodom and Gomorrah (Gen 19:24 f.). Let the man hear the cry of alarm in the morning, and the war-shout of his enemies at noon! 17. Would that the prophet's mother had been his grave, and her womb always great! (For ch 21, see § 463a.)

Part II Joakim King: 609-598 B.C.: chh 26; 22-23; 25; 36; 45; 35; 12:7-13:27. (For ch 25, see § 459k-m). Between Josias and Joakim came Joachaz (609 B.C.) who was deported into Egypt after three months (4 Kg 23:30-34) by the Pharaoh Necho (Necho). Joachaz was Josias' third son; he is put 459a in the last place in 1 Par 3:15 (under the name Sellum : see § 459d ad init.) owing to his insignificance. Necho put Josias' second son Eliacim on the throne, changing his name to Joakim. Ch 26 perhaps belongs to Joakim's first year (26:1). Chh 25 (25:1), 36 (36:1), 45 (45:1) are assigned to his 4th year, and ch 25 to the first year of Nabuchodonosor (25:1), which last is reckoned from the 1st of Nisan (March-April) of 604; presumably therefore Joakim succeeded to the throne late in the year, and his 4th year fell mainly in 604.

b The significance of this date lies in the fact that in 605 B.C. Nabuchodonosor, acting for his father Nabopolassar, king of Babylon (who died soon afterwards) defeated Necho at Carchemish (about 260 m. NNE. of Damascus) a great commercial centre and fortress, commanding the principal ford over the Euphrates. He thus became master of western Asia, including Palestine; the battle was one of the great turning-points in history, leaving Babylon supreme till its conquest by Cyrus, the Persian king, in 539 B.C. Jeremias preached submission, promising that all would go well, but he was not listened to, so that Jerusalem fell in 587 B.C.

c XXVI 1-24 Jeremias' Warning and Narrow Escape—The date is probably 608 B.C.; but in 28:1 the 'beginning' of Sedecias' reign is his 4th year, which shows the term to be somewhat elastic. 5. God sent his prophets, 'rising up early to do so', i.e. insistently and continuously; similarly in 7:13, etc. 6. On Silo (Shiloh), see 7:12. 10. 'the king's house' was a little below the temple on the eastern hill, and immediately adjoined it; cf. 22:1, etc. 16. The princes and people save Jeremias; (17-19) certain elders also bring up the case of Micheas (Mic 1:1; 3:12). 20-23. The story of the true prophet Urias illustrates Jeremias' danger; but (24) Ahicam the son of Saphan protected him. Another son of Saphan, Gamarias, was a king's secretary, an important minister of state (36:10-12, 25), and a third son was Elasa (29:3), evidently a friend to the prophet, as was likewise Ahicam's son Godolias (39:14; 40:5-6). Ahicam had been trusted by King Josias (4 Kg 22:11-14).

d XXII 1-XXIII 40 For Kings and Prophets—(For ch 21, see § 463a). It seems necessary to put 22:1-23:8 here, the part dealing with the kings, because the memory of Josias' death is recent (22:10, 15-16), and the interest in his own son Sellum is still alive (22:10-12). 'Sellum' is the name in 22:11 and 1 Par 3, 15, and is that of another king in 4 Kg 15:13; he is called Joachaz in 4 Kg 23:30-34; 2 Par 36:1-4. Joakim, however, is attacked in the 2nd person, and his end is prophesied (22:13-19), as well as that of his son Jechonias (22:23, 28; 37:1, etc.: called 'Joachin' in 52:31; 4 Kg 24:6-15, etc.), who also is addressed in the 2nd person (22:25-26). This passage on the kings leads up to one on the Messianic deliverance (23:3-8), and thus to the false prophets.

e 6. 'Gilead art thou to me, and the top of Lebanon', examples of finely wooded regions. 10. Josias was defeated and slain at Megiddo in 609 B.C. by the invading Pharaoh Necho, who dethroned his son Sellum (=Joachaz) and carried him away to Egypt, whence he was never to return. 13-17. Joakim is far from imitating the righteousness of his father Josias. 18. The cries of lamentation are merely the conventional formulae, not intended to have any particular application to Joakim. On his end see also 36:30.

f There is but little connexion in 20-23 with what immediately precedes or follows. The people are summoned to wail upon the heights (a common place for so doing; cf. 7:29; Is 15:2) by which the Babylonians will advance upon Jerusalem, Lebanon in the north, Bashan in the NE., Abarim east of the northern part of the Dead Sea. 20. 'and cry from Abarim, for all thy lovers are destroyed', for whom see on 4:30. 22. 'thy pastors', meaning here and elsewhere the rulers who should feed thee: 'the wind shall feed', an ironical expression for scattering them. 23. Jerusalem has been confident as a bird nesting among the cedars of Lebanon: 'How shalt thou groan!'

24-30 The Doom of Jechonias—28. The prophet has a word of lament and supplication for him; but (29-30) the stern decree stands. 'barren': not in the strict sense, for there is mention of his seed in 28, and of eight sons (or seven, if 'Asir' means 'Jechonias the captive') in 1 Par 3:17-18. The word is a rare one, occurring elsewhere only in Gen 15:2 and Lev 20:20-21: it comes from a root meaning 'to strip oneself' (BDB), and can well mean 'stripped' of royal power (as Vg and LXX seem to imply), both himself and his descendants.

XXIII 1-2 The Prophecy passes to an Attack upon the Kings (pastors) in general. 3-4. Yahweh will give them better pastors and (5) 'raise up to David a righteous shoot', springing from the ground (rather than a 'branch'). The term is a Messianic title, used again in 33:15; Zach 3:8. 7-8 practically repeat 16:4-5, where (as there remarked) they can hardly be in place. This Messianic deliverance shall eclipse the exodus from Egypt, but is conditioned (as always) by 18:7-10.

9-32. The rest of ch 23 contains an attack upon the false prophets with whom in one place (11) the priests are associated. 9. Jeremias (here as elsewhere) is profoundly moved at the message which he is to deliver. 10. The 'adulterers' are so called (as often) primarily because of their idolatry, but secondarily because sexual immorality was often mixed up with the idolatry. The land 'mourneth by reason of the curse', the drought immediately mentioned. The course of prophet and priest 'is become evil, and their power', their authority, 'is not right': they abuse it. 13. The prophets of Samaria 'prophesied by Baal', in his name; (14) but the prophets of Jerusalem are worse, they are as Sodom and Gomorrah. 15. 'wormwood', and 'gall', see on 8:14; 9:15. (19-20 are practically repeated in 30:23 f., where they probably belong; they interrupt the sense awkwardly here.) 22. 'But if they stand in my council [my intimate circle] then let them cause my people to hear my words, and let them turn them [my people] back from their evil way'. 23. God is not only near, he is everywhere. 30. The false prophets (the 'chaff' of 28) steal God's words from their neighbours (the true prophet, the 'wheat' of 28) in order to make their own pretended prophecies more plausible. 32. 'recklessness', rather than 'wonders'.

33-40. In what follows one must understand the double sense of the Hebrew word massā, meaning something lifted or taken up, either a 'burden' in the literal sense, or something taken up on the lips, a prophetic utterance or 'oracle'. 33. If anyone asks Jeremias what 'massa' ('oracle') there is from Yahweh, he is to answer from Yahweh, 'You are my massa ("burden"), and I mean to throw you off'. 34. In fact, they are not to speak of Yahweh's 'massa' any more, doubtless because of the rather sinister sense attaching to the prophet's oracles, his 'massas'; they may have been protesting that they were indeed 'burdens'! 35. Henceforth they are simply to ask what Yahweh has 'answered' or 'spoken'. 36. Again they are forbidden to speak of Yahweh's 'massa'; for everyone is making up his own 'massa' ('oracle'), and thus they pervert Yahweh's own words. 38. But if they persist in speaking of Yahweh's 'massa' ('oracle') in spite of his forbidding it, (39) then 'I will take you up': this is the verb corresponding to 'massa', so that the sense is, 'I will make you my "massa" (burden), carry you off, throw you away, and leave you'.

XXV 1-38 The Babylonian Supremacy: the Cup of Yahweh's Fury—As Knabenbauer remarks, there is no need to suppose that Jeremias travelled to all the nations who were to drink the cup, nor even to suppose a vision; the cup of God's fury is the prophet's

459k denunciation which will be drunk when his prophecies are fulfilled. We may indeed call the Babylonian supremacy itself the cup of God's fury (as appears from 25:9, 11 and especially 51:7), apart of course from Babylon itself, for which see on 12-14. The 23 years of 3 are about 627-605 B.C., both years being included, as usually in ancient calculations. 10 'the sound of the pair of millstones', circular, 18-24 inches in diameter, the lower one fixed in the ground, the upper one turned by one or two (Mt 24:41) women: their noise was a sound of life in a village.

1 12-14, and the mention of the king of 'Sesac' (Babylon) in 26 (omitted by LXX) are thought by some to be later additions, because 15 would follow more naturally after 11, and because of the mention of Jeremias' book of prophecies against the nations in 13, which it may be right to identify with chh 46-51. But in the case of such a disturbed text as this, it is quite possible that the additions were made by the original author; and it is to be observed that LXX puts chh 46-51 precisely here, roughly as chh 25-31, and that this may be the right place for them, the change being perhaps due to a desire for clearer historical sequence. 25:13 is identical in MT and LXX, except that LXX adds (ungrammatically) a mention of Elam, after which it goes off on to what is 49:35 in MT.

m Jeremias had already prophesied that the chastisement of the Hebrews was not to be final in 4:27, etc. (see note); now the limit of 70 years is announced (11-12; cf. 29:10), and as for the Babylonians (14), 'many nations and great kings shall use them also as slaves'. 15. Disaster and dismay are represented as an intoxicating draught, as often in Jeremias (13:12-14, etc.). 20. 'all in general' are the mixed foreign population in Egypt, perhaps especially the foreign mercenaries; cf. 50:37. 'Ausitis' or Uz, perhaps an Aramaean tribe E. or NE. of Edom. Ascalon, Gaza, Accaron (Ekron), and Azotus (Ashdod) are the Philistine cities in SW. Palestine (cf. 47:5). According to Herodotus (ii. 157) the last-named was captured after a 29 years' siege by the Egyptian Pharaoh Psammetichus (666-610 B.C.). Possibly there is some mistake here; for example, it may have been captured in the 29th year of his reign. 21. Edom, S. of Palestine: Moab, E. of Dead Sea; Ammon, N. of Moab. These three stretched eastward into the desert. 22. Tyre and Sidon, the Phoenician cities on the coast to the N.; also the Phoenician colonies on the Mediterranean 'coastlands' are added. 23. 'Dedan and Tema and Buz', tribes of N. Arabia; see on 9:26. 24. 'Arabia', the northern part. Omit 'and all the kings of the west' which in the Hebrew merely repeats the previous words. 25. 'Zambri': omitted by LXX, and not mentioned elsewhere. 'Elam': about 200 m. E. of Babylon, N. of Persian Gulf: cf. 49:34.

n 'The Medes': SW. of the Caspian, NE. of Babylonia and Assyria: about this time their empire reached to the Black Sea and into E. Asia Minor. 26. 'the kings of the north . . . one with another'. 'Sesac' or 'Sheshak', here and in 51:41, is a so-called Atbash cypher for 'Babel' (Babylon): the 2nd last letter of the Hebrew alphabet (š) is put for the 2nd first (b), and the 12th last (k) for the 12th first (l). It may have been wise at the time to disguise this direct attack on Babylon; but this latter is mentioned so freely elsewhere that the use of the anagram seems to have been little more than a literary device. Otherwise we should have to suppose that originally it was used much oftener, but was afterwards discarded. 30. Cf. Am 1:2. Yahweh's 'holy habitation' is the temple. He shall 'roar against his homestead' or pasture, meaning Jerusalem and Judah. 'He shall shout as those treading the grapes', but it will be the inhabitants of the earth that he will be treading down. 31. 'The din' will be everywhere. 34-36. The 'shepherds' are the rulers, as in 2:8, etc. 38. 'the wrath of the dove' should probably be 'the oppressing sword', as in 46:16; 50:16.

XXXVI 1-32 The Reading of the Roll—(For ch 35, see § 460d-e.) This is the most vivid chapter in the whole work. Baruch was Jeremias' faithful disciple and secretary, and belonged to a distinguished family, being the brother of Saraias (cf. 32:12 with 51:59), who was 'captain of the resting-place' of the king when travelling (which presumably he would select), or (as we might say) quartermaster, to King Sedecias (51:59). Baruch was taken along with Jeremias to Egypt (43:3-7): see § 453c. The roll which Baruch wrote for Jeremias at this early stage, even the revised roll (36:32), obviously cannot be the whole book as we have it today; but the fact that the prophet had such a faithful secretary increases our confidence in the genuineness of the whole book. In 45:1-4 there is a special message for Baruch, addressed to him at the time of the writing of the roll. (The Book of Baruch is treated separately.) 3. Forgiveness is still promised to Judah upon repentance—5. Jeremias is 'hindered', possibly by some ceremonial uncleanness, from delivering the message himself. 9. 'The ninth month', the later Chisleu, roughly our December; cf. 22. 10. Baruch read the volume 'in the chamber of Gamarias', for whom see on 26:24. For the 'new gate' into 'the upper court', see on 7:2. 12. For 'the king's house', see on 26:10. 16. The princes 'turned in fear one towards another'. 18. Omit 'as if he were reading'. 19. The princes do not wish the fate of Urias (26:20-23) to befall Jeremias and Baruch (cf. 36:26), though (16, 20) they feel bound to tell the king. 20. For 'court' read 'cabinet', with a change of a letter; the king would not be sitting out of doors in December, but in his winter house (22; cf. Am 3:15), doubtless adjoining the rest of the palace. 23. 'As often as Judi had read . . . he cut them with a scribe's knife', used for making and mending reed pens, cutting writing materials, etc. 26. 'Jeremiel' is 'the son of the king' (DV 'Amelech'). 30. On Joakim's end see also 22:18-19; in 4 Kg 24:5 he is said to have 'slept with his fathers', but there is no mention of his burial. 31. 'But they hearkened not' to God's threats. 32. 'Many like words' were added in the new roll. Jeremias is ordered to write yet another roll in 30:2.

(For ch 37, see § 463d.)

XLV 1-5 The Message for Baruch—(For ch 44, see § 464f.) This short chapter practically belongs to the previous section (ch 36), and (1) bears the same date (36:1). 3. Baruch is deeply grieved at what he has had to write; but Jeremias is to say to him, (4) 'What I have built I am destroying, and what I have planted I am plucking up'. MT adds what RV renders, 'and this in the whole land'; but the translation is uncertain, and LXX is probably right in omitting. 5. This is no time for ambition, of which Baruch had apparently to some extent been guilty; but Yahweh will let him escape with his life, whithersoever he goes. The Heb. idiom runs literally, 'I will give thee thy life as a spoil', as something to be snatched up hurriedly and carried away with difficulty. The idiom recurs in 21:9; 38:2; 39:18.

(For ch 46, see § 465a-d.)

XXXV 1-19 The Rechabites—(For ch 34, see § 463b.) d The Rechabites were a branch of the Cinites (Kenites), who were early associated with the Hebrews, and settled in the S. of Judah (1 Par 2:55; Jg 1:16; 1 Kg 15:6; 27:10). Their ancestor Jonadab, son of Rechab, joined with Jehu (king of Israel 841-814/3) in the extermination of the Baal-worship (4 Kg 10:15-23). The present chapter is our chief source of information about them. Jonadab had bound them to a strictly nomadic life, probably in the main to preserve their religion. They had taken refuge in Jerusalem for fear of the Babylonians and Syrians (35:11; cf. 4 Kg 24:2), which dates the present incident towards the end of Joakim's reign. The 'chambers' in 2 and 4 are the apartments of priests, etc.; there is no mention of 'treasures'. 4. Maasias was one of the three 'keepers of the threshold' (cf. 52:24=4 Kg 25:18), important officials, probably keepers of the temple

460e gates. Sophonias, his son (21:1; 29:25; 37:3), was even more important, being 'the second priest' (52:24), second only to the high-priest, and apparently in direct command of the temple (29:26), like Phassur in 20:3. 7. The Rechabites were 'sojourners in the land', aliens permanently dwelling there, to whom were accorded in the Law practically equal privileges with the Hebrews. 11. 'Syria' or 'Aram', as always in Hebrew: the capital was Damascus. 19. To 'stand before Yahweh' would normally mean ministering in the temple. In Hegesippus' account of the martyrdom of St James, the brother of the Lord, quoted by Eusebius in his Church History (ii. 23, 7), there is mention of a Rechabite even among the temple priests. There is also mention of a Rechabite at Jerusalem in Neh 3:14. (For ch 36, see § 460a-b.)

f XII 7-XIII 27 The Waist-Cloth: the Coming Disaster—(For 11:1-12:6, see § 457f-g.) Because of 13:18 f. it seems more likely that this section belongs to the three months' reign of Joakim's son Jechonias (or Joachin: see § 459d-g). Joakim's mother was Zebida (4 Kg 23:36), of whom we know nothing; Jechonias' mother was Nohesta (Nehushta, 4 Kg 24:8). Jechonias was only 18 when he succeeded (ibid.); his youth would enhance the prominence attached to the queen-mother by Eastern custom (cf. 3 Kg 2:19), and account for her being mentioned in 13:18; 22:26; 29:2; 4 Kg 24:8, 12, 15. Again, in 12:7-17 the reference is to the bands of Babylonians and Syrians raiding Judah, as in 35:11; 4 Kg 24:2 (in which last passage Moabites and Ammonites are also mentioned), so that we should be obliged to place this section, like the preceding one, into Joakim's last years, if in his time at all. In any case this is the most convenient place in which to consider the section.

g 7 Yahweh speaks sorrowfully of having 'forsaken my house . . . and given the beloved of my soul into the hand of her enemies' (cf. 22:5; Mt 23:38), (8) because she has turned like a savage beast against him; 'therefore have I hated her'. 9. 'Is my heritage', he asks with amazement and pain, 'a speckled bird of prey, that the birds of prey round about are upon her' because of her unusual plumage? Let the wild beasts devour her! 11. None consider what the end of such things must be, i.e. the desolation of 12-13. 12. Even 'the bare heights in the wilderness', where Judah courted the Baalim (see on 3:2) will be overrun. 14. Nevertheless her destruction is not to be final (see on 4:27). And though her enemies are to be plucked out of their own land (15) they too will be restored, (16) and if they will be converted 'they shall be built up in the midst of my people', being thus in every way united with them, with such presumably as would still be found in Palestine. Even the prophecies against the nations end with promises of mercy (see on 49:39) apart from the special one against Babylon. (The 1st line of Ac 15:16 is from 12:15, but what follows is taken freely from Am 9:11-12.)

h XIII 1 The narrative of the Waist-Cloth presents difficulties—In view of such passages as 25:15-28 (see § 459k) and Ez 4, it can hardly be regarded as certain that Jeremiah travelled a few hundred miles to the Euphrates and back in order to hide a waist-cloth in a rock. Some have therefore suggested a vision or dream of some kind. It has also been thought, however, that Wady Fara, about 3 m. NE. of Anathoth, may be meant; the name represents the 'Parah' (DV 'Aphara') of Jos 18:23. Doubtless for this reason the OT translation published by the Jewish Publication Society of America in 1917 simply retains the Hebrew word 'Perath' in 4-7. Water penetrated to the buried waist-cloth and spoilt it; (9) such also shall Judah and Jerusalem become. 14. 'I shall dash them one against another, even the fathers and the sons together'. 15-17. Let them heed the warning in time.

i XIII 18-19 There follows an apostrophe to King Jechonias and the queen-mother: 'Sit ye down low, for your glorious crowns are fallen from your heads!' In prophetic vision the prophet sees even the cities of the 460i south (though the invader was to come from the north) 'shut up', i.e. quite empty, for all the inhabitants have been carried away—a poetical hyperbole.

20-27. The reproaches that follow begin as the words of Jeremiah, but (cf. § 454b) pass into those of Yahweh. 20. 'Lift up thine eyes, O Jerusalem [following LXX] and behold those who come from the north'. Her 'flock' are her inhabitants. 21. 'What wilt thou say, when he appointeth over thee as heads those whom thou didst teach to be thine intimates?' This supposes only a transfer of one word in this difficult line, which also sets the metre right. The nations she is courting (presumably Babylon and other neighbouring nations) will become her harsh masters: cf. Ez 23:22-23. Her inhabitants shall be scattered like chaff from the threshing floors; see on 4:11. 27. 'How long will it yet be, ere thou become clean?' (For ch 14, see § 458a.)

Part III Sedecias King: 598-587 B.C. (a) Warnings to Exiles and Natives: chh 24, 29, 27-28. (For ch 23, see § 459h-j.)

XXIV 1-10 The Exiles with Joachin and those remaining with Sedecias—A strong contrast is drawn between those who had been taken into captivity with Joachin in 598 B.C. (cf. 13:18-19; 22:24-30; 4 Kg 24:11-17; 2 Par 36:8-10) and those who remained behind with Sedecias, entirely to the advantage of the former, who are represented as good figs, while those at Jerusalem are the bad figs. It is natural to suppose that the deportation is a recent event, and that this chapter must be dated near the beginning of Sedecias' reign; and ch 29 for the same reason, and because of its close connection with this chapter (with 29:17-18, cf. 24:8-10).

1. 'engravers': more probably 'smiths'. 6. 'I will set my eyes upon them for good', for the purpose of doing them good. 8. 'So will I give up Sedecias'. 9. 'I will make them a consternation to all the kingdoms', as in 15:4.

XXIX 1-32 The Letter to the Exiles in Babylonia—b (For ch 28, see § 461g.) Jeremiah encourages them to settle down contentedly, and (10) promises a return after 70 years; he deals with some false prophets there. 1. Why 'the residue', is not clear; there may have been a massacre. But LXX omit the word. 2. On 'the queen', see § 460f. 'engravers', see on 24:1. 8. For 'Elasa', see on 26:24. 'saying' introduces the prophet's letter, which occupies the rest of the chapter, apart from the explanatory note in 29-30. 8-10 The Period of 70 Years for the Babylonian exile c had already been mentioned (25:11-12); but the false prophets were prophesying an earlier return (cf. 27-28, especially 28:4). These 70 years seem best reckoned with Condamin from 605 B.C. to 537 B.C., which would be reckoned as 69 years, and at the round number of 70. By his victory over the Egyptians at Carchemish in 605 B.C. Nabuchodonosor (waging war for his father Nabopolassar, king of Babylon) became master of western Asia. We read in 2 Par 36:5-7 that he took King Joakim from Jerusalem to Babylon as prisoner; this is not mentioned in 4 Kg 24:1-2, which however makes it clear that the Babylonians were taking prisoners about that time. Berossus, the Babylonian priest of Bel, who wrote about the middle of the 3rd cent. B.C., is quoted by Josephus (Ant 10, 11, 1 and Contra Apionem 1, 19) as stating that Nabuchodonosor had Jewish captives conveyed to Babylon. It seems reasonable, therefore, to date the Babylonian captivity from this episode, and the end of it from the return of the exiles after Cyrus' capture of Babylon in 538 B.C.

12-32 After the 70 Years—12. 'You shall go and pray to me'. 15 does not fit in well here, and should probably precede 21, as in the Lucianic recension of LXX, and also in the ordinary LXX text (which however leaves out 16-20 altogether). 17-18. See § 461a. 21-23. The two false prophets have been guilty of gross immorality, 461d and are promised dire punishment. 24. A third false prophet has sent letters from Babylon to Jerusalem, of which the extract quoted must be part of a letter to Sophonias, for whom see on 35:4. He was evidently in sympathy with Jeremias. 26. He could put anyone 'in the stocks and in the collar'; see on 20:2. 28. 'It is a long time' that the exiles will be in captivity; see on 8-10. 20-30 are parenthetic; 31-32 probably belong to the original letter. Semeias shall have no male issue, in the person of whom he might be said to witness the return from the Babylonian captivity. But perhaps we should end 32 with the LXX: 'there shall not be a man of them (i.e. of his descendants) in the midst of you to see the good things which I shall do to you; they shall not see them'.

e XXVII 1-21 Warning to the five Kings and Sedecias and to Priests and People—(For ch 26, see § 459a-c.)

It is clear from the mention of Sedecias in 27:3, 12, and from the mention of the captivity of Jehonias in 27:20, that we should read 'Sedecias' in 1 rather than 'Joakim'. The verse may have been taken over by mistake from 26:1. It seems likely also that chh 27-28 are closely connected, and that the time-heading in 28:1 originally belonged to 27:1. The Peshitta actually reads 'Sedecias': LXX omits f 27:1 altogether, perhaps in perplexity. Since the battle of Carchemish (605 B.C.) the power of Babylon had become overwhelming; but the five kings still hoped to shake off its yoke, and invited Sedecias to join them in the attempt. Jeremias warns all that it will fail. 2. 'Make thee thongs and bars' to form a yoke, the 'thongs' being used to bind the 'bars' together: cf. Lev 26:13 ('the bars of your yoke'). Jer 2:20; 5:5; 30:8. The divine purpose is constantly brought home in Holy Scripture by symbolic action (e.g. Gen 9:13; Ac 21:11). In 12 and 16 'I spoke' refers to Jeremias himself. 19. 'Thus saith Yahweh of hosts concerning the pillars [cf. 3 Kg 7:15-22; 2 Par 3:15-17] and the sea [3 Kg 7:23-26; 2 Par 4:2-5] and the bases' (3 Kg 7:27-37; 2 Par 4:14). These were all broken in pieces, and the bronze carried to Babylon (52:17). Other 'articles' are mentioned in 3 Kg 7; 2 Par 4; for their return, cf. Esd 1:7-11.

g XXVIII 1-17 Hananias the False Prophet—See § 461e.

It has even been suggested that the events in chh 27-28 belong to the same day; in any case this false prophecy was a counterblast to that of Jeremias. 1. 'Gabaon' (Gibeon), about 5 m. NNW. of Jerusalem. He is called 'prophet', much as we speak of 'fortune-tellers' without belief in their power to tell fortunes. 6. Jeremias would wish Hananias' prophecy fulfilled; (8) still, 'the prophets' of old usually 'prophesied' (omit 'and') threatened calamities, and did not court the people with promises of pleasant things, except as the reward of repentance. 9. Time will show! 10. Hananias 'took the bar from the neck of Jeremias', meaning the symbolic yoke he wore (see on 27:2), and so in 12 and 13 (where it seems better to read with LXX, 'I shall make'). Jeremias, having now had revealed to him the answer to be given, delivers it to Hananias; of the two essentials of true prophecy, revelation and mission, (15) Hananias has received neither, and (16) he has 'spoken treason against Yahweh' (cf. 29:32). 17. Hananias died within three months; cf. 28:1.

h LI 59-64 The Mission of Saraias—(For 51:1-58, see § 467e-j.) Perhaps soon after the events of chh 27-28 (see 461e-g) Jeremias writes upon a scroll the evils in store for Babylon, and commissions Saraias to read it there, presumably in private to the Jewish community; he is then to perform the symbolic act of binding a stone to the scroll and sinking both in the Euphrates. 59. The attempt to draw Sedecias into a league against Babylon (see § 461e-f) may have been the cause of Sedecias' journey to Babylon; at that time he may have wished to clear himself from any suspicion of revolt. Saraias was Baruch's brother, and

'captain of the "royal" resting-place' (see § 460a). 461h 60. 'all these words' were obviously written too early to include all the present book of Jeremias; but the expression implies that a copy was preserved, probably containing 50:1-51:58. 61. 'then see that thou recitest all these words'. 64. 'she shall not rise again from the evil that I am bringing upon her'. Here the prophecy proper ends. MT adds (a) 'and they weary themselves', apparently an interpolation from the end of 51:58; (b) 'Thus far the words of Jeremias', probably a compiler's note intended to distinguish the prophecy proper from ch 52. (For ch 52, see § 468.)

Part III (b) Promises of Restoration—chh 30-33. 462a

(For ch 29, see § 461b-d.) These chapters offer a marked contrast to the rest of the book, striking a note of hope seldom present elsewhere (yet see 3:14-19; 16:14-15; 23:3-8).

XXX 1-24 The Restoration of Judah—Judah is mainly in question, though there are some more general references. 2. Jeremias is commanded to write a second roll, of a very different character from that of ch 36, (4) 'words . . . about Israel and about Judah'. 8. 'I will break his yoke from off his neck', the first 'his' referring to the Babylonians, the second to Jacob, i.e. the Israelites, as does 'their' in 9. The yoke of Babylon was broken by its capture in 539 by the Persian king Cyrus, who allowed the exiles to return. For 'yoke' and 'bands' (thongs), see on 27:2. 10-11 are repeated in 46:27-28, but fit better here.

Judah and Israel are not to be consumed utterly: b see on 4:27. 12. 'Thy hurt is sore, thy wound is grievous'. 14. 'thy lovers': see on 4:30. The last words of 14 occurs again in 15, and should probably be omitted. 'thy sorrow is sore', as in 12. 16. 'Therefore': because the punishment is from God, he will end it when it has reached the full measure, and punish the wicked whom he has allowed to inflict it. 18. Yahweh will bring back Jacob's tents from captivity: Jerusalem shall be rebuilt upon her own mound, 'and the palace shall be inhabited after its wonted manner'. 21. Foreigners shall no longer rule: the native prince 'I shall cause to draw near, and he shall approach unto me': the words imply the priesthood in the Messianic ruler; cf. Ps 109:4; Zach 6:13. Who indeed has ever dared to take this office upon himself unauthorized by Yahweh? Lit.: 'for who is this that hath gone surety for his heart [i.e. for his courage] to approach unto me?' 23-24 are practically identical with 23:19-20, where they make an awkward interruption; probably they belong only here.

XXXI 1-40 The Restoration of Ephraim—'Ephraim' e

(6, 9, 18, 20) stands for the Northern Kingdom, of which it was the chief tribe, making up with Manasses 'the house of Joseph'; cf. Gen 48; Jos 18:5; Jg 1:22, 35, etc. The Northern Kingdom is also called here 'Samaria' (5) and 'Israel' simply (2, 4, 7, 9, 21) in contrast to Judah (27, 31), so that other words are added for clearness when 'Israel' embraces Judah as well (1, 37), unless mistake be impossible (33). Jerusalem is still to remain the national centre of worship (6).

Shalmaneser V, King of Assyria, conquered the d

Northern Kingdom in 721 B.C.; cf. 4 Kg 17. 2. Ephraim shall find grace in the desert 'used figuratively for the exile: 'I will go that I may cause Israel to rest'. 3. 'Yahweh hath appeared from afar', from his dwelling at Jerusalem, 'to me', Ephraim, saying, 'Yea, I have loved thee . . . therefore have I drawn thee' unto me. 5. 'The planters shall plant, and shall enjoy the fruit thereof', lit. 'shall treat as profane' (or common), i.e. the fruit. Cf. Lev 19:23-25: when a tree was planted, no fruit was to be gathered from it for the first three years, and the fruit of the fourth year was to be consecrated to God, but the owner might eat the fruit of the fifth year, which was then no longer taboo, but profane (common). Thus a period of settled peace and prosperity is indicated.

462d 6. The watchmen on the highlands of Ephraim shall give the signal for the pilgrimages to Jerusalem, thus showing that the schism between North and South is at an end. 7. 'Cry aloud at the head of the [liberated] nations'. 8. 'The north country' of the exile of Ephraim was Assyria. Even those who would find it most difficult to travel should return. 9. They shall return with tears of contrition. 'I shall bring them unto streams of water'.

15. 'A voice shall be heard on high': this may well be the right translation, as it has other good support besides Vg; but the same letters might mean 'in Rama' (mentioned 40:1), which was about 5 m. north of Jerusalem, not far from Rachel's tomb (cf. 1 Kg 10:2: the reputed site near Bethlehem can hardly be squared with 1 Kg 10) and near enough to justify Mt 2:17-18 in seeing here some indication of a Messianic event, as in Mt 2:15. 16. Rachel is poetically represented as to be compensated for her sorrow. 18. 'Hearing I have heard Ephraim bemoaning himself', and saying 'Thou hast chastised me'. 20. 'Is not Ephraim my dear son? Is he not my darling child?' The word 'not' is twice inserted here, to bring out the sense. 'For as often as I speak of him, I vividly remember him still'. 21. 'Set thee up guide-posts, make thee waymarks: set thy heart toward [mark well] the highway, the way by which thou shalt go' into exile, in order to return by it. 22. 'How long wilt thou go hither and thither, O thou backsliding daughter', hesitating to make thy peace with God and ensure thy return?

And then a great sign is promised, so great that it is even called a creation. The verb is in the perfect tense ('hath created'), but it is generally admitted that this is merely another example of the well-known idiom, the 'prophetic perfect', a vivid manner of representing a prophecy as already fulfilled. The present writer accepts Knabenbauer's explanation in CSS, which he regards as far more plausible than any other, but of course it presupposes that miracle and prophecy are possible. Instead of the initiative being taken by the man, as is usual in human generation, the physical process on the purely human side will be set on foot by the woman, who will 'press round' a man (a meaning given by BDB to the verb in this passage, but with a different implication). The miracle is emphasized by the word used for 'woman' being an unusual one, which stresses the sexual character. The word for 'man' (that found in Gabri-el 'man of God') is also an unusual one, implying strength and power; a cognate word (a fact significant in the present context) is applied as a name to the Messiah in Is 9:6 ('God the Mighty'), and directly to God himself in Ps 23:8 (twice); Deut 10:17; etc. This explanation of the passage is confirmed by the fairly obvious reference which it contains to Is 7:14, which can reasonably be supposed to have been familiar to Jeremias' hearers and readers, as to those of Mic 5:3, immediately after the mention of Bethlehem. Like Isaias, Jeremias passes easily by a process of compenetration from the temporary deliverance to the full Messianic deliverance of which it is a type.

23. The blessing shall be addressed to Jerusalem: 'O abode of righteousness! O holy mountain!' 24. 'therein' refers to the whole land of Judah. 25. 'For I have sated the thirst of the weary soul'. 26. The prophet awakes out of the sleep of ecstasy, which had revealed such pleasant things to him, and opens his eyes: omit 'as it were'. A new prophecy then begins. 27. Man and beast shall multiply. 29-30. The solidarity of family and nation and other human units is founded in human nature, and can only be disregarded with peril, nor does God say that he will disregard it; nor yet was the present generation of the Hebrews free from guilt. But the responsibility of the individual will be the ultimate measure of God's treatment of him; cf. Ez 18.

31-34, quoted at length in Heb 8:8-12, as is part of 33-34 in Heb 10:16-17; Rom 11:27. From both the passages in Hebrews the conclusion is drawn to a new dispensation, with Christ for high-priest (Heb 8:1; 10:21), in place of the old. The passage in Romans throws forward the complete fulfilment of the prophecy to the last stage in the world's history, when Jew and Gentile together will accept Christ (Rom 11:25-32). The prophet is indicating and contrasting the predominant characteristics of the two dispensations; not that faith and love and forgiveness were entirely absent from the old dispensation, or that proper instruction will be entirely unnecessary in the new. See (e.g.) the writer's article on 'The Prophets and Sacrifice: a study in biblical relativity', in JTS 42 (1941) 155-65. For 36-37, see Rom 11:29, just referred to; God will not renounce his call of 'all the seed of Israel'. 38. 'the tower of Hananeel' (Hananel; mentioned Neh 3:1; 12:38; Zach 14:10) was at the NE. corner of the city; 'the gate of the corner' (4 Kg 14:13; 2 Par 26:9) was at the NW. corner. 39. Gareb and Goathah (Goah) are not mentioned elsewhere; the latter presumably marked the SW. corner, and the former some future extension of the city wall to the west. 40. 'the ashes' are sacrificial ashes, and the vale of Hinnom is indicated (see on 7:31); hence it is 'the country of death', which is probably the right reading, though there is a textual difficulty.

The horse gate', however, seems to have been connected with the palace (4 Kg 11:16; 2 Par 23:15; Neh 3:28), which was south of the temple, so that 'the whole valley' seems to include the whole broad open depression at the SE. of the ancient city, south of Siloam, and some land round the SE. corner. All this valley 'shall be holy to Yahweh', and shall remain such, with its former infamous rites abolished, sharing in the general consecration of the city to the true God. XXXII 1-44 The Purchase of the Field—The siege of Jerusalem began in Sedecias' 9th year (39:1; 589 B.C.) but was discontinued for a while owing to the approach of an Egyptian army (see on 37:4). Jeremias intended to take advantage of the Babylonians' absence to visit his property in Anathoth, but was arrested on suspicion of deserting to the Babylonians and put into a dungeon (37:10-15), whence upon petition to King Sedecias he was removed to the freer custody of the 'guard-court' (37:21; 38:28). The present incident, which finds him there (32:2, 12), follows upon the events just mentioned, but is best considered here along with the other 'promises of restoration' in Part III (b).

8. Hanameel (Hanamel), the prophet's cousin, offers him the 'redemption' of a field in Anathoth. If a Hebrew were selling land, it was the duty of his next of kin to 'redeem', i.e. to buy it (see the introduction to the Book of Ruth in WV). This duty Jeremias is ordered by God to discharge, as a pledge that in spite of the capture of Jerusalem (15) 'houses and fields and vineyards shall yet again be bought in this land'.

1. The date is 587 B.C.—2. The Babylonians have resumed the siege of Jerusalem, and Jeremias is still in the guard-court, which formed part of the palace buildings; cf. 38:28. 5. 'till I visit him', ambiguous words, possibly Sedecias' softening of the prophet's sterner words (e.g. in 21:7). 8. Hanameel came to the guard-court (see §462j). 9. The price of the field was 'seventeen shekels of silver', about £2 2s 6d of our money, but the purchasing power was far greater. (St Matthew, compounding Zach 11:12-13 with Jer 32:6-9 and other verses, sees some foreshadowing in OT of the purchase of the 'Field of Blood', as in Mt 27:6-10; cf. Mt 2:15, 23; etc.) 10. 'And I wrote the deed, and sealed it'. 11. 'Then I took the purchase-deed which was sealed, containing the terms and conditions, and also that which was open'. 'containing' is here put for 'and' in the Hebrew; such seems the sense. 'terms and conditions' are probably technical legal terms, the precise sense of which is not clear.

14. The purchase-deed would be enclosed in an l

462i envelope of clay, upon the outside of which a duplicate text would be impressed, and the whole put in an earthen jar. Duplicate texts of this kind have been found in Babylonia; any dispute about the outside text would be settled by breaking the clay envelope before witnesses and referring to the inner text. 12. Baruch (cf. § 460a) receives the purchase deed (not a 'book'). 15. It is in the style of OT prophecy that this prediction should be accompanied by a symbolic act of this kind; purchase-deeds are to be preserved against the restoration.

m 16-25. The key to the prophet's prayer is in the last verse; Jeremias is perplexed at what he has been ordered to do, at a time when the Babylonians are about to capture Jerusalem. Yahweh's answer occupies the rest of the chapter. The prayer is full of OT references, too many to give here. In 18, taken from the decalogue, the text runs on in Ex 20:5; Deut 5:9, 'unto the third and fourth generation of them that hate me', thus applying only to descendants who follow in the wicked ways of their fathers, and it goes on to speak at once of God's mercy. 25. 'And thou hast said to me'; it does not seem to be a question. 26-35. Yahweh answers that Jerusalem shall certainly receive the punishment she deserves, and recapitulates her sins. The allusion in 32 is of course to false prophets.

36-44. Nevertheless the restoration will come. 40. 'I will make an everlasting covenant with them, that I will not turn back from them, from doing them good'. 43-44. Only 'fields' are mentioned, but evidently there is reference to the whole prophecy of 32:15.

n XXXIII 1-26 The Restoration is to be Full and Messianic—The story is taken up from the end of ch 32; cf. 33:1, 'a second time'. Judah and Israel are to be brought back, the Messiah is to sit upon the throne of David, and the Levitical priesthood is to continue. Jeremias is still in more or less free custody in the 'guard-court'. 2. 'Yahweh will do it, will plan it so as to establish it'. The figure is really taken from pottery (cf. 18:1-6; etc.): lit. 'will form [the vessel] so as to make it firm', not to be broken. 3. He will show the prophet 'great things and mysteries'. 4. He speaks 'concerning the houses . . . broken down (to make a defence) against the siege-mounds [the 'works' of 32:24] and against the sword'. 5. The beginning of the verse is difficult; we should perhaps read, 'Though the Chaldeans [Babylonians] are coming to fight'.

o 6 refers to the Hebrews: 'I will reveal to them abundance of peace and faithfulness', God's own faithfulness to his promises. 7. 'and the captivity of Israel. . . (9). And she [Jerusalem] shall be to me a name of joy', and the Gentiles 'shall fear and tremble', be filled with great awe. 10. 'There shall be heard . . . in the cities of Judah, and in the streets of Jerusalem . . . (11) the voice of joy . . . of them that bring thank-offerings'. LXX omit 14-26; and 15-16 repeat 23:5-6, where see notes.

p The rest of the chapter offers a difficulty, because it is evident that descendants of David did not 'sit upon the throne of the house of Israel' (17) after the return from the Babylonian exile, and that Levitical priests ceased to offer sacrifices to God (cf. 18) after the destruction of the temple by the Romans. A twofold answer may be given, of which the first part may be called the historical solution, corresponding to the actual facts, and the second, which it is no less necessary to bear in mind, the ideal solution, the scheme envisaged by Almighty God in the case of the Jews accepting their Messias.

q A. The historical solution. Christ is the Davidic king, and he shall reign for ever (Lk 1:32-33), though his kingdom is not of this world (Jn 18:36) in the sense that (to put it shortly and roughly) it leaves secular matters to be dealt with by the several temporal rulers. During the time between the exile and Christ's coming, the sceptre (in the sense of a certain autonomy) had not completely passed from Judah (cf. Gen 49:10), though there was an interval during which no descendant of David could be said to be sitting on his throne. On the other hand, during this interval the Levitical priests were sacrificing in the temple, and it is enough to understand the prophecy to refer to the time up to the coming of the Messias. Such a word as 'never' need not be pressed further than this, for words were not used so absolutely in OT; in Daniel, for example, the king is often greeted with the wish that he may 'live for ever'. But there were also positive indications that the Levitical priests were not to continue for ever; it is explained in Hebrews, with reference to Ps 109:4, that Christ himself was a priest 'after the manner of Melchisedech' though of the tribe of Judah (Heb 7) and not therefore a Levitical priest. And there is a manifest rejection of the Levitical priesthood and of the temple in Mal 1:10-11. Even Jeremias speaks of the new age as one in which the ark of the covenant, designed to be the very centre of OT worship shall be altogether forgotten (3:16), where we should rather have expected him to say that it would be restored. And in his picture of the new covenant in 31:31-34 (quoted in Heb 8:8-12) there is no question of Levitical worship.

B. The ideal solution. Thus the prophecy can be explained in the light of history; and in view of 18:7-10 it could be explained in the light of even graver difficulties. Nevertheless we cannot rightly understand the prophecy unless we allow for the fact that, if we may so put it reverently, the historical solution was God's second-best, and only became history through the Jews' rejection of Christ. If they had accepted him, we may take it that Jerusalem would have become the centre of the Christian Church; we may imagine Palestine as the independent papal state, and the temple as the mother and mistress of all the churches, with the OT priesthood still retained, though certainly not exclusively. We cannot fill in the details of the picture; but it drew tears from the Saviour's eyes as he gazed upon the city before entering it in short-lived triumph, even as Jeremias had wept over it, and as those can scarce forbear to do who are familiar with its history in the Scriptures and after them. 'Hadst thou but known!' (Lk 19:42.)

It is St Paul's doctrine (Gal 3:26-29, etc.) that all the members of Christ's Mystical Body are one with him, and thus are the seed of Abraham, and our Lord himself expressed this unity even more strongly at the Last Supper (Jn 17:20-23). Thus the seed of David has increased to countless millions since Christ's death, and the priests and Levites of the new dispensation have also become an immense multitude, though of course by no means so numerous as the faithful. 'The two families' of 24 are Israel and Judah; cf. 26, and chh 30-31, etc.

Part III (c) The Siege—chh 21, 34, 37-39. That ch 21, so clearly a siege story (cf. 21:4) should have its place so early in the book, is a striking sign of the disturbed state of the work as a whole. (For ch 20, see § 458k-m.) XXI 1-14 Sedecias' Enquiry and Jeremias' Answer—From 21:2 the time appears to be the very beginning of the siege; afterwards the Babylonians withdraw for a while: cf. § 462j. 1. Phassur is not he of 20:1 (the father being different), but of 38:1. For Sophonias, see on 35:4. 4. 'gather them together', perhaps the Babylonians: the meaning is doubtful. 9. The only way is to submit. 'as a spoil': see on 45:5. 11. 'And concerning the house'. 12. 'in the morning', the usual time for business, while it was still cool. 13. From the SE. Jerusalem might seem to stand out 'upon a rock above a plain', but the Hebrew seems to imply a 'tableland' rather than a rock; the description applies with difficulty to Jerusalem, but easily to Moab (cf. 48:8, 21), so that the verse may be misplaced. 14. Jerusalem is likened poetically to a forest from its cluster of houses; cf. Is 9:18-19.

463b XXXIV 1-22 The Fate of Jerusalem and Sedecias Foretold: the Emancipation of the Slaves—(For ch 33, see § 462*n-1*.) The city shall be taken and burnt, and Sedecias shall be taken away captive, but shall die in peace and receive the usual funeral rites. He had persuaded the citizens to free their Hebrew slaves, men and women, in accordance with Deut 15:12 (Jer 34:13-15); but when the siege was temporarily raised (21; cf. § 462*j*) they brought them back into slavery again (16). God rebukes them and promises punishment.

5. 'so shall they burn for thee' the usual spices, etc.; cf. 2 Par 16:14; 21:19. 7. Only two cities were left, Lachish (Tell ed-Duweir, about 25 m. SW. of Jerusalem) and Azecha (Azekah: Tell ez-Zakariyeh, about 15 m. SW. of Jerusalem). 9. 'so that they should not serve them, to wit, a man serve his Hebrew brother'. 'to wit' and the 2nd 'serve' are inserted for clearness.

6 The release probably did not go beyond the requirements of Deut 15:12, which however would doubtless cover the great majority of the slaves. 15. The act of release was solemnly performed in the temple, (16) so that to violate it was to profane Yahweh's name. 17. They had proclaimed liberty, every man to his brother, etc.; Yahweh now by way of punishing them for their perjury, proclaims liberty for them from his own service, handing them over 'to the sword and pestilence and famine' as to their new masters, 'and I will make you a conspiration to all the kingdoms of the earth': see on 15:4. 18-19. For the sacrificial rite, cf. Gen 15:10, 17. The parties may be calling upon themselves a similar cutting into two is they fail to observe their part of the compact, or the unity of the contracting parties within the same sacred victim may be implied, as in the eating of the same sacrificial meal. 19. 'eunuchs' may sometimes mean mere officials, e.g. Putiphar in Gen 39:1.

d XXXVII 1-20 Jeremias Arrested: Sedecias' Enquiries—(For ch 36, see § 460*a-b*.) 1. It was Sedecia whom (as the text means) Nabuchodonosor had made king. 3. For Sophonias, see § 460*e*. Juchal reappears in 38:1. 4. The Pharaoh Hophra (589-564 B.C.; cf. 44:30) advanced with an army to relieve Jerusalem. Nabuchodonosor accordingly abandoned the siege for a while, defeated the Egyptians and drove them back to Egypt, after which he resumed the siege and took the city. Cf. Ez 17:11-2; Jos., Ant. 10, 7, 3; § 462*j*. 9. Even if there were left of the Babylonians only 'men wounded' desperately (lit. 'pierced through'), they would take and burn Jerusalem; Yahweh's decree of doom stands fast. 11. Jeremias probably intended to visit his native Anathoth, perhaps to receive an inheritance, (12) when he was arrested at the Benjamin gate (mentioned again 38:7), which must have been in the north wall, (14) and imprisoned in the house of Jonathan, the king's secretary, 'for they had made that the prison'. 19-20. Sedecias, however, upon the prophet's request, had him removed to the freer custody of the guard-court, 'and they gave him a daily loaf of bread out of the bakers' street'.

6 XXXVIII 1-28 XXXIX 15-18 Imprisonment: Sedecias again consults the Prophet: the Promise to Abdemelech—The removal of Jeremias to the guard-court (37:20) made the publication of his prophecies all the easier. 1. 'Phassur the son of Melchias', already mentioned 21:1; 'Juchal' already in 37:3; 'Gedalias', perhaps the son of the Phassur of 20:1. 2. 'his life shall be to him as a spoil': see on 45:5. 5. Sedecias fears to resist the princes: 'The king can do nothing against you'. 6. So they cast Jeremias into the cistern (so throughout 7:13) of Melchias, which was in the guard-court: an underground pit for storing water, whence Abdemelech obtains permission to release him. 7. 'the Benjamin gate', already in 37:12. 10. 'thirty' should probably be 'three'. 16. 'hath made for us this soul', i.e. these lives of ours. 17. Even now Sedecias can save himself and his city by surrender. 22. Many women had been carried away with Joachin in 598 B.C.: the rest shall deride Sedecias: 463e

'Thy friends have prevailed over thee, and set on thee:
Now that thy feet are sunk in the mire, they have turned away from thee'.

28. 'the house of Jonathan'; cf. 37:14, 19. 28. 'Jeremias remained in the guard-court'. 'And it came to pass, when Jerusalem was taken': these words properly belong to the beginning of the next chapter, where see note.

Abdemelech, the Ethiopian eunuch, had rescued Jeremias from the cistern, where he would probably have died (38:7-13); he now receives a message of comfort in return (XXXIX 15-18), which however, as indicated in 15, belongs to the time when the prophet was in the guard-court, and was probably delivered soon after the rescue. 18. 'thy life shall be as a spoil to thee'; see on 45:5.

XXXIX 1-14 The Capture of Jerusalem—The chapter should begin, as already noted, with the last words of 38:28, and then probably go on to 39:3; the intermediate verses interrupt the sense and the sentence ('it came to pass . . . that all the princes'). But 39:4-13 (omitted by LXX) is probably likewise a later insertion, for of course Sedecias would not wait for the chief Babylonian officials to be sitting in state at the gates before attempting to escape. What does happen is that they send for Jeremias, whose story is thus continued.

The two interjected verses, 1-2, are abridged from 4 Kg 25:1-4a (=Jer 52:4-7a). The siege began in 589, and ended in 587. 3. The princes 'sat' in solemn session to deliver judgements and give directions. Probably there was only one Nergal-sharezer; the first mention may be a slip for 'Nabusezban' (Nebushazban) in 13. 'Rabsares' (Rab-saris) may be a title ('chief of the eunuchs', or perhaps 'great chief'), and similarly Rebmag ('Rab-mag', chief of the soothsayers). 4-10 is an abridgement of 4 Kg 25:4-12 (=Jer 52:7-16). 11-13 also offer a difficulty, because Nabuzardan (Nebuzaradan) is not mentioned in 3, and did not come to Jerusalem till a month after the capture of the city; cf. 39:2; 52:12. There is no difficulty of course in Nabuchodonosor's order to him in 11-12, but the mention of it is not likely originally to have belonged here. 14. For Ahicam, see on 26:24. His son Godolias was made 'governor over the cities of Judah' (40:5), but was murdered by Ishmael and his party (41:2).

The commentary upon the historical matter in this section is reserved for 4 Kg, where it comes in more appropriately.

Part IV After the Capture of Jerusalem (587 B.C.): 464a chh 40-4—The folly which had marked the behaviour of the Hebrews towards the irresistible power of Babylon continued to mark it after the capture of their city. The Babylonian treatment of Judah was milder than the Assyrian treatment of the Northern Kingdom in 721 B.C. Those deported seem on the whole to have been treated fairly well, no alien colonists were imported, and the poorer classes (who, left without leaders, were not likely to rebel) were encouraged to settle peacefully on the land under the Hebrew governor Godolias. This Jeremias, who remained with Godolias, likewise encouraged them to do. But Ishmael (41:1), who was of the blood royal and probably hoped with the help of Ammon to mount the now vacant throne, murdered Godolias, and ultimately (41:10, 15) fled back to Ammon. Johanan (41:11) and the other leaders of the Jews fled to Egypt for fear of the vengeance of the Babylonians, in spite of the exhortations of Jeremias to remain in Palestine, and his threats of what would

b XL 1-16 Jeremias remains with Godolias the Governor, who encourages the Hebrews to settle down peaceably.

1. For Rama, see on 31:15. Nabuzardan (Nebuza-radan) was 'captain of the bodyguard' (again 2, 5; 41:10). 4. He promises Jeremias, 'I will set mine eyes upon thee', as ordered in 39:12, i.e. he will look well after him. 5. For Godolias, see on 39:14. 6. Masphath (Mizpah), probably the height Neby Samwil, about 4½ m. NW. of Jerusalem. 7-8. 'The captains of the forces which were in the fields, both they and their men . . . came to Godolias at Masphath': and so in 13. 10. 'I dwell in Masphath (lit.) to stand before the Chaldeans', i.e. to take orders from the Babylonians, while representing your interests. 14. The king of Ammon was hostile to Babylon (27:3), and probably hoped that Ishmael might join in resistance.

c XLI 1-18 Ishmael slays Godolias and those with him, and seventy others, but is forced to take refuge with the Ammonites. The Jewish captains prepare to flee to Egypt. 1. Three months after the capture of the city (cf. 39:2), Ishmael (2) murders Godolias (3) and his Babylonian body-guard with him, 'even the soldiers'. 6. Ishmael feigned sympathy with the eighty men, who were mourning the destruction of the temple. 8. Subterranean pits were used for storage, (9) but the corpses were thrown into a cistern, doubtless built by King Asa to supply Masphath with water when he was fortifying it against King Baasa (3 Kg 15:22). 12. 'the great waters' are probably 'the pool of Gabaon' (2 Kg 2:13), about a mile north of Masphath. 18. The Jewish captains were afraid of what the Babylonians might do to punish the murder of Godolias.

d XLII 1-22 Jeremias warns the Jewish Captains against fleeing to Egypt, where destruction will overtake them. 1. For 'Jezonias' (which is read in MT here from 40:8) read 'Azarias', as in LXX and 43:2. 2. 'Let our supplication fall before thee', which in the Hebrew idiom means 'be laid before thee', and with success, 'be accepted', as in 37:19. 10. 'for I repent of the evil', an anthropomorphic expression of a kind common in Holy Scripture; in man a change of purpose would be implied, but in God only of conduct. 12. 'And I will grant you mercy, that he may have mercy on you, and may cause you to dwell in your own land'; (13) but if you say, "We will not dwell in this land", so that you hearken not to God's voice . . . 21-22. Jeremias sees already that they do not mean to obey his message.

e XLIII 1-18 In spite of Jeremias' Words, the Jews proceed to Egypt, taking Jeremias with them: he foretells the conquest of Egypt by Nabuchodonosor. 7. Taphnes, see on 2:16. Driver translates (9): 'bury them in mortar in the pavement which is at the entry of Pharaoh's house', and suggests that the pavement may be the large oblong brick pavement close to the palace-fort built by Psammetichus I (664-610 B.C.), and excavated by Flinders Petrie in 1886. 13. 'And he shall break the pillars' or obelisks 'of the house' or temple 'of the sun', with allusion to that in the Egyptian city On, called Heliopolis ('city of the sun') by the Greeks, about 6 m. NE. of Cairo. The temple was erected by Thothmes III c 1500 B.C., with an avenue of obelisks in front of it, one of which is still in situ, and another is 'Cleopatra's Needle', on the Thames Embankment. An inscription of Nabuchodonosor states that he invaded Egypt in 568 B.C. and defeated King Amasis of Egypt (570-526 B.C.).

f XLIV 1-30 Jeremias rebukes the Jews in Egypt for Idolatry—They will perish there in consequence. The Jews defend their practices. 1. Magdal (Migdol), on NE. border of Egypt, a little E. of Taphnes, for which (and Memphis) see on 2:16. 'the land of Phatures' (Pathros) is Upper Egypt (again in 15). 10. 'They have not humbled themselves even to this day'.

14. (at end) 'none shall return save fugitives' who also shall be but 'few in number' (cf. 28). 17. 'every word that is gone forth out of our mouth': a solemn expression for a vow; cf. 25. 'the queen of heaven': probably Astarte; see on 7:18. 19. 'And when we sacrificed . . . and poured out . . . was it without (the consent of) our husbands that we made cakes to portray her [probably with her image stamped upon them, or in her shape] and poured out drink-offerings to her?' There may well be an allusion to Num 30:7 ff.; their husbands did not cancel their vows. Obviously 19 is spoken by the women, and the Peshitta and some MSS of LXX mention the fact, but the weight of textual evidence is against the insertion. 23. 'to idols' is not in the text, but gives the sense. In 25 LXX reads 'Ye women have spoken', and this verb and the last two in the verse are in the feminine in MT, so that the whole verse may be addressed to the women. They say, 'We will surely perform our vows': Yahweh answers ironically, 'Fulfil then your vows, perform your vows!' 26-27 must be understood of the band of idolatrous rebels whom the prophet is addressing (Knabenbauer, Condamin); later on there were many Jews in Egypt. 30. For Pharaoh Ephree (Hophra), see on 37:4. He was deposed by a military revolution and ultimately strangled. (For ch 45, see § 460c.)

Part V Prophecies against the Nations: chh 46-51— 465a
These belong to the time following the battle of Carchemish (605 B.C.), in which Nabuchodonosor, commanding the Babylonian army as his father's general, decisively defeated the Egyptians under the Pharaoh Nechao (Necho), establishing Babylonian supremacy over the Middle East. Nabuchodonosor shortly afterwards succeeded his father as king of Babylon. These prophecies may originally have followed ch 25, where LXX places them, though not in the same order; that chapter may in any case serve as a kind of introduction to them, though they so interrupt the story of Jeremias that it has seemed better to keep them here. Such indeed may have been the reason why they came to find their way here, if they were not here originally.

XLVI 1-28 Egypt—1 is the general title of Part V, b and 2 of this chapter. 3-4. A picture of the Egyptians preparing for battle. 'Harness the horses' to the chariots, an important part of an Egyptian army; 'the horsemen' are the cavalry. 5-6. But almost at once he sees them in flight. 'Terror on every side'; see on 20:3. Escape is hopeless. They have been defeated at Carchemish (2); see § 459b. 7-8. Egypt was puffed up with pride, but her boasts have come to naught. 'Who is this that riseth up like the Nile [in its annual flood] and his waters toss themselves like rivers? Egypt riseth up like the Nile, and his waters toss themselves like rivers. And he saith . . .'. 'The city' seems to be used (by a Heb. idiom, as in 47:2) for 'cities' in general, with their inhabitants. 9. 'Go up, ye horses [from Egypt northward] and rage, ye chariots', driving madly ahead. These 'Lydians' are a people near the west border of Egypt. Mercenaries from these three nations (Ethiopians, Libyans, Lydians) formed the chief part of the Egyptian armies; cf. Ez 30:5, etc. 10. But the expedition is going to end in Yahweh taking vengeance on them at Carchemish (605 B.C.); the death of King Josias (609 B.C.), defeated and killed by the Pharaoh Necho at Megiddo, was still a recent memory. 11. The balm (balsam) of Galaad (Gilead) is also mentioned in 8:22 (cf. 51:8), etc. The Egyptians were famous for their knowledge of medicines. 12. The Egyptian warriors have stumbled against each other in their flight.

13-26 Jeremias prophesies the Successful Invasion of Egypt by Nabuchodonosor, which took place in 568 B.C.; see on 43:13. Sedecias had sought help from Egypt; cf. Ez 17:15. 14. For 'Magdal', see on 44:1; for Memphis and Taphnes, on 2:16. 'prepare thyself' to resist the invader. 15. 'Wherefore 465c hath Apis fled, hath thy strong one made no stand? This on the whole seems the more likely translation. The reference to Apis, the divine bull of Egypt, is apparently preserved in LXX, the translators of which (being in Egypt) would more easily understand it. It implies very little change in MT. Even in the alternative translation ('Wherefore is thy strong one beaten down? He hath made me stand') the 'strong one' is generally recognized to be the Apis bull, the word being often used in OT of bulls, e.g. in Ps 21:13 'many bulls have encompassed me: strong ones of Bashan have beset me round'. But in 47:3 and 50:11 horses are meant. 16. The foreign mercenaries (see on 9) will wish to escape home 'from the oppressing sword': similarly in 50:16.

d 17. 'Call ye the name of Pharaoh king of Egypt Crash', the crash of disastrous battle; 'he hath let the appointed time [of grace or of preparation] pass by'. 18. 'so shall he come', i.e. Nabuchodonosor, towering over all. 20. There shall come upon Egypt 'a gad-fly', Nabuchodonosor with his army. 22. 'Her sound shall be like a serpent as it goeth', hissing impotently at the wood-cutters who destroy its retreat in the underwood. 23. The many flourishing cities of Egypt are compared to a forest. 25. 'Behold, I will punish Amon [the god] of No [Thebes, the capital of Upper Egypt, now Luxor] and Pharaoh and those who trust in him'. The intervening words are almost certainly an interpolation, as the repetition of 'and Pharaoh' shows. 26. The prophecy concludes with a promise of restoration. 27-28 practically repeat 30:10-11, and probably belong there alone; they do not fit in well here.

o XLVII 1-7 The Philistines and Phoenicians—It is implied in 4 that the Phoenicians (Tyre and Sidon) were involved in the general disaster, but the Philistines furnish the main theme. Tyre and Sidon were on the Mediterranean coast to the extreme north of Palestine, and the Philistines to the west of Judah. 1. 'The word of Yahweh' is 'concerning the Philistines'. When precisely the Pharaoh, obviously Necho (see §465a, etc.), 'smote Gaza' on the SW. coast of Palestine is not known. 2. 'The waters' are the Babylonians: 'the city' is used collectively for 'cities'; see on 46:8. 3. 'At the noise of the stamping of the hoofs of his strong ones [here horses; see on 46:15], at the rattling of his chariots, at the rumbling of his wheels, the fathers look not back' to carry away their children, their hands hang feebly in their terror. 4. 'because of the day that cometh to despoil all the Philistines, to cut off from Tyre and Sidon every helper that surviveth', all other helpers having been already cut off from these doomed cities. 'For Yahweh is about to despoil the Philistines, the remnant of the isle of Caphthor', i.e. Crete, their home; they were an Aryan race. 5. 'Baldness' and cutting oneself were signs of mourning; see on 16:6. Gaza, Ascalon, Ekron, Ashdod (Azotus) and Gath were the leading Philistine cities (cf. 25:20). 'Ascalon is destroyed: O remnant of Accaron (Ekron), how long wilt thou gash thyself?' This seems the most likely translation, but 'Accaron' implies a change in the Hebrew word, which as it stands can only mean 'their valley', and is recognized by all to be a scribe's mistake. A lesser change would give, 'O remnant of the Anakim', older inhabitants of those parts; cf. Jos 11:22 ('Enacims'), etc. 6 appears to be a cry of the Philistines for mercy. 7 is the prophet's answer, that such is the work to which Yahweh has appointed his sword.

466a XLVIII 1-47 Moab—The territory of Moab was the high and rich tableland east of the Dead Sea; but after the Israelite conquest the tribe of Reuben was assigned the territory north of the Arnon, which flows in from the east about the middle of the Dead Sea (cf. Jos 13:15-21), territory which had been part of Seon's former kingdom (see on 45). But Reuben did not succeed in holding this territory, so that here and in Is 15-16 cities assigned to it are mentioned as Moabite. Nabo, Cariathaim (which is probably 'the strong place'), Heshbon (about 14 m. E. of NE. corner of Dead Sea), Horonaim (NE. corner of Dead Sea) and Luith (near E. of Dead Sea, about a third from the S. end) are Moabite cities. 2. 'In Heshbon they have devised evil against her', i.e. Moab. Heshbon is represented as already captured by the enemy, and the sword is to overtake the rest of Moab. 4. 'her little ones have caused a cry to be heard'; but perhaps, with LXX and a slight change in MT, 'they make a cry to be heard unto Zoar', at the extreme SE. of the Dead Sea, and probably now under it, so that the sense would be, 'from one end of Moab (e.g. from Heshbon in the north) to the other'. 6. 'heath' is probably the juniper; see on 17:6. But LXX 'wild ass' (shy and difficult to capture) is a tempting reading.

7. Chemosh (Chamos) was the national god. 8. 'the valley' of Jordan towards the Dead Sea, and the main 'tableland'. 9. 'Give wings to Moab, for she would fain fly away'. 10. 'Cursed be he that doth Yahweh's work negligently', i.e. the appointed destruction of Moab. 11. 'Moab hath been at ease', like good wine improved by resting on its own sediment. 12. 'I will send him men that tilt up' wine-bottles skilfully, so as to let the liquid run off clear, leaving the sediment, 'and they will tilt him up, and empty his vessels, and dash his jars in pieces'.

13. Bethel was the rival sanctuary to Jerusalem set up by Jeroboam in the Northern Kingdom; cf. Am 5:5, etc. 15. 'they have gone up into her cities, and the flower of her young men have gone down to be slaughtered' like cattle—such is the implication of the word. 17. 'know his name' probably implies considerable knowledge of Moab, in accordance with the pregnant sense of 'name' in Heb. 'strong staff' and 'beautiful rod' imply strength, authority, glory. 18-19. 'daughter of Dibon . . . inhabitress of Aroer', the inhabitants of these Moabite cities, both a little north of the Arnon. 'bulwarks', better 'fortifications'. 21 'Judgement is come upon the tableland'. 26. 'Make him drunk' with terror and despair; see on 25:15. 'Let Moab fall with a splash into his own vomit'. 27. 'For was not Israel a derision unto thee? Or had he been caught among thieves, that as often as thou spakest of him, thou didst wag thy head (in scorn)?' This ends the verse. 28. 'Be ye like the dove that maketh her nest in the sides of the hole's mouth'. The text is a little uncertain, but the reference is to the many fissures in the rocky sides of the defiles of Palestine, especially in the gorge of the Arnon, where numberless doves nest.

29-39 contain many reminiscences of Is 15-16, where also there is question of the doom of Moab, with much that throws light on these verses. References are given to the chief Isaian parallels. 29-30: Is 16:6. 'I know his arrogance . . . his boastings are vain, their deeds are vain'. The Heb. is too idiomatic for a close translation. 31: Is 16:7. 'I will cry out for all Moab, for the men of Kir-heres (Is: Kir-hareseth) will I moan', a strong fortress 16 m. S. of the Arnon and 8 m. E. of the Dead Sea. 32: Is 16:8-10. The vines of Sabama (Sibmah, probably 2½ m. WNW. of Heshbon) spread out to Jazer (N. of Heshbon?) and SW. over the Dead Sea; Jazer shall mourn their loss. 33: Is 16:10. For 'Carmel' read 'the fruitful land'; see on 2:7. 34: Is 15:4-6. A difficult verse, from which some words may have fallen out; in the light of Is 15:4-6 we may perhaps read, 'Heshbon crieth out, and Eleale [near Heshbon]: even unto Jahaz [about 6 m. S. of Heshbon?] they have uttered their voice, from Segor [Zoar, see on 48:4] to Horonaim [see §466a] and the third Eglath [? there may have been three Eglaths near each other]: for the waters of Nemrim also [probably Wady Numeirah near SE. end of Dead Sea] shall become desolate'. 35. Cf. Is 15:2; 16:12. 36: Is 16:11; 15:7a. 'and my heart soundeth like pipes', such as were used at funerals, 'for the men of Kir-heres [cf. 31] therefore the abundance that he [Moab] hath gotten is perished'.

37: Is 15:2-3. All these are signs of mourning: o

466e 'upon all hands are gashes'. See on 16:6. 39. 'How hath Moab turned his back with shame!' 40. 'One like an eagle [Nabuchodonosor, like (strictly speaking) a griffon-vulture] shall fly, and spread out his wings against Moab'. In 49:22 much of 40b and 41b are applied to Edom. 41. The site of Carioth (Kerioth, the native place of Judas Iscariot) is uncertain. With 43-44a cf. Is 24:17-18. 45b-46 are based on Num 21:28-9; 24:17. 45. 'Beneath the shadow of Heshbon stood the fugitives without strength', hoping for protection; but the city was to prove only the beginning of the conflagration which was to destroy Moab, 'a flame from the house of Seon' (or Sihon), another name for Heshbon, from its former king (Num 21:26). This flame 'shall devour the temples of Moab's head, and the crown of the head of the sons of the battle-din': 'battle-din' as in 25:31, the reference being to the Moabite warriors: 'temples', perhaps the hair was removed from them with religious significance; see on 9:26. 46. Chemosh, see on 48:7. 47. The prophecy ends with hope of restoration for Moab, as for Egypt (46:26), Ammon (49:6), Elam (49:39), and probably Edom (49:11).

f XLIX 1-6 'On the Children of Ammon'—The tribe of Gad was assigned a territory in Transjordan stretching roughly from the head of the Dead Sea to the north of the Jabbok, the northern part of the former kingdom of Seon (Sihon). In the semi-arid district east of the wide semi-circle of the Jabbok dwelt Ammon, with its capital Rabbath-Ammon (later Philadelphia, now Amman) in a strong position near the source of the river. Under the system of the loose confederacy of tribes, however, Gad was as little able to resist the incursions of Ammon as was Reuben to withstand Moab. King David subjugated Edom, Moab, and Ammon, but Reuben and Gad did not permanently recover.

g 1. Milcom (Melchom) was the national god of the Ammonites, and here represents them. 2. 'her daughters' are the towns and villages near Rabbath-Ammon. 3. Hai is apparently an otherwise unknown town near Heshbon, which however was a Moabite city; some not very successful efforts have been made to emend the text. 4. 'Why gloriest thou in thy valley?' 'valley' may be repeated by mistake with a verb. Though on a high tableland, Rabbath-Ammon lay between hills. 'delicate' is uncertain. 'Who shall come to me?' This alludes to the strong defensive position of the city; but (5) the enemy shall be all round, 'and we shall be driven away every man right forth, and there shall be none to collect them that wander'. 6. Once more the last word is one of hope; see on 48:47.

h 7-22 'On Edom'—Edom at this time still inhabited the plateau SE. of the Dead Sea, with the capital perhaps at Teman, near Petra; but some take Teman for a district. The Nabataean Arabs were soon to drive the Edomites more to the west, so that the later Idumaea cannot be said to correspond at all closely to the earlier Edom. Edom, Ammon, Moab, and Israel, together with the Canaanites, the Syrians (Aramaean) at Damascus and the Phoenicians in Tyre and Sidon, were all kindred races; the Arabs, Babylonians and Assyrians, though likewise Semites, were less closely related to the group. The Philistines were not Semites at all. There was always much enmity between the Hebrews and Edomites (cf. Ps 136:7); but the former were convinced that their cause was the cause of God. With 49:7, 9, 10a, 14-16, cf. Abd 8 and 1-6.

i 7. The Themanites, and the Edomites in general, appear to have had a certain reputation for wisdom: cf. Job 2:11; Abd 8. 8. 'dwell deep down', in inaccessible hiding-places. Esau was the father of the Edomites (Gen 36:8-9); Dedan was a district to the SE. of Edom, the inhabitants of which are warned to flee, for fear of sharing Edom's fate. 9. 'If grape-gatherers come to thee, they will leave no gleanings; if thieves by night, they will destroy till they have had enough'. In Abd the turn of the phrase is different. 10. 'I have revealed his secret places': his race is ruined, 'he doth not exist'. These last words have been used to throw suspicion on 11: but Egypt, Moab and Ammon were not left without hope; see on 48:47.

12. 'the cup' is that of Yahweh's fury; cf. 25:12, 28:29. 'they to whom it did not properly belong to drink' were the Hebrews. 13. 'Bosra', an Edomite city about 20 m. SE. of the Dead Sea. 'her cities' are doubtless her smaller neighbours. 14. The language is figurative. 'and rise up to battle!' 16 in MT begins, 'O thy trembling', but the word is not found in Abd 3, and the text is uncertain. 'Thou that . . . holdest the height of the hill'. 17. 'hiss', or, as we might say, 'whistle', to match the parallel word 'be appalled' (rather than merely 'astonished'). The verse is largely identical with 19:8. 18. Cf. Deut 29:23; Gen 10:19, etc. The verse is practically repeated in 50:40.

19. Edom is compared to a flock of sheep, against which he will send a lion (Nabuchodonosor), which will 'come up from the jungle of the Jordan [the thick semi-tropical vegetation fringing its banks] against the established sheepfold: for in a moment I will chase them [the sheep] away from it [the lion]. And whosoever is chosen [i.e. whosoever I choose] I will appoint over it', over the flock. 'For who is like to me' in power? 'Or who will fix a time for me', make an appointment to meet me in a trial of strength or in a court of law (cf. Job 9:19)? 'And who is the shepherd that can stand before me', i.e. the ruler that can defend his people from me? 20. 'Surely they [their enemies like wild beasts] shall drag along [the Edomites like] the little [helpless] ones of the flock; surely their sheepfold shall be appalled because of them'. 19-21 are repeated with variations in 50:44-46. 22. In 48:40b, 41b much the same words are applied to Moab.

23-27 'On Damascus'—Damascus, a city of renown and joy (25) in times ancient and modern, situated in a beautiful oasis formed by the streams from the Anti-Lebanon before they lose themselves in the desert to the east, was the capital of Aram (Syria), a powerful kingdom to the NE. of Palestine, until finally subdued by Assyria in 732 B.C. Ben-hadad was the name of several of its kings. Emath (Hamath) was 110 m. N. of Damascus, and Arpad (Arpad) 95 m. N. of Hamath. Evidently all these had refused to submit to Nabuchodonosor, and were to feel his vengeance.

23b is difficult and uncertain: Driver renders, 'because of care, like the sea, they cannot rest'. 26 is repeated in 50:30. In 27 'palaces' of Ben-hadad seems better. The verse may have been partly suggested by Am 1:4, 14.

28-33 'On Kedar (Cedar) and the Kingdoms of Asor m (Hazor)', which Nabuchodonosor king of Babylon smote'. For 'Kedar', see on 2:10. 'Asor' may be a collective term denoting village settlements of Arab tribes to the S. and E. of Palestine, as distinguished from the nomadic tribes.

28 contains a summons to the Babylonians to attack, and 29 a promise of booty: the 'curtains' are the tent-hangings. The invaders shall cry out to the natives, 'Terror on every side'; see on 20:3. 31 is again a summons to the Babylonians, and 32 a promise of booty. 'their hair cut round'; see on 9:26. 33. 'Asor shall be a lair of jackals', like Jerusalem (9:11) and the cities of Judah generally (10:22), and Babylon (51:37).

34-39 'Concerning Elam'—For Elam, see on 25:25. The later date assigned to this prophecy marks it out as a subsequent addition, made at a time when the deportations to Babylonia would increase the knowledge of Elam and interest in it.

35. 'The bow of Elam' was 'their chief strength'. 38. 'I will set up my throne' of judgement, condemning its kings and princes to destruction by the Babylonians. 39. But here again the prophecy ends with a promise of restoration; see on 48:47.

467a L 1-LI 58 'Concerning Babylon'—The longest and most vehement prophecy is against Babylon. She has been God's instrument for punishing other nations, but she is not to escape punishment herself. The city was captured by the Persian king Cyrus in 539 B.C. It has been too easily assumed by some non-Catholic scholars that Jeremiah cannot have written this section, even while they practically admit that it is written in his style. It is a mistake to suppose that a prophet who loved his own chosen country so much could have any really friendly feelings towards its ruthless foe: a still greater mistake, of course, to suppose that real prophecy is impossible, and that therefore these chapters must have been written only a little before the fall of Babylon, when that fall could easily be foreseen. There is some repetition of the main topics, which seems to be due to the author writing under strong feeling.

b 1. 'In the hand of' is a Heb. idiom for 'by'. 2. 'a standard', some sort of signal to attract attention. 'Bel', the Babylonian form of 'Baal' (see on 2:8, and cf. Dan 14:2), and here probably a title of Marduk (Merodach) supreme god of Babylon. The 'nation' of 3 is spoken of in 51:11, 28 as the Medes, a usage also found sometimes in Greek literature; the dominant nation was the Persian, but the two were closely united and were together supreme in the Persian empire. Persia proper lay on the eastern side of the Persian Gulf; Media lay NW. of it, NE. of Babylonia. 4. Cyrus allowed the exiles to return to Jerusalem. 5. The words they shall say are, 'Come ye, and let us join ourselves to Yahweh', etc. 7. 'because they have sinned against Yahweh', here called 'the abode of righteousness and the hope of their fathers'. 8. 'be ye as the he-goats', leading the way.

c 9. 'the great nations' are the Persians and Medes and their allies; 'from thence [by enemies mainly from the north] she shall be captured: their arrows shall be as those of a skilled warrior, who returneth not empty'; cf. 2 Kg 1:22. The Persians relied much on the bow. 11-12 are addressed to Babylonians; 'your mother' is Babylon. 'Because ye rejoice, because ye exult, O ye that pillage mine inheritance: because ye gambol like heifers at grass and neigh like horses [see on 46:15], your mother shall be very ashamed, she that bare you shall be abashed. Behold [understand here, "men shall say"] the last of the nations, a wilderness, a dry land, and a desert'. 14. The foe is invited to attack. 15. 'Shout against her round about! She hath given her hand [in token of submission; cf. Lam 5:6]; her buttresses are fallen'. 16. Foreigners settled in Babylon shall flee 'from the oppressing sword'; cf. 46:16. 17. Israel's misfortunes are told in metaphor, but (19-20) she is promised restoration and pardon. Bashan, E. and NE. of the Lake of Galilee.

d 21 begins a fresh invitation to attack Babylon. 'Go up against the land of Merathaim, go up against it, and against the inhabitants of Pekod'. The former is Babylonia, but it is not clear how; perhaps the name has been adapted somewhat in order to let it mean symbolically 'double (i.e. intense) defiance' or 'bitterness'. The latter are mentioned (though DV does not show this) in Ez 23:23; they were a people of Babylonia bordering on Elam, and are perhaps mentioned here because the name could suggest 'visitation' or 'punishment'. 'all behind them' should be omitted with LXX and Syr., being probably due to dittography. Yahweh's weapons in 25 are the attacking nations. Words are taken from this verse in Rom 9:22: see also Is 13:5; 54:16. 26. 'open her granaries: pile her up [and all inside her] like heaps [of corn] and destroy her utterly' as an abomination; cf. Deut 13:12-18. 27. 'her valiant men', lit. 'her young bulls'; cf. Is 34:7. 28. The liberated Jews shall tell in Sion the vengeance taken by Yahweh on the Babylonians for the destruction of his temple. 29. 'Call together the archers against Babylon, all that bend the bow: encamp against her round about'. 30 repeats 49:26. 34. 'Their redeemer' or vindicator, strictly speaking the next of kin; cf. the introduction to Ruth in WV. 467d 'to give rest to [not terrify] the earth': most of the nations had been disturbed by Babylon; cf. Nah 3:19 on Nineveh. 36. 'her diviners' are doubtless meant: lit. 'her boastings'. 37. 'the mixed people' in the midst of her are the mixed foreign population (cf. 25:20); but the following words may imply that foreign mercenary troops are especially in question. 39. For 'dragons' Driver conjectures 'wild cats', from the cognate Arabic word; and the 'fig fauns' are probably 'wolves'. 40 practically repeats 49:18, and 41-43 are adapted to Babylon from 6:22-24. 42. 'They lay hold on bow and javelin'. 44-46 largely repeat 49:19-21, adapted from Edom to Babylon: in this case the 'lion' is Cyrus.

LI 1 'I am about to stir up against the inhabitants of Leb-kamai the spirit of a destroyer', i.e. of Cyrus: cf. 11. 'Leb-kamai' means 'the heart', or in the applied sense, 'the midst', which seems better here, 'of those who rise up against me', and is here an anagram for 'Chaldaea', i.e. Babylonia, similar to the anagram 'Sheshak'; see on 25:26. MT reads 'against Babylon and against the inhabitants', etc.; but the mention of Babylon should probably be omitted, because it spoils the metre, and because it would be incongruous to insert it before its anagram. Later on it might be thought necessary to interpret the anagram. 2. 'I will send to Babylon winnowers, and they shall winnow her, and empty her land' by their devastations. For the figure of winnowing, see on 15:7; 4:11. 3. The text is difficult and uncertain; it may mean that it will be useless for the Babylonians to try to defend themselves. 4. 'and those pierced through [i.e. desperately wounded] in her streets'.

5. 'forsaken', lit. 'widowed': Yahweh is not dead, f but has punished their sins, and now will avenge them. 6 is addressed to the Jews in Babylon: 'be not cut off in her iniquity'. 7. The nations 'are mad' from having drunk her wine; cf. 25:15-16, with note. 8. Cf. Is 21:9; Apoc 14:8. 'take balm': see on 46:11. The words are here ironical. In 9 the Jews in Babylon appear to be addressing the other foreigners there: she should have profited by their presence to learn the true religion. 'forsake her' is imperative. 'her judgement' is her punishment. 10. Yahweh has shown openly the righteousness of our cause. In 11 'the king of the Medes' is Cyrus; cf. 51:1. 'the vengeance of the temple'; see on 50:28. 12. 'against the walls . . . strengthen the watch [invest it closely], set watchers [whose business it will be to see that this is done], prepare the ambushes', perhaps against sorties: cf. Jos 8:12 ff.; Jg 20:29 ff. 13. 'thy end is come, the cubit where thou shalt be cut off', a figure from weaving. 14 should probably read, 'Though I have filled thee [or perhaps, though thou art filled] with men [inhabitants] as with locusts [in point of numbers, yet] thy [the assailants] shall raise the battle-cry against thee'. 15-19 repeats 10:12-16, which see.

20-23 should probably be referred to Babylon (rather g than Cyrus); the tenses can be read as past just as easily as present, and there is no hint of Cyrus in the immediate context; 24 would then introduce the reversal of Yahweh's action hitherto. Upon this interpretation Babylon is still the cup of God's fury (cf. 25:15), or rather (taking the tenses in the past) has been such in the past. 20. 'Thou wast my mace, my weapon of war, and with thee have I broken in pieces nations, and with thee have I destroyed kingdoms', and so on, with past tenses. 23. 'captains and rulers': better, with Driver, 'governors and viceroys': the words are of Assyrian origin, and are often used in Assyrian inscriptions of governors of cities or provinces. They are used again in 28 and 57. 24. 'Nevertheless will I repay': Heb. uses 'and' (as here) even where there is a sharp antithesis. 25. 'mountain' is used metaphorically, as Babylon is in a plain: the reference may be to Babylon's towering supremacy in the world, or to her mass of tall buildings. Possibly there is some influence from Ez 35:3 ff. 'which destroyest': the

of her assailants; cf. 55. 43. 'an appalment, a dry land, a steppe: no man shall dwell in them . . . pass through them'. 44. 'Bel', see on 50:2: he will be compelled to disgorge the plunder of conquered nations. 45 is quoted in 2 Cor 6:17, together with Is 52:11. 46. Understand, 'take heed lest . . . ruler against ruler': these (with the rumours) will be signs of the break-up of the Babylonian empire. 48. 'shall sing for joy over Babylon'. 49. 'Yea, Babylon must fall, O ye slain of Israel: yea [giving the reason] the slain of all the earth have fallen because of Babylon'.

51 gives the answer of the Jews in Babylon; they are ashamed to return, with strangers in possession of the temple. To this Yahweh answers with his final word of judgement. 53. 'establish her strength on high' with walls even loftier. 54. 'and of great destruction'. 55. 'the great voice', the noise of the city's life. the 'wave' of the assailants; cf. 42. 'their voice maketh an uproar'. 56. 'their bows are broken in pieces'. 57. 'her governors and her viceroys and her warriors'; cf. 23. 'they shall sleep an everlasting sleep'; cf. 39. 58. Such is the way in which 'the peoples labour to no purpose, and the nations weary themselves for [only to feed] the fire': omit 'and shall perish': a quite general statement from Hab 2:13, with which the denunciation of the doom of Babylon concludes.

Part VI The Historical Appendix: ch 52—Most of the matter in this part can be traced to the Books of Kings, and it is generally admitted that it is a later addition, of which Jeremiah was not the author. The fall of Jerusalem may be called in a sense the main theme of the book of Jeremiah, and perhaps it was thought by some later scribe that it should therefore appear at the end as the grand finale. The contents of the chapter are taken into account in the commentary on the Books of Kings, at the relevant passages. 1-27 comes from 4 Kg 24:18-25:21. 28-30 come from some independent source, and are taken into account at the right place in 4 Kg. The extra details about the fittings of the temple in 17-23 are considered under 3 Kg 7. 4-11 and 13-16 have already occurred slightly abridged in 39:1-2, 4-10, but it seems likely (as is noted ad loc.) that these verses of ch 39 should be omitted.

LAMENTATIONS

By M. LEAHY

469a Bibliography—*A. W. Streane, Jeremiah and Lamentations, CBSC, 1889; J. Knabenbauer, S.J., Commentarius in Daniele: Prophetam, Lamentationes et Baruch, CSS, 1907²; *A. S. Cohen, Hindhead (Surrey), 1946; L. Dennefeld, Les Grands Prophètes (La Sainte Bible, Tome VII), Paris, 1947, 407-34.

b Title and Place in the Canon—In MT the Book is entitled 'Ēkâh ('How') which is the initial word of the 1st, 2nd and 4th chh. The Rabbis (and St Jerome in the Prologus Galeatus) referred to it as Qinôṭ ('Elegies') and an equivalent title was adopted by LXX (Θρήνοι) and by Vg (Lamentationes). In MT the Book is one of the five 'Rolls' which form part of the third division known as the 'Writings'. (The first and second divisions of the Heb. Bible are known as the 'Law' and the 'Prophets' respectively.) In LXX, Syr. and Vg, however, the Book comes after Jeremiah, among the 'Prophets'.

c Literary Form—Each of the five chh which comprise the book contains twenty-two divisions, which is the number of consonants in the Hebrew alphabet. The first three chh are arranged in strophes of three and the fourth ch in strophes of two verses. In the first, second and fourth chh the opening word of each strophe begins with its respective letter of the alphabet, but in the third ch the same letter begins each verse of a strophe. All the Lamentations with the exception of ch 5 are written in a 'limping' rhythm, known as Qinâh because of its use in this book; in Qinâh rhythm each verse has two parts with, as a rule, three significant words in the first and two in the second.

d Subject-matter—The Book contains laments over the destruction of Jerusalem by the Neo-Babylonians in 586 B.C., and the sufferings endured by the population and the poet himself (cf. ch 3) before, during and after the siege. The catastrophe is acknowledged to be the result of repeated transgressions against Yahweh, and thus we find, intermingled with the laments, humble confessions of sin and ardent appeals for mercy and deliverance.

e Authorship—Jewish tradition attributes our book to Jeremiah. The LXX has the following preface (not inspired): 'And it came to pass after Israel was taken captive and Jerusalem laid waste, that Jeremiah sat weeping and lamented with this lamentation over Jerusalem, and said' (cf. a repetition of this statement, with a slight addition, in Vg). The Talmud (Baba Bathra, 15a) also states that Jeremiah was the author. The Greek and Latin Fathers likewise take the Jeremian authorship for granted.

Recently, however, not a few critics, relying chiefly on internal evidence, have sought to show that not all the poems are by the same author, and only some of these critics would admit the Jeremian authorship of any. The following are the principal difficulties against attributing all the lamentations to Jeremiah.

f (i) In the first poem the order of the Heb. consonants is the normal one, whereas in the next three chh Pe comes before Ayin. This variation would tend to show that the second, third and fourth are not by the author of the first. It may well be, however, that the Hebrew poets enjoyed a certain liberty in the arrangement of the consonants of the alphabet.

(ii) The complaint in 2:9 that the prophets of Jerusalem 'have found no vision from the Lord' would seem to imply that the author of the second Lamentation is not Jeremiah since he, at least, was a prophet. Perhaps, however, the words mean that the prophets have received no vision of encouragement from Yahweh.

(iii) Verses 17 and 20 are quoted against the Jeremian authorship of the fourth chapter. In 17 the poet includes himself (note the 1st pers. plur.) with those who expected Egyptian aid whereas Jeremiah never did (cf. Jer 37:5-10), and in 20 he speaks of King Sedecias with reverence whereas Jeremiah spoke of him in disparaging terms, Jer 24:8-10. Those who defend the Jeremian authorship reply that Jeremiah in Lam 4 is speaking in the name of the people and interpreting their thoughts.

(iv) The phraseology of Lam varies from that found in Jer. This objection loses some, at least, of its force when it is remembered that the situation as seen by the author of Lam is completely different and so its description necessitates a diction different from that in Jer. The Jews are now suffering severely for their folly. A religious leader—especially one who is himself full of grief—refrains in such circumstances from adding to the sufferings of a people whom he loved by further threats and bitter remarks but, on the contrary, treats them gently, seeks to console, and exhorts them to amend their ways and beg Yahweh's mercy and forgiveness.

On the whole the arguments advanced against Jeremian authorship do not appear conclusive. We do not think, however, that Lam was written as a unity. Commentators point out that the prophecies collected in Jer were originally in circulation as separate compositions. We may reasonably suppose that Lam also was formed by the combination of what were originally five separate elegies composed by Jeremiah.

Doctrine—The author emphasizes the power of Yahweh; the destruction of Jerusalem is his work for it was he who brought the Neo-Babylonians to be his agents in effecting the destruction, 1:14; 2:17; 4:11. He lays stress upon the justice of Yahweh, 1:18; 3:42, but reminds his readers that, although just, Yahweh is also infinitely merciful, 3:22 f. He frequently states that it is because of their sins and those of their religious leaders that the people are suffering, 1:5, 8, etc. When composing the Office of Tenebræ the Church searched the Bible for words to express our sorrow for Christ in his sufferings; she could find nothing more apt than these Lamentations.

I 1-22 The First Lamentation—1-11 The Desolation of Jerusalem—470a

1. The city, normally crowded since it was the political and religious centre of the kingdom, now sits solitary, emptied by the exile of many of its inhabitants; she that was once great among the nations is now become as a widow in her unhappiness; she that was a princess among the districts into which the Hebrew Kingdom was divided is become a bond-servant, subject to taskwork. 2. The city weeps bitterly in the night which is normally the time of repose; she is not consoled by her lovers and friends, i.e. by her political allies, cf. 19. 3. The inhabitants who remained behind

470a after the destruction of the city chose voluntary exile in Egypt because they found the Babylonian yoke intolerable (cf. Jer chh 42 f.); Judah duells among the heathen, without, however, finding rest; all her persecutors overlook her in narrow defiles. This last clause is to be understood figuratively of the tribulations which hemmed in the people of Judah. 4. The roads leading up to Zion, once crowded with pilgrims on their way to the solemn festivals, are deserted; the city-gates, the recognized places of assembly in Eastern towns, are destroyed; the priests sigh because the temple-ritual has ceased; virgins are sorrowful because they can no longer take their appointed part in the joyous religious processions (cf. Ps 67:26). 5. Zion's enemies are triumphant and prosper; her misfortunes are Yahweh's punishment for her sins; not even her young children escaped captivity. 6. The daughter (of) Zion (i.e. Zion; we have here the genit. of definition) has lost all her splendour; her princes, weakened by hunger, were an easy prey for the Babylonians. The poet has in mind the flight and capture of King Sedecias and his princes, Jer 39:4 f.

b 7. Jerusalem remembers the days of her affliction and her wanderings (DV 'prevarication of') when her inhabitants fell into enemy hands. The reference is to the bitter siege and conquest which left her homeless. The clause 'all her desirable things . . . of old' should be omitted as a gloss; there is a line too many and without this clause the strophe gives better sense. The word rendered 'sabbaths' is not found elsewhere but the context requires some such word as 'extinction'. 8. Jerusalem has sinned grievously and has become as one impure, i.e. ceremonially unclean and therefore to be shunned; those who once honoured her now despise her; she herself, painfully conscious of her unsightly condition, turns aside to escape notice. 9. Her filthiness is in her skirts, i.e. her sins are exposed for all to see; in the days of prosperity she reflected not that retribution would inevitably overtake her. The last clause is a cry to Yahweh for compassion, because the enemy has magnified himself. 10. The Babylonians robbed her treasures; Jerusalem has seen that the heathen are entered into the sanctuary, the heathen concerning whom Yahweh, because of the danger of idolatry, commanded that they should not enter the community of his chosen people. 11. Those who survived the siege are now destitute; hunger has compelled them to exchange their valuables for food.

c 12-22 An Appeal for Compassion—In this section, except in 17, Zion is the speaker. 12. Zion makes a pathetic appeal for pity; the anguish wherewith Yahweh has smitten her is incomparable. The last part should read: (my anguish) which is severely dealt out to me, wherewith Yahweh has afflicted (me) in the day of his fierce anger. 13. is a graphic description of the calamities which befell the city. The figures used are those of a fire, a net, sickness; 'chastised me', reading yirdennî. 14. 'Bound [reading nisqad] is the yoke of my crimes; by his hand [the Lord's] they are knit together, they are come upon my neck; he has made my strength to fail; the Lord has given me over to their [referring to crimes] power [lit. hand; read b'yādām], I am not able to rise'. The crimes of Jerusalem are the poles and cords with which the Lord made a yoke and laid it on her neck; the sufferings of Jerusalem are but the due punishment of her crimes. The last line but one means that the Lord abandoned her to the fate of sinners (cf. Job 8:4). 15. In two images, that of a solemn feast at which the victims offered are the flower of Zion's army, and that of a winepress in which the blood of the people of Judah is trodden out, the destruction is presented as the work of the Lord as the first cause: 'The Lord has flouted at all my valiant men in the midst of me; he has proclaimed against me a festival' (DV 'the time'). Read 'the virgin, the daughter Judah' (cf. 6). 16a. Therefore (cf. 13-15) does Zion weep. 17. The poet interrupts the wailing of Zion to affirm that although Sion spreads forth her hands in a gesture of entreaty, no one is found to console her;

Yahweh has decreed concerning Jacob (i.e. the nation) that they that are round about him should be his (the nation's) enemies. They that are round about him are the neighbouring nations. For 'menstruous woman' read 'one impure', cf. 8. 18. Zion acknowledges the justice of Yahweh's judgement. 19 She repeats (cf. 2) that her lovers deceived her; her priests and old men perished of hunger. 20. Zion, betrayed by men, turns to Yahweh. For 'I am full of bitterness' read 'I have grievously rebelled', and for 'destroyeth' read 'renders childless'. 21. Her enemies derive special satisfaction from the knowledge that it was Yahweh, in whose special relationship to Israel Zion gloried, who brought this misfortune upon her; he brought the day that he had proclaimed, the day of Jerusalem's downfall foretold by the prophets (not as in DV 'the day of consolation'). The last clause is an appeal for retribution on her exulting foes: 'Let them be like unto me'. 22. Zion continues her prayer for retribution, pleading that her foes are guilty as well as she. 470d

II 1-22 The Second Lamentation—1-17 The Desolation of Jerusalem and Judah the Result of Yahweh's Anger—1. For the expression 'the daughter of Zion' cf. 1:6. The Lord has brought misery upon the city; he has cast down from its proud pre-eminence the city of Jerusalem (lit. 'the glory of Israel'); he has not remembered his footstool, i.e. the temple with the Ark of the Covenant (1 Par 28:2). 2. He has devastated the homesteads of Jacob (here a synonym of Judah) and destroyed the strongholds of Judah; by delivering them up to the heathen he has deprived the kingdom of its sacred character as his elect (cf. Ex 19:6), and the princes of their sacred character as consecrated rulers in the theocratic kingdom. 3. The horn of an animal is a figure for strength. The Lord has withheld aid from his people against their enemies; he has brought ruin upon the nation. 4. He has ranged himself against his people; his right hand—the hand which shoots the arrows—he has brought into position. MT niššāḥ ('standing') is to be corrected to hiššāḥ ('he has fixed') which was read by LXX and Vg. 5. For 'walls' read 'palaces'. 5b. (He) has multiplied in Judah groaning and moaning. 6a. And he has stripped his temple-enclosure as a garden is stripped when its fruit is gathered. 7. The Lord has caused the destruction of the altar of holocausts, the sanctuary and adjacent buildings; the joyous singing of the worshippers has given place to the profane shouting of the conquerors. 8. Yahweh carefully planned and thoroughly executed the work of destruction. A builder uses a line for precision in his work of building; Yahweh, however, is depicted as using a line for precision in his work of demolition. The rampart and wall are left in such a dilapidated state that they are said to mourn. 9. The gates of the city have disappeared without trace; the whole system of legal administration has ceased with the breaking-up of the state; Zion's prophets receive from Yahweh no oracle of encouragement. 10. The old men grieve and mourn in silence; the virgins are dejected. 11f. The poet breaks into tears at the picture of children fainting from hunger and dying in their mothers' arms. The bowels and the liver were, in biblical thought, seats of the emotions. His sorrow was so acute that he could not restrain his emotions (lit. my liver is poured out upon the ground).

13. The poet addresses himself to Jerusalem. It would be some comfort for her to know that her disaster is not unparalleled, but the poet can find no example of a like calamity. 14. The false prophets bear a heavy responsibility for Jerusalem's unhappy state. Had they candidly unveiled her iniquity and foretold its consequences they might have averted the catastrophe which has now befallen her. Instead they deceived her by oracles of falsehood (cf. Jer 14:13; 23:17) and of banishment. The latter are so called because they encouraged a false sense of security which resulted in the people's neglecting to amend their ways and thus having to endure the consequences, viz. banishment

470f from the homeland. For 'to excite thee to penance' read 'to change your lot' (lit. 'to bring back your captivity'). 15f. recount the malicious glee of Jerusalem's foes. 16, 'we have swallowed her up'. 17. The poet declares that it is Yahweh who has destroyed Jerusalem; in the days of old he had decreed chastisement for disobedience (cf. Lev 26:14 ff.; Deut 28:15 ff.).

g 18-22 An Exhortation to supplicate Yahweh—18 f. Zion is requested to cry to the Lord day and night. Emend the first words in 18 to read: 'Cry you (sa'at lak) to the Lord, O wall of Zion'. 19 contains a line too many and 'that have fainted', etc., is to be deleted as a gloss from 11. The apple of the eye is the pupil. The night was divided into three watches of four hours each; the fourfold division (cf. Mt 14:25) is of Roman origin. 20. Zion, accepting the invitation, supplicates Yahweh to remember that the sufferers are his chosen people, and asks whether he is indifferent to the atrocities which occurred during the siege when mothers ate the children they were fondling, and priests and prophets were butchered in the very sanctuary. 22. Yahweh summoned the terrors of war, plague and famine (lit. my terrors on every side) as at other times he summoned the multitude of his worshippers.

471a III 1-66 The Third Lamentation—1-24 A Lament of Personal Woe—1. I am the man that has seen (i.e. experienced) affliction. 6. The Lord has made him to dwell in dark places like the dead who are cut off from the light of day. 7. He has hemmed him in by insuperable obstacles. 8. When he prays the Lord refuses to hear him; he shuts out his request. 9ff. describe, again in figurative language, his anguish and perplexity. 12f. The Lord is here likened to a hunter, shooting arrows (lit. daughters of the quiver) into the poet's body. 15. Read 'bitter herbs' (DV 'bitterness'). 16. He has broken his teeth with gravel, i.e. he has treated him severely, he has made him to wallow in ashes. 17f. His life is one of unrelieved desolation and he has lost hope. He speaks thus to Yahweh: 'You have removed my soul from peace, I have forgotten happiness; And I said (within myself): my strength is vanished as also my hope (which is turned aside) from Yahweh'. 19. Immediately overcoming his despair, he appeals to Yahweh to be no longer unmindful of his affliction and his wandering about homeless (DV 'poverty and transgression'). 20. His soul remembers them (cf. 19) without ceasing, and languishes within him. 21. 'This [what is related in the following two verses] I recall to my mind, therefore have I hope'. 22f. His hope is inspired by remembrance of Yahweh's unflinching mercies despite the sins of men. (I recall to my mind) that the mercies of Yahweh have not ceased (cf. Targum and Syr.), that (DV 'because') his mercies have not failed. They are ever fresh (23a). 24. Yahweh is his portion, that which alone he desires.

b 25-39 Resignation to the Will of Yahweh—This section teaches that man in the midst of suffering should submit himself to Yahweh and patiently await his help. 27. It is good for a man that he bear the yoke from his youth, that is, that he accustom himself from youth to bear with courage and confidence the trials of life. 28-30. Let the man, therefore, who is suffering, be resigned and submissive to Yahweh's will. Let him sit alone and be silent when he has laid it (suffering) upon him (28). Let him put his mouth in the dust, perhaps there is hope (29); 'to put the mouth in the dust' is an expression of humble and silent submission—the mouth filled with dust cannot speak. Let him give the cheek to him that strikes him, let him be filled with abuse (30). 31-33 contain an inducement to resignation to the Lord's will. The suffering will not last for ever, and Yahweh in his mercy will soon grant relief (31 f.); he, like a true father, does not cause pain capriciously (lit. not from his heart: DV 'not willingly'). 34-38 contain a further inducement. Injustices are not committed unknown to him; it is he who permits the wrongs wrought by man—who is he that spoke and the thing was done, when the Lord commanded it not? (37); it is he who sends both prosperity and adversity. Does not the Lord see (36b) the oppression of mankind (lit. prisoners of earth, cf. Goldman, 89) and the withholding of man's God-given rights and the perversion of justice? 39. 'Wherefore does a living man complain, a man notwithstanding his sins?' The writer here assumes that a sinful man deserves death, yet the Lord, although he is inflicting suffering, allows him to live.

40-47 The Application to Israel of the above-mentioned Counsels—40 f. The poet, speaking in the 1st pers. plur., invites his compatriots to examine their consciences and earnestly seek pardon through repentance. 42. Israel has sinned and God has not pardoned because there is no repentance. 43a. God has placed his anger as a screen between himself and his people. 44. Their sins prevent the return of his favour; he has screened himself with a cloud that their prayer may not penetrate to him. 45f. He has humbled the Israelites (MT 'us'; DV 'me' in 45 is incorrect) in the sight of the nations who laughed at their misfortunes. 47. Fear and the pit are their lot, desolation (DV 'prophecy') and destruction. 'Pit' is a metaphor taken from the hunting of wild animals which were trapped in pits.

48-66 Another Lament of Personal Suffering—48-51. The poet tells how his eye runs down with water because of the ruin of his people (lit. the daughter, my people). He is suffering especially because of the Hebrew women who are completely at the mercy of their captors (51). 51 seems out of place and its original position may have been after 48. The precise meaning of 51a is obscure; it may mean that constant weeping has made him physically ill. 49f. His eye pours down and ceases not, without respite, till Yahweh look down and behold from heaven. 52-54. The poet, looking back over the past, describes in language which in part at least is figurative (54) the sufferings which he endured at the hands of his enemies. 53a. 'They resolved to put an end to my life in the dungeon'; cf. Jer 38:6-13. 55-58. While suffering thus he had prayed to Yahweh saving: 'shut not thine ear at my sighing, at my cry' (56b) and Yahweh intervened in judgement, and the verdict in his favour released him from his sufferings. 59. He now pleads for another intervention of Yahweh in judgement, for if he would only intervene he would grant release from his present sufferings. 60-63. He goes on to recount the causes of his misery; his enemies are meanly hostile, they are plotting against him and in all their movements (lit. when they sit down and when they rise up) he is the subject of their taunting songs. 64-66. He is confident that Yahweh will requite his enemies. 65: 'You will give them hardness of heart, thy curse upon them!'

IV 1-22 The Fourth Lamentation—1-12 A Vivid Portrayal of the Horrors of the Siege—1. The citizens of Zion once comparable to fine gold and precious and hallowed stones are now esteemed worthless. How is the gold become dim! how is the most fine gold changed! how are the hallowed stones scattered at the top of every street! 2a. The precious sons of Zion, comparable to fine gold. 3. The jackals suckle their whelps, but the inhabitants of Zion do not feed the little children, and are become as cruel as the ostriches who by nesting on sand and not in inaccessible places expose the chicks to danger (cf. Job 39:13-16). 4f. The little ones and those brought up in refinement suffer from hunger and thirst and are reduced to extreme misery (the verbs are in the present tense). 6. Sodom was less culpable than Zion seeing that she suffered less; she was spared a prolonged agony (cf. Gen 19:24 f.), and hands did not fall upon (lit. whirl round about) her, i.e. she was not attacked by the soldiers of an invading army and thus escaped the atrocities frequently perpetrated by them. 7f. The poet contrasts the appearance of the nobles (DV 'Nazirites') before and during the siege. For 'old ivory' read 'corals'. 9. Those dispatched by the sword had a better death than they who endured a 471f lingering death by famine. 10. Starving mothers have boiled and eaten their children. 11f. The destruction of Jerusalem is the work of the divine anger, although it was widely thought that Yahweh would not permit an enemy to enter the city where his temple stood.

g 13-16 Insurrection against the Gullty Leaders—14. After the fall of the city, the religious leaders, fearing the wrath of those whom they had deceived, wandered blindly through the streets, not knowing where to seek refuge; they were polluted with innocent blood so that people could not touch their garments (14b) lest they contract ceremonial defilement. 15b. They were unwanted even in the lands where they sought refuge: when they fled away, they wandered here and there: men said among the Gentiles, 'they cannot remain'. 16. The anger of Yahweh scattered them; people had neither respect for the persons of the priests nor pity for the old men (LXX prophets).

h 17-20 Futility of the Hope of Help from Egypt—Events showed how vain was their hope: (18a) the Babylonians hunted our steps so that we could not walk in our broad places, i.e. those who came into the open spaces had to seek shelter because the besiegers from their siege-towers began shooting arrows and hurling stones at them. 20. King Sedecias was taken near Jericho (Jer 52:8 f.): the breath of our nostrils (so called because under Sedecias the Jews had hoped to maintain their national life even in a foreign land), the anointed of Yahweh was taken in their pits.

i 21 f. An Imprecation against Edom—The Jews were bitterly hostile towards the Edomites (cf. Ps 136:7; Abd 10 ff.; Ez 35:5); Edom stood by the Babylonians, and, as a reward, when Judah was conquered, they gave over to her the rural districts. 21 is a sarcastic invitation to Edom to rejoice while it can, for its glee will be short-lived; it will soon be chastised. The cup is here a metaphor for divine punishment of sin. 22. The punishment of Sion's sins, viz. the agonies endured during the siege and subsequent deportation, is already an accomplished fact, while Edom has yet to undergo the punishment of its iniquity. 22b reads: 'he will visit your iniquity, O Edom; he will uncover your sins'.

j V 1-22 The Fifth Lamentation—This is not strictly a lament but rather a prayer (Vg entitles it 'Oratio Jeremiae prophetae') for the Jews—the exiles and 471j those left behind in Judah—whose unhappy state is recounted (2-18) in order to secure Yahweh's mercy. 2. Neighbouring peoples have extended their borders into the former territory of Judah (lit. their inheritance). 5a. MT reads: 'upon our neck we are pursued', but the consonants of the word rendered 'upon' are identical with those for 'yoke' and perhaps the text had both words originally. The restored text would read, '(with) a yoke upon', etc. 6. They were engaged to serve the Egyptians and the Assyrians (i.e. the Babylonians who acquired the former Assyrian Empire) to procure sustenance, for the exiles had no land to cultivate. 7. From 16 it is clear that he does not place all the blame on their parents for there he states that the people who were suffering had also sinned. The latter, therefore, merited their own punishment, but on account of the iniquities of their parents they were more severely punished, 'not more severely than they deserved, but more severely than they would have been, had their parents not sinned . . . on account of our solidarity the growing guilt of a sinful race may finally draw down on it a punishment that the hand of God had previously withheld' (E. Sutcliffe, The Old Testament and the Future Life, 1947, 87). 8. The slaves k who rule were Babylonians who rose to official positions. 9. The remnant in Judah bring in what little food they can collect in peril of raids by desert nomads who take advantage of the unsettled conditions. 10. Their skin is hot from fever brought on by famine. 11-14 enumerate the atrocities committed by the Babylonians. 13 reads in MT: 'The young men have carried the mill-stone, and the children have stumbled under the load of firewood'. 16. They have lost their national prestige. 17 f. They are full of grief for this, namely, for the devastation of the hill of Sion which is such that jackals wander about on it.

Sion, Yahweh's earthly throne, is destroyed but (19) Yahweh reigns forever, and thus (20) there is hope that he will some day restore Judah, his special kingdom. Wherefore would you forget us forever, forsake us for the duration of our days? 21. The poet prays that Yahweh may bring about their moral conversion and their restoration to the homeland. 22. Unless you have utterly rejected us, (and) are exceedingly angry against us. He is convinced that the rejection can be but a temporary one.

b The Person of the Author—Baruch, Heb. barāk 'blessed', the son of Nerias, the son of Maasias, Jer 32:12, belonged to a noble family, his brother Saraia being a high official in the court of king Sedecias, Jer 51:59. He is first introduced to us as Jeremiah's secretary in 604 B.C., Jer 36:4. Later, he assisted Jeremiah in the purchase of a field in Anathoth, Jer 32:12 f. After the fall of Jerusalem and the murder of Godolias he was carried away with Jeremiah to Egypt, Jer 43:6. Nothing is known from the book of Jeremiah of his later years. It is not unreasonable to suppose that after the prophet's death or shortly before, he went to Babylon with a message of hope to the exiles. From his book we learn that he went to Babylon and in the 5th year of the exile, 581 B.C., came back to Jerusalem bringing his book with him. Baruch was a man of strong character, Jer 43:3, but, apparently, less strong than his master in his resignation to the impending ruin of Jerusalem, Jer 45:3.

c Contents and Structure of the Book—The Book of Baruch, as it is read in Vg, consists of two parts of different origin, chh 1–5 being attributed to Baruch and ch 6 to Jeremiah. In LXX the two parts are separated. For the sake of clarity they will be treated here separately.

The Book of Baruch proper falls into three parts: (1) a confession of sins and a prayer for deliverance, 1:15–3:8, preceded by a historical introduction, 1:1–1:14; (2) a panegyric on Wisdom, 3:9–4:4; (3) a consolatory message to the exiles, 4:5–5:9.

Although the three parts are linked together by a common historical background, namely, the exile and the desolation of Jerusalem, their literary features are so different that they can hardly be considered as parts of the same theme. Part I is a confessional prayer by the repentant exiles, while Part II is an exhortation to the exiles who are represented as still straying away from the Law, 4:2; in Part III they are assured of the approaching end of their captivity. The three parts seem to be separate compositions originating from the same historical conditions rather than parts of the same theme. This is, to a certain extent, borne out by the fact that the Greek text of Part I closely resembles that of the latter part of Jeremiah. If both are the work of the same translator, as Thackeray has maintained (JTS, 1902–3, 261–6), though later he retracted his opinion (Sept. and Jew. Worship, 87), then Part I was for some time separated from the rest of the book and united with Jeremiah.

The Epistle of Jeremiah, Bar 6, is a strong denunciation of Babylonian idolatry and a warning to those who were being led into captivity lest they should be impressed by the gorgeous manifestations of idolatrous worship.

d Place in the Canon—In most MSS of LXX Baruch comes immediately after Jeremiah and is followed by Lamentations and the Epistle. In the Latin Bible the Epistle forms ch 6 of Baruch and both follow Lamentations.

Original Language—Baruch and the Epistle have been preserved in Greek. St Jerome knew of no Hebrew text (Praef. comm. in Jer. PL 24, 680; Praef. in vers. Jer. PL 29, 848). But the majority of modern critics maintain that they were both originally written in Hebrew (J. Goettsberger, Einkl., 307, 310; Höpfl-Miller-Metzinger, Intr. Spec. 454, 457; *O. Eissfeldt, Einkl. in das AT, 649 ff.; Oesterley, 265 f., 270; A. Robert in DBV (S) 4, 854). The Hebrew origin of 3:9–5:9 and 6 has been disputed by *E. Schürer (The Jewish People, 2, 3, 191, 195), J. T. Marshall (HDB, II, 578) on the grounds of the elegance of the Greek language which is not that of a translator. The balance of probability, however, remains in favour of a Hebrew origin. Theodotion's version, made from Hebrew, includes Bar.

Authorship—Catholic writers generally agree in attributing Bar to Jeremiah's secretary. Different views are held by J. Goettsberger who attributes 3:9–4:4 to a later author; P. Heinisch who believes that 3:9–4:4 was written after the exile and 4:5–5:9 towards its end (Theol. und Glaube, 1928, 696–710) and by A.-M. Dubarle who places the composition of 3:9–4:4 in the middle of the 4th cent. B.C. (Les Sages d'Israël, 132).

Non-Catholic critics bring the final redaction of the book down to A.D. 70, though some of the component parts may have an earlier origin. The introduction, 1:2–14, they say, teems with historical inaccuracies. Baruch never was in Babylon. A contemporary writer, as Baruch, would never have associated Nabuchodonosor with Balthassar who was not his son. The altar of sacrifices, which was rebuilt after the return from the exile, Esd 3:2, is supposed to be still standing and sacrifices could be offered upon it. The introduction is therefore considered to be a literary device meant to disguise events much later than the Babylonian captivity. Moreover, it is said that 1:15–2:18 depends on Dan 9:4–19; it is therefore later than 166–165 B.C. Now there is no other event in post-Maccabean history to which the historical introduction can be made to apply except the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus in A.D. 70. 4:5–5:9 depends on the apocryphal Psalms of Solomon (cf. 4:37; 5:1, 5, 8 and Ps. Sol. 11:3, 6–8) that were written after the capture of Jerusalem by Pompey in 63 B.C.

These reasons are not convincing. The historical difficulties will be dealt with in the commentary. As regards the literary affinities it is not easy to establish the order of priority. There is evidence in favour of a dependence of Daniel on Baruch. Part II is strongly influenced by Isaiah II even in those passages that seem to be related to the Psalms of Solomon.

The origin of the Epistle is generally placed by non-Catholic critics in the Greek period. Babylon of the letter, it is said, is not the magnificent Babylon of Nabuchodonosor, but Babylon in decay as it was in the days of Alexander the Great. Moreover, the prediction of a captivity lasting seven generations or 280 years is inconsistent with Jeremiah's prediction of a 70-year captivity. The correction of seven to three does not solve the difficulty. Supposing the text to be correct and reckoning the 280 years from the destruc-

472 tion of Jerusalem in 586 B.C., the captivity predicted by the writer would come to an end in the year 306 B.C., shortly after Alexander's conquest of Babylon. The same view is held by A. Robert in DBV(S) 4, 857.

It is unlikely that the letter was written by Jeremiah. The writer displays an intimate knowledge of Babylonian idolatry, such as could not be obtained except through a prolonged sojourn in Babylon. Moreover, the style is by far inferior to that of Jeremiah. It lacks the impassioned outbursts, the elegiac tone, the emotional effects, characteristic of Jeremiah's style. Compare the Epistle with Jer 10:2-16 which is said to be parallel to it. Had it really been written by the prophet Jeremiah, a later editor would have united it to Jeremiah's book rather than to that of Baruch.

Taking into consideration the objections against the traditional view of the origin of Baruch and the Epistle I believe that originally they were independent compositions written on four separate scrolls. Bar 1:1-3:8 was written by Baruch and, possibly, interpolated by later editors. Bar 3:9-4:4 and 4:5-5:9 were written during the exile, perhaps by Baruch himself, but as independent compositions. The Epistle too was probably written during the exile by an anonymous writer. The four compositions were united together on account of their common historical background.

g Canonlicity—Baruch and the Epistle are excluded from the Jewish canon. There is evidence, however, that Bar was accepted by the Jews, though later rejected. Theodotion's version includes it. Moreover, Bar and the Epistle occur in ancient lists, which rigorously exclude the non-canonical books, under the title 'Jeremiah with Baruch, Lamentations and the Epistle' (Swete, Intr. 203-10). There is also evidence that Bar was read in Jewish synagogues on certain festivals during the early centuries of the Christian era (Thackeray, 107-11).

h Doctrinal Content—The doctrinal element of Bar is common to other biblical books, especially the prophetic writings. The confession, with its threefold element of proclamation of God's justice and power, confession of the people's sins and prayer for forgiveness, is cast in the usual form of confessional prayers, cf. Esd 9:5-15; Neh 9:6-37; Dan 9:4-19. Wisdom, which is identified with the moral law or the Sinaitic covenant, is the source of life and happiness. It is a gift of God, and man cannot acquire it nor find it with all his wealth and labour. Idols are vain things and their worship is degrading.

The Messianic doctrine in 2:35 is that of Jer 32:40. 5:1-4 predicts in a fuller sense the spiritual restoration of Jerusalem in Messianic times. The literal Messianic interpretation of 3:38 is based on Vg.

473a I 1-2 The Title—Probably it refers to 1:3-3:8 only. There is no historical evidence against Baruch's journey to Babylon. The fifth year must be reckoned from 587-586 when Jerusalem was captured and the temple destroyed. Insert 'fifth' before 'month' in accordance with 4 Kg 25:8. The book was therefore written in the year 582-581 B.C., the fifth anniversary of the capture of Jerusalem.

b 3-5 The Reading of the Book—3 f. On that day Baruch read the book before king Jehonias and before all the captives gathered near the river Sedi. Jehonias either enjoyed some liberty and could therefore join the gathering or had the book read to him in prison. The locality of the river Sedi (LXX Sud) is unknown. Probably it was one of the artificial canals of the Euphrates. 5. Sorrow for their sins, penance and prayer for forgiveness were the effects produced on the hearers.

c 6-9 A Money Collection—6. In order to obtain God's help more speedily they wished to have prayers offered for them in Jerusalem. So they made a collection of money, 7, and sent it to the priests and people of Jerusalem. Joakim was not the high-priest, who at that time was in exile, 1 Par 6:15, but the priest at the head of those who remained in Jerusalem. He was, probably, a relative of Josedek's, the exiled high-priest whose genealogy, like that of Joakim, is traced back to Sellum (Salom) through Helcias, 1 Par 6:14 f. 8 f. The subject of 'received' is Baruch. Baruch, therefore, on the 10th of Sivan (May-June), brought back to Jerusalem some of the temple vessels which Nabuchodonosor had carried off to Babylon, 4 Kg 24:13; 25:13-17. Instead of 'bound', 9, read 'captives' and transpose after 'the princes'.

'Buy with it holocausts and offerings for sin and frankincense and make an oblation'. Baruch carried also a message to those left in Jerusalem. Although the temple had been burnt and the altar destroyed, a provisional altar was, most probably, set up on which the priests could perform the liturgical service; cf. Jer 41:5. 11 f. The exhortation to pray for Nabuchodonosor is an echo of Jeremiah's recommendation, Jer 29:7. A difficulty lies in the association of Nabuchodonosor with Balthassar who, as we know with absolute certainty, was the son of Nabonidus. That Nabuchodonosor had a son called Balthassar who died very young is quite possible though there is no documentary evidence. As Balthassar is also represented as Nabuchodonosor's son in Dan 5:2, 11, 13, 18, 22, it is very likely that Balthassar has been introduced here by a later editor from Daniel (W. Stoderl, Zur Echtheitsfrage von Bar 1-3:8, Münster, 1922, 21 f.). The expression 'many days', 12, corresponds to the 70 years of Jer 25:12; 29:10. 13. They acknowledge that their punishment is deserved. Add 'and his indignation' after 'wrath'. 14. The book, i.e. the confession contained in 1:15-3:8, was to be read in the temple, or on its ruins, on a certain unspecified feast-day, probably the Feast of Booths, sometimes called simply 'the Feast', 3 Kg 8:2, and on other days of meeting. Thackeray identifies the feast with New Year's Day, and the days of meeting with the Sabbaths intervening between the anniversary of the capture of Jerusalem and the anniversary of its burning, 91-4.

15-II 10 The Confession—It has striking similarities to Daniel's prayer in Dan 9:4-19. 15. Cf. Dan 9:7. God is just and punishment is fully deserved. 16-18. Cf. Dan 9:8, 10. All classes have sinned. The same enumeration occurs in Neh 9:32; Jer 32:32. Delete 'nor put our trust . . . obedient to him', which are not in LXX. 19. The obstinacy is inveterate; cf. Jer 7:25; 11:7. The Syr. reading 'we have rebelled' is preferable to 'going astray'; delete 'we turned away from'. 20-22. The calamities are the fulfilment of the threats announced by God through Moses, Lev 26:14-39; Deut 28:15-68, and later prophets, Jer 11:7 f.; 16:10-13; etc. II:1 f. Cf. Dan 9:12. The writer develops the thought expressed in 20-22. God has made good the word which he had spoken against their rulers and all the people by bringing upon them plagues unparalleled in man's history. 3. That they would eat the flesh of their own children had been predicted in Lev 26:29; Deut 28:53 and Jer 19:9; cf. also Lam 2:20; 4:10 and Jos. BJ 6, 3, 3-4. 4 f. Another punishment: subjection to foreign powers and oppression. 4a agrees with Esd 9:7a; 4b with Jer 42:9b; 5 with Deut 28:13. The Israelites were several times under the domination of neighbouring kingdoms, especially Assyria and Babylonia. 6-10. God is just in inflicting such a severe punishment, because he had forewarned the people. He has therefore kept watch over his plagues and brought them upon his people. The expression 'kept watch' is a familiar one in Jer; cf. 1:12; 31:28; 44:27.

II 11-18 The Prayer—After the confession they make an appeal for deliverance from captivity. 11. Cf. Dan 9:15; Jer 32:21. God, who, in the past, has delivered them from their enemies, can deliver them now too. 12. Cf. 3 Kg 8:47; Dan 9:15. 13. Cf. Jer 42:2. 14 f. The reason for their deliverance is God's own sake, God's name by which they are called, the intimate relation between God and themselves. They do not ask God to punish their enemies, they simply pray that 478f their Babylonian masters may allow them to return to their homeland. 16 f. If they are left to perish, there will be none to worship God, because the dead in Sheol cannot praise him, Ps 6:6; 87:11; 113:17. The mention of the 'holy house', 16, does not necessarily imply that the temple had been rebuilt. The expression 'Look down from thy holy house' may be paralleled by Is 63:15 where 'dwelling' (LXX house) means 'heaven'. 18. A difficult verse. The sense seems to be: Those that are afflicted praise God when they are relieved (Kalt, Dennefeld), or: The repentant people proclaim God's righteousness (Knab., Fillion). The expressions 'a sorrowful heart', 'to go bowed down', 'failing eyes', 'hungry soul' denote sorrow, humility and repentance; cf. Deut 28:32, 65; Prov 27:7; Ps 41:10, 12; Eccles 12:11.

g 19-26 God's Past Threats and the People's Obstnacy—They do not deserve God's mercy because they have always spurned his warnings. 19. Cf. Dan 9:18b. Their fathers and their kings have disobeyed God and have no right to his compassion. 20. Omit 'But'. They acknowledge that their calamities are the accomplishment of God's threats. 21-23. In the light of Jer 27:12; 7:34 and the underlying Hebrew text read: 21 'Bow down your neck and serve . . . 23 I will cause in the cities of Judah and in the streets of Jerusalem the voice of mirth . . . bride, and the whole land shall be desolate without inhabitants'. Jeremias had always advocated a policy of peaceful submission to Babylon, because he knew only too well that resistance meant only destruction and devastation; cf. Jer 27:6-11, 12-15. 24 f. Read 'we' instead of 'they', 24, and 'pestilence' for 'banishment', 25. 24c = Jer 8:1; 25a = Jer 8:2; 25b = Jer 32:36b. They have not heeded Jeremias' advice; they have revolted against the king of Babylon, and God's threats have come true. In the narrative of the siege of Jerusalem nowhere do we read of the desecration of tombs, but there is evidence of such profanations in the Assyro-Babylonian inscriptions. Jeremias ironically adds that the bones of their kings will be left bleaching in the fields so that they may continue to worship the sun, the moon and the stars as they did in their lifetime. Those who were still living died a terrible death; Lam 2:12, 20 f.; 4:9. 26. Another punishment: the destruction of the temple, the pride of their country.

h 27-35 God's Kindness towards his People—God has dealt very leniently with them because he has not exterminated them as they deserved. 28-33. They recall God's minatory predictions to Moses, Lev 26:14-39; Deut 28:62, and his predictions of the people's conversion, Lev 26:40-45; Deut 30:1-10. 34 f. The writer passes on from the national post-exilic restoration to the Messianic restoration which is described here with words and ideas borrowed from Jer 31-31:33.

i III 1-8 A Last Appeal to God's Mercy—They have repented; may God now forgive them and bring them back to their country. 1. 'A soul in anguish' and 'a troubled spirit' are expressions denoting sorrow for sin; cf. Ps 50:19; Is 57:15. 2. The words 'for thou art a merciful God' are read only in Vg, a few Greek MSS and the Old Latin. 3. The interrogative form is supported by the parallel passage in Lam 5:19 f. How can God, an eternal and almighty king, let his people be exterminated as if he were unable to save them? 4. They are on the brink of the grave on account of their fathers' sins. The correction of 'dead' to 'men' is unnecessary, because a desperate condition is sometimes compared to death, cf. Is 26:19. 5 f. If God takes their sins into account, he will punish them accordingly, but this would impair his honour because the heathens will think that he is unable to save them. Therefore they pray God to consider his honour rather than their offences, and they will henceforth proclaim his justice and mercy. 7 f. It is to this end, that they may praise his name that he has inspired their hearts with sentiments of repentance, reverence and love.

God has promised that he will bring them back to their 479 country when they repent. They have now repented, may he fulfil his promise completely.

9-IV 4 Wisdom leads to Life—Israel was a privileged 474a people because they had a law given by God, such as no other people had. But they have transgressed the law and have consequently sunk into the depths of misery.

9-14 The Transgression of the Law is the Source of b their Calamities—9. An invitation to listen to the teaching of Wisdom, i.e. to keep the commandments of the Law which is a source of life and happiness, Deut 30:15-20. 10 f. Remove the point of interrogation to the end of 11. Israel is wasting away in the land of his enemies; there, in the midst of a heathen people, they have become unclean as by contact with a corpse, Num 19:11 ff.; they are as good as dead. 12 f. The answer to the question. Israel has forsaken God, the source of Wisdom. Idolatry was the capital sin of Israel. If Israel had not departed from God, they would have enjoyed peace and prosperity in their land for ever. 14. Since God's law is the source of peace, Israel must strive after it with all his power. The Law enlightens the mind, strengthens the will in the performance of what is right, and grants length of life, happiness and peace to those who keep it.

15-31 Wisdom is beyond Man's Reach—15. Man 6 must seek Wisdom; but where does she dwell? Where are the treasures which she bestows on those who seek her? Cf. Job 28:12. The answer is given further on. 16-21. Wisdom lies beyond man's reach. Mighty princes, powerful hunters whose hands neither beasts nor birds could escape, wealthy people who trusted in their unlimited riches, silversmiths who produced wonderful works of art were all unable to find the way to wisdom. All these passed away; and generation after generation strayed away from the right path. 22 f. The peoples most renowned for their skill, the Canaanites or Phoenicians, Ez 28:4 f., the Themanites, who dwelt in S. Edom, Jer 49:7, the Hagarenes or Ishmaelites, Gen 25:12 f., who sought after earthly wisdom, the merchants of Madian and Thema, who spoke in proverbs and sought after understanding, have failed to find the way to Wisdom. 24-28. The immeasurable universe, God's dwelling, does not possess Wisdom, nor were the giants, the renowned men of old, Gen 6:4, the bearers of Wisdom on earth. On the contrary they perished because they lacked Wisdom. God has not placed Wisdom in any part of the immense universe, nor has he chosen any class as messengers of Wisdom. This prepares the way for 32 f. where the divine origin of Wisdom is declared. 29-31 develop the same thought; cf. Deut 30:12 f.

32-38 Wisdom dwells with God—32-36. God alone, d an all-knowing and almighty God, knows Wisdom, Job 28:23. 37. God possesses Wisdom and has communicated it to the Israelites in the Mosaic Law. Now the sense of the whole section becomes clearer. The Law was given to Israel out of God's love. It could not be acquired by human means. No other people had a Law like it. But Israel transgressed the Law and, as a punishment, they were given up into the hands of their enemies. 38. In Vg and the Old Latin the subject of 'was seen' and 'conversed' is 'he', i.e. God. Hence Greek and Latin Fathers have applied this verse to the Incarnation (Knab. 489). But the context requires 'Wisdom' as subject of the two verbs. After being communicated to Israel Wisdom remained on earth making her abode amongst men. Some interpreters take the verse for a Christian gloss (Whitehouse, 591; Goettsberger, 310). But the personification of Wisdom and the idea of her dwelling among men occur also in Eccles 24:12-16, and the pretended Christian universalism in contrast with Jewish particularism is neither broader nor different from that of the Wisdom books; cf. Eccles 24:40-47. The verse, however, refers also, in a fuller sense, to 474d the Messias through whom revelation has been brought to perfection.

- e IV 1-4 Exhortation and Conclusion—1. This Wisdom, which God has bestowed upon Israel, is identified with the book of the commandments, the Law which subsists for ever. Those who hold fast to it will come to life, those who depart from it will meet their own end. 2 f. A last exhortation. O Israel, hold fast to the Law and walk in its light, lest God should take away from you the advantages of the Law and bestow them upon another people. 4. But this will never happen, because we shall always do what God has revealed to us.

475a 5-V 9 God's Promises of Restoration will be fulfilled—The writer comforts Jerusalem by the assurance of the approaching end of the exile.

- b 5-9a The People punished for their Sins—5. The writer cheers the depressed exiles who, despite their condition, are still called by the name of Israel, a name which recalls a glorious past. 6. God's punishments are corrective not vindictive. He has given them up into the hands of their enemies, but will not exterminate them. 7. Idolatry was the inveterate and most heinous sin of Israel. Idols are called demons in Deut 32:17. Omit 'the eternal God'. 8. Their sin was the more execrable as it was committed against the eternal God who had nursed them, and against Jerusalem who had reared them. The figure of God nursing his people is vividly described in Os 11:3 f.; cf. also Deut 1:31; 32:10; Is 63:10; for the figure of Jerusalem-mother cf. Is 51:18. 9a. The writer introduces Jerusalem lamenting over her children and comforting them.

- c 9b-16 Jerusalem's Lamentations—9b. Jerusalem addresses the neighbouring cities manifesting the cause of her grief. 10 f. She brought up her children with joy, but was unable to avert the punishment, and let them go into captivity. 12 f. Her children have been carried away for their sins, and she is like a mother bereft of her husband and children; cf. Lam 1:1. 14-16. Jerusalem again entreats the neighbouring cities to have compassion on her. 15 f. are reminiscences of Deut 28:49 f.; Jer 5:15 ff.

- d 17-29 Jerusalem's Message of Comfort to her Children—17 f. Jerusalem can afford no help to her exiled children; God alone can deliver them. 19. Jerusalem bids farewell to her children on their way to their land of exile. 20. She has changed the clothes of her happy days for the sackcloth of mourning, and she will pray God all her life. 21-24. She exhorts them to pray to God and feels confident that he will soon deliver them. 25. The enemies will be conquered and the exiles delivered. It was for a brief moment that God forsook his people, Is 54:7 f. 26. The children of Jerusalem, brought up with affectionate care are now walking through rough ways and driven like a flock carried away by the enemy. 27. A repetition of 21. 28 f. The only condition for their deliverance is that they should seek God with more determination than they had turned away from him.

- e 30-V 9 A Message of Comfort to Jerusalem—30. Jerusalem must not despair. God who has chosen her for himself and given her his name as Yahweh's dwelling-place, will comfort her. 31 f. 'Woe be to those that have afflicted thee, and rejoiced at thy fall. Woe be to the cities which thy children have served. Woe be to her that hath received thy sons'. The destruction of the enemies of Israel, especially Babylon, had long before been predicted by the prophets; cf. Is 13; 47; Jer 25; 50. 33-35. The devastation of Babylon is described here with features borrowed from the prophets: thus 33 = Is 51:22 f.; Jer 50:11-13; 34 = Is 47:9; 35a = Jer 51:58; 35b = Is 13:21; Jer 50:39. The word δαίμονια 'devils', which occurs also in the parallel passage Is 13:21, probably stands for a word meaning 'wild animals' as those enumerated in Is 13:21 and Jer 50:39. 36 f. The exiles will return from all parts rejoicing in their God who has shown his glory by bringing them back to their country. Words and ideas reflect Is 43:5; 49:18; 60:4. The description has its full application in the Messianic restoration. 475e V:1-3. DV and Vg give the sense rather than the exact rendering of LXX: 'Put off . . . and put on the splendour of the glory of God for ever. Array thyself in the robe of God's righteousness and set a crown on thy head of the glory of the Everlasting. For God will show thy brightness to everyone under heaven'. Jerusalem will be reinstated in her former glory as a queen adorned with sanctity and ruling with justice over all the world. The outlook is Messianic. Cf. Is 52:1; 60; 61:3. 4. Restored Jerusalem will be called by a new name: 'The peace of righteousness and the glory of the fear of God'. She will be the seat of a righteous power, and all her citizens will enjoy peace. 5. A repetition with slight variations of 36 f. At the end read: 'rejoicing that God hath remembered them'. 6. The exiles will be brought back as a royal throne. The Vg and Old Latin reading 'as children of the kingdom', i.e. as royal children, gives a better sense and is supported by Is 49:22 f. 7-9. All obstacles will be removed, and they will walk safely. The tall trees will overshadow them during their march, and God himself will walk at the head of the caravan leading them with joy and protecting them with his mercy and righteousness. The ideas and phraseology recall Is 40:4; 49:9 f.; 52:12; 55:12.

VI The Epistle of Jeremias—The prophet addresses the Jewish captives warning them against idolatry. 476a

The Title does not form part of the Epistle but has been added after Jer 29:1.

- 1-6 Introduction—1. The captivity was a punishment b for their sins, Jer 25:8 f. 2. This seems to be inconsistent with Jer 25:12; 29:10. But 'seven' may be a symbolical number having no mathematical value (cf. Deut 28:7; Dan 3:19) and 'generation' may be taken in the sense of an indefinite period of time. Cf. the analogous expression 'a thousand generations', Deut 7:9; 1 Par 16:15; Ps 104:8. The expression 'seven generations' is therefore parallel to 'many years' and 'a long time', not their equivalent. 3-5. Omit 'and of stone', 3. The prophet warns them not to be impressed by the ostentatious processions of the Babylonian gods and by the crowds of worshippers. It is God whom they must worship. 6. God himself speaks directly. Do not fear these gods, nor seek their protection, because my angel will constantly be with you (cf. Ex 32:34), looking after you, or, according to others, he, or I, will not leave your sin unpunished.

- 7-14 Idols are Powerless—7. Idols have a polished c tongue and are all overlaid with gold and silver, but they cannot speak. 8 f. 'And they [the craftsmen] take gold and make crowns for the heads of their gods'. The priests did not hesitate to appropriate the gold and silver ornaments of their gods. 10. They make gifts of them to the hierodules in the temple precincts. They deck them [the idols] as men with garments, these gods of silver, these gods of gold and wood. 12. They are richly clothed, but the priests must clean their faces of the dust 'which is thick upon them'. 13 f. They hold sceptres, swords and axes, as is often seen in Assyrian and Babylonian sculptures, but they can make no use of them. Therefore they need not be feared. Transpose these last words to the end of 14.

- 15-22 Idols are Useless and Insensible Images—16-21. d Their eyes are filled with dust; they are locked in temples as a man condemned to death for high treason; their interior is licked up, worn out; but they do not feel the worms eating up both themselves and their garments. 22. The refrain; cf. 14.

- 23-28 Idols are Helpless and Unconscious of Offences e—23. In 7, 50, 56, 70 it is said that idols were only overlaid with gold; but among the many idols there may have been some statuettes made of solid gold. 26. 'For if they fall . . . nor if a man set them upright can they move by themselves, nor if they are set crooked, can they set themselves straight'. They are motionless as the dead, and the offerings made to them are offerings made to the dead. 27. The priests make any use of the sacrificial offerings, and their wives salt a portion of 476b them, but nothing is given to the poor and to the sick. Priests had a share of the sacrificial victims (E. Dhorme, Les Religions de Babylonie et d'Assyrie, Paris, 1945, 231 f.). They were also the treasurers of the temple revenue, and sometimes embezzled their gods' property (Ibid. 201 f.). 28. Contrary to the prescriptions of the Jewish Law (Lev 12:4; 15:19 f.) women in a state of ceremonial uncleanness could partake of the sacred meals. If idols were true gods, they would never tolerate such profanation.

f 29-39 Further Illustration of the Idols' Impotence—29. How can idols be gods when even women are allowed to minister as priestesses? Jewish legislation debarred women from the altar service. 30 f. The superiority of the Israelites' God is further emphasized. The Babylonian priests sit, or perhaps weep, in the temples with their clothes rent, their heads and beards unshaven and their heads uncovered howling before their gods as at a funeral-feast. All such signs of mourning were strictly forbidden to Israelite priests, Lev 21:5. 32. This must have been shocking to a pious Jew to whom anything that came near the presence of God became holy. 33-37. A series of implicit contrasts between the One God of the Israelites and the Babylonian gods. Unlike them God is a just judge rewarding good and punishing evil, Deut 32:35; 1 Kg 26:23; he sets up kings and deposes them, 1 Kg 2:8; he gives riches, 1 Kg 2:7; he requires vows to be performed promptly, Deut 23:21; he can save from death, 1 Kg 2:6; he gives a blind man his sight, Ps 145:8, delivers a man from distress, Is 25:4, helps the widows and the orphans, Deut 10:18; Ps 145:9; Is 1:17.

g 40-44 The Gods dishonoured by their Worshipers—40 f. The Babylonians dishonour their gods by asking of them what they cannot do. Thus if they hear of a dumb man, they bring him before Bel-Marduk, the great national god of Babylon, entreating him that the man may speak, as if he can hear them. And though they are aware, from their own experience, of their gods' impotence, they do not forsake them, for they are devoid of sense. 42 f. They dishonour their gods also by the immoral Ishtar cult. Women with a cord round their waists, sat in the streets, probably near the temples, burning chaff, the smoke of which was believed to possess aphrodisiac properties, and expecting to be accosted by a male worshipper. After having performed her shameful religious duty she reproached her less fortunate neighbour for not having had the same favour. Cf. Herodotus 1, 199.

45-51 Idols are the Work of Men's Hands—45. Cf. Ps 113:4; Jer 10; 3 f.; and esp. Is 44:12-30. Read 'craftsmen' for 'priests'. 46. Man is mortal; how can he produce a god that is immortal and eternal?

47. Idols therefore are a lie and an object of shame bequeathed by artisans to posterity. 50. The nothingness of idols will one day be made manifest to all peoples. 51. 'To whom, therefore, is it not known . . . ?'

52-55 Total Helplessness of Idols—52. Unlike the true God of the Israelites, Deut 17:14 f.; 28:12, 14, the Babylonian gods can neither set up kings nor give rain. 53. They can neither plead a cause nor redress a wrong; they are as helpless as crows flying in mid-air. This is, perhaps, a popular saying meaning: They can plead as much as a crow.

56-64 Idols are utterly Worthless—58. They are absolutely useless. A mighty king, a needful object, a door in a house, a wooden pillar in a royal palace are more useful than false gods. 59-62. The sun, the moon, the stars, the lightning, the wind, the clouds obey God's commands in all their activities, but idols are utterly powerless.

65-68 The Idols' Powerlessness is further emphasized—Beasts, which are able to move, are better than they.

69-71 Idols are Contemptible Things—They are like a scarecrow unable to protect a field against robbers; like a thorny shrub patiently suffering birds to sit upon it; like a corpse, probably of an infant, cast away in the dark and left to rot. Their purple and linen robes are eaten by moths, and they themselves cannot escape the ravages of time, and so they will become an object of shame and reproach to their worshippers.

72 Conclusion—A righteous man having no idols is better than a worshipper of idols. The second term of comparison is implied, and we need not suppose that some words have fallen out. For similar construction, cf. Gen 37:27; Num 14:3, etc.

Historical Background—The period with which the book of Ezekiel is chiefly concerned is that which elapsed between the death of Josias, 609, and the destruction of Jerusalem, 587. The fall of the Assyrian empire had been gradual. Long before the capture of Assur, 614, and Nineveh, 612, and the final collapse of Assyrian resistance in Northern Mesopotamia, 607, outlying regions had regained their independence. Shortly before 650 Psammetichus I had driven the Assyrians out of Egypt and laid siege to Ashdod, capital of an Assyrian province in Southern Palestine. His son and successor, Necho II, led an Egyptian army through Palestine in 609, to aid the Assyrians, his allies, and still more to regain for Egypt her ancient dominion over Syria and Palestine and the control of the great trade routes of the Near East. Josias meanwhile had taken advantage of Assyrian weakness to institute a great religious revival, destroy the idolatrous shrine at Bethel and extend his boundaries northwards. Hoping to maintain his independence he opposed the Egyptians at Megiddo and lost his life in battle, 609. He was succeeded by his second son Joachaz, preferred by the people to his elder brother Eliakim. Necho after marching to the Euphrates encamped at Riblah on the Orontes, where he received homage and tribute from the Syrian and Palestinian states. Thither he summoned Joachaz, deposed him after a three months' reign and sent him a prisoner to Egypt where he died. Eliakim received from Necho a new name Joakim (Yôyâqim) and was made vassal king of Judah, 608-598. After the collapse of Assyrian resistance, 607, the Egyptian army now on the Mesopotamian border had to be dealt with by the Babylonians who also claimed dominion over Syria and Palestine. The crown-prince Nabuchodonosor (Nabukudurri-usur 'Nabu, protect the boundary') crossed the Euphrates, defeated Necho at Carchemish, 606, and pursued the Egyptians through Syria and Palestine to their own borders. Here however he was recalled to Babylon by the death of his father Nabopolassar in May or June 605. On his march through Palestine he had besieged Jerusalem and begun the exile by deporting Daniel and his companions to Babylon in December 606. The fast, instituted to commemorate the anniversary of the calamity, determines the month, in the third year of Joakim (Spring 606-Spring 605) by the Babylonian postdating system, Dan 1:1, but in the fourth (Autumn 606-Autumn 605) by the Hebrew antedating system, Jer 46:2. Joakim paid tribute to the Babylonians for three years but

f Nabuchodonosor despoiled the palace of its treasures and the temple of its sacred vessels and deported also to Babylon many thousands of the more influential citizens. Ezechiel was one of the deported and dates his prophecies from this event, 597. Joachin was replaced by Matthanias a third son of Josias who received a new name Sedecias and was the last king of Judah, 597-587. He remained subject to Babylon until 589 when Judah, Ammon and Tyre participated in a revolt instigated by the new Pharaoh Hophra (Vg Ephree) more daring than his predecessor Psammetichus II, 594-589. Jerusalem was besieged for the third time by Nabuchodonosor early in 588 and captured in August 587. The citizens were slaughtered and dispersed, the city and temple destroyed by fire. Only peasants and vintagers were left in the land which was not made a Babylonian province but was abandoned to the depredations of hostile neighbours. Sedecias escaped from the city but was captured and taken to Riblah where his sons were slain before his eyes and he himself was blinded and deported.

g The religious condition of Judah during this period was similar to that of nearly a century earlier and was due to the same causes. A great religious revival was followed by a corresponding idolatrous reaction. Pious kings were replaced by impious successors, Ezechias by Manasses and Amon, Josias by Joakim and Sedecias. Foreign alliance or dependence, Assyrian in the earlier, Egyptian and Babylonian in the later period, introduced foreign worship. Old Canaanite religious practices flourished in both periods. The deportation of the best elements of the population in 597 must have aggravated existing evils. There is thus no reason to think that Jeremias and Ezechiel exaggerate in their descriptions of the moral and religious depravity which made chastisement inevitable and sealed the fate of Jerusalem and Judah.

478a Contents—The book of Ezechiel is divided into three parts containing respectively threats of chastisement against Jerusalem and Judah, chh 1-24, prophecies against Gentile neighbours, chh 25-32, and promises of a restoration of the exiles, chh 33-48. The threats are varied by denunciations of the crimes committed, practical instructions and rare gleams of hope of a better future. In view of recent theories on the composition of the book a close synopsis of its contents is necessary to give the reader a clear idea of its logical structure.

b In the introduction to the first part, chh 1-3, Ezechiel receives his prophetic mission with appropriate instructions from Yahweh who appears to him in Babylonian enthroned on his heavenly chariot. The first cycle of threats, chh 4-11, begins with a prediction by means of symbolic actions of the siege and fall of Jerusalem and the death and dispersal of its citizens, chh 4-5. The country also from the Egyptian desert to Riblah on the Orontes will be devastated for the sins of its inhabitants, chh 6-7. Transported in a vision from Babylonia to Jerusalem Ezechiel beholds the idolatrous worship which defiles the sanctuary, the execution of the guilty citizens and the destruction of the city by fire. Yahweh abandons his sanctuary and city, but sends through his prophet a message of hope to the exiles to whom he promises a new heart and a new spirit, chh 8-11. The second cycle of threats, chh 12-19, begins with another symbolical prediction of the fall of Jerusalem and the exile with special reference to the fate of Sedecias. The fulfilment of prophecy is emphatically proclaimed and false prophets are denounced, chh 12-13. The exiles now ask Ezechiel to consult Yahweh on their behalf. He refuses, but exhorts them to a true repentance assuring them that Yahweh spares the innocent when he punishes a nation for their sins, ch 14. There is no hope for Israel, Yahweh's unfruitful vineyard, for the wood of the unproductive vine is useless except as firewood, ch 15. A long historical retrospect of the sins of Israel shows that her punishment is just and inevitable. The lesson is enforced by the examples of Sodom and Samaria, already punished though less guilty, ch 16. Sedecias, a perjurer, doomed to deportation, suggests by contrast a picture of the Messiah, ch 17. The exiles, again informed that they will not be punished except for their own sins, are reminded of God's mercy and exhorted to repentance, ch 18. A poetical elegy on three exiled princes, Joachaz, Joachin and Sedecias, aptly concludes the cycle, ch 19. The third cycle opens with another request from the exiles to consult Yahweh on their behalf. Ezechiel again refuses, then denounces their fathers' sins and their own sins, but finally predicts future conversion and restoration, ch 20. The sword of Yahweh, Nabuchodonosor, is next depicted entering the land to exterminate its inhabitants, ch 21. The sins of Judah are again denounced and all classes of her inhabitants are shown to be guilty, ch 22. Another historical retrospect of the sins of the northern and southern kingdoms, Oholah and Oholibah, shows that Judah's chastisement is just and inevitable, ch 23. The last chapter announces the beginning of the siege of Jerusalem and on the same day the death of Ezechiel's wife whom he is forbidden to mourn as a sign to the exiles not to mourn the fall of Jerusalem. The news of that event brought to the exiles by a fugitive will detach Ezechiel's tongue from his palate, give him free use of his prophetic gift.

The second part of the book begins with a prophecy of the destruction of Ammon, Moab, Edom and Philistia, ch 25. Next come three prophecies against Tyre concluding with brief indications of the fall of Sidon and the restoration of Israel, chh 26-28. Finally seven prophecies predict the fall of Egypt and one also her subsequent restoration, though not to her former greatness, chh 29-32.

The promises of restoration commence with the arrival of the fugitive announcing Jerusalem's fall. The teaching on personal responsibility is more fully expounded. Not the remnant left in Palestine and doomed to destruction but the exiles shall possess the land, ch 33. Former shepherds of Israel are denounced. The reign of a new David and the abiding presence of Yahweh are promised, ch 34. The ruin of Edom, implacable enemy of Judah and chief occupier of her territory, is again predicted, ch 35. The restoration of Israel, rebuilding of her cities, multiplication of her seed, gift of a new heart and a new spirit, not through her own merits but for the glorification of Yahweh's name among the Gentiles, are foretold, ch 36. The vision of dry bones restored to life and the symbolical action of joining together two rods figure the revival of the nation by the return of the exiles and the reunion of the sceptres of Judah and Israel, ch 37. The destruction of Gog and his army represents Yahweh's final victory over the pagan world, chh 38-9. Finally the new temple, the new cult and the new holy land are depicted at length, chh 40-48.

Ezechiel and his Mission—Ezechiel (Y'hezq'el 'God is strong' or 'God strengthens') son of Buzi, was a priest, undoubtedly of the line of Sadoc. He must have been of a certain age and standing to be included among the influential citizens of Jerusalem deported with their king Joachin by Nabuchodonosor in 597. His residence in Babylonia was at Tel-Abib, apparently the chief settlement of the exiles, on the Naru Kabaru or Grand Canal (DV 'river Chobar') south of 478i Babylon in the vicinity of Nippur. He was married but his wife died on the first day of the siege of Jerusalem, Jan. 588. His custom of dating his prophecies and his adoption of the Babylonian calendar are naturally attributed to the milieu in which he lived and prophesied. He received his prophetic vocation in June 593. His last dated prophecy belongs to the year 571. All our knowledge of him is derived from his own writings, and the dates of his birth and death are unknown. He must have witnessed the religious revival of Josias and the subsequent idolatrous reaction and died in exile.

g The mission of Jeremiah was to the Israelites in Palestine but that of Ezechiel was to the exiles. He had to maintain Yahweh worship among them and prepare them for the restoration. His task was difficult for they were a rebellious people inclined to idolatry and, in their isolation from temple and cult, accessible to the seductions of Babylonian ritual and pagan environment. Presumption and despair were the chief obstacles to their conversion. They believed that their exile would be speedily terminated and that Yahweh, who had miraculously preserved Jerusalem from the Assyrians, would not allow the Chaldeans to destroy his city and sanctuary. They believed also that they were being punished unjustly for the sins of their ancestors, and were the innocent victims of national responsibility. Such hearers were little disposed to heed prophetic discourses assuring them of the proximate and certain ruin of the nation and of the need of conversion to obtain a hearing from Yahweh and escape a similar fate. Only when the prophet's authority was established and the exiles' infatuation dissipated by the fall of Jerusalem could his preaching bear fruit. b We can understand therefore why he was inhibited in the use of his prophetic gift during a long period and why supernatural manifestations, symbolic actions, parables and popular sayings were particularly necessary to excite interest and secure a minimum of attention from an unprepared and incredulous audience. The many predictions of the fall of Jerusalem and of the destruction and dispersal of the inhabitants of Judah were directed against the presumption of the exiles, the repeated lessons on personal responsibility and divine mercy against their despair. Far from being involved in the ruin of the nation they were to be the nation resuscitated. The many descriptions of the sins of Israel in all its history and in all classes of its population were intended to convince the exiles that her chastisement was just and inevitable. The mass of the Israelites in Palestine were guilty and doomed to destruction. Ezechiel has no mission to preach to them, makes no effort to convert them. His solicitude is for the exiles on whom all his hopes are centred. More fortunate than Jeremiah he knows that his labours, at first unfruitful, will be recompensed by a measure of success in the not too distant future.

i The view, advanced by Hertrich and Bertholet and defended by Auvray, that Ezechiel's residence in Babylonia before Jerusalem's fall is the invention of a redactor and that his threats of punishment, like those of Isaias and Jeremias, were addressed to the Israelites in Palestine, is based on a misunderstanding of the prophet's mission and character. The three great prophets in their prophecies against the Gentiles distinguish clearly between those against whom oracles are directed and those for whom they are revealed and to whom they are addressed. They did not seek by these oracles to convert the Gentiles but to convince the Israelites that Yahweh would remove the oppressors of his people and thus prepare the way for the Messianic kingdom. Similarly Ezechiel had not like Jeremias a mission to the Israelites in Palestine whose doom he repeatedly announces as proximate and inevitable. His mission was to convert the exiles on whom all hopes of a restoration were based and who had to be disabused of their errors and convinced of God's justice and holiness before they could become the objects of his mercy and the recipients of his favours.

That we learn more of the actual conditions of the exiles from Jeremias than from Ezechiel is explained by their different characters. Ezechiel, concentrated completely on his main object, gives little information about himself and his surroundings. He is not discursive and self-revelatory like Jeremias. Finally the new view is not commended by the numerous textual alterations required to transport the prophet from Tel-Abib to Jerusalem during the first part of his prophetic career. It should be antecedently well established to justify so many arbitrary emendations.

Ezechiel has been accused of originating the exaggerated cult of the Law which characterizes later Judaism. The accusation is based on the theory of Wellhausen that the ritual laws of the Mosaic code are a development of the code of Ezechiel. Our increased knowledge of the Ancient East has shown, however, that an extensive ritual developed early in all Eastern religions. Without discussing the date when the legislation of the Pentateuch received its final form we can confidently assume that the ritual laws of Leviticus are earlier than those of Ezechiel. The prophet's code is ideal and selective. He ignores important legal institutions of earlier date and adopts those which suit his purpose. His exclusion of Levi from a tribal portion of the land shows that he regards the whole tribe of Levi as dedicated to the service of the sanctuary. It is most unlikely that later Judaism, while ignoring his descriptions of the temple and the holy land, adopted and developed his legal code. Ezechiel is moreover an eloquent exponent of the need of interior religion. He insists on a sincere conversion to Yahweh, on a new heart and a new spirit.

Many commentators have depicted Ezechiel as a victim of hallucinations, as afflicted with the physical maladies of aphasia and catalepsy. These errors are due, partly to a rationalistic interpretation of supernatural manifestations, partly to a misunderstanding of the texts. His frequent visions and symbolical actions were intended to secure the attention of his incredulous hearers and prepare them for the day when the fulfilment of his oft-repeated prophecies would make them acknowledge his authority and follow his guidance. The visions also taught the necessary lesson that the dominion of Yahweh extended beyond the land of his people to all parts of the world. As Ezechiel's tongue was 'attached to his palate' from the beginning of his prophetic ministry to the fall of Jerusalem, he could not suffer from aphasia while prophetically active but from certain restrictions in the use of his prophetic gift. The binding with cords is another figurative indication of the moral obligation of seclusion imposed on him by Yahweh. It was not catalepsy but Yahweh's command which made him lie on his right and on his left side during long periods. He was also ordered to prepare his own food in the sight of the people during these periods which he could not have done if deprived of all power of movement by catalepsy.

479a Messianism—As a religious teacher Ezechiel is simple and earnest and usually enforces his lessons by frequent repetitions. Only his Messianic prophecies require some explanation. They present us with a striking example of the lack of perspective which sometimes characterizes prophetic visions of future events. He sees on the same plane two distinct future events, the proximate national restoration and the remote establishment of the Messianic kingdom and combines these visions in his descriptions of a Messianic restoration. That is why his Messianism is so distinctively national and material and why a literal fulfilment of many of his prophecies cannot be expected since the Messianic kingdom was not national but universal, not materially but spiritually peaceful and prosperous. The Messiah is a sprout of the dried up trunk of the Davidic tree which becomes a magnificent cedar, a good shepherd contrasted with the many bad shepherds of Israel, above all a new David. His kingdom is depicted as material and national, the

- 479a promised land enlarged by the conquests of David. His subjects are the twelve Jewish tribes with an admixture of alien residents. The peace of this kingdom is secured by weakening or destroying hostile neighbours, Philistia, Edom, Moab, Ammon, Tyre and Egypt. The defeat and destruction of Gog and his army after the establishment of the kingdom is an assurance of Yahweh's permanent protection. Material prosperity is indicated by the fertility and fecundity of sterile regions. The new temple is mainly a reproduction of the temple of Solomon. The new laws are Mosaic and national. The conditions of entry into the kingdom are a sincere conversion, a new heart and a new spirit. This picture of a Jewish Messianic kingdom which was never realized may have little appeal for modern readers but was undoubtedly helpful to Ezechiel's contemporaries who needed encouragement to support the trials of exile and prepare themselves for the coming restoration. There is an economy in divine revelation. The expiatory sufferings of the Messiah and the exclusion from his kingdom of the Jews who rejected him did not form part of Ezechiel's message.
- c Composition and Authorship—The logical and for the most part chronological order of the prophecies may well suggest to the general reader that the present form of the book of Ezechiel is that which it received from its original author. A closer study reveals however in this as in other prophetic books the hand of a redactor. The text is sometimes in considerable disorder. Examples will be found in chh 4, 10 and 24. Messianic prophecies in the first part of the book are generally considered later additions (16:57-63; 20:33-44 more probably; 11:14-21; 17:22-24 less probably). Other subsequent insertions are 3:16b-21; 27:9b-25a; 28:20-26; 39:17-20; 46:16-18. For reasons suggested by the context we may well attribute the present position of these passages to a redactor without however denying their authenticity. The present text exhibits moreover a number of minor errors, omissions, amplifications and glosses. There are also many repetitions. Most of these are explained by the fact that Ezechiel often repeats himself to impress his teaching on his hearers but some are more probably later additions.
- d Ancient commentators in general and among modern non-Catholics J. Herrmann, 1924, and G. A. Cooke, 1937, in particular defend the substantial authenticity of the prophecies. Only in recent times have other explanations of their origin been proposed, usually too extravagant to need refutation. Hoelscher, 1924, attributes only the poetical parts to Ezechiel and the mass of prose prophecies to a 5th cent. redactor. Torrey, 1930, regards the whole book as a pseudoeptigraph, composed c 230 B.C., fictionally ascribed to the time of Manasses by its original author and transformed into a post-exilic work by a redactor. Smith, 1931, makes the author a prophet who lived partly in the Northern Kingdom, partly in exile at Nineveh between 722 and 669. Both Torrey and Smith find the idolatrous reaction described by Ezechiel inexplicable after the reform of Josias and therefore transfer the prophecies which denounce it to an earlier historical period. They err in not recognizing that at a later period the same causes produced the same effect. Hertrich, 1932, assigns the promises, especially chh 40-48, to an exilic redactor and nearly all the rest of the book to a prophet who lived at Jerusalem during the years preceding the city's fall. Bertholet, 1936, develops Hertrich's theory. He locates Ezechiel first at Jerusalem during the period of threats, then somewhere in Judah where he prophesied against the Gentiles and finally in Babylonia where he predicted the restoration. He assumes that the prophet only left detached leaves and sketches of prophecies expanded into the present book by his spiritual heirs. It is difficult to believe that the prophet was unable to express himself clearly as Bertholet supposes, and to understand why his editors took such pains to conceal his long residence in Jerusalem. Ezechiel's repetitions even when accompanied by variations are particularly objected to and attributed to alternative sketches of the same prophecy. Is it not natural for a teacher to repeat himself in order to impress his teaching on his hearers? Failure to recognize the religious need of a prophet of the exile provisionally supplied by Ezechiel is a fundamental error of this and similar theories.

Text and Versions—The Heb. text of Ezechiel is less well preserved than that of any other OT book. Our chief help in re-establishing it is the LXX based on a Heb. text older than MT. Here as elsewhere deeper corruptions are common to MT and LXX. Frequently however the Gk text reveals a gloss or omission in MT and supplies a correction of a corrupt reading. Sometimes the context, sometimes the metre in poetical passages, establishes the superiority of the LXX reading. The qinah metre more commonly used by Ezechiel is well known, and superfluous additions in MT, omitted by LXX, can be detected. At other times, however, the Gk translator misunderstands the Heb. text or evades a difficulty by an omission or an approximate rendering. No general rule can be given but an intelligible LXX variant is usually preferred to an unintelligible MT reading. Our knowledge of the Gk text of Ezechiel has been increased by the publication of the Chester Beatty (Ez 11-17 with lacunae) and the Scheide (Ez 19-39 with lacunae) papyri dated in the early 3rd cent. before Origen's Hexapla. The fact that the new text has some MT readings not found in our oldest and best Greek MS (B) does not in any way diminish the value of the LXX variants mentioned above. It was previously believed that three Gk translators rendered each a different part of the book. This conclusion, based on the different renderings of the divine names in the MSS, has been upset by the evidence of the Scheide papyrus. We may now ascribe more probably and naturally the whole book to a single translator. The Syriac version occasionally supports corrections derived from LXX. Vg almost invariably follows MT.

I-XXIV Threats: Chastisement of Jerusalem and 480a Judah.

I-III Introduction: First Vision and Vocation.

I 1-28 The Theophany—God appears to Ezechiel in his heavenly chariot. The four living creatures, later called Cherubs, who support his throne are first described, then the chariot wheels, then the throne and finally the figure on the throne. The vision is perceived like a dream not by the outer but by the inner senses. The Cherubim have each four wings, one pair covering their bodies, the other outstretched so that the four pairs of extended wings form the four sides of a square. They have also each four faces like those of a man, an ox, a lion, and an eagle so that they can go face forward in all four directions, N. S. E. W., without turning. Each has moreover two hands under the lower wings and one leg, not jointed and round at the extremity. The legs are attached to wheels which revolve when the chariot is in motion. Each of the four wheels consists of two wheels at right angles to each other and can thus revolve in all four directions without turning. Above the Cherubim is a kind of firmament, compared to crystal, and above the firmament the figure of a man enthroned, all fiery and encompassed with a brightness resembling the rainbow.

1-3. Time and place. 1. The thirtieth year is enigmatical. Suggested reckonings from the birth of Ezechiel and the reform of Josias are unparalleled. Most probably thirtieth is a corruption of the regnal year (12th or 13th) of Nabuchodonosor. 2-3. The second indication, June 593 B.C., not in the first but in the third person, brings the date into conformity with the other dates of the book, all reckoned from the captivity of Joachin in the first year of Sedecias, 597 B.C., Nisan (March-April) being the first month of the year. The place is the Naru Kabaru, Grand Canal, e 4. The storm-wind, dark cloud and fire or lightning are the usual accompaniments of a theophany. The vision as the harbinger of evil comes from the north, the region of darkness and calamity. 'a fire infolding it': 'a mass of fire'. 'amber': 'electrum', an amalgam of gold and silver.

d 5-14. On the Cherubim cf. Ex 25:18; 3 Kg 6:23. The Babylonian kirubu was an inferior deity who guarded the gates of temples and palaces and might be also an idol-bearer. This monster had the head of a man, the body of a lion or an ox and the wings of an eagle. A few commentators interpret faces as aspects and assimilate cherub and kirubu. But the wings—the eagle aspect—are distinguished from the faces in the description. Face-forward movement in all four directions without turning requires four faces. The figure of the cherub is based on that of the kirubu but is not a reproduction of it. 7. The jointless legs and rounded soles exclude bending and turning. 8. Omit 'on the four sides' after wings. 10. The faces express respectively the intelligence, strength, majesty and swiftness of the Cherubs. 'over': 'to'. 11. Omit 'and their faces', not in LXX and confusing. 12. The spirit of God directed the movements of the Cherubim. 13a. 'And between these living creatures appeared as it were coals of fire which burned like torches'. Omit 14 (LXX). It was the fire which flashed and moved.

e 15-21. The wheels rest on the ground when the chariot comes to earth. 'With four faces' (unintelligible): (LXX) 'by the four (living creatures)'. 16. 'the sea': 'topaz', lit. eye of Tarshish. The view that the wheels were not double, as already explained, but when seen in perspective seemed to be one within the other is improbable. Work means structure. 17. Parts are lit. quarters, each facing in a different direction. 18. Read 'felloes' for 'wheels' and for 'whole body'. The eyes were most probably ornaments as in a peacock's tail. Some interpret bosses instead of felloes. Directed by the spirit of God wheels and cherubs moved harmoniously in all four directions without turning. 20-21. 'spirit of life' (LXX, Vg): 'spirit of the living creatures' (MT).

f 22-28. The platform resting on the heads of the Cherubim is likened to the firmament, God's footstool; cf. Ex 24:20. Its firmness and colour are indicated by the comparisons. 23. MT gives the Cherubim three pairs of wings by a dittography, rendered loosely in Vg. 'straight': 'outstretched' (LXX). The meaning is that the platform extends as far as the outstretched wings. 24. Comparisons indicate the noise of the wings when in motion. When let down they remained outstretched. Omit 25. The voice is premature and the letting down of the wings a repetition. 26. The spirituality of God is safeguarded by expressions like appearance and likeness. 27. 'amber' 'electrum'.

g The theophany in Babylonia gave an important lesson to the exiles. They shared to some extent the pagan belief that the power and presence of a god were restricted to a particular region. By his majestic appearance in a foreign land Yahweh manifested his Omnipotence and Omnipresence.

h II 1-III 15 Call to the Prophetic Ministry—God announces his mission to Ezechiel, constitutes him his interpreter and finally sends him to preach to his fellow-captives at Tel-Abib.

II 1-7 The Task—Ezechiel prostrates himself in fear and reverence before the glory of God. He hears a voice bidding him rise and obeys, strengthened by the spirit. The expression Son of man is equivalent to man. It occurs ninety times in Ezechiel and stresses the littleness of man compared with the greatness of God. 8. The Israelites are characterized as a rebellious people, not peoples (MT). 'my covenant': 'against me'. 4. 'And the children . . . are of', etc.

5. The condition is disjunctive; 'Whether they hear or not . . . they shall know'. 6. 'Unbelievers and destroyers'. The usual rendering, briars and thorns is uncertain. 7b-c. 'whether they hear or refuse to hear, for they are a rebellious house'. House is accidentally omitted in MT.

II 8-III 3 The Message—God presents to Ezechiel I a book containing lamentations, mourning and woe and orders him to eat it. We thus learn that God is the real author of what Ezechiel preaches and that the divine communications are threats of punishment. The eating of the book is not real but symbolical, since the vision affected only the internal senses. On its roll form cf. Jer 36. 8b. 'And be not rebellious like that house'. 9. The prophet says a hand indeterminately to avoid anthropomorphism. III:1. 'Eat what thou findest'. 3. The book is sweet as God's gift. Cf. 'My yoke is sweet'.

III 4-11 The Sending—Ezechiel is now sent to the exiles, the recipients of his instructions. He is warned that his rebellious and hard-hearted hearers will not heed his words but is strengthened to persevere against all opposition. 5. The foreigners are 'deep of lip and heavy of tongue'. They seem to mumble and stammer. 6. Cf. Christ's words on Capharnaum and Bethsaida (Mt 11:21; 12:41). 11c. 'Whether they hear or refuse to hear'.

12-15 The Vision disappears: Ezechiel goes to k Tel-Abib—12. (After 'commotion'): 'When the glory of Yahweh ascended from its place'. b'rûm 'in ascending' replaces bârûk 'blessed'. 13b. 'and the simultaneous noise of the wheels'. Omit the rest as an inappropriate repetition. 14. Ezechiel was not transported to Tel-Abib but a supernatural force uplifted him spiritually and impelled him thither. His bitterness was due to reaction and a realization of the difficulties of his task. 15. Exhausted by his experiences he remained stupefied for seven days at Tel-Abib until a fresh revelation restored him to his senses.

16-21 The Prophet's Responsibility—Ezechiel is I remarkable for his teaching on personal responsibility. The subject is discussed here from the point of view of the prophet, compared to a watchman, and subsequently more fully, 14:12-23; 18:1-32; 33:1-20. Both prophet and sinner are responsible if no warning is given. Only the sinner is responsible if the warning is unheeded. The punishment contemplated is death. Prolongation of life is the reward of the prophet's fidelity and of the sinner's conversion. The habitual sinner is first considered, then the just man who sins. Conversion is equally necessary and salutary in both cases. 20. (After 'iniquity'): 'And I lay', etc. 'He shall die' is the apodosis of the first conditional clause. 'Because' begins the second clause. MT detaches 16a, date of the vision in 22 ff., from 16b, thus suggesting that this passage is a later but not inappropriate addition.

22-27 Silence and Seclusion—These verses may belong m to the introduction or to the first cycle of prophecies. Ezechiel is ordered to stay in his house and refrain from preaching. The binding with cords and attachment of the tongue to the palate are figurative indications of the seclusion and silence imposed. As Yahweh is the author of the mutism he must also be the author of the binding; cf. 4:8. 25. 'Bonds shall be put on thee and thou shalt be bound with them and thou shalt not go out among them' (the exiles). Yahweh as agent is sometimes unmentioned when human agents would be explicitly indicated and he alone can attain his end by imposing on his prophet a moral obligation. There is no reason to suppose that the binders were exiles who thought Ezechiel demented, still less to attribute his silence and seclusion to physical maladies, aphasia and catalepsy. The motive of the precept was the unworthiness and unpreparedness of the exiles. 'For they are a rebellious house'.

IV-XII First Cycle of Threats against Jerusalem and 481a Judah.

IV 1-V 17 Symbolical Announcement of the Siege

481a of Jerusalem and the Exile—The text must be restored to order. Siege of Jerusalem, 1-3, 7. Famine during the siege, 10-11, 16-17. Length of the exile, 4-6, 8. Unclean foods during the exile, 9-12, 15. Annihilation of the citizens, 5:1-4. Explanation of the symbols, 5:5-17. The determination of the periods represented by days during which Ezechiel lies on his left and on his right side is disputed but only one solution is tenable. As the days represent years they cannot refer to the siege of Jerusalem. Neither can they refer to the iniquity of Judah and Israel during the divided monarchy since Judah's iniquity cannot be reduced to forty years, and Ezechiel represents not the commission but the chastisement of sin. As periods of symbolical expiation they can only refer to the exile. Israel's exile, 721-538, lasted 183 years, Judah's, 587-538, 49 years. The 190 and 40 years preserved by LXX are round numbers in close agreement with these figures. The MT reading 390 probably represents an attempt to equate the combined periods, 430 years, with the length of the Egyptian captivity. The use of Israel as a designation of the Northern Kingdom after the fall of Samaria is exceptional, but not without parallel; cf. Is 11:12. As the prophet was ordered to prepare, cook and eat his food in the sight of the exiles we cannot suppose that he was literally bound or paralyzed. He was confined to his house by Yahweh's command, and when he lay down he had to lie on his left side during the first and on his right during the second period.

b IV 1-3, 7 Siege of Jerusalem—Ezechiel is ordered to depict on a brick (used in Babylonia for diagrams as well as for writing) Jerusalem in a state of siege. The siege wall, which may have been a circle of forts, the mound built up against the city wall, the camps of the besiegers and their battering rams are all depicted. The iron wall encircling and isolating the besieged is represented by the iron griddle, used for baking bread, erected between Ezechiel and the city. The prophet, representing the Babylonians, besieges the city, menaces it with bared arm and prophecies against it. The diagram predicts a future event like the inscription in Is 8:1.

c 10-11, 16-17 Famine during the Siege—The famine is symbolized by the rationing. Ezechiel is restricted to a daily ration of 20 shekels of bread, about 8 oz, and a sixth of a hin of water, about 2 pints. The drink restriction would be felt most in the hot climate of Babylonia.

d 4-6, 8 Length of the Exile—As the Oriental faces the east in determining directions the left side indicates the northern, the right the southern kingdom. The expiation is not vicarious but symbolical. 5a. 'For I have appointed the years of their iniquity to be unto thee a (corresponding) number of days'. 8. 'siege': 'distress'.

e 9, 12-15 Unclean Foods during the Exile—The mixture of wheat and barley, beans and lentils, millet and spelt, was unlawful just as sowing two kinds of corn in one field or using two kinds of cloth for one garment, Lev 19:19; Deut 22:9-11. The fuel for baking was also unclean and revolting, Deut 23:13 ff., but a mitigation of this uncleanness was obtained by prayer. The dried dung of animals is still frequently used. Bread is sometimes baked by making a fire over flat stones, spreading the cake on the heated stones and covering it with the embers. The period mentioned is 190 (MT 390) days to which 40 must be added. Food eaten in exile was unclean because sacrifices and offerings of first-fruits by which it was sanctified were impossible.

f V 1-4 Annihilation of the Citizens—The last of the symbols refers to siege and exile combined. The shaving of Judah with a razor expressed the completeness of its devastation, Is 7:20. Here the order given to Ezechiel symbolizes the annihilation of the inhabitants of Jerusalem. Some perish within the city by famine and pestilence, others without by the sword; others are deported but shall not escape the sword. A few are spared from the massacre but even of these all shall not survive. That this remnant is ignored when the symbol is explained does not justify the conclusion that 3-4 is a later addition. 1a. 'Take thee a sharp sword, (as) a barber's razor take it to thee'. 2. 'according to': 'after'. 'knife': 'sword'. 4. (After 'with fire'): 'And thou shalt say to the whole house of Israel' (LXX).

5-17 Explanation of the Symbols—The symbols indicate the chastisement of the inhabitants of Jerusalem for their iniquities. Jerusalem was the religious centre of the world. The Jews were God's chosen people united with him by a special covenant. Instead of being an example to the Gentiles they surpassed them in wickedness. Hence their punishment will be without parallel, especially because they defiled Yahweh's sanctuary with idolatrous worship. They shall perish by pestilence, famine, the sword, and attacks of wild beasts. They shall become a byword to the Gentiles, astonished at the severity of their punishment. 6c. They refers to the Jews, not the Gentiles. 7. 'have surpassed': 'have rebelled more than'. The judgements of the nations indicate the precepts of the natural law. 10. Cf. 4 Kg 6:24-29 and Lam 4:10. 12. Deportation will not end the punishment. The sword still threatens the exiles. 15b. When the evils predicted come to pass the sufferers will recognize the prophetic character of Ezechiel's words intended for them as well as for his fellow-exiles. Communications were maintained between the exiles and the Palestinian Jews. I will be comforted expresses anthropomorphically Yahweh's satisfaction at the completion of his task. 16-17. These verses are regarded by some as a later addition. Repetitions, however, are common in Ezechiel. Blood is elsewhere coupled with pest. As distinguished here from blood shed by the sword in battle it may refer to homicides, fatal accidents, judicial executions.

VI 1-14 Announcement of the Punishment of Judah 482a

—The previous threats of chastisement were directed particularly against Jerusalem and its citizens. Now Judah and its inhabitants are similarly threatened. The hilly character of the land explains why the mountains are addressed. The high places on the hills were conspicuous centres of idolatrous worship. Sword, famine and pestilence are the instruments of chastisement. 3. 'rocks': 'water-courses'. The places personified represent their inhabitants. 4a. 'idols': 'incense altars'; cf. Is 17:8. Omit 5a, a repetition of 4b. The shrines of the idols are profaned by the bones of their worshippers. 6. 'Wherever you dwell, the cities shall be laid waste and the high places shall be desolate that your altars may be laid waste and made desolate and your idols be broken and cease and your incense altars be hewn down and your works abolished'. 8. 'Yet will I leave a remnant in that ye shall have some that shall escape the sword among the nations when ye shall be scattered among the countries' (MT). The prophet addresses the Jews in Palestine. He told them in 7 that when the calamity came upon them they should recognize its author. He adds in 9 that a remnant will be converted after the deportation. LXX omits I will leave a remnant, already indicated in 5:3. The comparison of idolatry to matrimonial infidelity is common in prophetic literature. 'because I have broken': 'when I break'. 11. Clapping of hands and stamping of feet express exultation (cf. 25:6), not at the abominations but at their punishment. 13a. 'your': 'their'. Ezechiel distinguishes between his fellow-exiles ('you shall know') and the Palestinians. 14. Deblatha: Reblatha, Riblah on the Orontes at the northern end of David's kingdom identified by Ezechiel with the promised land.

VII 1-27 Second Announcement of the Punishment of Judah and Jerusalem—This prophecy has the same subject-matter as the preceding one. It emphasizes the imminence of the catastrophe, its inevitability, and its enormity. It belongs apparently to the first year of Ezechiel's mission.

1-9. The judgement is imminent. The time, the 482c day, the evil, the end, is come. 2. The four quarters of the earth indicate the whole world. The prophets frequently depict a particular judgement as part of the general judgement. 3c. 'And I will bring upon thee all thy abominations'. LXX puts 2-3 after 8-9. 5. 'Evil upon evil, behold, it comes' (slightly corrected). The word rendered 'destruction' in DV means elsewhere 'crown' or 'garland'.

d 10-19. The punishment is inevitable. 10b. 'The crown has sprouted, the sceptre has blossomed, pride has budded'. The reference is probably to the crowning of Sedecias, whose pride brought revolt and ruin. 11, abbreviated in LXX, is unintelligible. 12. The buyer rejoiced in satisfying his desire, the seller regretted the surrender of his possessions. They are now equal. 13. The principle is illustrated by the sale of land which returned automatically to its original owner in the jubilee year. The verse may be a gloss. 14. 'They have blown', etc. 16. 'trembling': 'mourning'. 17. 'And all knees shall be weak as water'. 19a. 'They shall cast their silver in the street and shall regard their gold as unclean'.

e 20-27. The enormity of the calamity appears from the profanation of Yahweh's sanctuary and his complete abandonment of his people. 20-22. The temple with its treasures, desecrated by idolatry, shall be profaned and plundered. 'They' in 22 is indefinite. 'secret places': 'treasures'. 23. 'Make the chain' (MT) for binding captives. 'and they shall make' (LXX). Judgement of blood means blood-guilt. 24. 'they shall possess their sanctuary': 'their holy places shall be defiled'. 27. Omit 'The king shall mourn, not in LXX. Ezechiel never calls Sedecias king. 'judgements': 'deserts'.

483a VIII-XI Idolatrous Worship in Jerusalem and its Punishment—In this vision dated a year and two (LXX 'one') months after the first, August 592 B.C., Ezechiel is transported in spirit to Jerusalem and there beholds: (1) various forms of idolatry practised by the citizens; (2) the slaughter of all the idolatrous worshippers by destroying angels; (3) the destruction of the city itself by fire; (4) Yahweh's abandonment of his city and sanctuary. The vision concludes with a prediction of restoration. The detailed description of the heavenly chariot, mostly borrowed from ch 1, is a redactional addition. Ezechiel was not bodily but spiritually transported to Jerusalem. He describes supernatural visions, not a series of events.

b VIII 1-18 Idolatrous Worship in Jerusalem—Four species of idolatry are mentioned: Idol worship, Animal worship, Tammuz worship and Sun worship, the first of Canaanite, the second of Egyptian and the third of Babylonian origin. Sun worship was common.

c 1-6. Transported in spirit to the northern gate of the inner court of the temple, Ezechiel looks northwards and sees in the outer court the idol of jealousy set up, as a rival of Yahweh and provoking his jealousy by receiving the cult due to him alone. The idol was most probably Ashera, the consort of Baal, set up by Manasses, 4 Kg 21:7, removed by Josias, ib. 23:6, and reinstalled by a later king. The reform of Josias like that of Ezechias was followed by an idolatrous reaction. 2. Cf. 1:27. 'of fire': 'of a man' (LXX). 3. 'he put forth'. Not the hand but the spirit of God uplifted the prophet. 'near': 'to the entry of'. The gate was a passage way with buildings on either side. 5. (After 'gate') 'the altar of the idol of jealousy'. Omit 'in the very entry' (LXX). 6. Omit 'thinkst thou'. In 6, 13, 15 'turn thee' renders an auxiliary verb expressing repetitions: 'thou shalt see again'.

d 7-12. In Egypt divinities were commonly represented as animals. Incense was offered by the 70 elders to various Egyptian gods. 8. Digging through a wall presents no difficulty in a vision. 11. Omit 'stood' after Saaphan and 'that' after them. Jezonias, an important person, is not mentioned elsewhere. 12. For 'Each in the chamber of his image' (MT), 'Each offering incense to his image' is suggested.

The elders say that Yahweh has abandoned them and they must seek help elsewhere. 483d

13-15. Tammuz was a vegetation god, the Adonis of the Phoenicians, who was supposed to die in the heat of summer and return to life in the spring. The women lament his departure to the underworld. 14. 'in by': 'to'. The mourning took place at the northern gate of the outer court. 15a. 'Hast thou seen?'

16-18. Ezechiel, led back to the inner court, sees 1 in the space between the temple and the altar 25 men with their backs to the temple and their faces to the east adoring the sun. 17. The sense is: Is it too little for them to perpetrate such abominations in the holy city that they fill the land with violence? The last member probably refers to idol worship in Yahweh's sanctuary. 'They present their stench to my nostrils'. 'Stench' is literally 'branch'.

IX 1-10 Punishment of the Idolaters in Jerusalem— Ezechiel now beholds six destroying angels slaying, by order of Yahweh, all the idolatrous citizens, but sparing the innocent whose foreheads have been marked with a sign. 1b. Omit: 'And everyone', etc. (inappropriate). 2. The upper gate is the north gate of the inner court. In Palestine the ink-horn of the scribe is still attached to his girdle. The brazen altar erected by Solomon was removed to the north side of the temple by Achaz who put a stone altar in its place, 4 Kg 16:14. 3. 'Cherub': 'Cherubim' (LXX). 4. Tau means mark. It also indicates the last letter of the Hebrew alphabet, shaped like a cross. The text does not refer to the letter or indicate the nature of the mark. Here again Ezechiel teaches personal responsibility. Only the guilty are punished. 6. 'The ancients before the house' are the sun worshippers. 8a. 'And while they were smiting'. Manifestations of pity and intercession are unusual in Ezechiel. Here they intensify the dramatic effect.

X 1-22 Destruction of the City by Fire—The account h is incomplete. It is suggested that the second part was missing or illegible and a redactor filled the lacuna with a second description of the chariot. The only novelties are the names Cherub for 'living creature' and galgal for 'wheel' and the attribution to the Cherubs of the eyes which adorned the wheels. Yahweh's abandonment of his temple is also narrated.

1-7. The angel who had been ordered to mark the foreheads of the innocents is told to take of the fire in the space between the wheels of the chariot and scatter burning coals over the city. 1 is probably interpolated. It repeats 1:26 and interrupts the context. 3. The right side is the south side. 5. As the Cherubim have halted, the sound of their wings is surprising. 7. 'one cherub': 'he' (LXX), and after 'Cherubims' 'And he took and went forth'; cf. 2.

8-17. The Cherubs and the Wheels. 9. 'to the sight like the chrysolite stone': 'like the brightness of the topaz'. 11. 'they first': 'the first'. 12. 'necks': 'backs'. 'circles': 'wheels'. The spirituality of the Cherubim is less apparent than in ch 1. 13. 'As for the wheels they were called in my hearing galgal'. 14. 'a cherub': 'an ox'. Ezechiel gets a side view of the chariot which was on the right side of the temple and thus sees first the face of the ox. 15. 'Living creatures' is collective.

18-22. Yahweh returns to the chariot which leaves the temple passing through the east gate. 19. 'it stood': 'they stood'. 20-21. The Cherubim are again described. 22. 'the impulse of every one to go': 'they went every one'. Omit 'and their looks'.

XI 1-25. This chapter announces the punishment l of the wicked counsellors in Jerusalem and the conversion and restoration of the exiles in Babylonia. The two episodes are similarly introduced by proverbial sayings expressing the security of the wicked citizens of Jerusalem and their contempt for the exiles. There is thus a literary connexion between them. The objection that the evil counsellors were already slain in ch 9 ignores the fact that the visions 4831 of the slaughter of the citizens and the burning of the city are prophecies of future events. The visions of the evil counsellors and idolatrous worship do not refer to the future. Moreover the terrible chastisement naturally follows its primary cause, idolatrous worship. The traditional order of the text should be retained.

m 1-13 The Flesh and the Cauldron—Ezekiel sees at the eastern gates of the city 25 of the chief men devising evil counsel. They declare themselves protected from destruction by the city wall as meat in a cauldron is protected from consumption. The prophet announces to them that the corpses of those for whose death they are responsible shall remain within the wall like meat in the cauldron but they themselves shall be deported from the city and slain by the sword. On the capture of Jerusalem in 587 B.C. the principal citizens were deported and some were subsequently executed by Nabuchodonosor at Riblah (cf. Jer 52:24-27; 4 Kg 25:18-21).

n 1. Jezonias and Pheltias are mentioned only here, but as princes of the people would be well known to the exiles. 3. 'Were not houses lately built?' (LXX, Vg) is preferable to MT: 'The time is not near to build houses'. The reference is to repairs executed after Nabuchodonosor's visit in 597 B.C. 7. This means the city. 10. The borders of Israel refer to Riblah, the scene of Nabuchodonosor's executions. LXX omits 11-12 possibly as superfluous. 13. The death of Pheltias at the time of the prophecy was a coincidence.

o 14-21 Who shall possess the Land of Yahweh?—The inhabitants of Jerusalem say to the exiles: 'You are far from Yahweh; the land is given in possession to us. The prophet announces that they shall be removed far from Palestine but the despised exiles shall return to it, purify it, and possess it as Yahweh's people. 15. Omit repetition of 'thy brethren'. 'kinsmen': 'fellow exiles' (LXX). 16c. 'And I have been to them only in a small degree a sanctuary', etc. The full observance of Yahweh worship was not possible outside Palestine. 17. 'you': them (LXX). 19. 'one heart': 'a new heart'. 20b. 'They shall be my people and I shall be their God'.

p 22-25 Conclusion of the Vision—Yahweh abandons Jerusalem—The heavenly chariot appears last on Mt Olivet whence Christ ascended into heaven. Re-conducted to Tel-Abib the prophet relates his visions to his fellow exiles.

484a XII-XIX Second Cycle of Threats against Jerusalem and Judah.

XII 1-20 Exile and Devastation—By symbolic actions, Ezekiel predicts (1) the exile in general and the fate of Sedecias in particular, (2) the devastation of the land. He makes public preparations for a departure in the daytime by collecting his belongings and putting them outside his house. He departs by night, passing through a hole which he has made in the wall and simulating blindness. There is some confusion in the text. In the command the evening is the time of departure, in the execution it is the time when the hole was made in the wall. 'Go forth' (qal) and 'carry forth' (hiph'il) are also confused in MT and Vg. Sedecias fled from Jerusalem through a south-eastern gate but was captured and blinded before he was led into exile. The second symbolic action depicts fear and anxiety about food caused by the devastation of the land.

b 1-16 Exile and Fate of Sedecias—2. 'provoking': 'rebellious'. The signs would excite the curiosity of the unbelieving exiles. 3. Omit 'and remove' before 'by day'. The preparation was by day, the departure by night. This verse predicts the exile in general. The necessities would be few: food, water-skin, staff, clothes. 4. 'furniture': 'belongings'. Refer 'by day in their sight' to 'bring forth'. 'that removeth his dwelling': 'to depart'. 5-6. These verses refer to Sedecias. 6a. 'In their sight thou shalt put (thy baggage) on thy shoulder and go forth in the dark'. The covering of the face represents the blinding of the king before his deportation. 7. (After 'dark'):

'I put (my baggage) on my shoulder in their sight'. 10. The message, lit. 'the prince, this burden (or, oracle) in Jerusalem', is obscure. 11c. 'Into exile, into captivity they shall go'. 12. 'shall carry (his belongings) on his shoulder'.

17-20. Eating in fear and trembling indicates insecurity of the means of subsistence. 18. 'trouble': 'trembling'. 'hurry and sorrow': 'anxiety and fear'. 19b. (After 'desolation'): 'Because their land and all it contains shall be devastated'.

XII 21-XIV 11 Prophecy and Prophets—Ezekiel first refutes popular sayings about prophecy. He then inveighs against false prophets and prophetesses. Finally he sets down the conditions required for obtaining answers through a prophet from Yahweh.

21-23 Sayings about Prophecy—The saying 'The days are prolonged and every vision faileth' must cease. Let it be said instead 'The days are near and every vision is realized'. 22. 'in the land': 'about the land'. The prophecies concern the land of Israel. 23. 'the word' (MT) 'the effect' (DV): 'is realized' (Syr.). 24. 'doubtful divination': 'deceitful oracle'. 25a-b. 'I am Yahweh, I shall speak my words, I shall speak and I shall perform and I shall postpone no longer' (LXX). The second saying refers particularly to the proximate destruction of Judah and Jerusalem. This prophecy will be fulfilled without delay, not 'after many days and in times afar off'.

XIII 1-16 The False Prophets—These are defined as 1 prophesying from their own hearts, announcing to the people as the words of Yahweh their own thoughts and wishes, and seeing not, having no supernatural vision. They are like foxes in ruins, undermining instead of building, like whitewashers of a wall, hiding instead of repairing weakness. Their punishment will be exclusion from the people and the land of Israel. 2. (After 'Israel') 'prophecy and say'. 5. 'to face the enemy': 'to the breach'. 6c. 'And they expected him to accomplish their word'. 9. 'council': 'congregation'. Written in the book means registered as members. 10. The wall is the false belief that Yahweh will protect Jerusalem unconditionally. 'dirt without straw': 'whitewash'. 11. 'Say to the whitewashers: there shall be violent rain, hailstones shall fall and the storm-wind shall break forth'. 13. The storm is the Babylonian invasion. 'to consume': 'shall fall'. 14. Insert 'you' before 'shall be consumed'. 15. 'I will say': 'it will be said'. 16. The prophets are the whitewashers of 15.

17-23. The false prophetesses besides attributing to Yahweh their own inventions and prophesying in his name adopted also Babylonian magical practices. They made bands for the joints of the hand and veils for the head to be used as amulets to avert evil influences. Superstitious belief in the efficacy of these amulets gave the power of life and death to their dispensers. 18. 'cushions': 'bands'; 'elbows': 'joints' (of the hands); 'pillows': 'veils'. To catch souls means to prey upon souls. 18c. 'Do you prey upon souls belonging to my people and give life to souls for your own advantage?' The prophetesses promised length of life to the sinners who bought their charms and threatened with death the just who refused them. They also profaned Yahweh by prophesying in his name. 20. Omit (LXX) as glosses 'flying' and 'the souls that should fly'. 22. Justice, not amulets, gives length of life.

XIV 1-11 Worshippers of Idols consult Ezekiel—1 He is ordered to threaten them with extermination unless they renounce idolatry and not to reply to their queries under penalty of sharing their fate. 3. 'uncleanesses': 'idols'. The sense is that their idol worship is external as well as internal. 4. 'I, Yahweh, will answer him notwithstanding the number of his idols'. 5. The answer has a salutary purpose. 7. The strangers would be pagan slaves who accompanied their masters into exile. 9. The prophet who is seduced and answers the demands of idolaters will be exterminated with them. It is Yahweh who seduces 484b him, not positively but negatively, lets him be voluntarily seduced.

I XIV 12-XVI 63 Total Corruption of Judah and Jerusalem—Ezekiel first describes the justice of Yahweh in chastising sinful nations, then the sinfulness of Israel, unfruitful vine, ungrateful child, unfaithful spouse. He concludes that her chastisement, severe and inevitable, will be followed by her restoration.

J 12-23 Justice of the Chastisements of Yahweh—When Yahweh chastises a nation he spares the just but not their sons and daughters. In the chastisement of Jerusalem, however, some will escape into exile to reveal by their manner of life the justice of Yahweh's judgement. Thus the general law of personal responsibility admits exceptions. As some of the guilty are spared here, so the just perish with the wicked, 21:3. 13. The clauses are all conditional, the apodosis is 14b. 'They [alone] shall be saved'. 14. As Israel is an exception to the general rule the instances of just men are sought elsewhere. It is therefore improbable that the prophet Daniel is here indicated. He was moreover a contemporary of Ezekiel while Noe and Job were ancients. Finally the prophet's name is always written Daniel, but here and in 28:3 MT has 'Danel'. This was the name of an ancient Phoenician sage recently revealed by the Rās-Shamra tablets. Most moderns accept the association of the Phoenician Danel with the Edomite Job. It may be assumed that Danel was an ancient historical figure, introduced into Phoenician mythology as Job was introduced into Hebrew Wisdom literature. 22-23. The conduct and actions of the fugitives must have been evil to convince the earlier exiles of the justice of the chastisement.

K XV 1-8 Jerusalem, Unfruitful Vine—The comparison of Israel to a vineyard usually depicts Yahweh's care of his people and their ingratitude and infidelity. Here the point of comparison is the inutility of the unfruitful vine-stock and its consequent destiny, the fire. Both ends, the northern and southern kingdoms, and the centre Jerusalem, captured and sacked in 597 B.C., have been wholly or partially consumed. Yahweh will complete the destruction. 2. 'What advantage has the vine-tree over any other tree, the vine-branch which is among the trees of the forest?' 4. 'reduced to ashes': 'burned'. 7b. 'They have gone out', etc. They have escaped so far but will finally perish.

I XVI 1-14 Jerusalem, Ungrateful Child—Jerusalem as capital represents the land of Israel. Ezekiel does not consider the ethnical origin of the Hebrew people. Israel is a founding. Her father and mother are the previous possessors of the land. The Amorites are the Semitic immigrants who invaded Canaan in the 19th cent. B.C. The Hethites are the northern non-Semitic peoples, Hurrites and perhaps Hittites, who invaded the land in the 18th cent. These possessed Canaan when the patriarchs settled there. 4. The new-born child is still washed, salted and swaddled by the Palestinian Arabs. Israel as a founding was neglected. 5. 'in the abjection of thy soul': 'in disgust for thy life'. The unwanted child was exposed to death. 6. 'I saw thee weltering in thy blood and I said to thee in thy blood "Live"'. Omit last member (LXX). 7. 'And grow like the plants of the fields'. 'woman's ornament': 'beauteous maturity'. 8. Covering with the extremity of the garment meant betrothal, Ru 3:9. Covenant was espousal. 10. 'violet-coloured shoes': 'the skin of the sea-cow'. 12. 'jewel upon thy forehead': 'ring on thy nose'. 13. Omit last member (LXX). A bride, not a queen, is described. 14b. 'For it was perfect through my splendour'. The early monarchy is depicted.

m 15-34 Jerusalem, Unfaithful Spouse—Judah used Yahweh's splendid gifts ungratefully for adulterous ends. Forms of idolatrous worship, both Canaanite and foreign, are indicated. She even paid her guilty partners instead of being paid by them. 16. (After 'high places'): 'decked with divers colours and hast played the harlot upon them'. 17. 'vessels': 'ornaments'. 20-21. Placating false gods with sacrifices of Yahweh's children was the climax of iniquity. Infants were first slain, then burned as holocausts to Moloch at Jerusalem. 22. 'after': 'in'. Correct last member as in 5. 24. 'common stew': 'altar base'; 'brothel house': 'high place'. 26-27 are usually misinterpreted. Ezekiel, describing the sins of Judah, records, after indigenous Canaanite worship, foreign worship introduced by foreign alliances. The first alliance with Egypt was that of Ezechias with the Kushite Pharaoh, punished by the invasion of Sennacherib. Many cities were detached from Judah and incorporated in the Assyrian province of Ashdod. The Egyptians were small in stature but the Kushites who then ruled Egypt were long-bodied, Is 18:2, 7. Their stature is here emphasized as giving them a deceptive appearance of strength. Great in flesh is 'big-bodied' or 'long-bodied', since bāsār 'flesh' is frequently used for 'body', but rarely for membrum virile, the inappropriate modern interpretation here. 27. 'And behold I stretched out my hand against thee, I diminished thy portion and I delivered thee to the desire of thy enemies, the daughters of the Philistines'. This verse confirms the historical allusion suggested above. 29. 'Canaan': 'trade'; cf. 17:4. Babylon was a trade centre. 31. Cf. corrections in 24. 'Thou hast not been as a harlot seeking [LXX] a wage'. 32-34. Judah differed from ordinary harlots in seeking and paying her lovers instead of being sought and paid by them.

35-43 The Chastisement of Jerusalem—She shall be handed over defenceless to her paramours who will strip her of everything and, as Yahweh's appropriate agents, will execute on her the sentence pronounced on adulteresses and shedders of blood. 36. Brass, not used for money (Vg), is unintelligible. 'by': 'and through'. Bloodshed by human sacrifice is indicated. 37. 'Hated' may mean 'loved less'. It probably indicates Judah's fickleness in adopting and abandoning false gods. 38b (corrected). 'And I shall bring upon thee my fury and my jealousy'. 39. 'the vessels of thy beauty': 'thy fair jewels'. 40. 'multitude': 'assembly', a kind of tribunal of the nations. The adulteress is stoned, the shedder of blood has his own blood shed. 41. 'Women' here means nations and particularly Judah's neighbours who rejoice in her humiliation. 42a. 'And I shall satisfy my indignation with her'. Yahweh is depicted as a husband who completely vindicates the wrong done him and is fully satisfied. 43c is probably interrogative. 'Hast thou not fornicated over all thy abominations?' Her punishment is merited by continual infidelity.

44-58 Jerusalem compared with Samaria and Sodom o

—The justice of the sentence pronounced on Jerusalem is confirmed by a comparison. She has sinned more than Samaria and Sodom. As they were punished her chastisement is inevitable. 44. Omit 'common'. 45. The Hittite mother was a heathen. The husbands are national as distinguished from foreign deities. The sisters adopted Canaanite gods and offered them human sacrifices. 46. 'elder': 'bigger'; 'younger': 'smaller'. Not age but extent of territory is indicated. 47. Almost, which begins the second member, must be referred to all. Jerusalem has been more wicked than her sisters in almost all her ways. 48. Daughters are minor cities. 49. 'abundance and idleness': 'careless ease'; 'put forth': 'strengthen' (the hand of the needy). 50. As thou hast seen alludes to the still visible ruins of Sodom. 52. 'Justify' here means render excusable as less guilty. Jerusalem entreated for (DV 'surpassed') her sisters by showing the comparative lightness of their guilt. 53. 'And I will change their lot, the lot of Sodom and her daughters and the lot of Samaria and her daughters and I will change thy lot in the midst of them'. As the prophecy precedes the fall of Jerusalem, Sodom and Samaria shall be re-established but Jerusalem shall be disestablished. 56-57. Was not Sodom a byword on thy lips? Now thou art a byword for thy neighbours. 'Syria', Aram (MT); 'Edom' (Syriac). Edom and Philistia were Judah's neighbours. 58. 'hast borne': 'shall bear'.

484p 59-63 Re-establishment of Jerusalem—Yahweh will make a new and eternal alliance with Jerusalem. Her sisters shall become her daughters. She shall never forget her past infidelity. 59. 'I will deal with thee as thou hast dealt despising the oath', etc. Chastisement comes first. 61. Daughters are subject, sisters independent. 'not by thy covenant': not for observance of the covenant. The promise is surprising in this context and most probably a later addition.

485a XVII 1-24 Fall of Sedecias; Advent of Messias—Ezekiel announces in a parable the enthronement of Sedecias, his alliance with Egypt and revolt from Babylon, his deposition and deportation. He then contrasts with the perjured and fallen monarch the Messianic king and his universal reign.

b 1-10 The Parable—Parables like symbols arouse interest. 3. The eagle is Nabuchodonosor who deposed Joachin and enthroned Sedecias. 'long-bodied': 'with long pinions'; 'marrow': 'top'. 4. Joachin is deported to Babylon. 'top': 'topmost'; 'Canaan': 'trade'. 5. (After 'land'): 'And set it in tillage land beside many waters, (like) A willow he set it'. Sedecias, comfortably enthroned, is compared to a well-watered willow, but, as a weak ruler, to a lowly vine. 6. 'grew into': 'produced'. 7. The second eagle is the Pharaoh Hophra. 7b. 'And behold the vine turned its roots towards him and shot forth its branches towards him that he might water it more than (it was watered in) the bed where it was planted'. 8. Sedecias' alliance with Egypt was inexcusable. 9. The consequence of revolt. After 'fruit': 'that all its branches which it shot forth may wither'. 10. 'furrows': 'bed'.

c 11-21 The Interpretation—The parable narrates the sin and punishment of Sedecias. By violating his oath of allegiance he offended Yahweh whom he had invoked in making it and broke faith with Nabuchodonosor. 12-14. The future tenses in DV should be past. 'observe it': 'stand'. 16. Sedecias died in Babylon. 17. Cf. 9. 'Pharaoh': 'he' (Nabuchodonosor). 18-19. The perjury of Sedecias is an offence against Yahweh. 20. Judge to execute the sentence given at Riblah.

d 22-24 The Messianic King—'Thus saith the Lord Yahweh: I, myself, will take from the top of the cedar, From its loftiest branches I will crop off a tender twig. I will plant it on a mountain high and elevated. On a lofty mountain of Israel will I plant it. It shall shoot forth branches and bear fruit. It shall become a magnificent cedar. All birds shall dwell beneath it, All winged things in the shade of its branches shall dwell. All the trees of the field shall know that I am Yahweh, That I have brought low a high tree and exalted a low tree, That I have made a green tree wither and a dry tree flourish'. The Messianic king is a sprout of the Davidic tree, dried up when he appears; cf. Is 11:1. He becomes, not a vine like Sedecias, but a magnificent cedar. His kingdom is universal. All nations find shelter therein. All kings recognize its divine origin. Cf. the Gospel parable of the Mustard Seed. This promise is appropriate to, and even suggested by, the context.

e XVIII 1-32 Personal Responsibility—Ezekiel combats the belief that children are punished for the sins of their parents. Each individual is responsible only for his own sins. Moreover if the just man sin or the sinner be converted, neither the good deeds of the former nor the evil deeds of the latter will be remembered. Finally he invites all to a true repentance assuring them of the Mercy of Yahweh, more ready to pardon than to punish. This teaching on personal responsibility and divine mercy was particularly necessary when over-emphasis on national responsibility and divine justice led to despair. It was more a reminder than an innovation. In the oldest parts of the Bible individuals are rewarded and punished for their own good and evil deeds.

f 1-4. The Proverb. 2. 'Why do you repeat this proverb among the children [LXX, 'land' MT] of Israel: The fathers have eaten sour grapes and the teeth of the children are set on edge?' The proverb attributes injustice to Yahweh and claims innocence for the speakers.

5-9. The just man. The precepts mentioned summarize important obligations: purity of worship, sexual purity, social justice and charity. Whoever observes them is just and will be saved from premature death. 6. The mountains are the high places. 7. Omit 'to the debtor'. 8. 'increase': 'interest'. Interest could be exacted from a foreigner but not from an Israelite. 9. 'truth': 'them' (LXX).

10-13. The wicked son of a just father. Omit 11a. b The list of sins refers not to omissions but to these things (10) which the sinner does. The son dies for his sins and is not saved by his father's justice.

14-20. The just son of a wicked father. This is the case instanced in the proverb. 17. 'from (injuring) the poor': 'from iniquity'. 18. Omit 'to his brother'. 19. Refutation of the proverb.

21-29. The Convert and the Pervert. God's Mercy } to the repentant sinner and the need of perseverance in the practice of justice complete the teaching. God is more pleased to pardon than to punish but repentance is necessary for pardon and no sinner is safe from chastisement. 21. 'Do penance for' is lit. turn away from. 24. Omit 'shall he live' (LXX). 'prevarication': 'infidelity'. 26. Omit 'therein' (LXX). 27. Omit 'considereth' (LXX). 28. 'Is not my way', etc.

30-32. Invitation to Repentance. 30b. 'Be converted and turn yourselves from all your transgressions that they may not be to you a stumbling-block of iniquity'. 32. For 'him that dieth' many read the sinner as in 23.

XIX 1-14 Elegy on the Princes of Judah—This elegy } aptly concludes the second cycle of prophecies. It is a poetical composition in qinah or elegiac metre. Each verse has five beats, three in the first and two in the second member. It is also a parable. Two princes are represented as young lions, sons of a lioness, and a third as a vine-branch. Sedecias is the vine branch as in ch 17. The lions, appointed by the lioness, are Joachaz deported to Egypt and Joachin deported to Babylon. Joakim is not mentioned because he died in Jerusalem, 4 Kg 24:5. The view that the second lion represents Sedecias is based on the false supposition that the lioness is Amital, wife of Josias and mother of Joachaz and Sedecias. But the lioness in the midst of lions is not the queen-mother but Judah in the midst of foreign nations. The lioness moreover appoints the second king. Sedecias was appointed by Nabuchodonosor. Finally the second monarch is deposed before the third is mentioned.

1-4 Joachaz—1. 'princes' (MT): 'prince' (LXX). m Thy mother, 2, 10, shows that the whole poem is addressed to Sedecias. 2-3. 'What a lioness was thy mother Among the lions! She couched in the midst of the lions, Reared her cubs. She reared one of her cubs Who became a young lion; He learned to rend his prey, He devoured men'. The detailed description is verified in the lion rather than in the prince. A parable is not an allegory. 4. 'They summoned nations against him, He was caught in their pit, And they led him in hooks To the land of Egypt'. Joachaz after a three months' reign was deported by Nechao to Egypt where he died. The lion figure is probably derived from Gen 49:9.

5-9 Joachin—5. 'When she saw that she waited And hoped in vain, She took another of her cubs And made him a lion'. Joachin, son of Joakim, like Joachaz was appointed without foreign interference. After a three months' reign he was deported to Babylon where records of his captivity have been discovered in the royal palace; see A. Bea, S.J., in Bi 23 (1942) 78-82.

6-7. 'He walked among the lions, He became a young lion. He learned to rend his prey, He devoured men, He knew their widows (?), He laid waste their cities, He terrified the land and its fulness, With the noise of his roaring'. For 'he knew their widows' (MT) 'he preyed in their dens' is suggested. 8-9. 'The nations round about laid snares for him, They spread out their nets, He was caught in their pit. They encaged him and brought him To the king of 485n Babylon, That his voice might be heard no more On the mountains of Israel'. The nations are the vassals of Babylon.

- e 10-14 Sedecias—10-11. 'Thy mother was like a vine stock in a vineyard, Planted by waters. She was fruitful and rich in branches Owing to the many waters. A strong branch of hers became A ruler's sceptre. His stature dominated Amid the foliage. He was conspicuous by his height And the multitude of his shoots'. The lion figure is abandoned because Israel is now a vassal state, Sedecias a creature of Nabuchodonosor. 12-13. 'But she was uprooted in fury, Dashed to earth, And an east wind withered Her branches which were broken off, And her strong branch was dried up And consumed by fire. And now she is planted in the desert In a dry and thirsty land'. The deposition of Sedecias and the exile are predicted. 14. 'And a fire came forth from the branch And devoured its shoots'. Sedecias is made responsible for the fire. Without shoots he can have no successor.

486a XX-XXIV Third Cycle of Threats against Jerusalem and Judah.

- XX 1-44 Israel's Past and Present Sins and Future Restoration—In August 591 B.C. the elders of Tel-Abib again request Ezechiel to consult Yahweh for them. The prophet again assures them that Yahweh will not hear them or reply to them. He recalls to them instead the sins of Israel and the necessity of conversion.
- b 1-4. The date was about eleven months after the last given, ch 8. 3. 'answer you': 'be inquired of by you'. 4. 'Wilt thou judge them?' or 'I will judge them' (LXX). 'Judge' means 'accuse'.
- c 5-9. Sins in Egypt. 5. 'lifted up my hand' means 'swore'. 'appeared': 'made myself known'. 6. 'Exuding milk and honey': producing abundant and excellent food. 'excellence amongst': lit. jewel of. 8. 'provoked': 'rebelled against'. 9. Idol worship merited extirpation. Yahweh spared them that his name as an omnipotent protector might be honoured by the Gentiles.
- d 10-17. Sins of the first generation in the desert. 11. Observance of the law was recompensed by length of life as non-observance was punished by death. 12. Observance of the Sabbath was particularly important in the exilic period when sacrifices and other ritual observances were impossible. 13. 'provoked': 'rebelled against'. 14. 'spared them': 'acted'. After 'nations': 'in whose sight I brought them out'.
- e 18-26. Sins of the second generation in the desert. Though warned they also sinned. Yahweh did not exterminate them for his name's sake. 25. 'shall': 'should'. 'laws that were not good' are possibly laws not good for them because by their fault they failed to observe them but more probably Canaanite observances which Yahweh gave them, let them take voluntarily. Yahweh's gift of Canaan exposed them to the seductions of Canaanite worship. Cf. 14:9. It would be contrary to the Holiness of Yahweh to impose laws not objectively good. 26. 'And I polluted them by their own gifts when they caused to pass through the fire all their firstborn to terrify them and that they might know that I am Yahweh'. God's purpose was to terrify them by the enormity of their crime. St Paul teaches similarly that God allowed sin to abound that man might realize his own weakness and seek divine aid.
- f 27-29. Sins in Canaan. 27. After 'blasphemed me': 'by their grievous infidelity'. 28. Worship in the high places was more usually associated with Canaanite divinities and included licentious practices of Canaanite origin. 29. The word bāmāh 'high place' is here popularly derived from the verb ba' 'go in', used of conjugal relations and suggesting infidelity to Yahweh. The philological derivation is unknown.
- g 30-32. Sins in exile. The worship of idols made the exiles unworthy of a hearing from Yahweh. 31. Though human sacrifices were not unknown in Babylonia the reference to Moloch offerings here is surprising and may be an interpolation.
- h 33-44. The Restoration. Yahweh will reassemble his people from the nations among whom they are dispersed and judge them. The wicked shall perish and the good shall return to Palestine. 35. 'of people': 'of the nations'. The Syro-Arabian desert seems indicated. 37. 'And I will make you pass under the rod', the shepherd's rod under which the sheep pass as they enter the fold at night. 39. After 'Lord God': 'Do away with [LXX] your idols. But after that you shall certainly hear me and you shall no longer profane my holy name by your offerings and your idols'. 40. After 'serve me': 'There I shall accept them favourably and there I shall require your offerings', etc. The promise here between the sins and their chastisement is unexpected and probably a later addition.

XX 45-XXI 32 (MT XXI:1-37) The Sword of Yahweh against Jerusalem and Ammon—Ezechiel first sees a fire consuming all the trees of Judah, symbol of the sword of Yahweh massacring all the inhabitants. He then describes in verse the sword and its work of destruction. In the third scene Nabuchodonosor (the sword) at the cross-roads consults his oracles to determine whether he shall first assail Jerusalem or Rabbath-Ammon. Jerusalem is designated. Finally Ammon's subsequent chastisement is predicted. This final invasion of Judah began in winter 589 B.C.

45-XXI 7 (MT XXI:1-12) The Fire and the Sword—

The fire is a figure, the sword its interpretation. 46. 'Drop (thy word) on the south'. 47. As the forest fire spares no tree, so Nabuchodonosor will spare no person. XXI:3. The just perish with the wicked. This prophecy of indiscriminate slaughter by a human agent does not contradict the prophet's teaching of man's individual responsibility before God. Nabuchodonosor neither could nor would discriminate between the just and the unjust. 7. After 'faint': 'And all knees shall be weak as water'.

XXI 8-17 (MT 13-22) The Song of the Sword—The word is sometimes uncertain. 9b-10. 'A sword, a sword is sharpened and polished. It is sharpened to slay; it is polished to flash lightning. Or shall we rejoice? The sceptre of my son despises all wood'. Wood or tree means sceptre or king. Sedecias despises all kings even Nabuchodonosor. 11-12. 'I have given it to a butcher [MT, to be polished] that he may take it in his hand. It is sharpened, it is polished to be put into the hand of a slayer. Cry and roar, Son of man, for it is (drawn) against my people, against all the princes of Israel; they are vowed to the sword with my people. Strike then thy thigh'. Striking the thigh expresses grief, Jer 31:19. 13. 'For what a trial if even the sceptre which despises is no longer! Oracle of the Lord Yahweh'. The dethronement of Sedecias is predicted. 14-16. 'But thou, Son of man, prophecy and clap thy hands, Let the sword be doubled, be tripled. It is a sword of slaughter, a sword of great slaughter which surrounds them, that hearts may melt and the overthrown be many. At all their gates I have set the threat [?] of the sword. It is made to flash lightning, to slay. Spread terror on the right, place thyself on the left wherever thy edge is destined'. Clapping hands indicates approval, exultation. 17. 'I also shall clap my hands, shall assuage my wrath. I, Yahweh, have spoken'.

18-27 (MT 23-32) Nabuchodonosor at the Crossroads

—Ezechiel is ordered to represent graphically the two roads open to the invader. From Riblah on the Orontes they branch off, SW. to Jerusalem, SE. to Rabbath-Ammon. He sees Nabuchodonosor at Riblah directed by his oracles to march on Jerusalem. He marks the Jerusalem road with an arrow in his drawing. 19c. After 'land': 'And fashion a signal, at the beginning of the way to the city fashion it'. The road to Jerusalem alone is marked for the sword of Yahweh. 21. 'stood': 'stands'; 'highway': 'crossroads'. The diviners cast lots, conventionally interpreted, consulted the Teraphim, household gods, and inspected the livers of slain animals. 22. 'In his right hand is the reply, Jerusalem'. Omit 'to set battering rams'. 'engines': 'battering rams'; 'lift up the voice in howling': 'raise the war cry'. 23. The oracle, disbelieved by the citizens, is confirmed by the remembrance of their iniquity. 24. 'remembered': 'called

- 4861 to (God's) mind' (by further sins). 25. After 'come': 'When iniquity has reached its term'. 26b. Lit. 'this not this [indicating a change], exalt the low and abase the high'. 27. 'I will make her a ruin, a ruin, a ruin. Woe to her! She shall remain thus till he come [the Messiah, Gen 49:10], to whom the right belongs and to whom I shall give it'. She, according to some Jerusalem, is more probably the Davidic dynasty.
- m 28-32 (MT 33-37) Chastisement of Ammon—28c-29. 'A sword, a sword is drawn to slay, is polished to flash lightning, amid thy false visions and lying oracles, to put to the neck of profaners, malefactors, whose day has come, whose iniquity has reached its term'. 30a. 'Restore it to its sheath'. The chastisement is certain but deferred. According to Josephus (Ant. 10, 9, 7) the Chaldeans devastated Ammon five years after Jerusalem's fall.
- n XXII 1-31 The Crimes of Jerusalem—Ezekiel first enumerates the various crimes of the citizens. Jerusalem filled with fugitives during the siege is then compared to a melting-pot for base metals. Finally the sins of the various classes, princes, priests, high officials, prophets, common people, are recorded to show that all are guilty.
- o 1-16 The City of Blood—Idolatry and bloodshed are the major sins of Jerusalem but many others are here mentioned. 2. 'dost': 'wilt'. 3a. 'Make known to her ... and say'. 'this is': 'Woe to' (LXX); 'shed-deth': 'hath shed'. 4. The sense is: thou hast hastened the day of chastisement and lessened thy years of life. 6. 'The princes ... every one according to his strength, were in thee', etc. 8. 'thou': 'they' (LXX). 10. 'humbled': 'done violence to'. Omit 'the uncleanness of'. 11. 'every one ... father in law ... brother': 'one ... another ... another'. 12. 'thou': 'they'; 'increase': 'interest'. 13a. 'I shall put my hands on thy dishonest gain' (LXX). 14. Clapping indicates approval. 16. 'And thou shalt be profaned' (MT). A slight correction gives: 'I shall make thee my inheritance', an announcement of subsequent pardon.
- p 17-22 The Melting-pot—Destruction of base metals is indicated, not testing or refining. 19. 'I will gather you': the country people seeking shelter in the capital. 20. 'take my rest': 'lay you there'. 21. 'burn': 'blow upon'.
- q 23-31 The Universal Corruption—All classes have sinned grievously. There is none to save the nation from destruction. 24. 'unclean': 'not wetted' (LXX), arid and unfruitful. 25a. 'prophets' (MT): 'princes' (LXX). The princes are the lions. The prophets appear later. 'catcheth': 'teareth'; 'souls': 'men'; 'hire': 'precious things'. 27. 'princes': 'chiefs'. High officials are meant. Omit 'and to destroy souls' (LXX). 28. The prophets have whitewashed concealed weaknesses by false prophecies of security. 29. The people of the land are ordinary people. For 'by calumny', 'without judgement' (a double translation) read 'wrongfully'. 30. There was no saviour like Moses to avert God's wrath.
- r XXIII 1-49 Infidelity and Chastisement of Samaria and Jerusalem—Ezekiel develops here the comparison, ch 16, of Samaria and Jerusalem to two sisters espoused by Yahweh and unfaithful to him. The big sister, Samaria, has already suffered for her infidelity from her paramour Assyria. How inevitable then is the destruction of the far more unfaithful Jerusalem by her lover, Chaldaea!
- s 1-4 Infidelity in Egypt—The sisters are accused of idol worship in Egypt. 4. Modern philologists give both names the same meaning 'tent-woman', Oholah 'tent of her', Oholibah (with the yod compaginis) 'tent in her'. St Jerome rightly renders Oholibah 'my tent is in her' and understands an allusion to the temple of Yahweh in Jerusalem. In inventing the names Ezekiel must have been influenced by contemporary usage rather than by archaic word formation. The parallel name of Jerusalem, Hepsibāh, is interpreted 'my pleasure is in her', Is 62:4. Elder and younger should be big and little. 'I took them as wives'; 48b. lit. they became mine.
- 5-10 Infidelity and Destruction of Samaria—She became allied with Assyria under Jehu in 841 and more permanently under Menahem in 738. Foreign alliance introduced foreign worship. Revolt from Assyria and alliance with Egypt led to her destruction in 721. 6. 'Who were clothed in violet-dyed stuffs, governors and commanders, all beautiful youths', etc. 7. 'uncleanness': 'idols'. 10. 'They uncovered her nakedness ... she became a byword among women'.
- 11-21 Infidelity of Jerusalem—Instead of taking warning from her sister's fate Jerusalem conducted herself still more shamefully in her relations with Assyrians, Babylonians and Egyptians. Achaz introduced the alliance with Assyria, Ezechias made an alliance with Egypt. Alliances with Egypt and Babylonia succeeded each other after the death of Josias. 12. Cf. 6. 14. 'colours': 'vermilion'. 15b-c. 'And with streaming turbans on their heads and all of them great warriors to look upon, representations of sons of Chaldaea, the land of their birth'. 'Babel' before 'Chaldaea' is probably interpolated. 17. 'and her soul was alienated from them'. 18a. 'And her fornications were revealed and her nakedness discovered'. 19-21. Jerusalem returns to the sin of her youth by alliance with Egypt.
- 22-35 Chastisement of Jerusalem—Babylon the paramour, formerly loved but now loathed, will be Yahweh's instrument in inflicting a most terrible and merciless chastisement. 22. Omit 'all'. The lovers now loathed are the Babylonians. 23. For 'nobles, kings, princes' read Pegod (Pugudu) Shoa' (Shutu) Qoa' (Qutu), peoples east of the Tigris subject to Babylonia. 24. 'well appointed': 'from the north' (LXX). 'breastplate': 'shield'. Judgements are laws. 26. Instruments of thy glory are thy jewels. 28. 'glutted with': 'alienated from'. 29. 'full of disgrace': 'bare'; 'disgrace': 'nakedness'. 32. The text seems disordered. 33. 'grief and sadness': 'horror and terror'. 33a. 'And thou shalt drink it and empty it and drain it to the dregs' (slightly corrected).
- 36-49 Recapitulation of the Sin and Punishment of the Sisters—Some additional sins are mentioned, in particular human sacrifices. 36. 'dost': 'wilt'. 'Declare' is an imperative. 37. 'offered': 'made pass through the fire'. 38. Omit 'on the same day' (LXX). 39. 'and': 'they'. 40. The strangers to whom a messenger was sent are the Egyptians, Assyrians and Chaldeans with whom the Israelites sought alliances. 41. 'thee': 'it', the bed. 42. The text and sense are uncertain. There is question apparently of the reception of the foreigners. 43. Text is uncertain. Vg renders literally. 45. 'But just men will judge them'. The Chaldeans are just as instruments of divine justice. 46. 'multitude': 'assembly', a judicial tribunal; 'tumult': 'ill-treatment'. 47. 'let them kill ... let them burn'. 48. 'Women' means 'nations'.
- XXIV 1-27 Announcement of the Siege and Capture of Jerusalem—Two symbolic actions indicate the siege. The cauldron previously mentioned is filled with choice meats to be cooked by fire. The choice meats are the principal citizens. Fire is next applied to the empty cauldron to remove the rust with which it is defiled. Complete destruction is indicated. Ezekiel's wife dies suddenly on the day the siege begins. Omission of the usual mourning rites represents the attitude of the exiles on hearing of the city's fall.
- 1-8 The Full Cauldron—1. The date of the beginning of the siege must have been revealed to Ezekiel. It was the 10th of Tebet (Dec.-Jan.) in the 9th year of Sedecias 589-588. Later the Jews celebrated the anniversary by a solemn fast, Zach 8:19. 4. After 'shoulder': 'fill it with choice bones'. 5. Wood, not bones (MT), was piled under the cauldron. 5b. 'Boil its pieces of meat and let the bones within it be well cooked'. 6. Not the rust but the meat and bones are to be cast out without discrimination since all are for destruction. 7. There was an ancient belief that blood while exposed

- 486y called for vengeance on the shedder. 8. Yahweh is again the author of what he lets happen.
- z 9-14 The Empty Cauldron—The cauldron or the city defies all attempts at purification and must be entirely destroyed. 10. The text is in disorder. The meat was cooked and the cauldron emptied in 5-6. Here again: 'Pile up the wood, light the fire, cook well the meat, (prepare the sauce) let the bones be burned'. Similarly the reference to the rust in 6a is out of place. It belongs to the burning of the empty cauldron. Heinisch reads 6a after 12 and 6b after 10a. Thus 3-5 and 7-8 refer to the first symbol, 6 and 9-13 to the second. 12. Omit 'great pains have been taken', dittography. Attach 13a. 'owing to the defilement of thy lewdness' to 12.
- aa 15-27 Unlamented Death of Ezechiel's Wife—By his attitude on the death of his wife, Ezechiel becomes a sign to the exiles. As he is forbidden to lament her death so they are forbidden to lament the destruction of Jerusalem. 17. MT transposes 'dead' and 'mourning' and reads 'men' for mourners. The mourning rites prohibited were baring the head and the feet, veiling the lower part of the face, the mourning meal. 18a. 'And thou shalt speak' (LXX), a command executed in 18c. 21. Jerusalem is lit. 'the glory of your might, the desire of your eyes, the object of your soul's compassion'. The text is in disorder. 22-23, in which the prophet speaks, interrupt the speech of Yahweh 21 and 24. 24. Omit 'of things to come'. 26-27. The restrictions imposed on Ezechiel's prophetic ministry shall cease when a fugitive from Jerusalem announces the city's fall; cf. 33:21 f.
- 487a XXV-XXXII Prophecies against Gentile Nations.
- XXV 1-17 Prophecies against Ammon, Moab, Edom, and Philistia—Like Isaiah and Jeremiah Ezechiel also predicts God's judgement on the Gentile Nations: Ammonites, Moabites, Edomites, Philistines, Phoenicians, Egyptians. He does not denounce their idol worship but their malevolent attitude towards Yahweh's sanctuary and Yahweh's people, because this hostility is the chief obstacle to a Messianic restoration.
- b 1-7 Ammon—The Ammonites will disappear and Ammon will be a camping-ground for desert dwellers, her eastern neighbours. 2. 'of them': 'against them'. 3. The sin of Ammon is hostility to the temple, the land and the people of Yahweh. 4. 'inheritance': 'possession'; 'sheepcotes': 'encampments', lit. the stone rings surrounding the tents. 5. 'stable': 'pasturage'; 'children': 'cities'. 7. 'people': 'peoples'.
- c 8-11 Moab—The Moabites will share the fate of the Ammonites. 8. Omit Seir. 9. The text is corrupt, but the sense is clear. All Moab will be exposed to invasion. The shoulder is the mountain side protecting on the north Moab and its important cities: Beth-jesimoth (Suwēme at NE. end of Dead Sea), Baal-meon (Ma'in, S. of Suwēme) and Kiriathaim (Kureiyāt, S. of Baal-meon). 10b. 'of the children of Ammon': 'of it'.
- d 12-14 Edom—The judgement on Edom will be executed by the Jews themselves who subjected the Edomites in the Maccabean period. 13. 'the south': 'Teman', an Edomite city, perhaps Odroh. Dedan is El-Olah.
- e 15-17 Philistia—God himself will chastise the Philistines. 15. 'with all their mind': 'with despite of soul'. After 'destroying': 'with eternal [implacable] enmity'. 16. 'killers': 'Cretans'. Ezechiel plays on the words kāraṭ 'cut off' and K'rīṭi 'Cretan' equivalent to Philistine.
- f XXVI 1-21 First Prophecy against Tyre: Sin and Punishment of Tyre—Tyre was the richest and most powerful of the Phoenician cities. It was built on an island nearly half a mile from the shore and was thus impregnable as long as the Tyrians retained command of the sea. It had also dependent cities and considerable territory on the mainland as well as colonies and trading posts in the islands and on the coasts of the Mediterranean. Its general policy, dictated by commercial interests, was submission and payment of tribute to the imperial invaders of Palestine and friendly relations with its neighbours. Though the Tyrians took part with Sedecias in his revolt against Nabuchodonosor they nevertheless rejoiced at the fall of Jerusalem, a commercial rival whose trade they hoped to inherit. Ezechiel predicts the complete ruin of Tyre and the Babylonian siege of Tyre. The ruin of Tyre is always attributed to Yahweh without mention of human agents. It was finally accomplished by the Saracens in A.D. 1291. Josephus informs us (C. Ap. 1, 21) that Nabuchodonosor besieged Tyre for 13 years, c. 586-574 B.C. We have no direct information on the outcome of this siege. The general verdict of historians that it was unsuccessful, seems to be confirmed by Ezechiel himself in a later prophecy, 29:18. Nabuchodonosor had no fleet and could not assault the island city or intercept its supplies. We must therefore regard the prophet's description of the siege as largely conventional. He magnifies the part played by horses and chariots and makes no reference to the special measures needed for the capture of an island city. A similar use of conventional language in eschatological prophecies is generally recognized.

1-6 Sin and Chastisement—1. The date is spring 586. The omitted month must be the 11th or 12th; cf. 33:21. 2. Tyre rejoices at Jerusalem's fall. 'Aha, she is shattered, The gate of the peoples. To me hath been turned The fulness of her that was laid waste'. 3. 'to thee': 'against thee'. 4. Omit 'like'. Tyre (Heb. sôr; sûr, means 'rock') shall become bare rock. 6. The daughters are the cities on the mainland.

7-14 Nabuchodonosor's Siege of Tyre—The long siege is the initial stage of Tyre's chastisement. 7. 'horsemen and an assembly of many peoples'. 8. The cities on the mainland are first reduced. Wall, mound, testudo or shield formation are ordinary features of a siege. 9. 'engines of war and': 'the shock of'. 10. 'horsemen and chariot-wheels when he enters thy gates as a conquered city is entered'. 11c. 'And thy strong pillars he shall lay low'. 12. 'they': 'he'. 13. 'multitude': 'noise'. Note the change of subject.

15-18 Effect on Tyre's Neighbours—15. They tremble at the news of Tyre's fall. 16. They exhibit the usual signs of mourning. 'astonishment': 'mourning garb'. 'ground and shall tremble every instant and be astonished at thee'. 17-18. They chant a lament: 'How hast thou disappeared from the sea, Famous city! That ruled over the sea, She and her inhabitants, That spread terror Over all the continent. Now the coasts tremble In the day of thy fall, And the islands in the sea are terrified At thy end'.

19-21 Oracle on Tyre—20. 'I shall bring thee down to those who have gone down to the pit, the men of yore, and set thee in the underworld, the primordial solitudes . . . that thou be no more inhabited, no more subsist in the land of the living'. 21. 'to nothing': 'to a terrible end'.

XXVII 1-36 Second Prophecy against Tyre: Lament for Tyre—The city is here likened to a magnificent ship whose construction and destruction are described in elegiac verse. Between the poetic sections is a detailed description in prose of the commerce of Tyre, probably a later addition.

1-9a The Building of the Ship—3. 'mart': 'trafficker'. The elegy begins 3c: 'Tyre thou hast said: I am a ship, Perfect in beauty'. 'Ship' (ʾōnīyāh) is omitted by haplography after anf. The comparison suggests insular site and sea trade. 4. 'In the heart of the sea thy domain; thy builders Have made thee perfect in beauty'. 5. From the cypresses of Sanir they built All thy planks. The cedars of Lebanon they took To make thee a mast'. Sanir is Mt Hermon. 6. 'From the highest oaks of Bashan They made thy oars. Thy deck they made of ivory inlaid in pine wood From the coasts of Kittim'. Bashan is northern Transjordan. Kittim, originally the inhabitants of Cicutum, is by extension Cyprus. The red pine of Cyprus was much used in ship-building. 7. 'Of fine linen with embroidered work from Egypt Was thy sail, Violet and purple from the coasts of Elisha Was thy awning'. 'To be thy 487l ensign' (after 'sail') is excluded by the metre and by the fact that Egyptian and Phoenician ships had no ensign. Egyptian linen šš was superior to the Syrian byssus. Elisha is most probably Alashiya, usually identified with Cyprus. 8-9a. 'The princes [LXX] of Sidon and Arwad were thy rowers, The sages of Simirra were in thee, They were thy pilots, The ancients of Gebal were in thee, They were thy caulkers'. Simirra is a conjectural emendation of MT Tyre. Phoenician cities: Arwad and Simirra in the north, Gebal (Byblos) in the centre, Sidon in the south, put their skilled men at Tyre's disposal.

m 9b-25a Commerce of Tyre—9b. 'thy factors': in thee to exchange thy wares'. 10. Nations that gave Tyre military aid are first mentioned, Lud are not Lydians but an African people. Put (DV 'Lybians') is Punt on the southern shores of the Red Sea. 11. for gammādm (Vg Pygmaei?) LXX reads šomerim 'watchmen' (in thy towers). 'quivers': 'shields'. 12-24. The list of peoples is mainly geographical: Tarshish in the far west—Ionia, Tubal, Mosoch in Asia Minor—Thogorma in Armenia—Rhodes, etc. in the Greek Archipelago—Edom, Judah, Israel, Damascus—Uzal, Dedan, Kedar, Saba, Ra'ma, in Arabia—Harran, Kanneh (Calne?), Eden (Bit-Adini), Assur in Mesopotamia—Media in the far east. 12. Tarshish supplied silver, iron, tin, lead. 13. Ionia, Tubal, n Mosoch gave slaves and bronze vessels. 14. Thogorma sent draught horses, war horses and mules. 15. Rhodes (LXX) and the Archipelago provided horns of ivory and ebony, evidently as middlemen. 16. Edom (LXX) supplied carbuncles, purple, brocade, fine linen, corals and rubies. 17. Judah and Israel gave wheat, honey, oil, balm and probably tragacanth gum and wax. 18. Damascus sent wine of Helbon (modern Khelbūn) and wool of Sokhar (unknown). 19. Omit Dan and Greece and interpret 'Mosei' as = from Uzal usually identified with San'a in Yemen. Its products were wrought iron, cassia and calamus. 20. Dedan (el-'Ola) supplied saddle-cloths. 21. Arabia and Kedar sent lambs, rams and he-goats. 22. Saba and Ra'ma gave the choicest spices, gold and precious stones. 23. Saba is a textual corruption. Render 'Chalmed' as 'all the Medes'. 24. Costly garments, violet and embroidered robes, carpets of many colours, strong and well-twisted cords were Mesopotamian wares. 25a. 'The ships of Tarshish carried thy wares'.

o 25b-36 Wreck of the Ship—25b. 'Thou didst fill thyself and wert heavy-laden In the midst of the sea. 26. 'south': 'east'. 27. Cargo and crew: riches, wares, sailors, pilots, caulkers, traders, warriors, sink with the ship. 28. 'At the loud cry of thy pilots The coasts [?] tremble'. 29-32. Other crews leave their ships, make mourning, and intone a lament for Tyre. 34. 'Now thou art wrecked on the sea In the midst of the waters. Thy wares and all thy multitude Have perished with thee'. 35. The Mediterranean peoples are stupefied, their kings are terrified. 36. Rival trading nations rejoice. Metre requires 'clap their hands' before 'and hiss at thee'.

p XXVIII 1-26 Third Prophecy against Tyre: Sin and Chastisement of the Prince of Tyre—The prince of Tyre is here regarded less as an individual than as an embodiment of the state; cf. Is 14:2-23. The first part of the elegy, 1-10, is more realistic and better preserved than the second, 11-19, in which the metre is scarcely recognizable. A short oracle on Sidon, 20-23, and a prediction of the restoration of Judah, 24-26, complete the chapter.

q 1-10 Pride and Humiliation of the Prince—2. In his pride he thought himself a god and his island capital the throne of a god. 3. 'Wert thou not wiser than Daniel?'; cf. 14:14. 'None of all the sages equalled thee'. 4a. 'By thy wisdom and thy understanding thou hast gotten thee riches'. 5. Wisdom in trading enterprises provided the riches on which his pride is based. 7. 'strongest': 'most ferocious'. 8. 'They shall bring thee down into the pit, thou shalt die the death of the slain in the midst of the sea'. 9. His death will show that he is a man. 10. 487q 'Uncircumcised': godless. Death without funeral rites was a great calamity.

11-19 Elegy on the Prince—He is fancifully invested with prerogatives denied to mortals. 12. He is a perfect seal-ring on God's hand, exercising divine authority. 'Full of wisdom' is an unmetrical addition. 13. 'In Eden, God's garden, thou wert, All precious stones was thy garment'. He is Adam before the fall. The list of precious stones, recalling Ex 28:17-20, is scarcely authentic. 14. 'In the day of thy creation with the Cherubim I placed thee. Thou wert on the mountain of the gods, thou walkedst in the midst of stones of fire' (LXX). The prince is in paradise with the Cherubim, its guardians, and on the mountain in the north where the gods assemble; cf. Is 14:13. Ezechiel poetically uses pagan mythology in his imaginative description. The exact symbolism of the stones of fire is unknown. 15. The prince's state of perfection endured until he sinned. 16. Then God expelled (lit. profaned) him from the mountain of the gods and the guardian Cherub banished him from the midst of the stones of fire. 17. Beauty produced pride and pride the loss of wisdom, the folly of sin. 18. 'sanctuaries': 'holiness'; 'will bring': 'brought'; 'will make': 'made'.

20-26. The chastisement of Sidon, mother city of the Phoenicians, by pestilence and the sword is briefly predicted. The removal of Israel's enemies is the prelude to the Restoration. 24. 'stumbling-block of bitterness': 'pricking brier'. 25. God will manifest his sanctity to the Gentiles by restoring Israel. This section seems to be an afterthought.

XXIX 1-16 First Prophecy against Egypt: Ruin and Restoration—The prophecy is dated the 12th of Tebet (Dec.-Jan.) 588-587. The pride of the Pharaoh, who is compared to a sea-monster, shall be humbled. Egypt, a weak reed to Israel, shall be devastated and restored, but not to her former greatness.

1-5 The Sea-Monster—Cf. Is 27:1. 2b. 'of': b 'against'. 3c. 'The rivers are mine. I made them' (LXX). The sea-monster, depicted as a crocodile, will be removed from his natural element and cast into the desert, the prey of birds and beasts. 4. 'bridle': 'hooks'. 5. 'gathered together': 'buried'.

6-12 The Weak Reed—Egypt is denounced as a weak and unstable ally of Israel. 6. 'Staff': support. 7. 'shoulder': 'hand' (LXX). 9c. The Pharaohs claimed divinity. 10. (After 'sword'): 'from Migdol to Syene', from N. to S. This Migdol was a fort on the NE. boundary. Syene: modern Assuan. 12. Forty years, not understood strictly, was also the period of Judah's dispersion.

13-16 The Restoration—Egypt shall be restored but not to her former greatness. 14. 'I shall change the lot of Egypt and bring them back to the land of Patros' (Upper Egypt). 16. The Egyptians will no longer deceive the Israelites by an alliance but will remind them of their iniquity when they turned after them. A weak neighbour is no obstacle to the Messianic restoration.

17-21 Second Prophecy against Egypt: Conquest of Nabuchodonosor—This is the latest of the dated prophecies, March 571. Nabuchodonosor, Yahweh's servant, is given the land of Egypt as the payment of his unrequited labours in the long and arduous siege of Tyre. The riches of Tyre which he failed to capture will be compensated by the riches of Egypt. 19. 'multitude': 'riches'. 20. 'Horn': strength. The Babylonian conquest of Egypt in 568 B.C. made his fellow-exiles more ready to accept Ezechiel's teaching.

XXX 1-19 Third Prophecy against Egypt: The Day of Yahweh—This undated prophecy depicts the fate of Egypt on the day when all the nations are judged; cf. Is ch 13. 3. The time (of the nations) is the day of judgement. 4. The wounded are those hors de combat, whether dead or wounded. 'multitude': 'riches'. The foundations are the neighbouring nations who fought in Egypt's armies. 5. On Put and Lud cf. 27:10.

488f Chub is unknown, probably a scribal error. Omit (LXX) 'of the land' and 'with them'. 'Children of the covenant': allies. 6. 'from Migdol to Syene'; cf. 29:10. 7. 'they': 'she' (LXX). 9. 'go forth from me in all haste to trouble the Ethiopians in their security'. The day of Egypt is the day of her downfall. 11. 'strongest': 'most ferocious'. 13. 'I will destroy the mighty from Memphis and the princes from the land of Egypt' (LXX). 14. Patros is Upper Egypt; Tanis (so MT; DV Taphnis) is in the northern Delta and Thebes in Upper Egypt. 15. Pelusium was on the north-eastern boundary, Memphis (LXX) south of Cairo. 16. (After 'Egypt'): 'Syene [LXX] shall tremble in anguish, Thebes shall be conquered'. The text which follows is corrupt. 17. 'they themselves': 'the women'. Heliopolis (LXX) is south, Bubastes north, of Cairo. 18. Taphnes was in the northern Delta.

g 20-26 Fourth Prophecy against Egypt: Pharaoh's Arm is Broken—This prophecy is dated 7th Nisan 587. Egypt will diminish, Babylonia will increase, in might. 21b. 'And behold it has not been bound for healing by the application of bandages'. 22. (After 'pieces'): 'his arms'. Omit 'which is already broken'. 24. (After 'Pharaoh'): 'so that he shall groan, as mortally wounded groan, before him' (Nabuchodonosor).

h XXXI 1-18 Fifth Prophecy against Egypt: The Cedar is Felled—The prophecy is dated May 587. Egypt is compared to a magnificent cedar now laid low.

1-9 Beauty of the Cedar—2b-3. 'To whom wert thou like in thy greatness? Behold a cedar in Lebanon, Fair in its branches, Lofty in stature, And among the clouds Was its summit'. Cedar, not Assyria, is the answer to 2b. Omit 'with thick leaves' (LXX); 'thick boughs': 'clouds'. 4. 'Waters (from above) made him grow, The abyss (beneath) made him increase in height, Making his rivers flow Around the place where he was planted And sending his rivulets To all the trees of the country'. The ancients thought that springs came from the waters beneath the earth. The trees are symbolical of the neighbouring nations. 5. Omit 'And his branches were multiplied' (LXX). 'elevated': 'lengthened'. 6. Omit 'when he had spread forth his shadow'. 8. There is an element of hyperbole in the comparison. Babylonia and Assyria (at an earlier date) were more powerful than Egypt. 'fir-trees': 'cypresses'. 9. 'beautiful by the multitude of his branches'. 'pleasure': 'Eden'.

i 10-14 The Felling of the Cedar—10. 'green and thick': 'into the cloud'. Pride is punished. 11b is corrupt. 12. Insert 'on the mountains and' after 'fall'. 'rocks': 'ravines'. 13-14. His fall brings ruin to the nations who depended on him and perish with him. 'among the thick branches and leaves': 'to the clouds'.

j 15-18 Effects of the Fall—Nature mourns and men tremble. 15. Omit 'I covered' (LXX). The sense is: I made the abyss mourn over him by keeping back its streams. I darkened Lebanon for him and all the trees of the field languished over him. 16. While the nations on earth tremble at his fall those already in Sheol are consoled by his arrival. 'pleasure': 'Eden'. 17. 'They too had to go down with him to Sheol, to those slain by the sword, as well as their descendants who dwell under his shade in the midst of the nations'. The Pharaoh's association with those slain by the sword implies privation of burial rites.

k XXXII 1-16 Sixth Prophecy against Egypt: Lament for Pharaoh—The date is uncertain, probably spring 586. The Pharaoh, compared to a crocodile, represents all Egypt. The first part of the lament is in verse.

l 1-10 Destruction of the Sea-monster—1. The date varies in MT and LXX, 11th or 12th month, 586 or 585. 2. 'The lion of the nations is come against thee, How hast thou disappeared! Thou wert like a crocodile in the Nile And didst snort with thy nostrils, Thou troubledst the waters with thy feet And fouledst their streams'. The rendering of 2a is a correction of MT: To the lion of the nations thou wert likened. But Pharaoh is likened to the crocodile, not to the lion Nabuchodonosor; cf. 11. 3. Omit 'multitude of many peoples', a gloss excluded by the metre. 4. The crocodile, removed from its natural element, becomes the prey of birds and beasts. 5. 'hills': 'valleys'. Ezechiel passes easily from the figure, the crocodile, to the reality, the Egyptians. 6. The text is confused and unmetrical. 'I will water the earth with what flows from thee And the watercourses shall be filled with thy blood'. 7b. The cosmic disturbances associated with the day of judgement emphasize the greatness of the catastrophe. 8. 'on thy land' (MT): 'on the earth' (LXX). Omit 'when they wounded', etc., a Vg addition. 9. 'destruction': 'prisoners' (LXX). 10. 'When I shall brandish my sword before them and they shall tremble at every moment'.

11-16 Completeness of Egypt's Destruction—11. The lion of the nations mentioned above is here identified. 12. (After 'multitude'): 'the most ferocious of all nations' (in apposition with 'mighty'). 13. 'that were beside'; 'out of'. 15. The sense is: I will make the land, etc. that they may know. 16. Daughters are here women, the customary mourners.

17-32 Seventh Prophecy against Egypt: Pharaoh in the Underworld—The last prophecy against Egypt may be dated six weeks after the preceding one. LXX supplies in the first month. Pharaoh's descent to the Underworld and his condition there are described. The most noteworthy point is the distinction of two classes in Sheol. The heroes have a privileged position in the upper part of the underworld; cf. Ps 48:15. The uncircumcised and those slain in battle are at a lower level in the bôr or pit. With these are associated the Egyptians and other war-like nations, oppressors of weaker peoples. Israel is not mentioned.

17-21 Pharaoh descends to Sheol—18. 'I have cast o her down'. 19 should follow 21a (LXX). 20b is probably corrupt, lit. 'The sword is given. They have drawn her and all her multitudes' (to Sheol). 21a-19a. The most powerful of the heroes in Sheol shall say to him: 'Whom didst thou surpass in beauty? Go down and make thy bed with the uncircumcised'. 21b. 'With his helpers he has gone down, he has made his bed amid the uncircumcised and those slain by the sword'. Cf. Is 14:19.

22-32 Pharaoh's Associates in the Pit—22-23. Assur and his multitude represent king and people. As oppressors they also are in the bottom of the pit. 24-25. Elam's fate is similar. 26-27. The Moschians and Tibarenians, always mentioned together, represent the northern nations of whom the Scythians had recently invaded the Near East. 27. 'And they lie not with the heroes that fell of old . . . but they have their guilt in their bones for they spread terror by their mighty deeds in their life time'. 28. Pharaoh is addressed. 29-30. Edom, the princes of the north (Syrians?) and the Sidonians (DV 'hunters') complete the list. Pharaoh finds some consolation in his associates, oppressors like himself.

XXXIII-XLVIII Promises: Purification and Restoration of Israel. 489a

XXXIII 1-33 Conditions of Salvation—Ch 33 is an introduction to the third part of the book. It repeats and develops four instructions already given. The first and second treat of the prophet's functions and personal responsibility. The third and fourth are admonitions addressed respectively to the undeported Israelites in Palestine and to Ezechiel's companions in exile. The occasion of the prophecy was the arrival of a fugitive with the news of the capture of Jerusalem narrated in the third section.

1-9 The Prophet's Functions—The prophet is compared to a watchman obliged to be on the lookout and to give warning of the enemy's approach; cf. 3:16-21; 14:9-11. 2. 'the nearest of them': 'from among them'. 3-5. If the prophet gives due warning, the sinner is alone responsible. 6. If the prophet fails to warn he also is responsible. 7. 'when thou hearest . . . thou shalt warn them'. 8-9. The conse-

c 10-20 Personal Responsibility—The chastisement of the nation for sins in which the exiles participated causes the latter to despair of pardon. Ezechiel reminds them of the justice and mercy of God who will not visit on them the sins of others and is always ready to pardon repentant sinners; cf. 14:1-8; 18:1-32. 12. Omit 'in his justice' (LXX). MT has the unintelligible 'in it'. 13-16. The just must persevere in his justice, the sinner must repent and repair the wrong he has done. 17-20. God's ways are just and forbid despair. Repentance of evil and perseverance in good will bring salvation.

d 21-29 Admonition to the Undeported Israelites—Ezechiel, informed of the fall of Jerusalem, receives at the same time full liberty of speech in preaching to the people. He rejects the claims of the undeported Israelites to the possession of Palestine. 21. Correct 'twelfth' (MT) and 'tenth' (LXX) to eleventh year. The news reached the exiles about six months after the city's fall. 22. Omit 'and he opened my mouth', dittography. Ezechiel was in ecstasy from the evening to the following morning when the fugitive visited him as already announced, 24:26. The undeported Israelites argue that Abraham was one, they his descendants are many and being better able to populate and utilize the land have a stronger claim to it. Ezechiel replies that as sinners they are doomed to destruction. Many of them must have suffered in a subsequent deportation, 582 B.C., mentioned in Jer 52:30. 25. 'unclean-nesses': 'your idols'. 26. 'You stood on your swords': you regarded might as right. 27. The ruinous places are dilapidated towns as opposed to open country, mountain tops, caves.

e 30-33. Ezechiel's fellow-exiles are reproached by Yahweh for their levity in not heeding his words and carrying out his instructions. Omit 'my people' (LXX). 'for lies are in their mouth', reading K'zābīm for gābīm. 32a. 'Behold thou art to them as a troubadour [sār for MT šir] who has a fine voice and plays well on the harp'. 33. Their eyes will be opened in the day of their chastisement.

f XXXIV 1-31 The Bad Shepherds replaced by a New David—In this prophecy Yahweh compares Israel to a flock of sheep, neglected, preyed on and dispersed by bad shepherds. He intends to purify them, to restore them to their old pasture where they shall find abundant nourishment and where a single shepherd, called David and Servant of Yahweh, shall rule them in peace and holiness; cf. Jer 23:1-8.

g 1-10 The Bad Shepherds—3. The shepherds took full remuneration for duties which they did not perform. 4. They did not assist the weak, sick, wounded and strayed who needed their ministrations, and the strong (LXX) with cruelty they trod under foot. 5. Omit 'and were scattered'. 8. The beasts of the field represent the foreign nations. 10. The shepherds will be called to account and deprived of their office.

h 11-16 Yahweh Shepherd of his Flock—The restoration is predicted. 11. 'visit': 'look for'. 12. As a shepherd reunites his scattered sheep, so shall Yahweh reunite his scattered people. 13. 'habitations': 'inhabited regions'. 16. Yahweh will do all that the bad shepherds failed to do. Omit 'fat' (LXX).

i 17-22 Judgement and Purification—17. The Heb. word for flock includes goats with sheep. Rams and he-goats particularly indicate the ruling classes inclined to egoism. The stronger animals after satisfying themselves trample the pastures and foul the waters. 'I will judge between sheep and sheep, between rams and he-goats' implies the removal of disturbers from the flock. 20. The fat are the oppressors, the lean the oppressed.

j 23-31 The Messiah and his Reign—The Messianic kingdom is often represented as a revival of David's kingdom. The Messiah is a new David, servant of Yahweh. His reign will be prosperous and peaceful. The new covenant is a covenant of peace. 23. Omit the second 'he shall feed them'. 25. LXX omits 'secure' and MT refers 'in security' to 'dwell'. 26a. The text seems corrupt. LXX reads: I will set them around my mountains. 29. LXX reads šālōm, MT šēm (DV 'renown'). 'a bud of renown': 'a perfect plantation'. Great fertility is indicated. 30. Omit 'with them' (LXX). 31. 'You are my sheep, the sheep of my pasture and I am Yahweh your God'. 'Men' is a gloss.

XXXV 1-15 Devastation of Edom—The Messianic restoration is depicted by the prophets as the re-establishment of Israel in all her ancient territory. Edom had occupied a considerable part of Judah after the fall of Jerusalem and aspired to the possession of all Israel. Their chastisement, already predicted, 25:12-14, is again announced as an integral part of the programme of the restoration. 2. Seir is a mountain range in Edom. 3-4. Edom will be entirely laid waste. 5. Edom's sin is perpetual enmity to Judah, manifested particularly in the recent calamity by either slaying fugitives or delivering them to the Chaldeans, Abd 14. 6. (After 'God'): 'Thou hast made thyself guilty of blood and blood will pursue thee'. There is a play on the words Edom and dām 'blood'. 8. 'I shall fill with the slain thy hills and thy valleys; the slain with the sword shall fall therein' (LXX). 10. The Edomites aspire to the possession of Judah and Israel which belong to Yahweh. 11. The lex talionis will be applied to Edom. Insert to thee after 'do' (LXX). 'I shall make myself known to thee when I judge thee'. 12. 'To consume' means for our sustenance. 14. MT is corrupt. Not the whole earth but Edom rejoices. The thought appears clearly in 15.

XXXVI 1-38 Re-establishment of Israel: Preparation of the Land and Purification of the People—The degradation of Israel was attributed by the Gentiles to the powerlessness of Yahweh, her protector. She must be re-established that Yahweh's name be no longer blasphemed. The devastated land will increase in fertility and the sinful people will be spiritually regenerated. The prophecy was conditional and depended for its literal fulfilment on the co-operation of Israel with the designs of Yahweh. It was spiritually fulfilled in the spiritual Israel, the Church founded by Christ.

1-15 The Mountains of Israel shall be Blessed—1. 'Mountains' means 'mountainous land'. 2b. 'Aha! Deserts [LXX] for ever! They have become our possession'. 3. 'because you have been despised and hated' (LXX). 4. 'to the valleys, to the deserted ruins and the abandoned cities that were spoiled', etc. 5. 'of': 'against'. (After 'themselves'): 'with all the joy of their heart and the contempt of their soul to possess and despoil it'. 6. 'ridges': 'ravines'. 7. Lift up the hand: swear. 8. The restoration is depicted as imminent. 9. 'I come to you and I turn to you', etc. 10. The fecundity of the remnant is also foretold by Isaiah. 12b. 'You [the mountains of Israel] shall be their inheritance and you shall be no longer deprived of their children'. 13. 'suffocated': 'deprived of children'. 14. Canaan devoured its children by famine caused by the dryness of its soil. 16-38 Israel shall be re-established and spiritually regenerated—16-23. The motive of the Messianic restoration is first explained. It is not for Israel's sake or through Israel's merits but that Yahweh's holy name be no longer blasphemed by the Gentiles who considered him unable to protect his people. 24. The exiles will return to Palestine. 25-29a. The spiritual regeneration of the people is predicted. Washing with water and infusion of God's spirit suggest a baptismal regeneration. 29b-30. Abundance of the fruits of the earth. 31-32. The Israelites will be rightly ashamed of their past infidelities. 33-35. Restoration of inhabitants to the desolate land and empty cities. 36. The neighbouring nations will recognize the hand of the Lord and no longer blaspheme his holy name. 37-38. Multiplication of the people. 'I shall multiply for them men like flocks'. The comparison suggests the consecrated flocks at the solemn feasts in Jerusalem.

490d XXXVII 1-14 The Vision of Dry Bones restored to Life—This vision does not teach the resurrection of the body, though often so interpreted, but the revival of the defunct nation of Israel. The scene of the vision was a plain near Tel-Abib already mentioned, 3:22.

e 1-10 The Vision—1. Render 'in spirit' and omit 'of the Lord'. Read 'men's bones' (LXX). 3. 'Shall these bones live?' Omit 'dost thou think'. 5. Spirit: the breath of life. 7. 'each one to its joint': 'each to each'. 9. 'these slain that they may live'.

f 11-14 The Interpretation—The dry bones represent the House of Israel as politically non-existent, not the dead on the last day. The graves were the places where dispersed Israelites lived as strangers in foreign lands. The re-establishment of the exiles in their own land was the revival of the nation.

g 15-28 The Reunion of the Separated Kingdoms—The symbolic action of joining together two rods or sceptres signifies the reunion of the divided kingdoms of Judah and Israel which Yahweh will accomplish. They shall form a single nation, under a single ruler, the new David, in their ancestral territory. Yahweh will make an eternal alliance with them and establish his sanctuary within them. The prophecy is Messianic, spiritually fulfilled in the one true Church.

h 15-20 The Symbolic Action—The names written on the rods are those of the tribal ancestors, Judah and Joseph, whose descendants played the leading part in the kingdoms of Judah and Israel. 19. 'in his hand': MT 'in my hand', LXX 'in the hand of Judah'. The ruler, David, suggests Judah.

i 21-28 The New Israel—21-23. The exiles shall return and form a single kingdom. 24-25. The new David shall rule over them for ever. 26-27. Yahweh will make an eternal alliance with them. 28. From his sanctuary among them he shall become known to the Gentiles.

491a XXXVIII-XXXIX Final Victory of Yahweh over the Pagan World—While Israel enjoys peace and prosperity in her native territory and consequently after the restoration, Gog, ruler of the northern nations, leads a mighty army against her. Yahweh protects his people by annihilating the hostile forces when they reach Palestine. The burning of the weapons, the burial of the slain, the feasting of birds and beasts, are described. Ezechiel's chief object is to assure his hearers of Yahweh's permanent protection. He predicts at the same time in language that is largely symbolical a remote future event. The text exhibits repetitions. The feasting on the corpses should precede their burial.

b XXXVIII 1-23 Gog's Invasion of Israel—The army of Gog is first described, then his designs against Israel, and finally his defeat by Yahweh. The nations mentioned are not literally the invaders but represent all the might of paganism.

1-9 Army of Gog—2. The name is possibly of Sumerian origin meaning 'darkness'. The northern regions are the regions of darkness. More probably the Gasgas, neighbours of Mosoch and Tubal south of the Black Sea, are indicated. Magog may be mat-Gog, the land of Gog. In Gen 10:12 Magog appears with Mosoch and Tubal among the sons of Japhet. 'of him': 'against him'. Omit 4a = 29:4a (LXX). 5. 'Libyans': 'Nubians' (Put). 6. Gomer are the Cimmerians. Crimea preserves the name. On Thogorma cf. 27:14. 7. The expedition is decreed by Yahweh. 8. 'be visited': 'receive orders'; 'is returned from the sword': 'was rescued from devastation'. Israel was waste but is now inhabited.

e 10-17 Designs of Gog—He plans to plunder a peaceful and naturally unprotected people. 12. 'which hath begun to possess': 'who have cattle and goods', are self-supporting, neither traders nor plunderers. The inquiries of the trading nations are explained by the fact that traders attended armies to purchase the plunder. 13. 'Dedan and their merchants, Tarshish and her traders'. 14-16. The repetitions disturb the construction. 'In the latter days' (cf. 8 'after many years'): in the remote future. 17. Prophecies of the destruction of Israel's oppressors are meant. Gog only appears here.

18-23 Destruction of Gog and his Army—Yahweh d himself annihilates the assailants. The description of the theophany is conventional. Earth trembles, birds and fishes, men and beasts, are terrified, mountains are overturned, rocks are rent, walls collapse. The enemies slay each other, Jg 7:32; 2 Par 20:23, perish by pestilence, 4 Kg 19:35, hailstones, Jos 10:11, lightning, Gen 19:24. Brimstone is associated with lightning owing to the sulphurous odour accompanying the electrical discharge (Iliad VIII, 135; XIV, 415). 18. 'wrath': 'nostrils', an anthropomorphism omitted by LXX.

XXXIX 1-24 Sequel of the Victory—After a recapitulation of the preceding prophecy, in which the destruction of the invaders is stressed, the burning of the weapons, burial of the slain and feast of birds and beasts are described.

1-8 Recapitulation—2. MT reads 'I will drive thee f on' for 'I will lead thee out'. 3. The breaking of the bow is a new feature. 4. 'I will give'. 6. Gog's own land will suffer and the 'islands' or coastlands of his allies. 7b. Lit. 'nor shall I suffer my holy name to be profaned'.

9-16 Burning of Weapons and Burial of the Slain—g The uninterrupted peace following the victory makes weapons useless. Their use for firewood is a reprisal.

9. 'spears': 'bucklers'; 'pikes': 'spears'. 11. 'the passengers': 'Abārim, a mountain range E. of the Dead Sea. The valley is unknown. 14. Omit 'to bury' (MT) but retain 'to seek out' (LXX). Omit 16a, which is a gloss = 'Hamōnah "multitude" is also the name of a city', and cf. the last words of 15.

17-24. The Feast of Birds and Beasts—The slain are h likened to a sacrificial feast provided by Yahweh. 18. 'bullocks, all fallings of Bashan'. 21-24. The causes of the exile and the restoration are set forth.

Fulfillment of the Prophecy against Gog—The i prophecy will be fulfilled towards the end of a period, regarded by some as pre-Messianic. Gog then represents the Seleucids. The Messianic interpretation seems preferable as Ezechiel contemplates a Messianic restoration; cf. Apoc. 20:7. The judgement of the Gentile neighbours, chh 25-32, was the necessary prelude to the establishment of the peaceful Messianic kingdom. Gog comes from afar to plunder that kingdom already established. He and his army thus represent the forces of evil seeking vainly to destroy the Church founded by Christ.

25-28 Final Prediction of the Restoration—This j oracle is a summary conclusion of the restoration prophecies. 25. 'bring back the captivity': 'change the lot'. 26. 'bear' (MT): 'forget' (LXX). To bear transgressions would imply chastisement. 27-29. Yahweh's name will be sanctified by the return of the exiles, their spiritual regeneration and his abiding presence among them.

XL-XLVIII—In this last section of his book Ezechiel concludes his prophecies on the Restoration with the detailed and magnificent description of the New Temple, the New Cult and the New Holy Land. Catholic tradition has usually regarded this picture as a figurative adumbration in Jewish colouring of the Messianic Kingdom, the Church of Christ. Some modern exegetes propose a more realistic interpretation. It is difficult to suppose that a practical programme for the expected historical restoration is here presented to the exiles. The rebuilders of the temple, guided by prophets, made no attempt to realize the plan of Ezechiel. His legislation which ignored the high-priest and was sometimes at variance with the Mosaic code was never accepted as authoritative. In his description of the New Holy Land there are several features, the temple river in particular, which defy a realistic interpretation. An ideal Messianic Restoration on the lines of Isaiah's picture of the New Jerusalem is less open to objection. The prince how-b XL-XLII The New Temple—1. The Outer Court and its Gates. 2. The Inner Court and its Gates. 3. The Temple Buildings. 4. The buildings of the Inner Court. 5. The Dimensions of the Sanctuary. The text of these chapters is often corrupt and unintelligible. In the limited space at our disposal we have confined ourselves to a description of the New Temple. A few of the details are necessarily conjectural.

c XL-1-27 The Outer Court and its Gates—Ezechiel is transported in spirit to Jerusalem and ordered to communicate to the house of Israel what is there revealed to him. The date is the 10th Nisan (March-April) 573 B.C. From a high mountain, not determined, he sees the New Temple; cf. Apoc 21:10. An angel in human form, but resplendent, conducts him and takes the various measures with a reed or measuring rod, 6 cubits long, and a cord or tape for longer distances. The wall enclosing the house (usually the temple, here the whole sacred area) was a reed = 6 cubits, in thickness and in height. The cubit however was not the ordinary one of 6 handbreadths but contained 7 handbreadths. Render 5 (after 'six cubits'): 'of a cubit and a handbreadth each'. The ordinary cubit was about 17·7 inches, Ezechiel's therefore about 20·65 inches. As the three gates (N. S. E.) were similar, only the eastern and most important is described. It was an unroofed passage-way with walls or buildings on either side. A flight of 7 (LXX) steps led up to the outer threshold 6 cubits long (the thickness of the outer wall) and 10 cubits wide. This gave admission to a corridor 13 cubits wide, flanked on either side by three lodges or guard-houses 6 cubits square and two pillars occupying each a space 5 cubits d long between the lodges. An inner threshold similar to the outer one led thence into a porch which communicated with the court. The porch was 8 cubits long and 20 wide. Two pillars (DV 'fronts') facing each other at the entry to the court added 2 cubits to the porch's length and rows of pillars at the N. and S. sides added 5 cubits to its breadth. The whole structure was thus a rectangle 50 cubits long and 25 wide. The guard-houses had barriers or enclosed spaces on the corridor side and doors on the court side. The whole edifice had also diminishing windows (wider outside than inside) looking out on the court. The pillars in the porch were adorned with paintings or sculptures of palm trees. The Outer Court had 30 chambers, fronted with pillars, 42:6, probably adjoining the outer wall and corresponding to the porticos in Herod's temple, and also a paved space all around, extending as far inward as the gates. The distance from these gates to the corresponding gates of the inner court was 100 cubits so that the outer court was 150 cubits wide on all sides.

e XL 28-47 The Inner Court and its Gates—The gates, first described, only differed from the corresponding outer gates in being reached by an ascent of 8 steps instead of 7 and in having their porches not at the inner but at the outer end. Ezechiel, conducted to the E. gate, is next shown the tables on which victims were prepared for sacrifice. Four of these were in the porch, four more outside it in the court, two at each side. They were of cut stone 1½ cubits square and a cubit in height and had knives and other sacrificial implements. They had a border of a handbreadth (LXX; or hooks? MT) and were sheltered from sun and rain. Finally Ezechiel enters the inner court and observes two chambers one beside the N. gate facing S., the other beside the S. gate facing N. These are 492b for the priests, the sons of Sadoc, charged with the service of the altar. The inner court was 100 cubits long and wide. This measure is obscure and probably incorrect. Other indications show clearly that the inner court, including the temple, was 200 cubits long and wide. The altar of holocausts was due east of the house or temple.

XL 48-XLI 26 The Temple Buildings—Ezechiel's temple like Solomon's had four parts: Vestibule, Hekal (Holy Place), Debir (Holy of Holies), Lateral Building. An ascent of ten steps led to the Vestibule, 12 cubits long and 20 wide. The door, 14 cubits wide, was flanked on either side by a column and a wall 3 cubits long and 5 thick. The door from the Vestibule to the Hekal was 10 cubits wide, the walls on either side were 5 cubits long and 6 thick. The door from the Hekal to the Holy of Holies, entered by the Angel but not by Ezechiel, was 6 cubits wide, the walls on either side 7 cubits long and 2 thick. The Hekal was 40 cubits long, 20 wide, the Holy of Holies 20 cubits long and wide. The lateral building, enclosing the sacred edifice on the N. W. S. sides, rested on a foundation 6 cubits deep and had 3 stories each containing 30 rooms in which the sacred vessels and treasures of the temple were stored. The outer wall was 5 cubits, the inner (that of the temple) 6 cubits thick. Both these walls had their thickness twice diminished by half a cubit to support the floors of the upper stories. Thus the width of the rooms, 4, 5 and 6 cubits, varied with their elevation. Two doors in the outer wall on the N. and S. gave access to the lateral building which was bordered by a paved space of 5 and a free space of 20 cubits. The measures given make the temple 100 cubits long and 50 broad. Only by attaching to its breadth the free spaces of 25 cubits on the N. and S. sides can it be regarded as 100 cubits broad. A building 20 cubits due W. of the sacred edifice is next mentioned. It was 90 cubits long and 70 wide and its walls were 5 cubits thick. It probably served as a store room for wood and a shelter for cattle. All the walls of the vestibule, holy place and holy of holies were panelled and the panelling was adorned with alternating palm trees and cherubs. Two faces of the cherubs, those of the man and the lion, were represented in profile. The holy place and the holy of holies had double folding doors, rectangular in shape. The door of the vestibule was apparently a wooden screen. Before the holy of holies was a wooden altar, 2 cubits square and 3 in height, provided with corners or horns. This was undoubtedly not the Shewbread Table, as is often supposed, but the Altar of Incense. The altar of holocausts is also called table, 44:16. Wellhausen excluded the altar of incense from Solomon's temple, but Ingholt has recently shown that the Canaanite temples had their hammōnīm or incense altars (cf. Is 17:8), also mentioned by Ezechiel, 6:6.

XLII 1-14 The Buildings of the Inner Court—Two large buildings are described parallel to the temple on its N. and S. sides and separated from it by the free space outside the lateral building. The main building in each case 100 cubits long and 20 wide was separated by a corridor 10 cubits wide from a kind of wing, adjoining the court wall, also 20 cubits wide but only 50 in length. The buildings had 3 stories like the lateral building but diminished in width as they ascended. The entry from the outer court was at the east end. The rooms in these buildings served as dining- and vesting-rooms for the priests who were forbidden to eat sacred meats or wear priestly garments outside the inner court.

15-20 The Dimensions of the Sanctuary—The whole space enclosed by the outer wall was a square measuring 500 cubits (LXX) on all sides. MT has 500 reeds = 3,000 cubits. Some commentators suppose a vast unoccupied space surrounding the temple precincts and safeguarding their sanctity. But the free space all round the outer wall is elsewhere estimated at only 50 cubits, 45:2.

492j XLIII-XLVI The New Cult—Yahweh now enters his temple and prescribes how he is to be worshipped there. 1. The Theophany. 2. The Altar of Holocausts. 3. Prince, Levites and Priests. 4. Offerings. 5. Feasts and Sacrifices. 6. Inalienability of Prince's Domain. 7. Kitchens.

k XLIII 1-12 The Theophany—Ezekiel in a vision sees Yahweh solemnly enter his New Temple by the eastern gate. Conducted into the inner court the prophet beholds the glory of the Lord and hears his voice (not an angel's voice DV). Yahweh will dwell for ever among his people. They shall no more profane his holy name by their infidelities, by the corpses of their kings, buried usually in the southern part of the temple hill but sometimes in the palace garden, and by the palaces of their kings separated only by a wall from the sacred edifice. Solomon's temple had no outer court and was separated from his palace only by the single wall of the inner court. Ezekiel is ordered to promulgate the plan and measurements of the New Temple and the laws now revealed to him by which temple service must be regulated. 7. Supply (after 'son of man') thou hast seen (LXX) and omit 'by the high places', a dittography.

l 13-27 The Altar of Holocausts and its Consecration—The Altar is assumed to have been of stone. Underneath was a socle, measuring, outside the altar which fitted into it, a cubit in breadth and height. The altar proper consisted of 3 square blocks placed one on top of the other. The lowest was 16 cubits square and 2 high, the middle 14 cubits square and 4 high, the topmost—the altar surface—12 cubits square and 4 high. Cf. §278c. The altar had horns or projections at all four corners. At the base of all three blocks was a border or rim half a cubit in height. These rims probably formed channels for the reception of the blood. The ascent to the altar was by steps at the E. side. The consecration lasted seven days. On the first day a young bullock was the sin-offering. Its blood was poured on the four horns, on the four corners of the middle and lowest blocks and on the border of the socle round about. The body was burnt outside the sanctuary. After the expiation ceremony a bullock and a ram were offered as holocausts. Similar offerings were made on the following days except that a he-goat was the sin-offering. Not Ezekiel but the priests instructed by him were the consecrators. The salting of the holocausts, not pentateuchal, is noteworthy; cf. Mk 9:49.

m XLIV 1-31 Prince, Levites and Priests—The prince is the viceregent of Yahweh who is king of the new theocratic state. Among his privileges is a special place for sacrificial meals, the eastern gate of the outer court. As this gate can never be opened because Yahweh entered by it the king must enter the court by another gate and thus attain the inner entry of the eastern gate. An allusion to a gate of Marduk's great temple in Babylon, only opened twice a year, is generally assumed. Many of the Fathers see in the gate through which God alone passes a figure of our Lady's perpetual virginity. The Israelites are reproached for having permitted foreigners and uncircumcised persons, whom they employed in an inferior capacity as temple servants, to enter and profane Yahweh's sanctuary. The Nethinim, inferior temple servants of foreign origin, must be replaced by a particular class of Levites, namely, those who formerly exercised sacerdotal functions but are now degraded in consequence of idol worship and infidelity to Yahweh. To these are committed the guardianship of the gates, slaughter of the victims and menial offices in general. They must not discharge the functions or enjoy the emoluments of the priesthood.

n The priests are no longer all the male descendants of Aaron but a particular class of them, the descendants of Sadoc. Aaron left two sons, Eleazar and Ithamar. Abiathar, high-priest in David's time, was descended from Ithamar. His disloyalty led to the transfer of the dignity to the loyal Sadoc, a descendant of Eleazar,

3 Kg 1:26, 35. The fidelity of Sadoc and his descendants in the service of Yahweh at a time of general apostasy is the motive of their choice as priests in the New Temple. Most of the obligations of the priests will be found in the Pentateuch, sometimes however imposed exclusively on the high-priest whom Ezekiel entirely ignores. Their garments, worn only in the inner court, are of linen. They neither shave their heads nor grow their hair too long. They abstain from wine when serving. Their wives must be Israelites and either virgins or widows of priests. They teach and judge the people. They must avoid association with corpses except in specified cases of very close blood relationship involving subsequent purification. They have no part in the land of Israel but live on the offerings made by the people to Yahweh. Meal-offerings, sin-offerings, guilt-offerings, ban-offerings and first-fruits are specified.

o 8. 'Only the prince shall', etc. 8. 'kept the ordinances': 'taken charge'. 10. 'and have borne': 'shall bear'. 13. 'by the holy of holies': 'most holy'. The most holy things were the meal, sin and guilt offerings, 42:13. 15. 'But the Levitical priests [omitting 'and'], priests of the tribe of Levi'. 19. 'Sanctify': practically = pollute. Contact with sacred things was forbidden. 28. 'cleansed': 'made unclean'. 29. Insert the meal offering after 'eat'. 30. The ḥrūmah or tribute (DV 'meats') was a special offering levied on all fruits and amounting in rabbinic times to a fiftieth of the harvest. 31. The food prohibition applied to people as well as priests.

XLV 1-17 Offerings—The land assigned to priests, Levites, city and prince is first specified, then the prince's obligations and further emoluments. A portion of land 25,000 cubits long and 20,000 broad is first measured. The half of this enclosing the sanctuary and a vacant space of 50 cubits all around it is for the priests, the other half for the Levites. South of this is a space 25,000 cubits long and 5,000 wide for the city. East and west of the entire space already measured, 25,000 cubits square, is the portion of the prince. It extends to the Mediterranean on the W. and the Dead Sea on the E. The ample provision made for the prince is designed to correct the ancient abuse by which monarchs arbitrarily appropriated tribal territory. The prince must not oppress his subjects and must exercise a special control over weights and measures. The shekel was the standard of weight, the bath of liquid, the ephah of dry measure. The prince receives from the people a sixtieth part of their wheat and barley, a hundredth part of their oil and a two-hundredth part of their flocks. In return he must provide all public offerings and sacrifices.

b 1. 'ten': 'twenty' (LXX). 4. 'suburbs': 'free spaces'; after 'houses'; and for their pasture lands'. 5. 'twenty chambers': 'cities to inhabit' (LXX). 6-7. The separation of the sanctuary is the tract of land reserved to temple, priests and Levites. 7. 'sea': 'west'. 9. 'confines': 'exactions'. 12. The mine was 50 shekels (LXX) more probably than 60 (MT). 15. 'of those that Israel feedeth': 'as offering of the families of Israel' (LXX). 17. 'and the sacrifices': 'and the offering'.

XLV 18-XLVI 15 Feasts and Sacrifices—Two feasts of expiation on the first of the first and seventh months replace the Yôm Kippūr. The blood of the sin-offering, a young bullock, is poured on the corners of the altar blocks, on the doorposts of the hekal and on the gateposts of the inner court. Pasch and Tabernacles are celebrated on the dates assigned by the law but the sacrifices offered are different and are accompanied by offerings of an ephah of meal and a hin of oil. There is no mention of the paschal lamb, barley first-fruits and booths or of the feast of Pentecost. The Sabbath and New Moon feasts are next considered. On these days the eastern gate of the inner court is left open and the prince has the privilege of assisting on the threshold at the sacrifices, invisible to the people, in the outer court. The rule that those who 493a enter the outer court by the northern gate leave it by the southern aims at the maintenance of order and binds prince and people. Six lambs and a ram are sacrificed on these feasts, also a bullock on the New Moon feasts. The usual accompaniment of an ephah of meal and a hin of oil is prescribed except in the lamb offerings when the amount is left to the liberality of the prince. When the prince makes a voluntary offering he may assist at the sacrifice in the porch of the eastern gate. Finally every morning a lamb must be offered as a holocaust together with a sixth of an ephah of meal and a third of a hin of oil. The law prescribed also a similar evening sacrifice and exacted a lesser quota of meal and oil. 19. 'brim': 'blocks'. 20. 'on the first day of the seventh month' (LXX).

d XLVI 16-18 Inalienability of the Prince's Domain—Only to his sons can the prince give permanently part of his domain. Such a gift made to anybody else is a loan and returns to the prince automatically in the year of liberty, the next Sabbatic year when Hebrew slaves were freed from bondage.

e 19-24 The Kitchens—The kitchens for cooking sacrificial meats, sin-offerings and guilt-offerings eaten by the priests in the inner court, naturally attached to the dining-rooms already described, were at the western extremity of these buildings. Only the northern kitchens are mentioned but others on the south side may be assumed. The kitchens for the laity were in four enclosures, 40 cubits long and 30 wide, occupying the four angles of the outer court. Here the flesh of peace-offerings was cooked and eaten.

f XLVII-XLVIII The New Holy Land—The Temple River is first described, then the boundaries of the land, and lastly its distribution.

g XLVII 1-12 The River—It issues from beneath the south side of the threshold of the temple, flows eastward by the Altar of Holocausts and emerges from the sanctuary on the south side of the perpetually closed eastern gate of the outer court. Thence it flows into the Dead Sea, increasing in depth so rapidly that at 4,000 cubits (less than 1½ miles) from the sanctuary it is no longer fordable. The desert which it traverses becomes extremely fertile. The trees on its banks heal with their leaves and bear fresh fruit monthly. The waters of the Dead Sea, healed by its entry, abound with fish. From Engaddi to Enaglaim at the sea's NW. end fishermen ply their trade. Only detached pools of Dead Sea water retain their salt. Ezechiel derives the fertility of desert land, a regular feature of Messianic prosperity, from the abiding presence of Yahweh.

h 13-23 The Boundaries—Ezechiel had previously indicated the northern and southern boundaries when he predicted, 6:14, that the land would be devastated from the desert (between Palestine and Egypt) to Riblah, near Homs, in the latitude of Tripoli and on the southern confines of Hamath. The site of Ezechiel's Riblah where Nabuchodonosor judged his captives on the confines of the land, 11:10, is quite certain. It helps us to identify the sites on the northern boundary and shows that Ezechiel's Messianic kingdom, a revival of that of David, included that monarch's Aramaean conquests. 15-18. 'These are the boundaries of the land: On the north side from the great sea [Mediterranean] by Hethlon [Heitala two hours E. of Tripoli], the entry of Hamath [Restan midway between Homs and 493b Hamath] S'dad [Sadad SE. of Homs], Berotha [Bereitan SE. of Ba'albek], Sibrayim [Sömeriye E. of the lake of Homs] which is between the confines of Damascus and Hamath, Hasar-Enan [Qaryetain on the road from Damascus to Palmyra] on the confines of Hauran. And the boundary was from the sea to Hasar-Enan, northern boundary of Damascus and boundary of Hamath. That is the north side. The eastern side was from between Hauran and Damascus and from between Gilead and the land of Israel, the Jordan serving as boundary to the east [Dead] sea and Tamar [Kornub SW. of Dead Sea]. That is the east side'. Besides the usual corrections sāpōnāh, a dittography, is omitted in 17. Hauran is the key to the interpretation. It is not Hawwārīn near Qaryetain but clearly a district like Hamath and Damascus, the Assyrian province of Haurina, which had to be included in the Messianic kingdom because it contained Aramaean territory subject to David. Ezechiel gives it a wide extension northwards as far as Hasar-Enan. Berotha and possibly Helam (LXX) are mentioned as Aramaean cities conquered by David, 2 Kg 8:8; 10:17. Hamath was the northern, Damascus the eastern boundary of Ezechiel's Hauran. Only at Gilead does the Jordan become the eastern boundary. The southern boundary is the usual one. Meribath-Qadesh ('Ain Qudeis) and the Torrent (of Egypt, Wady el-'Arish) are mentioned. The Mediterranean is the western limit as far as opposite the entry of Hamath. Phoenicia as far north as Tripoli is included.

XLVIII 1-35 The Distribution—Ezechiel begins by giving foreigners settled in the Holy Land a share in its territory. The distinction between Jew and Gentile tends to disappear in the Messianic kingdom. He then assigns a strip of land to each of the twelve tribes, seven to the N. and five to the S. of the previously reserved territory. The order from N. to S. is: Dan, Aser, Nephtali, Manasses, Ephraim, Ruben, Judah, reserved territory, Benjamin, Simeon, Issachar, Zabulon, Gad. Each tribe divides its land by lot among its families and alien residents. Judah and Benjamin have privileged positions next the sanctuary from which the tribes of servile origin on the mother's side, Dan, Aser, Nephtali, Gad are furthest removed. Levi has no portion among the tribes. The Levites therefore in the reserved territory are a tribal unit, not merely degraded priests. Ezechiel's distribution is mathematical. He takes no account of tribes that have disappeared anciently like Ruben and Simeon or recently like those of the Northern Kingdom nor of the variety in the population of the tribes and the fertility of the land. The reconstitution which he contemplates is not practical but ideal or Messianic. A recapitulation of the description of the reserved territory gives new information about the city. It will be peopled by members of all twelve tribes and will measure 5,000 cubits squared if the suburbs extending 250 cubits on all four sides are included. It will have twelve gates named after the twelve sons of Jacob, not the twelve tribes for Joseph and Levi replace Ephraim and Manasses. The reserved territory E. and W. of the city 10,000 cubits long and 5,000 wide on both sides will supply food to the citizens. The circumference of the city wall will be 18,000 cubits and the name of the city will be Yahweh is there.

b The Person of the Prophet—Our information about Daniel is derived mainly from his book. In the third year of Joakim, king of Juda (605 B.C.), Daniel was led captive to Babylon by Nabuchodonosor. According to Josephus (Ant 10, 10, 1), he belonged to the royal family of Sedecias, the last king of Juda. Together with other Jewish youths he was educated at the royal court of Babylon where, however, they all kept to their religious practices. Daniel's extraordinary skill in the interpretation of dreams raised him to a position of the highest authority in the Babylonian empire. His three companions on refusing to worship the golden image were cast into a burning furnace and miraculously rescued. Daniel remained in power during the reign of Darius, who contemplated making him chief minister over the whole realm (6:4). The jealous ministers plotted against his life, but God delivered his faithful servant and brought upon Daniel's accusers the evil they had devised for him. Daniel lived at least till the third year of Cyrus, 10:1 (536–535).

The name Daniel (= 'my judge is God') occurs in the name-lists of the post-exilic period (Esd 8:2; Neh 10:7), but there is no evidence that the prophet was one of the exiles who returned back with Esdras. It is generally believed that the Daniel, who is mentioned by Ezechiel as a pattern of righteousness and wisdom (14:14, 20; 28:3), is the prophet and the diplomat of the Babylonian court. This identity has recently been disputed mainly on grounds of orthography, the consonantal form of the prophet's name being dn'y'l, while the name of Ezechiel's Daniel is spelt dn'l, a form which occurs in the Räs-Shamra tablets; cf. P. Joüon in Bi (1938) 283–5; P. Heinisch, Das Buch Ezechiel, BB 77; Dennefeld, 631.

c Contents and Analysis—The general theme of the book is the uniqueness of the God of the Israelites and his superiority over all heathen gods demonstrated by the personal experiences of the prophet himself and by God's prediction of a universal and everlasting reign of peace and justice for those who remain faithful to him. Hence the book falls naturally into two parts, chh 1–6 and chh 7–12. In Part I, which may be called 'the stories section', Daniel relates some of his personal experiences in the court of Babylon in order to show that the God of the Israelites is Almighty and the Only Living God. In Part II, or 'the visions section', he relates his visions and their interpretations.

In ch 1 the writer introduces Daniel, the divinely gifted interpreter of dreams, and his three companions, the faithful and undaunted worshippers of the true God. In ch 2 Daniel interprets Nabuchodonosor's first dream which symbolized the overthrow of all earthly kingdoms and the setting up of a universal reign. Thereupon Nabuchodonosor acknowledges the superiority of the God of Daniel over all other gods. Ch 3 develops the same theme in a different way. Daniel's companions refuse to worship the idol erected by the king, are cast into a burning furnace, and miraculously rescued from the flames. The king once more acknowledges the power of their God. In ch 4 Daniel interprets another dream to Nabuchodonosor, who is compelled again to acknowledge God's power and righteousness. Ch 5 carries us down to the last days of Babylon. Daniel interprets the symbolical writing on the wall predicting the impending downfall of the Babylonian kingdom. Afterwards (ch 6) Daniel was appointed by Darius the Mede one of the three presidents governing the whole kingdom. On being slandered by envious officials he was cast into a den of lions where he was miraculously preserved from harm. The king acknowledges the power of the God of Daniel, and enjoins all his subjects to honour him.

Part II relates Daniel's four visions.

In the first vision (ch 7) Daniel sees four monstrous beasts emerging from the sea. An angel explains to Daniel their symbolical meaning. They represent four successive kingdoms. From the fourth a king will arise who will seek to exterminate the people of God. But eventually he will be overthrown and the holy people will receive an eternal and universal dominion.

The second vision (ch 8) symbolizes the downfall of the Medo-Persian power, the rise of the empire of Alexander the Great, the sacrilegious arrogance of one of the Greek rulers.

In the third vision (ch 9) Daniel, after confessing the people's sins and praying for the nation's restoration, receives a divine assurance that God's promise will be fulfilled after 70 weeks of years, or 490 years.

The fourth vision (chh 10–12) is a revelation concerning the rulers of the people of Israel down to Antiochus IV, whose conquests and ignominious end are vividly depicted. An age of bliss will then dawn upon the people of God.

Chh 13 and 14 in the LXX and the Vg are an appendix containing the story of Susanna, and the story of Bel and the Dragon.

It appears from this analysis that the two parts differ from one another, not only in their literary form but also in their historical outlook. In Part I the writer is mainly concerned with the Neo-Babylonian empire, and hardly displays any interest in the Persian and the Greek age. Nabuchodonosor is the centre of gravity of chh 1–6. He is the golden head (2:38), the king of kings ruling over the whole earth (2:37 f.), the mighty tree stretching forth its branches to the extremities of the earth (4:17–19). An echo of Nabuchodonosor's greatness and magnificence resounds even in the narrative of the last days of the Babylonian domination (5:18 f.). The general situation of the Jewish exiles is, apparently, uneventful. But in Part II the writer's 494f attention is concentrated on the age of Antiochus IV (175-164 B.C.). The writer is horrified at the sight of the persecuted Israelites, and his sorrow is assuaged not by the remembrance of a glorious past, but by the hope of a brighter future. The Babylonian age has no part in his visions, but he describes the Seleucid domination with a richness of detail unusual in prophecy.

g The Apocalyptic Character of the Book—There are striking differences both in contents and in mode of expression between the book of Daniel and the other prophetic writings. In the latter the reader is moving in a world of realities, among a living community unfaithful to their God, and unresponsive to the prophets' warnings. But in the book of Daniel we are transported into a world of dreams and visions, among monstrous beasts and manlike angels. Future events, which are only vaguely predicted by the other prophets, are depicted in the book of Daniel with a richness of detail which is more appropriate to history than to prophecy.

h Hence it has been the custom to reckon the book of Daniel, especially chh 7-12, with those books which, on account of the revelations which they purport to communicate, have been called apocalypses, from the Greek ἀποκάλυψις = 'revelation'. The distinguishing feature of this species of literature, which flourished mostly from the 2nd century B.C. to the 2nd century A.D., producing a plentiful crop of apocryphal writings, is a revelation which, by a literary device, is supposed to have been made by God to some prominent man of antiquity, and kept, for a long time, hidden from the people. The revelation is made to extend over two periods of time, the one prior to the writer's time, the other later; the one relates past history in the form of prediction of future events, the other expresses the writer's hopes in the form of prophecy. On Apocalyptic literature see DBV(S), art. Apocalyphtique.

i Such a representation of history as real prophecy is, at least apparently, a literary forgery and a gross theological imposture. Modern criticism is, however, less severe. It is generally admitted that pseudonymity does not necessarily imply a falsehood; it may be a literary device, and as such it is quite consistent with biblical inspiration and inerrancy. The book of Wisdom is a well-known example. True it is that the apocalyptic writings are not mere literary pseudographs, in which a writer appears ostensibly under an assumed name. They derive or seem to derive all their authority and influence from the person whose name they assume, and whom they represent as communicating the divine revelation. And in order to strengthen the popular belief in the supposed origin of these writings their authors have also represented God as ordering that these books should be kept hidden until their appointed time.

j It does not seem correct to say that these anonymous writers intended to derive all their influence from their assumed names. Nor is it probable that this sort of pseudographic literature was, at the time of its appearance, so shrouded in mystery as is now believed. The fact that many writers during a period of four centuries chose this literary form for the expression of their religious sentiments clearly suggests that writing under an assumed name and representing past history as prophecy was a literary artifice unknown neither to writers nor to readers. The possibility of deception was therefore excluded. The apocalyptic writers derived their influence from their firm belief in God's promises of a better age and from their unshakeable conviction in his universal providence which they expressed in a literary form which was the product of the time. In this way they helped to strengthen the faith of their contemporaries and keep them united together as one soul inseparably attached to God amidst all persecutions. Whether the book may be classed with pseudonymous apocalyptic writings is discussed below, § 495a-k.

Position of the Book of Daniel in the Canon—In the LXX and the Vg the book of Daniel ranks fourth among the major prophets, while in MT it is classed among the Hagiographa. St Jerome in the Prologus galeatus follows the order of the Jewish Canon (Praef. in libros Samuel et Malachim, PL 28, 553f.). The different position of Daniel in the Greek and the Jewish Canons may be easily explained by assuming that this book received universal recognition when the collection of the prophetic writings had already been closed. The Jews of Alexandria arranged the books of the OT according to criteria of date and literary form, and so Daniel found himself among the prophets.

It is doubtful, however, whether the Jewish order of books is the original one. Josephus seems to include Daniel among the Prophets (C. Apion. 1, 8). The oldest Greek lists of books, some of which give the Jewish Canon, enumerate Daniel with the Prophets (cf. H. E. Ryle, The Canon of the Old Testament, table facing p 292).

The Deuterocanonical Additions—The Greek version of Daniel and the Vg have some sections which are not in the Hebrew-Aramaic text. They are: the prayer of Azarias (3:24-45); the Song of the three children preceded by a prose interlude (3:46-90); the story of Susanna (ch 13); the story of Bel and the Dragon (ch 14). It is generally held by Catholic scholars that these portions were originally written in Hebrew or Aramaic, but did not form part of the original book (C. Julius, Die griechischen Danielzusätze und ihre kanonische Geltung, BS, VI, 3/4, 1901). We may add that they originated in the time of Daniel and belonged to the same cycle of Daniel episodes which have come down to us in a Hebrew and Aramaic form. They were translated into Greek, but when the final redaction of the book was made, the original text of these portions was either lost or for some reason inaccessible to the redactor. Of their canonicity, however, there can be no doubt.

The Language Problem—In the Hebrew Bible the book of Daniel is written in two languages. 1:1-2:4a and chh 7-12 are in Hebrew; 2:4b-6:29 are in Aramaic. The deuterocanonical portions are in Greek. Various solutions have been proposed to explain the trilingual character of the book. The Greek sections are certainly translations from lost Semitic originals. The change from Hebrew to Aramaic and from Aramaic to Hebrew can hardly be attributed to the original writer. Very probably the several episodes and visions circulated on separate leaves in a Hebrew and in an Aramaic form, the one being a translation of the other, and the final compiler put together the stories in that linguistic form that came into his hands.

Text and Versions—The Hebrew-Aramaic text of the book of Daniel has been rather badly preserved, as is shown by the numerous discrepancies from the ancient versions which, in many cases, exhibit a better text. This becomes clearly understandable when we consider that MT represents the last stage of a gradual editorial development which had been going on since the book took a definitive shape about the year 168 B.C. Besides these editorial changes there are others which originated in the time when the book was still in the state of a loose collection of separate narratives. Some of the chronological indications at the beginning of the narratives are, most probably, scribal or editorial insertions. But despite its corrupt state the Hebrew-Aramaic text of Daniel represents on the whole the substance of the original. The earliest version is the LXX, which was made during the latter half of the 2nd century B.C. The translator shows signs of incompetence. Compared with the rival Greek version of Theodotion, it looks more like a paraphrase than a translation (A. Bludau, Die alexandrinische Übersetzung des Buches Daniel und ihr Verhältniss zum Massoretischen Text, BS, II, 2/3, p 206). On account of its divergencies from the Hebrew text, the LXX version was never received in the Church (St Jerome, Comm. in Dan. Proph. PL 25, 514). The divergencies may, 494n however, to some extent, be due to a slightly different Semitic text.

- o The LXX version of Daniel was from a very early date superseded by that made by Theodotion, a Jewish proselyte, c. A.D. 180. Theodotion's version is probably a revised edition of an older version made from the Hebrew and independent of the LXX (H. B. Swete, Introduction to the Old Testament in Greek, p. 48). Theodotion places the story of Susanna at the head of the book, and in the Chester Beatty Papyri, published by F. Kenyon, the text of Daniel (fasc. vii, pp. 17-38), which contains the LXX version and belongs probably to the early 3rd century A.D., places ch. 5 after ch. 8. But these different arrangements are most likely due to redactors or copyists rather than to a Semitic original.

The Vg is made from the Hebrew-Aramaic text current in Jerome's time, a text which was very closely related to MT. Occasionally Jerome follows Theodotion. The deuterocanonical parts are from Theodotion.

495a Date and Authorship—Catholic tradition has always recognized Daniel as the original author of the book. The first heterodox view was that propounded by the Neo-Platonic philosopher Porphyry (died 303), who attributed the book to an anonymous writer living in the times of Antiochus Epiphanes (St. Jerome, Comm. in Dan. Proph. PL 25, 491). This view, which soon fell into oblivion, was revived with the rise of Rationalism, and is now held, with rare exceptions, by all non-Catholic scholars.

These are their chief arguments:

- b 1. The Linguistic Argument. (a) The Hebrew of Daniel is that of a much later age than the 6th century B.C.; it resembles, not the Hebrew of Ezekiel, a contemporary of Daniel, but that of the age subsequent to Nehemiah (S. R. Driver, pp. lx f.).

(b) The Aramaic represents a later stage of development than that of the Egyptian papyri of the 5th century B.C. and of the book of Esdras (G. R. Driver, JBL, 1926, p. 118).

(c) There are at least 15 Persian loan-words and 3 Greek words in Daniel. Now if the Persian words presuppose a period after the Persian empire had been well established, the Greek words demand a date after the conquest of Palestine by Alexander the Great (S. R. Driver, p. lxxiii).

- c 2. The Historical Argument. The writer reveals such an imperfect and inaccurate knowledge of the political history of Babylon during the last years of the Neo-Babylonian empire and the first years of the Persian rule that he cannot have lived in that period. Thus, for example:

(a) A captivity in the 3rd year of Joakim (1:1) is unknown to oriental history.

(b) Baltassar (Belshazzar) is represented as the last king of Babylon and son of Nabuchodonosor (ch. 5). In point of fact Baltassar was the son of Nabonidus, the last king of Babylon, and had no relationship with Nabuchodonosor.

(c) Darius the Mede is said to have succeeded Baltassar after the downfall of the Babylonian empire (5:30 f.), and to have ruled over Babylon before Cyrus (6:28; 10:1; 11:1). In 9:1 he is called the son of Assuerus (Xerxes). It appears that the writer has erroneously introduced a Median kingdom ruling over Babylon between the Neo-Babylonian and the Persian empires. A contemporary writer like Daniel cannot be made responsible for such a gross historical mistake.

- d 3. The Theological Argument. (a) OT prophecy is the communication of a divine message directed primarily to the contemporaries of the prophet. Whether it is a message of doom or of hope, it is always intimately related to the circumstances of the time of the prophet. Now the interest of the book of Daniel is chiefly centred on the age of Antiochus IV, and it brings no message to men of the 6th century. This constitutes a strong presumption that the author of the book of Daniel lived in the period which he describes—that is, in the time of Antiochus.

(b) Another distinctive feature of OT prophecy is its relation, close or remote, to the Messianic kingdom and the lack of any determination of time and persons. Hence the principle that prophecy is not predicted history. In the book of Daniel there are a number of prophecies having no apparent relation to Messianic times and many details of time, names, and persons that are unusual in prophecy.

(c) The doctrines concerning the angels, their office, rank and name, the resurrection and the last judgement are presented in the book of Daniel with a distinctness and a development that point to an age later than the exile.

On the ground of these arguments and others of less probative force, such as the position of the book in the Jewish Canon and the complete absence of any allusion to it in the literature earlier than the books of Maccabees, the non-Catholic critical school considers the book of Daniel to be an anonymous apocalypse written at the time of Antiochus Epiphanes, c. 168 B.C. Although these arguments, even taken cumulatively, do not compel us to abandon the traditional view, they call at least for a reconsideration of our position. The Danielic authorship, in its strictest sense, can hardly be defended, but, on the other hand, there are no good arguments against the view that there is at least a solid Danielic nucleus. It has been said above that the Aramaic sections are, probably, translations from Hebrew (so Goettsberger, p. 9 f.; Linder, p. 57). Moreover, recent Catholic commentators are inclined to place the final redaction of Daniel at a much later date than that of the prophet. Now supposing that both the translation and the final redaction were made in Palestine during the Greek period, the linguistic argument will prove only what we actually admit, namely the late date of the final redaction, or, to put it in modern language, the last edition of the book of Daniel. But the origin of the book remains unaffected.

The historical argument, apparently the strongest, is equally inconclusive. That the book contains a number of historical inaccuracies cannot be denied, and it must also be admitted that the efforts made by commentators to defend the accuracy of Daniel are not always successful. Though it is certainly most uncritical and unfair to explain away these historical inaccuracies by laying the blame on copyists, translators and editors, the textual conditions of the MT and ancient versions and the way in which the book, very probably, grew up and was handed down to us must serve as a warning against relying too confidently on certain details which are more liable to scribal manipulation. Thus, for example, there are reasons to believe that the appellation 'Darius the Mede' is a later addition or textual corruption; cf. Lagrange in RB (1904) 501 f.; E. Kissane in Irish Theol. Quart. (1919) 57. If this is true, a serious historical difficulty is removed.

The theological argument requires to be treated with reserve. The possibility of prophecy is beyond dispute, so that the question is not whether Daniel could foretell future events having no immediate connexion with his contemporaries, but whether he has actually done so.

We admit that the prediction of future events having no relation to the Messianic plan of redemption is, at least, not in accordance with OT prophecy in general. Now there is in 'the vision chapters,' especially in ch. 11, a mass of historical details couched in prophetic language and yet having no relation to the Messianic kingdom. The assumption that all these historical data are real prophecies would necessarily imply that such irrelevant facts as the marriage of a royal daughter or an unsuccessful political alliance are the objects of a divine revelation, an implication which few, if any, will admit. One feels strongly inclined to consider the prophetic form of certain details as a literary device intended more forcibly to impress upon readers the lesson of history.

In order fully to estimate the real import of the 495g historical or Maccabean standpoint and its bearing upon the date of the book, one must distinguish sharply between the historico-Maccabean and the Messianico-eschatological perspective. The promise of an eternal and universal kingdom to be established upon the ruins of all earthly powers rings throughout the whole book. It is the predominant note, and the point of convergence of all the narratives and visions, whereas the references to the history of either the Babylonian or the Persian or the Greek domination assume a secondary rôle. All these world-empires will be overthrown, the powers of evil will be defeated, and the people of God will enjoy the blessings of a peaceful kingdom established on earth and enduring in heaven for eternity.

h If the prophecies of the book of Daniel are viewed from this twofold standpoint, the theological argument based on the analogy of prophecy loses much of its force. The establishment of the kingdom of God on earth and its consummation in heaven are in themselves independent of the historical circumstances of any particular age, and are the result of God's victory over the powers of darkness symbolized in the person of Antiochus and of all the persecutors of the righteous people. The references to Antiochus IV, and to the Greek period in general, have only a secondary importance, and may be considered as an illustration of the destruction of the enemies of God added by a later writer without any prejudice to the general meaning of the book. In other words, 'the visions section' may be regarded as the work of Daniel in so far as it foretells the establishment of the Messianic kingdom on earth and its consummation in heaven, while the Maccabean colouring is the work of a 2nd-century editor who adapted Daniel's predictions to the historical conditions of his age.

i It may not be out of place to give here the latest views of Catholic writers on the book of Daniel. J. Nikel believes that the contents of the book go back to the times of the exile, but that the book took its final shape during the Greek age (Grundriss der Einleitung in das A. T., Münster, 1924, p 205). J. Goettsberger holds that the book is made up of two collections, chh 1-6 and chh 7-12, the substance of which goes back to Daniel himself or to his time, but the final redaction of the book was made c 300 B.C. Ch 11 has been extensively glossed over (Das Buch Daniel, pp 6-8; Einleitung in das A. T., p 326). H. Junker thinks that the book is the work of a writer living in the Maccabean age who made use of pre-Maccabean material bearing the name of Daniel. He worked over this older material and illustrated Daniel's visions and symbols by history (Untersuchungen, pp 101-7).

j J. Linder explains the Danielic authorship in this manner: 1. The visions were written by Daniel in Hebrew. 2. The narratives were written in Hebrew by Daniel or, at least, in his time, and translated into Aramaic during the Persian age. The translator also rendered ch 7 into Aramaic. 3. A redactor united the two parts together, c 300 B.C., and translated 1:1-2:4a into Hebrew (p 57). In the latest edition of Höpfl's introduction to the OT it is held that the book in its present form is the work of an unknown writer living c 300 B.C., who made use of older material, H. Höpfl-A. Miller-A. Metzinger, Introductio Specialis in Vetus Testamentum (Rome, 1946²) 482. Dennefeld, 638, without going into details, says in a general way that the book has an apocalyptic character, and received its final form in the Maccabean age, but that its contents go back to the age of the exile.

k Summing up the results of this inquiry into the origin of the book of Daniel, we may say that its formation and transmission had a very eventful history. Daniel himself recorded some of his personal experiences at the court of Babylon. As he did not intend to write a complete autobiography, but to impress upon his fellow exiles belief in the uniqueness of God and his superiority over all heathen deities, the individual episodes, very probably, circulated on separate sheets. They were eagerly read and copied. In course of time these copies were, in varying degrees, retouched and expanded by copyists and editors. The visions were made to apply to the age of Antiochus IV by an inspired writer who lived at that time. These Daniel stories, or many of them, were translated into Aramaic in Palestine, and some of them were probably re-translated into Hebrew. Later they were all translated into Greek. At a certain date the separate narratives were collected into one book according to the form and language which were at hand. It happened that the episode of the idol (ch 3) came into the compiler's hands in its shorter form, and the stories of Susanna and of Bel and the Dragon were either unknown or inaccessible to him. The Greek translators made use of this edition, but either because they wished to have a fuller narrative or for other unknown reasons they adopted the longer redaction for ch 3, and incorporated other stories into their translation.

Doctrinal Value—Though the name Yahweh does not occur in this book, the God of the Israelites is constantly represented as the Only and Living God, an almighty, all-knowing God, the king of kings and the Lord of heaven and earth. He controls all the course of history. He sets up kings and he brings them down. Resistance to his rule ends in destruction; submission in peace and happiness. God dwells in heaven and rules the world through intermediate spiritual agencies. He permits the righteous to be persecuted only to give them a greater reward if they remain faithful to him.

The Messianic doctrine differs sensibly from that of the other prophets inasmuch as it is almost completely absorbed by the eschatological aspect of the kingdom of God. Before the advent of the Messiah all hostile powers, and particularly the great persecutor of the people of God, will be utterly overthrown. The Messianic kingdom, unimpressive in its beginnings, will in course of time extend all over the earth. Though established on earth, it will be a spiritual kingdom, based on peace and justice and on the recognition of the Only True God. The rich and varied imagery of temporal blessings, characteristic of other Messianic prophecies, is totally absent. The Messianic king will not conquer the world by the sword, he will be the 'son of man' and will receive the royal power at the hands of God, who alone has the right to give it 'to whomsoever it shall please him' (4:14).

The Messianic aspect of the kingdom of God insensibly merges into its eschatological aspect. The earthly stage of the kingdom of God, in other words the Church of Christ, is only the prelude to its heavenly stage which will last for ever. It is under this eschatological aspect that the kingdom of God, which will be established upon earth, is described as everlasting (2:44; 7:18, 27). The inauguration of the heavenly kingdom will be preceded by the destruction of the 'man of sin' who is generally identified with the Antichrist symbolized by Antiochus. When the Antichrist is overcome, the dead will be called back to life and brought before the final judgement; the righteous will receive the reward of everlasting life and the wicked will live in everlasting shame.

I, 1 f. Daniel's Deportation—According to Jer 46:2, Nabuchodonosor defeated the Egyptian forces in Syria at Carchemish in the 4th year of Joakim (605 B.C.). Before that year an invasion of Palestine by Nabuchodonosor was therefore impossible. Supposing Jeremiah is reckoning the years from the date of accession, while Daniel, following the Babylonian system, is reckoning from the New Year following the accession, the 3rd year of Joakim on the one system would coincide in part with his 4th year on the other. By that victory Syria and Palestine passed under the power of Babylon. While Nabuchodonosor was pursuing the Egyptians down to the borders of Egypt, he received the news of the death of his father, and had to hasten back to Babylon to secure the succession against possible usurpers. On his way back or in his pursuit of the enemy he marched against Jerusalem, very probably 496b to assert his right of dominion over the Judean capital. Joakim came to terms by accepting the status of a vassal king and paying a tribute too heavy for the royal treasury. Some of the temple vessels were carried away to the land of Sennaar, an archaic appellation of Babylonia (Gen 10:10; 11:2; 14:1, 7, etc.), and placed in the temple of Marduk, the patron-god of Babylon. The words 'and the vessels he brought into the treasure house of his god' are probably interpolated. The name 'Nabuchodonosor,' Hebrew Nebukadnessar, is an alternative form of Nebukadrezzar, which corresponds to Babylonian Nabu-kudurri-uṣur, 'Nebo protect the boundary'.

e 3-7 The Education of Daniel and his Companions—3.

In his campaign against Jerusalem Nabuchodonosor took some hostages, cf. also 4 Kg 24:1-7; 2 Par 36:5-8. It was the custom of oriental kings to have among their pages foreign youths of noble descent. Nabuchodonosor accordingly ordered Asphenez, the chief official of his household, to bring into the court some noble youths of the Jewish captives. 4. The qualifications required were: absence of any physical imperfection, a comely appearance, and a mental alertness that would enable them to learn quickly and thoroughly all that it was necessary for a page to know. The adjectives 'skilful, acute, instructed' do not imply three different qualities, but simply serve to emphasize the necessity of their intellectual training. Above all other things the boys had to learn the literature and the tongue of the Chaldeans. The appellation 'Chaldeans' denotes primarily the people who dwelt SE. of Babylon (Gen 11:28, etc.). When Babylon fell into the hands of Nabopolassar, a Chaldean, in 625 B.C., the term Chaldean came to be applied to the subjects of the king of Babylon (4 Kg 25:4-26; Is 13:19; 23:13, etc.). After the fall of the Babylonian empire it acquired a more restricted sense denoting a special class, the priests of Bel who practised magic arts and were probably of a Chaldean origin. In this sense the word first appears in Herodotus (1, 181, 183), but it never occurs in the OT except in Daniel. It follows that the Chaldean tongue and literature which the Jewish youths had to learn were the incantation texts and the Babylonian language in which they were written. Magic was prohibited by the Mosaic Law (Lev 20:27; Deut 18:10-12), but it is nowhere said that Daniel or his companions ever practised this art.

e 5. The course of training was to extend over a period of three years, at the end of which they were to enter the king's service. Their daily food was provided from the king's table. 6. Among the young nobles were four from Juda. 7. As a mark of their subjection to another king and to other gods they had their names changed: Daniel 'God is my judge' was changed into Baltassar, Bab. balatsu-uṣur, '(Bel) protect his life'; Ananias 'Yahweh is gracious' into Sidrach, Heb. Sadrak, perhaps Bab. šudur-Aku 'command of (the god) Aku'; Misaël 'who is what God is?' into Misach, Heb. Mešak, perhaps Bab. mi-ša-Aku 'who is what Aku is?'; and Azarias 'Yahweh is a helper' into Abdenago, Heb. 'abed nego, Bab. 'abed Nebo, 'servant of (the god) Nebo'. For the practice of changing the name of high public officials in a foreign country or under a foreign power cf. Gen 41:45; 4 Kg 23:35; 24:17.

f 8-16 The Loyalty of the Youths to their Religion—8.

Certain foods were prohibited to the Jews (Lev 11). Moreover the meat, whether prohibited or not, and the wine might have been offered to the gods before being served. Partaking of such food was a violation of the Levitical law and a recognition of the heathen deities. In order to avoid the possibility of contamination Daniel asked to be allowed to abstain from the meals provided from the royal table. For other instances of abstention from heathen food cf. Tob 1:12; Jud 12:2.

g 9f. The request, bold though it seemed, aroused in the official a feeling of sympathy. He would willingly have acceded to his request, but as responsible for their health he might incur the king's displeasure if they should not look as well as the other boys of their age. 11-13. Daniel repeated his request through a subordinate official who had the immediate care of the boys, and proposed a ten-day experiment. The word 'Malasar', Heb. hammelsar is either a proper name, Bab. amelu-uṣur '(Bel) protect (thy) servant' or a title denoting a particular office, perhaps 'keeper, warden'. 14-16. As the result was satisfactory, Malasar kept them on a vegetarian diet. God's intervention is naturally implied.

17-20 Daniel and his Companions introduced to the King—17.

God rewarded the youths' steadfast attachment to their religion by an extraordinary wisdom. This wisdom was not the superstitious art of divination (5), but the knowledge of those moral and practical principles that were necessary for the high positions which they were later to occupy. Daniel in particular was endowed with the power of interpreting dreams and visions. This remark is a prelude to the following narratives and serves also to stress the fact that Daniel's exceptional skill was not the result of his training in the literature of the Chaldeans but the gift of God. The science of dreams was highly appreciated in a country where so much importance was attached to them. 18. At the end of the three years they were introduced to the king who (19) after conversing with them found them superior to all the others, and chose them as his personal attendants. 20. Whatever the king asked them, they invariably proved far superior to all the magicians and enchanters in his realm. The superiority of the God of the Israelites is implicitly asserted.

21 does not necessarily imply that Daniel died in the 1st year of Cyrus, as this is contradicted by 10:1. These chronological indications are very probably editorial additions; see note to 10:1.

II Nabuchodonosor's Dream—The object of the dream 497a is to show how all earthly kingdoms will pass away and upon their ruins God will set up a universal and everlasting kingdom. Though the king did not understand the meaning of his dream, he acknowledged the superiority of Daniel's God. The story is parallel to that of Pharaoh and Joseph, Gen 41.

1-12 The Magicians unable to interpret the King's b Dream—1.

The date is inconsistent with 1:5, 18. In the second year of Nabuchodonosor Daniel and his companions had not yet completed their course of education, and could not therefore be involved in the condemnation of the wise men (13). The difficulty is not solved by the assumption of a double year of reckoning which would make Nabuchodonosor's second year coincide with the third year of Daniel's education (Goettsberger, p 19; Driver, p 17). Other interpreters introduce textual changes and read sixth instead of second (Montgomery, p 141), or twelfth (Linder, p 133; *Marti, p 7; *Farrar, pp 143 ff.). The date is probably an interpolation. Nabuchodonosor had a dream which agitated his mind and interrupted his sleep. Dreams were regarded by many peoples of antiquity as divine communications, and their meaning was therefore a matter of the greatest importance. The Babylonians, the Assyrians, and the Egyptians had professional dream-interpreters. 2f. The king summoned the whole class of magicians, enchanters, sorcerers and Chaldeans and requested them to tell him his dream and its interpretation. It has been supposed that the king had really forgotten his dream, and that only a vague and confused impression was left in his mind (Knab.). Probably the king simply pretended to have forgotten his dream only to test the magicians' skill. Naturally the magicians were unable to meet the king's first demand. The word 'Syriac' in 4 is a gloss based on the false assumption that Syriac, i.e. Aramaic, was the language of the Chaldeans. The change from Hebrew into Aramaic in 4b cannot therefore be due to a writer living in the 6th century B.C. 5f. The king insisted that they should recount the dream themselves. 'The word from me is sure', i.e. I proclaim an irrevocable sentence: 'If you will not tell me the dream and its interpretation, you shall be cut into pieces and 497a your houses shall be made a dunghill'. Although the severity of the punishment was in accordance with the times, we must not imagine the king as an insensate despot making impossible demands. He believed that an exceptionally important divine communication had been made to him, and wanted to make sure that there was no falsehood in the magicians' interpretation. The threats were, however, balanced by the promise of great rewards if they succeeded in telling the dream and its interpretation. 7-9. The reason for the king's unusual demand is now made clear. He felt that the dream portended some very important event, and in order to have a guarantee of the truth of the interpretation he insisted that the magicians, endowed, as they were believed to be, with an extraordinary wisdom, should tell him his dream. He repeated his threats. The sentence is irrevocably given. In vain do you seek to gain time to have an opportunity to concoct a false interpretation. 10 f. In order to defend themselves the magicians put forward two arguments: (i) no monarch had ever made such a demand to his magicians; (ii) no human being, but the gods alone who do not dwell upon earth, can satisfy the king's demand. Implicitly they acknowledged a superhuman wisdom in Daniel, who later told the dream and its interpretation.

e 12 f. The King's Order—The king burst out into anger and ordered that all the wise men should be slain. A decree was issued to that effect.

f 14-23 Daniel promises to interpret the Dream—14 f. On that occasion Daniel displayed remarkable prudence and discretion. He immediately sought Arioch, the chief of the royal bodyguard, and inquired the reason of this decree. It may appear strange that Daniel, though found to be ten times wiser than all the magicians of Babylon (1:20) was not summoned with the other wise men. But it must be remarked that Daniel is consistently separated from the king's magicians, and is introduced only when they fail (cf. 4:3-5; 5:7-13). His wisdom is a gift from God, not a superstitious art. His separateness reflects God's separateness from, and superiority to, the gods of the Chaldeans. 16 raises a serious difficulty. Daniel could not enter the king's presence without being introduced, as is expressly stated in 25. The difficulty is removed by deleting with Theodotion the words 'went in and' and reading: 'Daniel desired of the king', etc. 17 f. Daniel communicated the matter to his companions, and urged them to pray that the merciful God might reveal to them this secret and deliver them from impending death. The LXX add 'fasting and penitence' to prayer. 19-23. God answered their prayer, and Daniel praised God, confessing his wisdom, his might, his providence, his sovereign power over all kings, his unlimited knowledge and his favour towards them.

g 24-28a Daniel introduced before the King—24. Having the king's secret in his hands, Daniel requested to be brought in before him. 25. Arioch immediately introduced Daniel, who, 26, declared to the king, 27, 28a, that though the wise men could not answer the king's demand, there was a God in heaven who could reveal all secrets and who had in reality revealed future events to the king. The expression 'in the latter times' denotes the Messianic age (cf. Is 2:2; Mich 4:1). Therefore the revelation refers ultimately to the establishment of the Messianic kingdom on earth.

h 28b-35 The King's Dream—29. Daniel refers to the natural causes which gave shape to the king's dream. After the fall of the Assyrian empire and the collapse of the Egyptian forces in Syria Nabuchodonosor, who was then ruling over a vast and powerful kingdom, was one night pondering over future conquests or the possibility of hostile attacks. As all his speculations proved fruitless, God revealed to him in a dream what was to happen till a far distant future. 30. Daniel will tell this portentous dream not because of any superior natural wisdom, but only in order that the king may know the meaning of his dream. 31-35. The dream was this: The king saw a colossal and extraordinarily bright statue standing before him; its appearance was terrible. The head was of fine gold; the breast and the arms of silver; the abdomen and the hips of bronze; the legs of iron and the feet partly of iron and partly of clay. While he was wondering at that statue, a stone was cut out from a mountain without any human agency and smote the statue on its feet, breaking it to pieces. Nothing was left of the statue; the fragments were carried away by the wind, and the stone became a great mountain filling the earth.

36-45 The Interpretation of the Dream—36. The plural 'we' refers probably to Daniel and his companions, but cf. for the use of the plural 2 Cor 1:4-14. 37 f. The golden head symbolized Nabuchodonosor's kingdom, a powerful and a glorious kingdom. The title 'king of kings' was common in the Persian age; cf. Esd 7:12. Nabuchodonosor is represented with a certain rhetorical exaggeration as a universal king who, however, has received his kingdom from God. Nabuchodonosor was in reality the greatest king of the Neo-Babylonian dynasty with which he is here identified. 39 f. The other metals symbolize three other successive kingdoms. The second is described simply as inferior to Nabuchodonosor (omit 'of silver', 39); the third as ruling over all the earth, and the fourth will be strong and destructive as iron. 41 f. The composite structure of the feet and toes—iron and clay—indicates that the fourth kingdom will be divided into two parts of unequal power of resistance. 43. An attempt will be made by intermarriages, to give a greater stability to the two rival kingdoms, but alliance will prove as unsuccessful as the intermingling of iron and clay. 44 f. When all those kingdoms are overthrown, God will set up another kingdom different from all the others. It will be indestructible and eternal, it will ever be in the hands of one people, and will supersede all earthly kingdoms. It appears from 44 that the fifth kingdom will be set up while the other four are still standing. But both the simultaneous destruction of the four kingdoms and the appearance of a fifth kingdom 'in the days of those kingdoms' are details required by the nature of the image not by its meaning. Daniel solemnly affirms the truth of this interpretation.

46-49 Acknowledgement of God's Superiority and Elevation of Daniel and his Companions—46. The king deeply impressed by this interpretation and recognizing a superhuman knowledge in Daniel, bowed down to him and ordered that divine honours be given to him. It is idle to inquire how such a strict monotheist as Daniel could accept divine honours, or whether he accepted them at all. The writer's concern is to emphasize Nabuchodonosor's acknowledgement of the supremacy of Daniel's God, an acknowledgement manifested outwardly by the homage paid to Daniel, God's representative. St Jerome (ad loc.) pointedly remarks that the king worshipped not so much Daniel as God in Daniel, and refers to Acts 14:10-17 and to a similar fact related by Josephus in Ant 11, 8, 5. 47. The titles 'a god of gods' and 'a lord of kings' must be taken here in a polytheistic sense. 48. Nabuchodonosor kept his promise (6), and bestowed rich gifts on Daniel. He also promoted him to the post of governor of the most important province of Babylon, and made him chief of the whole guild of magicians. This last office simply stresses Daniel's superior skill in the interpretation of dreams without implying necessarily that he practised magical arts. 49. Daniel did not forget his companions. At his request they were appointed to high offices in the province of Babylon, while he remained at court as the king's chancellor. For the expression 'in the gate of the king' cf. Est 2:19, 21; 3:2.

Appendix I. Historical Meaning of the Dream—It is universally admitted that the four kingdoms symbolized by the four metals are four historical kingdoms, but there is no agreement about the identification of the kingdoms. The theory prevalent in Catholic exegesis 498a and which is already found in St Jerome (PL 25, 504, 530) identifies them as: 1. Neo-Babylonian; 2. Medo-Persian; 3. Greek; 4. Roman. Non-Catholic commentators, with a few exceptions, identify them as: 1. Neo-Babylonian; 2. Median; 3. Persian; 4. Greek. Amongst recent Catholic interpreters there is a growing tendency to identify them as: 1. Neo-Babylonian; 2. Medo-Persian; 3. Alexander; 4. Alexander's successors; Lagrange, RB (1904) 503 f.; D. Buzy, Les symboles de l'Ancien Testament, 1923, pp 266-80 = RB (1918) 403-26; M. Becher, VD (1924), 206-10; L. Dennefeld, Le Messianisme, 1929, p 173; J. Chaine, Introduction à la lecture des prophètes, 1932, p 260.

b As none of these theories is free from difficulties we must try to establish certain facts. It is generally agreed that the four kingdoms of ch 2 are identical with those of ch 7. It is also universally admitted that the first kingdom is the Neo-Babylonian or the reign of Nabuchodonosor, the greatest representative of the Neo-Babylonian dynasty. The fourth kingdom of ch 7 cannot be the Roman empire, because the beast symbolizing it is slain before the establishment of the Messianic kingdom. Even in ch 2 the Messianic kingdom is represented as following the destruction of the statue. The fourth kingdom of ch 7 is certainly the Greek empire, the identification resting mainly on the identity of the fourth beast with the he-goat of ch 8, which symbolizes the Greek empire (8:21). Both beasts are characterized by a small horn growing greater and stronger and making war against the holy people.

c While upholding the Greek theory with many Catholic interpreters, we disagree with them in their separation of Alexander's reign from that of his successors. The Jews made no such distinction. For them there was only one Greek empire represented mainly by Antiochus IV. As the horns are a natural feature of the beast, the domination of Alexander's successors must be considered as a part of one empire and not as a separate empire symbolized by a different beast. Moreover, since in ch 8 the Medo-Persian empire is represented as one empire symbolized by one beast, so must it be represented by one beast or by one metal in the other visions. Any attempts therefore, to split up the Medo-Persian empire into two separate and successive kingdoms is against the writer's view of history. For an exhaustive discussion of the various theories, see H. H. Rowley, pp 61-173, where the view current in Protestant exegesis is strongly defended.

d On account of the difficulties which confront all these theories one feels inclined to ask whether the number four is a historical number or rather, to a certain extent, schematic (Junker, p 9). In fact, Daniel seems to be predicting not a definite number of historical kingdoms, but all the historical kingdoms, whatever their number, from Nabuchodonosor to the establishment of the kingdom of God. These kingdoms are distributed into four periods, and in 7:2 are related to the four winds which have certainly a meaning of universality (cf. Zach 6:1, 5; Apoc 7:1). The schematic plan is also evinced by the fact that the writer displays no interest in the second and third kingdoms. He gives no clue for their identification. Their only function in the writer's plan is to succeed one kingdom and be succeeded by another. Therefore it is at least probable that, while the first and fourth kingdoms represent two definite and historical kingdoms, the second and third are intended to fill up the period intervening between the fall of Babylon and the Greek domination. A similar interpretation has been proposed by St Augustine for the ten horns in 7:7, which, according to him represented all the kings of the Roman empire (De Civ. Dei 20, 22; PL 41, 695 f.).

e Appendix II The Messianic Kingdom—Catholic exegesis has from very early times identified the fifth kingdom symbolized by the stone with the Messianic kingdom. There seems to be an allusion to the Messianic interpretation in Hermas, Similitudes, 9, 2.12. The Church has made extensive use of Daniel in the office of Christ the King. The Messianic kingdom is described as a 498e spiritual or divine, universal and eternal kingdom. The destruction of the hostile powers is not necessarily simultaneous, but a time will come when all opposition will be overcome and the Church of Christ will spread over all the earth. The kingdom of Christ must be considered in both its earthly and its heavenly stage. The sensus plenior of the prophecy includes all the stages of development of the Church until its consummation in heaven.

Although the coming of the Messianic kingdom is f closely associated with the collapse of the fourth kingdom, which we have identified with the Greek empire, we must not take this chronological succession in a strict sense. Future events are generally revealed without any distinct indication of their dates, and consequently the Messianic future is, not infrequently, represented as following immediately upon historical events which in reality are separated from it by a long interval. Therefore we must not infer that Daniel expected the foundation of the Messianic kingdom immediately after the fall of the fourth kingdom. The expression 'in the days of those kingdoms' has no strict chronological bearing on the establishment of the Messianic kingdom, see note to 2:44.

III—The object of this chapter is twofold: (i) to 499a illustrate the uniqueness and supremacy of the God of the Israelites; (ii) to lay down a rule of religious conduct, namely, the faithful must choose martyrdom before apostasy. For later references to the story see 1 Mac 2:59; Hb 11:34.

1-7 The Erection and Dedication of the Golden Idol—1. b

In the LXX and Theodotion the story is dated 'in the eighteenth year of Nabuchodonosor'. This date corresponds to the 19th year of Nabuchodonosor according to the Jewish system of computation, the year of the fall of Jerusalem (2 Kg 25:8; Jer 52:12). If the date is genuine, the statue was probably erected to celebrate the king's victories and to honour the patron-god of Babylon. The statue was very likely a colossal stele partly sculptured at the top and overlaid with gold. The dimensions, c 90 feet in height and c 9 feet in breadth, are to be referred to both the part presenting human lineaments and to the pedestal. The image was erected outside the city of Babylon, in the plain of Dura. 2f. For the ceremony of the solemn dedication of the statue the king summoned all the high officials of his kingdom among whom were naturally Daniel's companions. A great crowd was also present. 4-7. A proclamation was then made that as soon as the signal should be given all were to fall down and worship the statue. Disobedience would be punished by burning. The furnace was probably a lime-kiln with an opening at the top for the escape of smoke (22), and another at the bottom for supplying the furnace with fuel. There is an allusion to a similar form of punishment in Jer 29:22.

8-12 The Accusation against the three Jews—Daniel's c companions refused to obey the king's order. On seeing this some of the Chaldeans or magicians (see 1:4) stimulated by jealousy, maliciously slandered (lit. 'ate the pieces of') the Jews who stood so high in the king's favour. The reason why Daniel has no part in this story may be either that the Chaldeans were afraid of him on account of his very high position, or that he was not present at the ceremony.

13-18 The Jews' Courage and Faith—13f. The king, d wishing to prove the truth of this charge, ordered the Jews to be brought before him, and inquired whether they really refused to worship his god. 15. It was not a mere inquiry; it was a command; and the Jews were once more ordered to bow down and worship the statue under penalty of being burnt alive. If the statue was erected after the capture of Jerusalem (see 1), it was certainly intended to express the superiority of Bel over Yahweh, a superiority which is clearly implied in Nabuchodonosor's defiant words: 'Who is the God that will deliver you from my hands?' The inconsistency of these words with Nabuchodonosor's

499d recognition of the God of Daniel as the God of gods and the Lord of kings (2:47) is perfectly compatible with the polytheistic belief of Nabuchodonosor.

6 16. To the king's command they replied unhesitatingly: We have no need to answer thee concerning this matter. They believed in God and trusted in him, and refused to discuss the question whether he could deliver them. The king had challenged God's power, but their faith remained unshaken. 17. They expressed their loyal attachment to their God in the most explicit terms: 'Whether our God, whom we worship, is able to save. . . 18. or not, be it known to thee, O king. . . ' These words do not imply a doubt about God's power, but are to be understood from the king's point of view. Whether God is able, as we believe, or not, as you think.

f 19-23 The three Jews in the Burning Furnace—19. On hearing this the king's countenance was disfigured with rage. He ordered that the furnace, one of the many brick-kilns round the town, should be heated seven times more than was necessary for ordinary purposes. 20f. The strongest men of the army were then commanded to bind the three Jews clad as they were in their mantles, their tunics, and their head-gears, and throw them into the fiery furnace. 22f. While they were being thrown in, the executioners perished in the flames that were fiercely bursting forth through the top opening of the kiln.

g 24-30 The Miraculous Deliverance of the three Jews—This section is not found in MT; cf. § 494f. It consists of three parts: the prayer of Azarias (25-45), a historical interlude (46-50), a song of praise and thanksgiving (51-90).

h 24-45 The Prayer of Azarias—This is a confession of the Israelites' sins and God's justice and a prayer for deliverance. For similar confessions cf. 9:4-19; Neh 9:6-37; Bar 1:15-3:8. It is out of its historical context. Azarias could not possibly stand up in the midst of the flames unless the flames had been rendered harmless, but it was in v 50 that the angel in response to Azarias' prayer 'made the midst of the furnace like the blowing of a wind', and then the three Jews broke out in a hymn of praise. There are some textual variations between LXX and Theodotion. The prayer was probably made while the men were being bound and the furnace was being heated (Linder, p 193 f.). 24 reads better after 50. 25. The words 'in the midst of the fire' have been added to make the prayer fit in with its present context. 26-28. God deserves all praise because he is just in all his dealings with his people, just in his commandments, in his punishments, in his warnings, in his threats and promises; cf. Deut 32:4. 29f. Azarias confesses the people's sins: apostasy from God and transgression of his law, 31, and the justice of God's punishments. 32f. The people, for their sins, were given up into the hands of their godless enemies, and particularly into the hands of Nabuchodonosor, the most wicked of all; confusion and shame have befallen the servants and worshippers of God, who cannot even express their grief. 34-36. Azarias implores God's mercy and forgiveness. Total extermination of the people would mean a breach of God's covenant with the Patriarchs and consequently bring disrespect upon his name. 37-40. He describes in moving terms the miserable condition of the people. They were reduced to a contemptible number; they had none to govern them, no prophets, no temple, no liturgical service whereby they could propitiate God. The only thing they could offer was a contrite and humble heart, which they hoped would have the same propitiatory effect as the Levitical sacrifices. The words 'there is no prophet' seem to point to the Maccabean age when there were no prophets (1 Mac 4:46). But though both Jeremiah and Ezechiel were still living when Jerusalem was captured, the episode may have been written when the two prophets were dead, and there was none who could speak in the name of God. 41. Repentance is accompanied by the purpose of a new life. 42-45. At last they appeal to God's goodness and mercy, praying him to deliver them from their enemies, to bring shame and disgrace upon their oppressors in order that all may know that he is the only God on all the earth. Although the prayer hardly fits in with its historical context, it cannot be said to be inconsistent with it. It is a national, penitential prayer, which may well be applied to the three Jews. Azarias is speaking on behalf of his people. He identifies himself with his people, and prays God to deliver them from their enemies.

46-50 Historical Interlude—46-48 are, very probably, a duplicate account of 22f. derived from another source. There is therefore no contradiction between the two passages. Theodotion, from whom this section is derived, omits v 22 in which the death of the executioners is recorded. The apparent contradiction in Vg is due to the fact that St Jerome has combined in his translation two texts, the Aramaic text and Theodotion's Greek version. 49f. are the sequel to 45. In response to Azarias' prayer the angel of the Lord came down into the furnace with the three Jews—the prayer having been made while they were being bound (see § 499h)—produced a cool breeze in the midst of the burning furnace, and they were unscathed by the flames. The miraculous deliverance is represented as being due to the angel's driving the flames out of the furnace. This, however, is rather a popular representation of God's protective power and omnipotence.

51-90 The Song of the Three Children—This is a litany psalm, as Ps 135, made up of two parts, distinguished from one another both by their contents and the form of the responsory. The first part, 52-56 with 57, is read in the Sunday office at Lauds II; the other part, or 57-88b, with two additional verses and without the responsories, is read in the Sunday office at Lauds I. The responsories are probably liturgical additions (Liber Psalm. cum cant. Brev. Rom., Romae, 1945, 338). We need not suppose that the song was composed by the young men themselves. They may have simply recited a hymn of praise which they had learned before; there is, therefore, no contradiction between 53 and 38.

51-56. They praise the God of their fathers, the God of the covenant, who has manifested his sanctity and magnificence by his presence in the temple of Jerusalem and on the throne of Israel, an all-seeing and all-knowing God whose heavenly throne rests on the cherubim (Ez 1:10; 11:22), and whose glory fills the heavens.

57-90. This is an invitation to all creatures to praise God. 57. The works of the Lord are the works of creation, i.e. all created things which are enumerated in the following verses from the angels and heavens to the earth and men, and ultimately to the three Jews.

58. The angels, the noblest of all creatures, lead the chorus of praise. Vg follows LXX, but in Theodotion 58 and 59 change places. 59-73. The heavens, the abode of rain (Gen 1:7) and all the celestial bodies, the sun and the moon, the stars, showers and dew, the winds, fire and heat, cold and frost (LXX), dew and hoar-frost, frost and cold, ice and snow, night and day, light and darkness, lightnings and clouds are next called upon to praise the Lord. The two pairs, 'cold and frost' and 'dew and hoar-frost' in 67 and 68 are omitted by the Vatican MS of Theodotion, and very probably are to be deleted as repetitions.

74-81. The earth with its mountains and hills, its vegetation, its fountains, its seas and rivers, and all that moves in the waters, its birds, its beasts and cattle join in this hymn of praise. 82-87. Man comes last and in this order: all men in general, the people of Israel, the priests, the ministers of the Lord, the righteous people, the pious and oppressed worshippers of God. 88-90. Conclusion. It is strange that the three Jews should be addressed in the second person and referred to in the first person in the same verse. Reading the first person throughout the sense would be: Let us all, now and forever, praise God who has delivered us from the abode of the dead and from 499a impending death, from the midst of the flames, from the midst of the fire (note the parallelism). 89 is a well-known liturgical versicle; cf. 1 Par 16:34, 41; 2 Par 7:3, 6; etc. 90. A last invitation to praise God is made to all the worshippers of the true God, whether Israelites or Gentiles.

p 91-97 (Aram. 24-30) The King's Recognition of the True God—91 (24). The king was sitting opposite to the side-opening of the furnace watching the execution of the sentence. On seeing four men walking in the furnace he was astonished and rising up from his seat asked his ministers whether it was not the fact that three men had been thrown into the furnace. Theodotion and LXX add that the king heard the men singing. 92 (25). The causes of the king's astonishment were: there were four men instead of three; their bonds had been burnt away and they were walking freely in the midst of the fire; they were uninjured by the flames; the fourth man looked like a son of the gods, i.e. an angel (so expressly LXX). All this becomes perfectly understandable if 49 f. are considered as a part of the original narrative. 93 (26). What the ministers' reply was we are not told. Naturally they did not know more than the king himself. Hence the king was bound to attribute the deliverance of the three men to a divine intervention, and called them out of the furnace, addressing them as the 'servants of the Most High God'. Nabuchodonosor recognized the God of the Israelites as the supreme god, but not necessarily as the Only God. 94 (27). Then all the high officials gathered around the three Jews, and were astonished that they had not even the smell of burning on them. The truth of the miracle was thus evidenced by the king and his ministers. 95 (28). The king extolled the God of the Israelites, who had protected his faithful servants, and praised the courage of the three young men who had frustrated his order and faced death itself that they might not depart from their God. 96 (29). Nabuchodonosor once more recognized the power of the Israelites' God and his supremacy, and issued a decree threatening with the most severe punishment those who should speak against this God. The king's confession is that of a polytheist who believes in one god without excluding others. 97 (30). The three Jews were reinstated in their former posts.

500a 98 (31)—IV 15. Nabuchodonosor's Second Dream—

This episode is another illustration of the supremacy of the God of Israel recognized by a heathen king. 98-100 (31-33). The royal proclamation, though placed at the beginning of the narrative, is in reality the result of the king's psychical experiences related later. After addressing all his subjects who, according to diplomatic style, are represented as dwelling in all the earth (cf. 6:25), the king manifests his intention to make known the wonderful deeds of God, the Most High (cf. 3:93). The body of the edict is made up of two couplets after the manner of the Hebrew Psalms (cf. Ps 144 [145] 13), and betrays a Jewish origin.

b IV 1-4. After having extended his conquests as far as Egypt and embellished Babylon with magnificent streets and buildings, Nabuchodonosor was enjoying a quiet life, and was 'flourishing in his palace' as a mighty tree stretching forth its boughs far and wide. The date 'in the eighteenth year', given by LXX is an insertion from 3:1. One night the king was, perhaps, complacently imagining himself or his capital Babylon to be like a mighty cedar tree affording shade and shelter to men and beasts. For the comparison of a powerful empire with the cedar tree cf. Ez 31:3-9. Then he saw a dream which was, naturally, provoked by his heated imagination, but the meaning of which he could not understand. The magicians were unable to interpret the dream. The fact that Daniel, who had been made chief of the magicians (2:48), was not consulted first, as was to be expected, is meant to emphasize Daniel's independence of, and superiority to, all the idolatrous and superstitious wise men of Babylon (see notes to 2:14-28a, 48).

51. As the magicians were unable to interpret the dream, Daniel was at last called before the king. Daniel's Babylonian name Baltassar, Heb. Bēlṣaṣṣar, is linked up with the name of the Babylonian god Bel, which, very probably, was originally a component element of Daniel's full name Bēl-balāṣu-uṣur ' (Bel) protect his life'. Daniel is described as being possessed of 'the spirit of the holy gods', considered as a source of inward illumination (cf. Gen 41:38). 6b must be read, with Theodotion: 'hear the visions and tell the interpretation of them'. 7-15. The king relates his dream. He saw a mighty tree which grew higher and stronger, till it reached to heaven and extended over all the earth. It afforded nourishment and shelter to all the beasts and fowl of the earth. While the king was wondering at that tree, a holy 'watcher' came down from heaven. The term 'watcher' or better 'wakeful one' denotes an angel, the angels being ever vigilant and ready to perform God's commands (St Jerome ad loc.). This appellation first occurs in Daniel, but became common in later literature. In the apocryphal book of Enoch angels are called 'holy watchers' (15:9), 'watchers of heaven' (12:4; 13:10). The angel with a loud voice ordered the tree to be cut down. But a stump was to be left encircled with a metal clamp. The last figure most likely marks a transition from allegory to reality. As the cutting down of the tree symbolizes the calamity which was to befall the king, the metal band must certainly refer to the physical restraint imposed upon him or to the iron bonds with which he had to be bound during his madness. The king, not the symbolic tree, will feed on the grass of the field, be wet with the dew, and dwell among the wild beasts (omit 'in the grass of the earth', 12). His heart, which according to Hebrew psychology is the organ of intellect, will be made like that of a beast. This state will last seven years, a time expression denoting a period of an unspecified duration. The king's doom is irrevocably fixed by God at the request of the holy watchers, who form a sort of divine council (cf. 3 Kg 22:19 ff.; Job 1-2). The scope of the angels' demand was the manifestation of the sovereignty of God, who alone had the power to set up kings on the throne and to raise up over the earthly kingdoms even the humblest of men. Having related his dream, the king pathetically requested Daniel to give its interpretation.

16-24 The Interpretation of the Dream—16. On hearing the ominous dream, Daniel, to whom God had revealed its meaning, was for a while appalled or perplexed at having to announce to the king his impending calamity. The king perceived his embarrassment and encouraged him to speak out. Daniel began by expressing the desire that the disasters portended by the dream might be averted from him and fall upon his enemies. 17-19. Then he proceeded to interpret the dream. The tree symbolized the king as the personification of a vast and powerful empire. 20-22. As the tree was cut down, so will the king fall from his pride and glory; he will be driven away from his city into the wilderness where he will live in company with the beasts and in a beastlike manner until he recognizes that God, the Most High, the true and only God, is the supreme ruler and that it is from him, not from other deities, that kings receive their power. 23. The stump left in the earth symbolizes the king's restoration to power which will follow his recognition of the divine origin of all human power. 'Heaven' is a metonym for God common in later Judaism; cf. 1 Mac 3:18, 19, 50, 60, etc. 24. Then Daniel advised the king to atone for his iniquities by good works and alms-giving; by this means God would perhaps prolong the king's prosperity. The theological doctrine of the meritoriousness of good works is clearly implied; cf. Tob 4:11; 12:9.

25-34 The Fulfilment of the Dream—25-27. The king did not give heed to Daniel's warning, and the doom, which had been foretold, fell on him. After a twelve-month respite for repentance Nabuchodonosor was one

500g day walking upon the roof of his palace in Babylon and admiring the great city and the magnificent buildings which he had erected. He was a great builder, and his utterance in 27 is reminiscent of the high-flown expressions by which he records his architectural achievements. His inscriptions contain the following phrases: 'My dear Babylon, the city which I love'; 'the palace, the wonder of the people, the seat of royalty; the abode of happiness'. 28f. The king had no sooner uttered the boastful words than a mysterious voice announced to him the immediate fulfilment of the dream. 30. At that very moment he was seized by a sudden attack of mania and had to be driven out to dwell with the beasts in the open fields. Nabuchodonosor's malady is scientifically known as 'lycanthropy' or 'insania zoonthropica', a form of insanity in which the patient imagines himself to be a beast and behaves like a beast. The king's external appearance became, to a certain extent, similar to that of a beast. His unkempt hair grew thick and rough like an eagle's feathers, and his uncut and hooked nails like claws. 31f. At the end of an unspecified period of time (see 22) Nabuchodonosor recovered his human consciousness. He lifted up his eyes to heaven and his reason was restored to him. He then praised the living God, acknowledging his everlasting domination and kingdom, the worthlessness of all men, God's irresistible power in heaven and on earth and the helplessness of all men before him. The ideas expressed here by the king occur in other books; cf. 31b and Ps 144 (145) 13; 32a and Is 40:17; 32b and Is 24:21; 32c and Is 43:13; 45:9; Job 9:12; Eccles 8:4. 33. The king was welcomed back to his kingdom by his ministers, reinstated in his former majesty and splendour, and restored to even greater glory. 34. In the final doxology the king recognizes the justness of God, who punishes those who, like himself, walk haughtily before him. As has been remarked at the beginning of this chapter, the royal proclamation in 3:98-100 is the chronological sequel to ch 4. This, however, is not a sufficient reason for transposing 3:98-100 after 4:34. The writer has preferred a logical to a chronological nexus.

1 Appendix—Nabuchodonosor's Madness. Against the historicity of this chapter it is objected by non-Catholic interpreters that (i) there is no historical evidence of Nabuchodonosor's insanity in contemporary documents; (ii) the narrative serves a didactic purpose.

J To these objections it is replied: (i) there is no reason for supposing that Nabuchodonosor could not suffer from the particular form of insanity which is described in ch 4, and which is indisputably attested by medical observation; (ii) we possess no complete biography of Nabuchodonosor; contemporary documents hardly record anything else except his architectural achievements, and we must not expect the royal scribes to record the weaknesses of their royal masters; (iii) a story about Nabuchodonosor, bearing a certain resemblance to the biblical account and accredited by some interpreters, is told by Megasthenes (c 300 B.C.), and preserved by Eusebius (Praep. ev. IX 41; PG 21, 761); (iv) the didactic character of a narrative is by no means inconsistent with its historicity. The view held by some recent commentators (Riessler, p 44; Goettsberger, p 41) that Nabuchodonosor in ch 4 stands for Nabonidus who, for some years, lived in retirement in the Arabian city of Tema is not probable.

501a V Baltassar and the Fall of Babylon.—This chapter is remarkable for its historical difficulties. On reading it without any reference to other historical information one will hardly escape the impression that Baltassar (Belshazzar) was the sole supreme ruler of Babylon; that he was the son of Nabuchodonosor; that he held a festival on the eve of the fall of Babylon, and was slain on that night, and that he was succeeded by Darius the Mede.

b All this is inconsistent with the available historical information. In the inscriptions Baltassar is invariably called 'the son of the king', but never 'the king'. It appears that he was never elevated to the throne either as co-regent with his father or as subordinate king. The statement which is met with in the inscriptions that Nabonidus entrusted the kingship to Baltassar does not imply more than a delegation of a limited power to be exercised during the king's absence from the capital (S. Smith, Babylonian Historical Texts, 1924, pp 84, 88). Moreover Baltassar, so far as contemporary evidence goes, was neither the son nor the grandson of Nabuchodonosor, nor was he in any way related to him. Lastly, it is unlikely that a king would hold such a festival when the invading army of the Persians was approaching Babylon and many cities had already fallen to the enemy. From the Nabonidus-Cyrus Chronicle we learn that the troops of Cyrus entered Babylon without fighting. After some weeks Cyrus himself entered the city proclaiming peace to all (H. Gressmann, Altorient. Texte zum A.T., 1926², p 368). There is nothing in the cuneiform records suggesting that Babylon offered any resistance to the Persians, and that Baltassar was killed in battle. The succession of Darius the Mede is definitely contradicted by all we know of the history of that period. See on the whole question H. H. Rowley, The Historicity of the fifth chapter of Daniel, JTS (1931) 12-31.

d Those who uphold the historicity of the narrative argue at length that since Baltassar was invested with royal authority, he could well be called king, though in point of fact he is never so called in the inscriptions. Moreover, though there is no evidence of a blood relationship between Nabuchodonosor and Baltassar, it is reasonable to suppose that Nabonidus, Baltassar's father, and a usurper of the throne of Babylon, had married a daughter of Nabuchodonosor or his widow in order to strengthen his position. S. Smith propounds the theory that queen Nitocris, mentioned by Herodotus, 1, 185, was the mother of Nabonidus, and became the wife of Nabuchodonosor after being deported from Harran to Babylon, Babylonian Historical Texts, 43-45. Nabonidus was consequently the son of Nabuchodonosor's wife, and in a legal sense the son of Nabuchodonosor. Consequently Baltassar was the grandson of the latter. As regards the capture of Babylon, the cuneiform documents have not preserved a full account of the event. But it seems to be established that the Persians entered the city during a night revel and that a prominent personage, perhaps Baltassar himself, died on that occasion (C. Boutflower, The Historical Value of Daniel v and vi, JTS [1915] 43-60, and In and Around the Book of Daniel, pp 114-41; B. Alfrink, Der letzte König von Babylon, Bi [1928] 187-205; *R. P. Dougherty, Nabonidus and Belshazzar, New-Haven, 1929; Linder, pp 244-52).

e Let us try to find a middle course. Baltassar certainly was not king, and it may be granted that he was not even co-regent with his father. But he was invested with a certain measure of royal authority, and consequently he could be called king at least in a sense corresponding to that limited degree of authority. To the popular mind Baltassar was the king of Babylon, especially in the absence of his father. Though, speaking with historical accuracy, the title was inappropriate, it can hardly be said to be untrue. This popular use of the royal title may have been determined by the didactic character of the narrative. Daniel's object was to draw a contrast between the proud but religious and repentant Nabuchodonosor and the sacrilegious, godless, and unrepentant Baltassar, and between the different fate which befell the two rulers. Nabonidus, the actual king, did not make a good contrast with Nabuchodonosor, and so his rôle had to be played by his son, who is therefore represented as king. This contrast explains also the reason why Baltassar is described as the son of Nabuchodonosor. We need not suppose that Nabonidus married Nabuchodonosor's widow or daughter. Baltassar's popular appellation of king made him a successor of Nabuchodonosor, who consequently was a predecessor 501f of Baltassar. This relation of 'predecessor-successor' which ordinarily but not necessarily implies that of 'ancestor-descendant' or 'father-son', seems to be the only one involved in Daniel's narrative. The question of the possibility of the festival may be dismissed in a few words. We do not know whether it was simply a state banquet or a religious feast which had to be kept in spite of adverse conditions. The circumstances of Baltassar's death are not known from cuneiform documents. The fact that the troops of Cyrus entered Babylon without fighting does not exclude the possibility that Baltassar was killed either by the Persians or by the Babylonians for some unknown reason. The question of Darius the Mede will be dealt with in the next chapter.

g 1-4 Baltassar's Feast—1. No indication is given of the occasion or the date of the feast. The date may be determined from 30 f. The fall of Babylon is now placed with certainty on the 16th of the month Tishri (= 12th October) of the year 539 B.C. The name of the king is Bēlšassar, Bab. Bel-šar-usur 'Bel protect the king', (Belshazzar) and must therefore be distinguished from the Babylonian name of Daniel. In Vg and DV Baltassar represents two different Babylonian names. See note on 1:7. The extraordinary number of guests was in accordance with the custom of oriental monarchs. The king was seated at a higher table facing the guests. 2-4. When he tasted the wine, not necessarily when he was drunk, he sacrilegiously ordered the sacred vessels of the temple of Jerusalem (1:2) to be brought into the banquet-hall. According to Babylonian custom women were admitted to these banquets, though under Persian and Greek rule they were not allowed to sit at table with men. The concubines were wives of an inferior rank. Insult was added to profanation when the sacred vessels were used for libations to the Babylonian gods amidst the songs and chants of the revellers.

h 5 f. The Writing on the Wall—5. When the revelry was at its height the king saw the appearance of a man's hand moving slowly upon the wall opposite to him and tracing some letters on the white plaster, which was lit up by candles. 6. At that sight he was alarmed, grew pale, and began to tremble so violently that his knees struck one against the other. We are not told whether the guests saw this vision, as the writer was not concerned with them.

i 7-9 The Magicians unable to read the Writing—The order of these verses seems to be disarranged, because the magicians are twice introduced to the king. W. Baumgartner in Kittel's Biblia Hebraica, 3rd ed., transposes 8a between 7a and 7b. The existing order, however, may be retained if we assume that the royal decree contained in 7b was brought to the magicians' knowledge by the king's ministers. Rewards were promised to the successful interpreter. Purple and the golden necklace were worn by persons of high rank; cf. Est 8:15 and the apocryphal 3 Esd 3:6. The meaning of the title 'third' is not clear. Some explain it as the third after Nabonidus and Belshazzar; others the third after the king and the queen-mother. But the Aramaic word talti (16, 29 taltā), which is apparently related to ʿlataʿa, Heb. šālīs 'third', is probably a loanword from Hittite šallīš, a word denoting a high official in close attendance on the king; cf. A. Cowley in JTS (1920) 326 f., Montgomery 256. The magicians were unable to explain the words, though presumably they could read them. The king's agitation increased and produced bewilderment and confusion among the guests.

j 10-16 Daniel before the King—10-12. The queen-mother, who was not with the king's wives mentioned in 2, entered the banquet-hall and advised the king to summon Daniel, a man whom she knew to be endowed with a divine spirit (see 4:5), and who, for his singular wisdom, was made chief of all the magicians by Nabuchodonosor (2:48), and from whom no secret was hidden. 13-16. Daniel was therefore brought before the king, to whom he appears to have been personally unknown. The king repeated his promises and declared the magicians' failure to read the writing.

17-28 Daniel Interprets the Writing—17. Daniel promised to read the writing, but refused to accept any gift from the impious king. 18-21. He recalled Nabuchodonosor's fate and his submission to God, the supreme ruler of all the earth (cf. 4:25-34). 22-24. He then reproached the king for his irreligious spirit. The doom was inexorable; no respite for repentance was offered. 25-28. The inscription on the wall was: mēnē, mēnē, ʿqēl uparšīn. The repetition of the first word and the plural ending of the last are not attested by Theod., Vg and Josephus (Ant 10, 11, 3), and are not held to be original by Charles and Montgomery, who believe that the words were originally vocalized as nominal forms mēnē, ʿqēl, p̄rās, and were interpreted by the Greek translators as passive participles. Hence the sense is: Number(ed): God has numbered the days of thy domination and brought them to a close. Weight (or weighed): weighed art thou in the balance of divine judgement and found wanting. Division (or divided): thy kingdom is divided or taken away from thee, and given to the Medes and Persians. This is the oldest interpretation which is already in Jerome. A recent interpretation, which is more common, though hardly more probable, reads the first word as a passive participle meaning 'numbered', and the other three as names of weights, mēnē being the equivalent of Heb. māneh, the mina; ʿqēl being the Aramaic form of Heb. šēqel, the shekel; and paršīn being the plural or dual of p̄rās, a late Jewish name for the half-mina. Hence the sense: Numbered: a mina, a shekel and (two) half-minas. The proportion of the weights is 60, 1, 30 + 30. The mina represents the flourishing reign of Nabuchodonosor; the shekel is Baltassar; the two half-minas are the Medes and Persians considered as one kingdom. So Riessler, Goettsberger, Linder, Marti, Driver, Boutflower, Bentzen. If the inscription contains a threat, as it certainly does, the first interpretation agrees better with the context.

29. The king keeps his promise and bestows rewards upon Daniel. There is no contradiction between 17 and 29. Daniel would not let himself be influenced by the promise of rewards in the interpretation of the mysterious writing.

30. The divine sentence was swiftly carried into effect. On that same night Baltassar, the last king of the Neo-Babylonian dynasty, was murdered, and the power passed into the hands of Darius the Mede.

Appendix—Darius the Mede. Darius the Mede is represented in 5:31 as the immediate successor of the last king of the Neo-Babylonian empire. Comparing this statement with 6:28, where Darius is mentioned before Cyrus, and with 11:1 where the 1st year of Darius is supposed to have preceded the 3rd year of Cyrus (10:1) it is inferred that the writer has interposed a Median empire between the Neo-Babylonian and the Persian, and a Median king ruling between Baltassar and Cyrus. This is a glaring misconception of history. There is indisputable historical evidence that Cyrus was the first king of Babylon after the collapse of the Neo-Babylonian dynasty. The Persian troops entered Babylon on the 16th of Tishri (= 12th October); Cyrus entered Babylon on the 3rd of Marchesvan (= 28th October), and in the contract tablets, the earliest of which is dated 24th Marchesvan (= 19th November) Cyrus is already called 'king of Babylon'. There is therefore no room for an interregnum following the fall of Babylon.

Some interpreters believe that the name Darius the Mede is a textual corruption or later addition, and that Darius Hystaspes is the real name of the king (M.-J. Lagrange, RB [1904] 501 f.; E. J. Kissane, The Irish Theological Quarterly [1919] 43-57; J. Goettsberger, p. 49). But the majority of Catholic interpreters retain the name, which recurs in 9:1 and 11:1, and endeavour to discover the person represented by that name. They argue that the man called Darius was not an independent sovereign, as the Aramaic text says simply that he received the kingdom, i.e. the 501n power, but not that he succeeded (Vg) to the throne of Baltassar. His position was therefore that of a governor or an associate king or a subordinate king. Consequently he is identified with Gobryas, the general who led the Persian army into Babylon (DBV art. Darius le Mède); with Cambyses, the son of Cyrus, whose name is sometimes associated with that of his father on the contract tablets and is called 'king of Babylon', while Cyrus is 'king of lands' (Boutflower, pp 142-67); with Astyages, the last king of Media, captured by Cyrus who, however, spared his life and appointed him governor or viceroy of Babylon (B. Alfrink, Darius Medus, Bi [1928] 316-40; Linder, pp 279-81); with Cyaxares, the son of Astyages, according to Xenophon, Cyr. I, 5, 2, etc. (Knabenbauer, pp 171-3). On all these identifications see H. H. Rowley, pp 7-53.

o Non-Catholic interpreters mostly try to find an explanation in the confused historical conceptions of the writer, who, living a long time after the events related by him, was unable to distinguish true historical facts from confused and distorted traditions (Marti, 42; Driver, 70; Charles, 139-46; Rowley, 54-60; Bentzen, 28 f.).

p While recognizing the insufficiency of any of the identification theories and refusing on the other hand to ascribe an historical error to the inspired writer, I feel inclined to admit the existence of a confused historical tradition attributable, however, to later editors, who have put together the separate episodes fitting them into a historical framework corresponding to the conceptions of their own time. That the book of Daniel has seriously suffered at the hands of copyists and editors is admitted by all, and though it is not always possible to distinguish additional elements, certain verses are so loosely connected with the context that they clearly betray their origin. Thus the name Darius the Mede in 12:1 is regarded as a gloss by some interpreters. The chronological indication in 10:1 betrays a late origin, and many other chronological indications are to be treated with reserve. That Darius the Mede is a creation of ignorant scribes has recently also been admitted by H. Höpfl-A. Miller-A. Metzinger, Introductio Specialis in V. Testamentum (1946⁴), 484 f.

b 1-9 (Aram 2-10) The Ministers' Plot against Daniel—1. Darius, obviously Darius the Mede previously mentioned, appointed 120 satraps or governors over his empire. Herodotus (III, 89) says that Darius Hystaspes (521-485 B.C.) divided the empire into 20 satrapies, but in Esther 1:1 Xerxes is said to have ruled over 127 provinces. 2. They were in charge of the king's revenue, and over them there were three chiefs, one of whom was Daniel. 3-5. Through the assistance of God Daniel distinguished himself by his ability and integrity and the king contemplated entrusting him with the administration of the whole empire. The two other ministers, who could not tolerate a foreigner being raised above them, plotted against his life. Since his conduct as a statesman was above suspicion, they devised a plan to bring his religious conduct into conflict with the law of the king. 6-9. They certainly knew that Daniel used to pray to his God at fixed hours. They therefore came in concert (6; so probably with Montgomery against Vg-DV 'craftily suggested' and the usual rendering 'rushed') to the king and requested him, apparently on behalf of all the governors, to issue an irrevocable decree to the effect that anyone who, for thirty days, should make petition to either god or man save to the king alone should be cast into the lions' pit. The unsuspecting king signed the decree. The object of the conspirators was to make Daniel appear before the king guilty of a capital offence.

502c They were not in any way concerned with the religious practices of the other subjects of the king, so we must not take into serious consideration certain questions, why, for example, Daniel was not consulted on this matter, or why the decree was to remain in force for thirty days only, a period which was insufficient for its promulgation throughout the whole empire. There are not sufficiently clear indications that the Persian kings considered themselves as gods; cf., however, Linder, p 286 and note 1. The irrevocability of the decree of a Persian king is attested by Est 1:19; 8:8. Lions were kept by the Assyrians and Persians for hunting.

10-13 (11-14) Daniel Faithful to his God—10. The jealous ministers having secured the king's assent hastened to inform Daniel. Daniel, however, was not daunted, but kept faithfully to his religious practices. The place for prayer was the upper room of the house (cf. Acts 1:13; 9:37, 39, etc.), having latticed windows. His face was turned towards Jerusalem, the dwelling-place of the God of the Israelites (3 Kg 8:48). In later times the three hours for prayer were: (i) early in the morning, at the time of the morning sacrifice; (ii) in the afternoon, about three o'clock, at the time of the evening sacrifice; (iii) in the evening at sunset (E. Schürer, A History of the Jewish people in the time of Jesus Christ, 2, 1 p 290, n 248). 11. At one of the fixed hours of prayer the two ministers went in concert (the same verb as in 6) to a place where they could see Daniel through the latticed window, and found him praying to his God. A practical illustration of the principle later proclaimed by St Peter: 'It is not just, in the sight of God, to hear man rather than God' (Ac 4:19). 12 f. They denounced him to the king immediately.

14-18 (15-19) Daniel Condemned to the Lions' Pit—14. e

The king felt sorely grieved that his able and loyal minister had fallen a victim to the plotters' jealousy through his own rashness, and strove all day to deliver him. But his pleading was of no avail. 15. The conspirators insisted on the irrevocability of the decree and demanded the death sentence against Daniel. 16. At last the king had reluctantly to yield. The death sentence was pronounced, and Daniel was cast into the lions' pit. The king hoped that God would deliver his servant. 17. The mouth of the pit was closed with a stone, which was then sealed with the signet-ring of the king and his ministers that nothing might be done concerning Daniel, i.e. that neither the king nor the ministers might tamper with the seals, lift up the stone, and rescue Daniel or kill him if uninjured by the lions. 18. The king went back to his palace, but his grief was so great that he refused all food and spent a sleepless night. The meaning of the Aramaic word for 'meat', Vg cibi, is uncertain. Other meanings equally doubtful are: 'musical instruments', 'dancing girls', 'concubines'. The general sense is that 'the king did not indulge in his usual diversions' (Driver, 77).

19-23 (20-24) Daniel Delivered—19 f. Early in the morning the king hastened to the pit and called Daniel with a sorrowful voice to find out whether God, the living God, could rescue his faithful servant. 21 f. Daniel was safe, and acknowledged the power and justice of God, who, through the agency of his angel, had rendered the lions harmless and thus rewarded the righteousness and faithfulness of the king's minister. For later references to Daniel's deliverance cf. 1 Mac 2:60; Heb 11:33. 23. The king's decree, which the ministers claimed could neither be repealed nor altered, was declared null and void by God himself. Daniel was brought out of the pit and, to the king's joy and astonishment, was found unharmed. The lions' den was a pit dug in the open air, having a lateral entrance closed with a stone and a partition wall with a door in it. A perpendicular shaft surrounded by a wall gave air and light to the lions' compartment. It was through this shaft that the king spoke to Daniel, but it was through the lateral entrance that Daniel was cast into, and brought out of, the pit.

502g 24 Daniel's Accusers Condemned—The punishment meted out to the false accusers was according to the principle of retaliation. But the slaughter of their families, though in conformity with primitive conceptions of justice (cf. 2 Kg 21:5-9) and Persian practices (Herod. III, 119) is against the principle of personal responsibility inculcated in Dt 24:16; Jer 31:29 f.; Ez 18. We are not to suppose that all the 120 governors with their families were thrown into the pit. The LXX are probably right in making the two colleagues of Daniel the only victims.

h 25-27 (26-28) The King's Acknowledgement of the God of Israel—The phraseology of the edict is very similar to that of Nabuchodonosor's edict in 3:98-100 and 4:31-34. Daniel's God was to be regarded as a living and ever-enduring God, whose sovereignty was not transferable, and who manifested his power by wonderful signs, especially by delivering Daniel from the lions. 28 (29) Conclusion—Daniel prospered in the reign of Darius and Cyrus. This closing remark at the end of the stories section is most likely due to the editor who collected the Daniel episodes narrated in the first part of the book; cf. 1:21.

503a VII-XII The Visions—This section is marked out from the preceding (chh 1-6) by a change in the literary form and the historical and prophetic outlook of the writer. The prophetic message is given in the form of visions, and develops at length a theme already foreshadowed in Nabuchodonosor's first dream, namely the destruction of all hostile powers and the establishment of a universal and abiding kingdom. The writer is not merely a theologian teaching the basic doctrine of the uniqueness and supremacy of the God of Israel, he is also and above all a prophet predicting the triumph of God over all the anti-theocratic powers, the establishment of a spiritual kingdom upon earth, and its glorious consummation in heaven. On account of their higher theological importance, the interpretation of the visions is represented as given by God through the ministry of an angel. Chronologically the visions run parallel with the episodes narrated in chh 5 and 6, but the chronological indications, which have no bearing on the meaning of the visions, may be later additions.

b VII The Vision of the Four World Empires—This vision is parallel to Nabuchodonosor's first dream. There are, however, appreciable differences between them. The writer's standpoint in ch 2 is the Babylonian age, in ch 7 it is the Maccabean age, or at least an age of religious persecution. In ch 2 Nabuchodonosor's glorious kingdom will be followed by successive periods of decadence leading to the setting up of a more glorious kingdom. In ch 7 this glorious kingdom will be preceded by an age of persecution and the extermination of a godless persecutor at the end of a succession of kingdoms. On the supposed mythological associations underlying the several features of the vision see H. Junker, pp 29-65.

c 1-8 The Vision—1. On Baltassar, king of Babylon, see § 501g. 1b read: And he wrote the dream. 2. In his night vision Daniel saw the four winds of heaven (cf. Zach 2:6; 6:5) stirring up the great sea, which is not the Mediterranean as in Jos 9:1, nor any other particular sea, but the world with its turbulent nations (cf. Is 17:12; Apoc 17:15). The winds represent the harmful forces, the disturbing influences, the enemies of peace and order coming from all directions. 3. Four monstrous and ravenous beasts, all different in appearance, came up from the sea. The connexion between these beasts and the evil powers which they represent is quite natural, and we need not go back to ancient mythology to explain it (cf. Is 27:1; 30:6; Ez 29:3). 4. The first beast was a lion with eagle's wings. The lion and the eagle symbolize the mightiest powers on earth. Representations of winged lions are common in Assyrian and Babylonian art. But its wings were plucked off, and it was made to stand erect upon two feet like a man, and a man's heart or intelligence was given to it. This last detail, which is a clear allusion to 4:13, has led interpreters to believe that the plucking off of the wings and the lifting up of the beast into an erect position denote the humanization of the beastlike king symbolized by the lion (Goettsberger, p 54; Dennefeld, 675; Driver, 81; Marti, 49; Bentzen, 32). This interpretation is incompatible with the historical fact that Nabuchodonosor had a man's heart during all his period of conquest, and it was only when his career of conquest was over that a beast's heart was given to him (Charles, 176 f.). Supposing the reference to 4:13 to be an interpolation made on the ground of the identity of the first beast with Nabuchodonosor (Junker, p 39), the other details may be easily explained as signifying the degradation or humiliation of the king or kingdom symbolized by the first beast. 5. The second beast was like a bear raised up on one side and having three ribs between its teeth, and it was incited to devour more prey. The bear is described as lying down with one of its sides raised higher than the other. Some interpreters represent the bear as raising itself on one of its sides before springing on its prey (Driver, p 82; Montgomery, p 288), or erect on its hind legs in an aggressive posture (Junker, p 41).

The three ribs are the remains or a large mouthful of the prey. Interpreters have endeavoured to find out the symbolical meaning of the several features of the bear. Thus the two sides, one higher than the other, are believed to represent the unequal strength of the Medes and the Persians, the two constituent parts of the Medo-Persian empire (Linder, p 300 f.). The three ribs are referred to the kingdoms of Lydia and Babylonia conquered by Cyrus, and Egypt conquered by Cambyses (Linder, p 301). The command to devour is an allusion to the destructiveness of the Medes (Is 13:17 f.; Linder, 301). It is better, however, not to press the meaning of these details, which after all are only natural features of the bear. 6. The third beast was like a leopard having four wings on its sides and four heads. The leopard is remarkable for its swiftness (Hab 1:8), but this symbolical leopard with its four wings is represented as very much swifter than the swiftest animal. The four heads have been taken to typify the four Persian kings referred to in 11:2 (Goettsberger, 54; Dennefeld, 676; Charles, 178; Bentzen, 33), or the four divisions of Alexander's empire (Linder, 301). It is perhaps preferable to take the four heads as indicating the four winds or directions and signifying an immense domain extending in all directions (Driver, p 83; Montgomery, p 290). With the words 'power was given to it' the figure passes into reality. 7. The fourth beast was unlike the others in its fierceness and unlike any known creature in its appearance. While the seer was contemplating the ten horns of the beast, another and a smaller horn grew up in the midst of them, rooting up three of the other horns. It had eyes like the eyes of a man and a mouth speaking haughtily.

9-14 The Divine Judgement—The second act of this drama opens up in heaven. Those dreadful beasts no longer play havoc in the world. They are judged and killed, in other words the heathen powers are overthrown and the world domination is given to the 'son of man'. 9. The seer imagines a large hall with thrones set for the judges or counsellors. Then the chief judge, or God himself, represented as an aged man, took his seat. Though the expression 'ancient of days' does not necessarily imply the idea of eternity, in the present text it presupposes it and must be explained as the analogous expressions in Job 36:26; Ps 55:19; 102:25 f.; Is 41:4. He was clad in snow-white raiment, and his hair was white like clean wool. His throne and its wheels were blazing flames and dazzling light (cf. Ez 1). 10. A stream of fire was coming forth from before him to devour and consume those against whom the death sentence should be pronounced. Myriads of angels stood in attendance ever ready to execute God's orders. The court sat, 508g and the indictment was read to the accused, i.e. all the misdeeds of the four symbolical beasts were recalled h as if they were read in a book. 11f. The construction is awkward but the sense is clear. While the seer's attention was concentrated on that majestic sight of the divine court, the beast was condemned to be burnt on account of the arrogant and blasphemous words which the little horn was uttering. Although the destruction of the beast naturally implies that of its horns, the implication does not go beyond the figure. The seer is concerned only in the little horn which he identifies with the fourth beast, but is uninterested in the fate of the other horns. The other beasts survived for an unspecified time after their power had been taken from them. The expression 'a time and a time' denotes a fixed but unspecified period of time.

1 13f. When all the beasts had been destroyed, one like a man or a human being was seen coming with the clouds, and therefore from heaven not from the tumultuous sea, and was presented before the aged judge. The expression 'Son of Man', which is rare in Aramaic but common in Hebrew, especially in Ezekiel, means simply an individual, a member of mankind; cf. Num 23:19; Ps 80:17; Is 51:12, etc. This mysterious man was invested with royal power, not as the successor to the throne of any of the heathen rulers, but as a universal sovereign whose power would be everlasting, untransferable, and imperishable. See § 504d-g.

j 15-17 The Interpretation of the Vision—15. Daniel was anxious to know the meaning of this vision. 16. He approached one of the angels and asked him about all these things. Angels sometimes appear as interpreters of visions, cf. Zach 1-6; Ez 40-48. 17. The four beasts represent four kings either individually or as the personification of their empires. 18. The destruction of these kings or kingdoms is not explicitly recorded, but is implied in the statement that the kingdom will be received by the saints of the Most High in everlasting possession. The 'saints' are the servants and the worshippers of God, united to him by the bonds of submission and obedience, and participating in some way in his sanctity. Though the Israelites are primarily intended, the expression has a universal meaning including all those who will k submit to God's sovereign rule. These loyal subjects of the kingdom of God are said to receive the sovereignty inasmuch as they will be freed from all foreign dominations and will enjoy all the blessings of a peaceful kingdom under a righteous king. There is, therefore, no contradiction between 18 and 14, where the royal power is given to the Son of Man. 19f. Daniel was not satisfied with this summary explanation, and requested further information about the fourth beast and its horns, and especially the small horn. 21f. These verses are an amplification of 8 and 11. In his description of the little horn, the seer passes insensibly from the figure to reality. The king symbolized by the little horn was making war against the faithful servants of God in order to bring them over to his gods. He prevailed, at least for some time, and many Israelites abandoned the religion of their fathers. But that was only for a short time. God came to the rescue of his people; judgement was given in their favour, and they acquired once more their religious liberty.

l 23. The fourth beast represents a kingdom which will be different from the others, both in its character and its destructive operations. 24. Ten kings will arise out of this kingdom or king; then another will arise different from all the others, and will bring down three of the ten kings. 25. He will speak haughtily against God, the Most High, and will wear out his faithful servants by oppression and persecution. He will attempt to interfere with the liturgical service of the Israelites by suppressing the religious festivals that were prescribed on fixed days. The period of the persecution will last for 'a time and times and half a time'. From very early times this vague and obscure time indication, which occurs again in 12:7 and in 508l Apoc 12:14, has been interpreted as denoting one year, two years and one half-year. Therefore the m saints will be delivered into the hands of the persecutor for three years and a half. This approximately agrees with 8:14, where it is said that the profanation of the temple and the abolition of worship will last for 2,300 evenings and mornings, or 1,150 days which make up approximately three and a half years. Moreover this indefinite time expression is equated with 'forty-two months' in Apoc 13:5. Some interpreters, however, prefer an indefinite and symbolical sense; cf. the analogous expression 'three and a half days' in Apoc 11:9, 11. 26f. At the close of the three and a half years of persecution judgement will be given against the persecutor; his domination will be taken from him and he will disappear for ever. Then the saints will take over the domination (see 18), which will be universal and everlasting, and which they will hold under the sovereignty of the Son of man.

28 Conclusion—The concluding remark, 'Hitherto is the end' corresponds to the introductory words in 1b, 'This is the beginning'. Daniel was distressingly agitated by this vision and its interpretation, and kept the matter in his mind.

Appendix I—The Four Empires. For the various identifications see § 498a. The Roman theory identifies the ten horns with ten kings or kingdoms arising out of the Roman empire, and the little horn with the Antichrist (Linder, p 302 ff.). The Greek theory, which is adopted here in the form proposed in § 498c, identifies the fourth beast with Alexander's empire. The great Macedonian general overran all Western Asia, smashing all opposition like a fierce beast trampling under its feet all the animals of the fields. The ten horns are his successors of the Seleucid dynasty. The little horn is Antiochus IV, the eleventh successor of Alexander on the throne of Syria. The number 'ten' has not necessarily an exact mathematical value. The three horns are three prominent personages whom Antiochus displaced in order to secure the throne. The historical background of this identification is provided by the books of Maccabees. Antiochus IV made war against the people of God, and, in a sacrilegious endeavour to stamp out the religion of the God of Israel, abolished the liturgical worship and desecrated the altar of sacrifices. The period of religious persecution lasted approximately three years and a half, the altar being desecrated on the 15th of the month Casleu (= December) 168 B.C. (1 Mac 1:57), and rededicated on the 25th Casleu (1 Mac 4:52), and the edict forbidding all religious observances being issued a short time before (1 Mac 1:43-56). Antiochus died a few months after the rededication of the altar.

Antiochus, however, and his impious achievements b do not correspond exactly to the description of the little horn. The death of Antiochus did not bring about either the end of the Syrian domination or the rise of a universal and abiding kingdom. Considering the close resemblance between the 'Man of Lawlessness' or the Antichrist, as described by St Paul in 2 Thess 2:3-12, and the little horn, we hold that the little horn in its literal, historical, and obvious sense represents Antiochus IV, but in a fuller and adequate sense it is the Antichrist of whom Antiochus was but a faint image; see J. B. Orchard, St Paul and the Book of Daniel, in Bi (1939) 172-9. It follows that the complete victory of the righteous people and the establishment of an ever-enduring kingdom will not be perfectly realized before the end of the world. The fact must be stressed that Daniel's outlook extends much further than the Messianic age.

As regards the other kingdoms no definite identifications c are proposed. The writer is wholly uninterested in them. He is also indifferent about the fate of the remaining seven horns of the fourth beast. It appears, therefore, that the quaternary number of the beasts arising out of the four principal winds or parts of the world is meant to express the universality of earthly d Appendix II—The Son of Man. The expression is used (i) in poetry as a synonym of 'man' and in parallelism with it, Num 23:19; Is 51:2, etc.; (ii) in Ezekiel with a diminutive sense implying inferiority, unworthiness in relation to God; (iii) in the plural to denote 'mankind', Gen 10:5; 1 Kg 26:19, etc. (ii) and (iii) are obviously inadmissible in Dan 7:13, where the expression seems to be intended to mark the contrast between the representative of the fifth kingdom and those of the other four. The latter were symbolized by monstrous beings emerging from the sea, the former is represented by a manlike being coming from the clouds.

e Before proceeding to identify the Son of Man we must determine whether the expression is used in a collective or in an individual sense. Two considerations seem to require a collective sense. 1. As the beasts symbolized kingdoms not kings, so must the Son of Man represent a kingdom not a king (P. Riessler, 70; Buzy, Les symboles . . . 291 ff.; Goettsberger, 56). 2. In 18, 27, the kingdom is given to the people of the Most High, therefore the Son of Man who in 14 receives the kingdom is in reality the whole community of the people of God. Other interpreters prefer to combine the two senses, considering the Son of Man as representing both king and subjects as forming one indivisible whole or one empire, Lagrange, RB (1904) 506. In 7:13 the Son of Man is an individual receiving the power to rule over the holy people, while in 18 and 27 the holy people, on account of their intimate association with their king are represented as reigning with him, cf. Apoc 20:4, 6. There is therefore no contradiction between the individual sense of the vision and the collective sense of its interpretation.

f Catholic exegesis has always recognized the Messias as the king designated by the title 'Son of Man'. The strongest argument for the Messianic interpretation is unquestionably the evidence of Christ himself who appropriated not only the appellation, but also the royal prerogatives attributed to the Son of Man by Daniel. Thus Christ will be a king and will sit at the right hand of God, Mt 16:28; 19:28; Lk 22:69; he will come in the clouds, Mt 24:30; 26:64; Mk 13:26, 14:62; Lk 21:27; he will judge all men, Mt 25:31-46. There can be no doubt that Christ derived this title from Dan 7:13, and interpreted it in a Messianic sense by appropriating the prerogatives and functions of the heavenly being that appeared to Daniel in human form; cf. F. Rosanliac, Sensus genuinus et plenius locutionis 'Filius Hominis' a Christo Domino adhibitae (Rome, 1920) 86-109.

g The Messianic interpretation of Dan 7:13 was also maintained by Jewish tradition from very early times. In the apocryphal book of Enoch there are in the 'Parables' section (37-71) written in the 1st century B.C. numerous references to the Son of Man derived from Daniel and applicable to the Messias alone. In rabbinic literature the Messias is sometimes called 'Anani' from Heb. 'ānān 'cloud', with reference to Dan 7:13. The Messianic doctrine of 7:13 f. is the establishment by God of a kingdom which will be entrusted to the Messias. It will be a universal and everlasting kingdom, and therefore spiritual, established on earth and enduring in heaven for eternity. It will be established on earth some time after the death of Antiochus IV, and perpetuated in heaven after the destruction of the Antichrist.

505a VIII The Vision of Two World Empires—The prophetic outlook, which in the preceding vision extended over the four world empires, is now narrowed down to two. The imagery and, in a certain measure, the doctrinal standpoint of the two visions are also different. In ch 7 the seer is predicting the end of persecution and the establishment of a new kingdom; in ch 8 he is vividly depicting the persecution of the holy people and the desecration of the sanctuary by Antiochus, but has hardly a word of hope for his oppressed people. Therefore ch 8 cannot be regarded as a doublet of ch 7 (Montgomery, 324), nor an explanation of the second and third kingdom of the first vision (Linder, p 329), but an independent vision consistent with the first in its general significance, but having its proper scope and outlook.

1 f. Introduction—The vision is dated in the 3rd year of Baltassar, probably an editorial insertion. Daniel was transported in spirit (cf. Ez 8:3; 9:24) to the citadel of Shushan (Susa) in the province of Elam, and there he saw a vision while he was near the stream Ulai. Susa was the capital of Elam (Neh 1:1; Est 1:1), rebuilt by Darius Hystaspes (521-485 B.C.), and the winter residence of the Persian kings. The stream Ulai is the Eulacus of the classical writers which flowed close to Susa (Pliny, Hist. Nat. 6, 27). The place therefore provided a suitable setting for the vision.

3-12 The Vision—3. Daniel standing near the stream Ulai saw on the opposite side a ram with two horns, one higher than the other. As the ram symbolized the Medo-Persian empire (20), its unequal horns represented the two powers separately. The higher horn, representing Persia, came up after the other one, the Persian empire being stronger than the Median and coming up later. 4. The ram butting to the west, the north, and the south, and advancing irresistibly in all directions represented the victorious march of Cyrus, who extended his conquests as far as the Black Sea and Egypt. His irresistible power made him undertake any military expedition, and success made him exceedingly great and powerful. Some interpreters see a correspondence between the three directions of the ram's advance and the three ribs in the bear's mouth (7:5), and between its unequal horns and the bear's unequal sides (Linder, p 329 f.). The correspondence seems rather far-fetched.

5-7. While Daniel was looking attentively at the ram, a he-goat, having a conspicuous horn between its eyes, came swiftly from the west and dashed against the ram, beating it down to the ground. The he-goat is the Greek empire (21) and the horn is Alexander the Great. The expression 'he touched not the ground', which is reminiscent of Cyrus' swift advance (Is 41:2 f.), vividly describes the rapidity of the march of Alexander, who in a few years subjugated all Western Asia as far as the borders of India. 8. When the he-goat had grown so powerful, its dreadful horn was broken, not in a fight but through an ordinary, unspecified cause, and in its place four other horns came up. When Alexander had reached the peak of his glory he fell ill and died in Babylon in the year 323 B.C. at the age of thirty-two years. On his death his empire was divided between four of his generals—Cassander, Lysimachus, Seleucus and Ptolemy. This settlement was arrived at in 301 B.C. after many wars among the rival generals. The first two had no part in the history of the Jews.

9-12. The history of the Seleucid dynasty is passed over, and mention is made of one king only, Antiochus IV (175-164 B.C.), the little horn which made war against Egypt (the South), Parthia (the East), and against the 'Beauteous Land'. The last expression for Palestine occurs again in 11:16, 41 and in Jer 3:19; Ez 20:6; Zach 7:14. On the wars of Antiochus with the Jews read the books of Maccabees. The little horn growing greater and greater until it reached the stars of heaven represents the arrogance of Antiochus and his insolent attack on the religion of the Jews, many of whom fell victims of his arrogance like stars hurled down from heaven. Antiochus' first attack was directed against those Jews who professed the religion of Yahweh. His second attack is now directed against God himself, the prince of the host or stars, whose daily sacrifice he abolished, and whose sanctuary he profaned, treating it irreverently as a worthless thing. On the daily sacrifice see Ex 29:38 ff.; Num 28:3 ff.; on the abolition of divine worship see 1 Mac 1:47; on the 506 f profanation of the temple by Antiochus see 1 Mac 1:21-24, 49, 57; 4:36-59. 12a is obscure and corrupt. The sense of Vg is that the suspension of sacrifices was a punishment of the people's sins, a sense which is not in conformity with the context. A probable interpretation is: An armed garrison was wickedly placed by Antiochus in the neighbourhood of the temple for the purpose of suppressing more effectively the divine worship (Driver, 117; Goettsberger, 62). By emending the first word of 12 šābā 'army' into šēb 'beauty', and shifting it back to 11, an equally good sense is obtained: Antiochus treated irreverently not only the temple but also all Palestine, 'the land of beauty' (cf. 9) and the dwelling-place of Yahweh by erecting 'altars throughout all the cities of Judah' (1 Mac 1:57). Then 12 is made to read thus: 'and the iniquity (instead of "in iniquity") was set upon the place of the daily sacrifice', the allusion being to the abominable idol erected on the altar of sacrifice, 1 Mac 1:57 (Linder, 337). Antiochus will also try to stamp out the true religion by destroying the books of the Law which embodied the true religious and moral principles (1 Mac 1:60). Success will crown this iconoclastic campaign.

506a 13 f. Duration of the Desecration of the Sanctuary—In the meanwhile Daniel overheard one angel asking another: How long will this profanation last? And the answer was: 'Unto evening and morning 2,300' (MT omits 'days'). This peculiar time expression is interpreted in two ways. It denotes either 2,300 days or 2,300 evenings and mornings, i.e. 1,150 days. The first sense is adopted by LXX, Theod., Vg, and by many ancient and modern interpreters. This period, which according to the context must coincide with the entire period of persecution, is reckoned from Antiochus' campaign in Egypt in March 169 B.C. and his subsequent attack on Jerusalem (1 Mac 1:18 ff.) to the peace terms offered by Lysias to the Jews (1 Mac 6:58-61) in July-August 163 B.C., an interval of six years four months, or c. 2,300 days (Linder, 342 ff.). This interpretation fails to take into due consideration one important fact. The vision is entirely centred on Antiochus, the greatest persecutor of the Jews. Therefore the 2,300 evening-mornings cannot be made to extend beyond Antiochus' death in 164 B.C., nor, on the other hand, can they be made to commence before the persecution broke out in 169 B.C. It seems more probable that the expression 'evening-morning' denotes two separate time units, and that the number 2,300 is the sum of 1,150 evenings and 1,150 mornings. The chief reason for this interpretation lies in the fact that the daily sacrifice, the suspension of which is emphatically predicted, was offered twice a day, in the morning and in the evening. Therefore the number 2,300 represents the total of daily sacrifices which will not be offered. As 1,150 days correspond to c. three and a half years, this period is generally identified with the time and times and half a time of 7:25. The sanctuary was rededicated on nearly the same day in which it had been desecrated three years before (1 Mac 1:57; 4:52).

c 15-27 The Interpretation of the Dream—15. The subject of the conversation between the angels was the duration of the persecution, but Daniel wished to understand more fully the meaning of the whole vision. An angel in a human form suddenly appeared standing at some distance from him. In Heb. there is a play on the word geber 'man' and Gabriel 'man of God'. 16. A voice like that of a man came from between the banks of the stream Ulai requesting Gabriel to explain the meaning of the vision to Daniel. This is the first time that an angel is called by a proper name in Scripture. He is mentioned also in 9:21 and in Lk 1:19, 26. 17. Daniel is addressed as 'son of man', a title denoting, as in Ezekiel, the weakness or inferiority of human nature in relation to God or the angels. The vision deserved careful attention because it dealt with events which would take place 'in the time of the end'. This expression, which occurs again in 11:35, 40; 12:4, 9, means simply 'the appointed time' which, according to the context, is the time of wrath (19), or the time of Antiochus' persecution. The expression, which seems to connect the end of the persecution with the end of the world, has been purposely chosen to denote two distinct but interrelated periods of time. As the death of Antiochus marked the end of a period of persecution and the dawning of the Messianic era, so will the elimination of Antichrist at the end of the world be followed by a reign of everlasting happiness in heaven. Both the end of the persecution and the end of the world are intended. 18. As the angel spoke, Daniel swooned or fell stunned to the ground, but was soon raised to his feet. 19. The vision deals with the time of persecution which is defined as a time of wrath. According to OT conceptions all the calamities which befell Israel during their long history were the manifestation of God's wrath for their sins; cf. Is 5:26; 10:25; 26:20; and for the times of Antiochus cf. 1 Mac 1:67; 2:49; 3:8, etc. 20-25. Then follows the historical interpretation of the vision. The great horn of the he-goat is Alexander the Great. After Alexander's death his empire was divided between four of his generals, none of whom, however, had the power of Alexander. As Daniel is concerned only with the Seleucid dynasty, the words 'after their reign' (23) refer only to this dynasty.

At a certain time, when the sins of the Jewish people, especially the sins of apostasy (cf. 1 Mac 1:11-16) have reached full measure (cf. 2 Mac 6:14), the wrath of God will come upon them in the form of a persecution by Antiochus, a bold-faced king, skilled in the art of dissimulation and duplicity (cf. 1 Mac 1:31). The words 'but not by his own force' (24) are probably interpolated from 22. If genuine, they imply that Antiochus will become powerful either by intrigues or by divine permission. His devastation of the land of Israel and the suppression of religious institutions will be greater than can be imagined. He will rid himself of his political opponents ('the mighty'), and will exterminate the pious Israelites. Through his cunning he will successfully practise deceit, and in his mind he will devise great, presumptuous schemes; he will kill many unawares and, after making a stand against God, the Prince of princes, he will fall not in war nor by a natural death but by divine intervention; cf. 1 Mac 6:8-16; 2 Mac 9:5-28. By a slight textual emendation partially based on LXX this sense is obtained: 24. '... he shall destroy the mighty ones. 25. And against the holy people shall his policy be directed, and he shall cause craft to prosper in his hand' (Charles). 26. The angel confirms the truth of the vision which is called the vision of the evenings and mornings (cf. 14), because it was intended to reassure the persecuted Jews that the end of the persecution would soon come. For similar asseverations of the truth of a vision cf. 10:1; 11:2; Apoc 19:9; 21:5; 22:6. Daniel is then commanded to write down this revelation and to close up and seal the scroll until the time of its fulfilment shall come.

27 Conclusion—The disclosure of the gloomy future of his people caused a painful shock to Daniel, who felt even more distressed because there were many details which he could not understand.

IX The prophecy of the Seventy Weeks—The vision of ch 8, compared with that of ch 7, was far from reassuring. It foretold persecutions, profanation, destruction, and though all this would have an end, it was not said plainly how and when the end would come. Daniel wished for further enlightenment, and in his anguish he turned to God, confessing the sins of his people which had been the cause of all their sufferings, implored him to forgive them, and to deliver them from their oppressors. We may distinguish two parts: the prophecy, 24-27, and its general background, 1-23. The general background is the age of the exile; the prophecy refers to the Messianic age, though its particular setting is the Maccabean age.

507b 1-3 Introduction—The prophecy is dated in the first year of Darius the Mede, therefore a short time after the fall of Babylon (5:31). In 1 Darius is called the son of Assuerus. In reality Assuerus, the Greek Xerxes, was the son of Darius I and the grandfather of Darius II. These chronological introductions are best accounted for as the work of ignorant scribes. In that year, when the prediction of the fall of Babylon made by Jeremias (25:12) had already been fulfilled (5:31), and the fulfilment of the promise of the restoration of Jerusalem after its 70 years punishment (Jer 29:10) was eagerly expected, Daniel, assuming the rôle of his repentant people, turned his face in the direction of Jerusalem and prayed God to forgive their sins. It appears that at that time there was already a collection of canonical books, of which the prophecies of Jeremias formed part. If the 70 years are reckoned from the year of the prophecy of Jeremias, or the 4th year of Joakim (605 B.C., Jer 25:1), they close in the year 535 B.C. But the number 70 has not necessarily an exact arithmetical value (A. Condamin, Le Livre de Jérémie, p 197).

c 4-19 Daniel's Prayer—The prayer is modelled after a type which seems to have been common in times of national calamity and which is characterized by these features : confession of sin, acknowledgement of God's justice, appeal to his mercy, and a prayer for deliverance. Examples of such public prayers are Esd 9:6-15 ; Bar 1:15-3:8 ; Dan 3:25-45. 4b agrees almost verbally with Neh 1:5 and Deut 7:9. 5f. Daniel confesses the nation's sins, which are forcibly expressed by five synonymous verbs. The gravity of the sins is heightened by two circumstances : they refused to listen to the prophets' warnings, and all classes of the people have sinned. For the phraseology cf. 3 Kg 8:47 ; Deut 17:20 ; Jer 44:4, 21 ; Neh 9:34. 7f. God is righteous, and the faithless people must bear the shame and disappointment of being driven out of the land of their fathers. 9-11. Daniel does not try to conceal or to extenuate the people's guilt. All have sinned, and the curses impending over transgressors of the Law (Lev 26 ; Deut 28 : 15 ff.) have now fallen upon them. In their hopeless plight Daniel makes an appeal to God's compassion and forgiveness. 12-14. are an expansion of 10f. 15-19. The confession now passes into a prayer for deliverance. The seer emphatically reaffirms the people's guilt, and, implicitly, their repentance and prays that God may look favourably upon Jerusalem and the mountain of the temple which had become an object of derision to all heathen peoples around them. Then he makes a stirring appeal to God's honour. God's temple in Jerusalem lay in ruins as if he were unable to protect it.

e 20-23 The Apparition of the Angel—The angel Gabriel, whom Daniel had seen on a previous occasion (8:16), was sent from heaven and 'flying swiftly' (so Vg and the ancient versions) came to Daniel at the time of the evening sacrifice to make him understand clearly the things he desired to know. In 22 read came to (LXX) for 'instructed me'. By way of introduction the angel said that as soon as Daniel commenced his prayer a divine revelation was made in response to Daniel's desire, and he came to communicate it to him because he was a man greatly beloved.

f 24-27 The Prophecy of the Seventy Weeks—After the fall of Babylon Daniel expected the immediate release of the exiles and the restoration of the monarchy of Israel. His expectations, though derived from Jeremias' predictions, were not yet fully realized, and he therefore turned to God for illumination. God predicted another restoration, a spiritual one, which would come after a longer period than predicted by Jeremias, and would be preceded by an age of persecution. There is therefore a relation of contrast between the object of Daniel's prayer and that of the angel's revelation, and we see no reason for regarding 4-19 and 20 as an interpolation and linking 21-27 with 3, making the prophecy an appendix of ch 8 (Marti, 64 ; Charles, 226 f. ; Goettsberger, 69 ; Bentzen, 41 f.). The interpretation of this most difficult prophecy will be based on these two main premises : the historical standpoint is the Maccabean age ; the prophetic perspective is Messianic and eschatological. For a discussion of MT and the ancient versions see Linder, pp 364-73. 24. It is universally admitted that the 70 weeks are 70 seven years' periods (cf. Lev 25:8), or 490 years. Most interpreters hold that the 70 weeks are a definite period, as is shown by their irregular division into three parts 7 + 62 + 1 (25, 27), of which the last part is further subdivided into two halves (27). The mathematical value of the number 70 provides the basis for the chronological determination of the coming of the Messiah and his death. But very probably the number 490 is simply an intensification of the 70 years of Jeremias (Junker, p 85), which in its turn is the product of two symbolical numbers 7 and 10 ; cf. the analogous numerical intensifications in Gen 4:15 ; Mt 18:22. This period of time has been decreed upon the people and the city, i.e. it has been decided that 490 years shall pass before the restoration takes place. This restoration will be characterized by (i) the finishing of transgression, i.e. the sin of apostasy and the religious persecution ; these will be definitely checked ; (ii) the ending of sin ; sin will be shut up, sealed up and thus prevented from doing any harm ; (iii) atonement for iniquity ; atonement is here used in the sense of appeasing God offended by sin. God will be appeased by the death of Antiochus for the sins of apostasy, and by the death of his only Begotten Son for the sins of all mankind ; hence Vg-DV 'iniquity may be abolished' is a good paraphrase. To this threefold negative element corresponds a threefold positive element consisting in (i) the bringing in of everlasting righteousness, i.e. the recognition of God's supreme rights and the performance of the duties deriving therefrom ; (ii) the fulfilment of vision and prophet, or, according to others, the sealing up, the end of prophecy ; (iii) the anointing of a thing most holy, i.e. the rededication of the temple and the altar of sacrifice or the consecration of a mystical temple of the Messianic age, or the anointing of Christ the Messiah, that is the inauguration of his ministry.

The end of the persecution, however, marked only the beginning of a national spiritual restoration which attained its full development only in Messianic times. The Maccabean interpretation of 24 is therefore only partially true, while the Messianic interpretation, which was always common in the Church, is the only perfectly true one. It follows that the Messianic restoration need not necessarily be placed in the last week. 25. The 70 weeks are divided into three periods of unequal duration, 7 and 62 to which another week is added in 27, each being characterized by some particular event. The first seven weeks are to be reckoned from 'the going forth of the word'. The 'word' is the divine oracle or divine communication made through Jeremias concerning the 70 years' captivity and the return of the exiles to their land (Jer 25:11 f. ; 29:10 ; cf. also Jer 30:18 ; 31:38). As these prophecies were uttered between the years 605-588 B.C. it is from these broad limits that the 7 weeks are to be reckoned. We purposely allow this latitude to the terminus a quo because we do not attach a strict mathematical value to the number of weeks. So with differences of detail Goettsberger, p 69 f. ; Höpfl-Miller-Metzinger, p 490 ; J. Chaine, Intr. à la lecture des prophètes, 262 f. Other interpreters, however, who refer the whole prophecy directly and exclusively to the Messiah, take the 'word' in the sense of 'edict', and identify it with the edict issued by Artaxerxes I in the year 458 B.C. for the rebuilding of Jerusalem (Esd 7:1-7, 11-26) ; Knabenbauer, Linder. This brings the last of the 70 weeks to the years A.D. 26-33, an exact Messianic date. But if 'word' is a royal edict, it should be identified with Cyrus' edict in 538 B.C. (Esd 1:1), which, being the first, was far more important than subsequent edicts by other 507] Persian kings. Though the building of Jerusalem is not expressly mentioned in Cyrus' edict, it is naturally implied (cf. Esd 5:1; Agg 1:4). Moreover the words l'hāšib u'lībnot do not mean 'to rebuild' but 'to bring back (from captivity) and to build'; cf. Jer 29:10.

k Now the permission to return to their land, to build the house of God and, naturally, their own homes was first granted by Cyrus. The first interpretation is therefore considered preferable, especially on the ground of the fact that the 70 weeks are an extension of the 70 years of Jeremias, and must therefore have the same starting-point. From the date of Jeremias' prediction concerning the return from the exile and the building of Jerusalem to the coming of an anointed prince 7 weeks or 49 years will elapse. The Messianic interpretation identifies the anointed prince with Christ the Messiah. But as 49 years, from whatever date they are reckoned, are too short an interval for the coming of Christ, the 7 weeks are, on the strength of the punctuation of Theod. and Vg, added to the 62 weeks, and thus the interval between Artaxerxes' edict and the coming of the anointed prince is made to extend

l over 69 weeks or 483 years. There is, however, no reason for departing from MT, which divides the verse at 'seven weeks'. It is the interpretation that must be based on the text, not the text to be made to conform to a particular interpretation. We prefer the Massoretic punctuation which gives a good sense and, accordingly, identify the anointed prince with Cyrus. The main argument for this interpretation is that we have in this prophecy a gradual unfolding of God's plan of restoration which was to commence with the release of the Jewish exiles by Cyrus, and to reach its culmination in the Messiah, the point of convergence of Daniel's predictions. Cyrus is actually called the anointed of the Lord in Is 45:1. From Jeremias' predictions, 605-588 B.C., to the end of the exile in 538 B.C. approximately 49 years have passed. After the first 7 week-years a period of 62 week-years will commence during which Jerusalem will be rebuilt, square and moat, i.e. provided with broad spaces and ditches round about. But times will be hard; cf. Esd 4; Neh 4, 6. If the 62 week-years are reckoned from the year 538 B.C. they end in the year 104 B.C., a date which has no particular significance. To avoid the inconvenience some interpreters make the 62 weeks run parallel with the 7 weeks, thus pushing back the terminus ad quem to the year 171 B.C., the year in which an anointed one (26), the high-priest Onias III, was murdered (*M. Thilo, Chronologie des Danielbuches, Bonn, 1926, 14). But the text obviously demands that the 62 weeks be reckoned consecutively to, not concurrently with, the 7 weeks. The Messianic interpretation adopts the Vg punctuation, and combines together the two periods of 7 and 62 weeks, making their sum of 483 years to start from 458 B.C. Such a way of reckoning renders the distinction of the two periods meaningless.

n As a period of 490 years divided into three consecutive periods of 49, 434 and 7 years respectively, characterized by certain definite events, cannot be made to fit into the historical framework of the last five centuries B.C., it is perhaps preferable to explain the 62 weeks as a vague, indefinite quantity having no precise arithmetical value. It is a fact that all these numerical operations of Daniel ultimately rest on the 70 years of Jeremias. The first operation is the multiplication of 70, which is the product of 7 by 10, by the symbolical number 7. The product 490 is therefore symbolical, though, of course, not without a broad historical value. The writer then goes on to work on this symbolical number dividing it into three unequal quantities. The first, 7 weeks or 49 years, is primarily symbolical, secondarily and approximately historical. The last week or 7 years, divided into two equal parts, is also symbolical, though at the same time very nearly historical. The remaining 62 weeks are the remainder of the subtraction of 8 (7 + 1) from 70, and their rôle is to fill up the interval between the events of the first

7 weeks and those of the last week. What the seer had in mind was the prediction of certain historical events and their chronological sequence, but not their exact dates. The 62 weeks therefore correspond to the period intervening between the return of the exiles in 538 B.C. and the cutting off of an anointed one, whether this is the high-priest Onias III, murdered in 171 B.C. (2 Mac 4:34), or Christ killed in A.D. 30 or 33. 26. A slight emendation of the last two words of 25 based on LXX and their transposition to the beginning of 26, would give this sense: 'At the end of the times', i.e. after the 62 weeks, etc. (Charles, Goettsberger). After the lapse of 7 and 62 weeks an anointed one will be cut off, 'and the people that shall deny him shall not be his'. The words between inverted commas are a paraphrase of a two-word elliptical and obscure Hebrew phrase which literally means: 'and shall have naught'.

If the anointed one is the Messiah the sense is: The cutting off of the Messiah will bring about not his end but that of his enemies (Knabenbauer, p. 256), or: The Messiah will be cut off not for his own guilt (Linder, p. 406). If the anointed one is Onias III the sense is: He will have no legitimate successor, or no one to defend him, or though he has committed no fault, etc. The identification of the anointed one may help us to reach the meaning of this enigmatic expression, but absolute certainty will perhaps never be attained. Interpreters identify him either with the Messiah or with the high-priest Onias III, according to their particular system of interpretation. Though neither the city nor the temple were destroyed after the death of Onias, both suffered considerably; cf. 1 Mac 1:31, 32, 38; 3:45. 26b is also referred to the destruction of the city and the temple by Titus in A.D. 70. And his (or its) end will be in an overwhelming flood. If these words are referred to Antiochus, the sense is that he will be swept away by a divine judgement as by an overwhelming flood; cf. 1 Mac 6:8-16. If they are referred to the temple and city, they denote their complete destruction. The war and its concomitant devastations, that are determined by God, will continue till the end, i.e. the time appointed by God. 27 is a detailed description of some of the events referred to in 26 as taking place after the 62 weeks. During the last week the leader or prince referred to in 26 will make a strong covenant with many, the allusion being to the co-operation which he found in many of them; cf. 1 Mac 1:11-15, or to the establishment of the religion of the New Covenant by Christ. For three and a half years he, Antiochus, will cause all sacrifices to cease (1 Mac 1:54 ff.; 4:52), or after three and a half years—the duration of Christ's public ministry according to a probable theory—Christ will abolish all sacrifices of the Mosaic Law by his sacrifice of the cross. Not only will the sacrificial worship be suspended or replaced, but 'an abomination of desolation' will also be set up on the pinnacle of the temple. The expression has a general meaning and denotes any abominable idolatrous object or sacrilegious action causing horror to the faithful. It occurs four times in Daniel (8:13 'the sin of the desolation'; 9:27; 11:31; 12:11), always in connexion with the suspension or abolition of worship. The author of 1 Mac referred it to the heathen altar set up by Antiochus on the altar of sacrifice (1:57), while in the Gospels (Mt 24:15; Mk 13:14; Lk 21:20) it has a broader meaning and denotes, most probably, the profanation of the temple by the Zealots a short time before the siege and fall of Jerusalem in A.D. 70 (cf. Jos BJ 4, 3). This temple profanation will last for a fixed time, i.e. until the time determined by God, after the lapse of which the divine wrath will be poured out completely destroying the horrible abomination. The beginning of a new age is tacitly implied.

Appendix—The Messianic Interpretation of the Prophecy of the 70 Weeks. (For the various interpretations see F. Fraidl, Die Exegese der Siebzig Wochen Daniels in der alten und mittleren Zeit, Graz, 1883.) The various interpretations may be grouped under two headings, the 508a Maccabean interpretation and the Messianic interpretation. The first restricts the prophetic perspective to the age of Antiochus IV, the persecutor of Judaism. The other refers it exclusively to the Messianic age.

b Both interpretations have a side open to attack. The Messianic interpretation, which has always enjoyed the greatest favour in Catholic exegesis, seems to overlook the undeniable allusions of the prophecy to the Maccabean age and its relation to the general plan of the visions, while, on the other hand, the Maccabean interpretation ignores the fundamental fact that Daniel's interest, though centred on the age of Antiochus, extends far beyond the limits of that age, and that the restoration described by him, especially in 24, by far exceeds the rededication of the temple in 165 B.C. The combination of the two systems will give a more satisfactory interpretation. To the prophet who was yearning for the temporal restoration of his people the angel promised a spiritual restoration described with Messianic characteristics. But as the temporal restoration, following the release from the exile, was preceded by years of suffering, so was the Messianic restoration to be preceded by a period of persecution and oppression. The thought of the oppression called forth some particular facts of the persecution period. When this period is over, the Messianic era will dawn upon the faithful Jews. This general sense of the prophecy falls into line, not only with the historical situation of the prophet as described in 9:2 ff., but also with the general plan of the visions which consists in the prediction of a period of persecution, the destruction of the persecutor, and the beginning of a new era.

d In the light of these general considerations we give the following exposition of the prophecy. The Messianic restoration will be accomplished after a longer period than that predicted by Jeremiah for the end of the exile. The first step will be the release of the Jewish exiles and the commencement of a new national and religious life. Then, after some time, persecution will break out. The highest representative of the Jewish religion—the high-priest Onias III—will be assassinated, an attempt will be made to extirpate Judaism, many Jews will forsake the religion of their fathers, the temple service will be suspended, and this will last for some time. At last the persecutor will be taken away and the restoration described in 24 will be gradually effected. The date of the coming of the Messiah is not indicated. The Messiah will inaugurate his kingdom upon earth some time after the end of the persecution. But there are in this prophecy, as in the other visions, three different perspectives combined into one: the Maccabean, the Messianic, and the eschatological perspective. The persecutions of the Maccabean age will lead to the Messianic restoration; the Messianic kingdom or the Church of Christ will be attacked during all her long existence, but all her enemies will in the long run be utterly overthrown and the kingdom of Christ will enter upon its final and glorious stage in heaven. The same line of interpretation, with some differences of detail, is taken up by M.-J. Lagrange, RB (1904) 514; (1930) 179-98; J. Goettsberger, 74 ff.; L. Bigot, DTC, IV, 75-102; F. Ceuppens, De prophetiis Messianicis in Antiquo Testamento, 505-21; Höpfl, Intr. Sp., ed. 5a, 490 f.; J. Chaine, 262 f., Dennefeld, 686 ff.

508a X-XII The Revelation of the History from the Beginning of the Persian Rule to the End of the Times—

This revelation is a brief survey of the history of the Persian and the Seleucid reigns and of the diplomatic relations between the Seleucids and the Ptolemies. It is carried down to the time of Antiochus, whose end is also mentioned. The prediction of the triumph of the righteous at the end of the world closes the revelation. Unlike the other symbolical visions, this is a direct communication by the angel Gabriel to Daniel.

b X1-XI1 Introduction. The Apparition of the Angel

—1. That this chronological indication, at least in its present form, is a late editorial note is made clear by the designation of Cyrus as 'king of Persia' which came into use during the Greek period. The usual title of the Persian kings during the Persian domination was 'king of Babel' (S. R. Driver, Introduction to the Literature of the Old Testament, 9th ed., p 546). The revelation dealt with the hardships which were to befall the people in times of war. Daniel paid careful attention to the revelation as its importance naturally required. 2f. Daniel received the revelation after a three-week mourning. The motive of Daniel's mourning was his anxiety about the fate which was 'to befall his people in the latter days' (14). He abstained from delicious food, from flesh and wine and ointments, these being marks of joy and happiness; Pss 103 (104) 15; 31(32) 6; etc. 4. After the three-week fasting Daniel was, on the 24th Nisan, on the banks of the Euphrates 'the great river'. 5f. There he saw what he thought was a man. The description is reminiscent of Ez 1:13. The superhuman being was an angel, and most probably the same one who had appeared to him before (8:16; 9:21). 7-9. The cause of the terror was not the vision, which Daniel's companions did not see, but perhaps a flash of lightning and a thundering noise which preceded the vision; cf. Acts 9:7; 22:9. Daniel lost consciousness and fell upon the ground. 10. Daniel returns to his senses and is raised up by the angel to a semi-prostrate position. 11. Then the angel addressed Daniel, the greatly beloved man and bade him stand upright and pay attention to his message. 12. Daniel was anxious about the future destiny of his people; he prayed God and fasted, and his prayer was heard by God. A clear example of the efficaciousness of prayer accompanied by fasting; cf. Tob 12:8. 13. The angel explains the reason of his delay. All nations had their own tutelary angels. The tutelary angel of the Jews received a divine message to Daniel, but the angel of the Persians stood in his way and tried to intercept the message. The conflict went on for 21 days, and the angel of the Persians seemingly prevailed. But at the critical moment Michael, an angel of a higher rank, or an archangel (Jude 9), came to his help, and the angel of the Jews prevailed there beside the prince (LXX, Theod., Syr.), i.e. the patron-angel of the Persians. This sense is obtained by reading nôfartî (LXX, Theod.) instead of nôfartî (MT), and giving it the intransitive meaning 'to excel' hence 'to prevail'. This war between the angels (see also 20), who, for the very reason of their being tutelary angels, are considered as God's ministers, is a dramatic representation of the nations' opposition against the people of God and of God's absolute control of all the nations.

14. After being delivered from his rival, the patron-angel of the Jews came straight to Daniel with his message. The expression 'in the latter days' denotes both the near and the remote future inclusive of the Messianic age, because the events of these future days need still to be manifested by another vision. 15. As the angel spoke, Daniel cast his eyes to the ground and was speechless. 16f. A touch by the angel restored to him his power of speech, 18f., and after another touch he completely regained his vigour. 20-XI 1. These verses are probably disarranged. Montgomery (p 416) followed by Linder (p 438) rearranges them provisionally thus: 20a, 21a, 20b, 21b, 11:1. Another possibility is that in 20-11:1, as in the whole chapter, we have a redactional combination of two slightly different forms of the same narrative (Junker, p 99). The angel calls Daniel's attention by a rhetorical interrogation (20a); he then declares that he will announce to him what is written in the book of truth (21a), the destinies of mankind being, as it were, written by God in a book and therefore inalterable. The object of the angel's announcement is: continuation of the war with the angel of the Persians, and, when this war is over, the beginning of another war with the angel of Greece, which will end with the victory of the revealing angel aided by Michael, the 509f great patron angel of the Jews (20b, 21b). 11:1 is interpreted in different ways. The simplest interpretation is that Gabriel has helped Michael from the first year of Darius the Mede. This is hardly consistent with the context, which represents Michael as the helper. Others prefer to remove 1a as a gloss and to read: 'standing as a helper and as a defence for me' as a continuation of 21b (Montgomery, 416; Junker, 99; Bentzen, 44).

510a XI 2 The Persian Age—The history of the Persian domination is reduced to three, obviously the first three, of Cyrus' successors: Cambyses (529-521), Darius I (521-485), and Xerxes (485-465). Of the wealth of Xerxes and his military expedition against Greece in the year 480 B.C. there is evidence in the classical writers (cf. Herod 7, 20-99). It cannot be inferred that the prophet knew only of four Persian kings, of whom Xerxes was the last. As he was not particularly interested in the history of all the Persian kings, he chose to mention four on account of the relation of the fourth king with Greece, whose interference in Palestine he intended to narrate at greater length.

b 3f. Alexander the Great (336-323 B.C.)—3. A powerful king ruling over an immense empire and crushing all resistance is a very appropriate description of Alexander the Great. 4. The suddenness of the fall of Alexander's short-lived empire is vividly depicted. After his untimely death his kingdom was broken (cf. 8:8 'the great horn was broken') and divided between his generals, none of whom had any blood relationship with Alexander or enjoyed his power. Like these generals, none of their successors were of Alexander's kith and kin. His illegitimate son Heracles and his posthumous son Alexander were both murdered in 309 and 311 respectively.

c 5-20 The Conflicts of the Seleucids and Ptolemies—Coele-Syria was for many years the bone of contention and the scene of many wars between the kings of Syria and the kings of Egypt. 5. The king of the south is Ptolemy I, son of Lagus, who, after Alexander's death, secured Egypt for himself and ruled first as satrap (323-305) and then as king (305-285). Seleucus I Nicator, another of Alexander's generals, was one of Ptolemy's princes or captains. At the convention of Triparadisus in 321 he received the satrapy of Babylon; in 316 he fled to Egypt, where he became Ptolemy's general; in 312 he recovered his satrapy and extended his dominion over all Asia Minor. He made Antioch the capital of his kingdom. Seleucus' empire was thus

d more extensive than that of Ptolemy. 6. After some years hostilities broke out between Ptolemy II Philadelphus (285-247) and Antiochus II Theos, grandson of Seleucus I (261-246), over the possession of Palestine. In order to bring about a peaceful settlement Ptolemy II gave his daughter Berenice in marriage to Antiochus II, who had divorced his wife Laodice. After her father's death Berenice was divorced by Antiochus, and later murdered with her child by Antiochus' first wife e (Jerome ad loc.). 7-9. Ptolemy III Euergetes (247-222) and Seleucus II Callinicus (246-226). After some time (these words are to be transposed from the end of 6 to the beginning of 7) Ptolemy III, brother of Berenice and therefore 'a scion of her roots', arose in the place of Ptolemy II, and with a view to avenging his sister's murder marched into Syria, reached its outer defences, entered into Seleucia and Antioch, the stronghold of the king of Syria, and returned to Egypt with a rich booty. He had to desist from attacking the king of Syria on account, very probably, of an insurrection in Egypt. After two years Seleucus II made a reprisal attack against Egypt, but was defeated and had to retreat to his land.

f 10-19. Antiochus III the Great (223-187). 10f. Seleucus III Ceraunus (226-223), the son and successor of Seleucus II, was killed during a campaign in Asia Minor, and was succeeded by his brother Antiochus III, who resumed the war with Egypt. His conquests of the Egyptian possessions in Syria (219) were like an overflowing flood. Antiochus then (217) moved in the direction of Egypt, and met the forces of Ptolemy IV at Raphia, on the borders of Egypt and Palestine, where he was defeated with heavy losses (Polyb., 5, 86). 12. Though the army of Antiochus was almost annihilated, the king of Egypt did not follow up his victory. 13f. Antiochus III raised another army, stronger than the former, and after some years (204) marched against Ptolemy V (204-180), who was still an infant, with a great army and much war equipment. The many who will rise up against the king of Egypt are Antiochus III, Philip V of Macedon his ally, and many insurgents in Egypt, who were dissatisfied with the rule of Agathocles, the prime minister of the infant king Ptolemy (St Jer.). These were joined by a band of Jewish apostates who had forsaken the law of God and adopted Hellenistic laws and customs (1 Mac 1:11-15). By their anti-religious attitude they prepared the way for the Hellenization policy adopted later by Antiochus IV, and so they unintentionally contributed to bring about the fulfilment of the prophecies on the persecution by Antiochus IV. But their plans will fail. 15. After the parenthesis of 14 the prophet reverts to Antiochus' campaign. The historical interpretation of this verse is given by St Jerome (ad loc.): Antiochus met the Egyptian forces near the sources of the Jordan (198), and defeated Scopas, Ptolemy's general, who took refuge in Sidon. Antiochus then besieged Sidon, and, as the Egyptian army was unable to raise the siege, Scopas surrendered to Antiochus. 16. After his successes in Syria Antiochus took possession of Palestine 'the glorious land', carrying destruction in his hand, the allusion being probably to the threat of an invasion of Egypt.

17. Antiochus never invaded Egypt. Though he purposed to acquire all the dominion of Ptolemy, he preferred to come to equitable terms with him owing to the interference of Rome. So he made an alliance with him, giving him his daughter Cleopatra in marriage, which was celebrated at Raphia in 192. The unusual expression 'a daughter of woman' probably denotes Cleopatra's excellent character and administrative qualities. By this political marriage Antiochus intended to simulate friendship with Ptolemy hoping to get a peaceful footing in Egypt without irritating the Romans. But his plans were foiled, for Ptolemy's generals, distrustful of Antiochus' show of friendliness, were constantly on their guard, and Cleopatra was on the side of her husband rather than on that of her father (Jerome). Antiochus never got possession of Egypt. 18f. Antiochus made many successful expeditions in the coast lands of Asia Minor. In 191 he was defeated by the Romans at Thermopylae, and again in 190 at Magnesia by the general Lucius Cornelius Scipio, the prince who not only checked Antiochus' arrogance, but made him submit to humiliating terms of peace. Antiochus met an ignominious end in 187 at Elymais in Persia, where he was killed after plundering the temple of Bel. 20. Seleucus IV Philopator (187-175). Antiochus III was succeeded by his son Seleucus IV, who sent an exactor to the glorious kingdom. The allusion is to the mission of Heliodorus, the prime minister of Seleucus, to the land of Judah, in order to plunder the temple of Jerusalem (2 Mac 3:1-40). Seleucus met an inglorious end after twelve years of an uneventful reign.

21-45 Antiochus IV Epiphanes, the great Persecutor of the Jews (175-164)—The writer's interest in the age and person of Antiochus IV is evinced by the abundance of details with which his story is retold. Antiochus was the brother of Seleucus IV, and for fourteen years a hostage at Rome. At Seleucus' request the Romans released Antiochus and took Demetrius, a son of Seleucus, in his place. While Antiochus was on his way to Syria, Seleucus was killed and Antiochus hastened to seize the throne which legitimately belonged to Demetrius, Seleucus' son. On Antiochus' relations with the Jews see 1 Mac 1:11-6:16; 2 Mac 4:7-10:9. For an appreciation of his character see b 21 Antiochus' Accession—To the Jews Antiochus was not a theos epiphanes 'a manifest god' as he boastfully called himself, but a despicable man. He had no right to the throne; he arrived at Antioch unexpected and usurped the throne by intrigue.

c 22-24 His Rise to Power—22. The army which will be completely destroyed is probably that of Heliodorus, who, after having murdered Seleucus IV, attempted to oppose Antiochus and to seize the throne. The prince of the covenant is the high-priest Onias III, murdered in 171 (2 Mac 4:34). 23 probably describes Antiochus' duplicity. He would enter upon alliances, and then would play his allies false, and was able to rise to power by means of a small army and a few partisans. 24. He was a senseless spendthrift. In order to replenish his empty coffers he would, in time of peace, enter and loot the most opulent of the cities; he devised plans against fortified places, but this was to last only until the time fixed by God. Antiochus' prodigality is well attested by ancient historians (cf. Livy, 41, 20; Polyb., 26, 10; 1 Mac 3:30).

d 25-28 Antiochus' first Egyptian Campaign, 170-169 B.C.—Cf. 1 Mac 1:17-20. The war was provoked by Ptolemy VI Philometor acting on the insensate advice of his ministers. Antiochus defeated the young king between Pelusium on the borders of Egypt and Mt Casius, captured the fortress of Pelusium, and went on to occupy the whole of Egypt. Ptolemy, while attempting to escape, fell into the hands of Antiochus. Into this disastrous war Ptolemy was led by two of his most trusted counsellors, probably his guardians Eulacus and Lenaeus. In order to achieve the complete subjugation of Egypt, Antiochus cunningly simulated friendship with Ptolemy, whom he lavishly entertained at table and maliciously pretended that he only intended to restore him to his throne. But Alexandria held out and Ptolemy Physcon (Euergetes II), brother of Ptolemy, was proclaimed king. When Antiochus departed from Egypt, the two brothers Philometor and Euergetes were reconciled, and Antiochus' plan of a complete and permanent occupation of Egypt was foiled. On his way back to Syria Antiochus made a detour to Jerusalem and plundered the sanctuary (1 Mac 1:21-24).

e 29-30a Antiochus' second Egyptian Campaign, 168 B.C.—When the two brothers Ptolemy VI and Euergetes II had been reconciled, Antiochus marched once more towards Egypt, but the issue was quite different from that of the previous campaign. The Roman Senate, to whom the two brothers had appealed, sent the legate Popilius who, on his arrival at Alexandria, ordered Antiochus to withdraw from Egypt immediately. The words 'the galleys and the Romans' are a correct interpretation, not a translation, of Hebrew which means 'the ships of Kittim'. Kittim denotes primarily the island of Cyprus (Gen 10:4), and in a wider sense the islands and coasts of the Mediterranean Sea (Jer 2:10; Ez 27:6), and later the western maritime peoples (1 Mac 1:1; 8:5); cf. also Num 24:24.

f 30b-39 Antiochus' Persecution of the Jewish Religion and his Implety—30. After being unceremoniously turned out of Egypt, Antiochus set himself to Hellenize the Jewish nation. A pro-Hellenic party had already arisen among the Jews (1 Mac 1:12-26). Antiochus gave regard to them. 31, 32a. Antiochus' forces supported by Jewish apostates set to their task, profaning the sanctuary, which was fortified as a stronghold, abolishing the daily sacrifice and setting up an abominable idol on the altar of sacrifices; cf. 1 Mac 1:46-57. The impious men of Juda who had violated the covenant were then made apostates by means of deceitful promises. 32b. The faithful Jews were strong enough to challenge their persecutors; cf. the stories of Eleazarus (2 Mac 6:18-31), and that of the mother and her seven children (2 Mac 7). 33-35. Those that remain loyal to God, i.e. the party of the Assideans (1 Mac 2:42) or the godly, will teach others the right course. Many of them will perish, but the party will be saved from complete extermination through the assistance of the small band of the Maccabees. Many joined the ranks of the Maccabees insincerely, fearing the drastic punishment of Juda (1 Mac 3:8; 6:21-27; 7:5-7) and became traitors to their people when opportunity arose. Many will fall, but death will come upon them not as a punishment but as a means of cleansing and purifying them, as gold is purified by fire, until the time appointed by God. For a fuller historical interpretation read the Books of Maccabees.

36-39. These verses describe Antiochus' self-deification and self-identification with Zeus Olympios or Jupiter Capitolinus, and his self-exaltation over the gods of his fathers and the God of the Jews. His insolence towards God and his worshippers will last as long as God is wrathful with his people. The description of Antiochus' anti-Jewish campaign corresponds perfectly to that of the little horn in ch 7 and the he-goat in ch 8; thus: he will do what he likes, 8:25; he will exalt himself, 8:10, 11, 25; he will speak haughtily, 7:8, 25; he will have a short-lived success, 7:25; 8:12, 24 f. during the time of God's wrath with his people, 8:12. This is further evidence for the identification of the little horn and the he-goat with Antiochus. Antiochus assumed the title of theos epiphanes 'the Manifest God' in 169 after his victorious campaign in Egypt. From 169 to 166 he is represented on coins with the emblems of the deity, and the inscription is Antiochos Theos Epiphanes. But from 166 onwards his figure is that of Zeus Olympios and the inscription is 'King Antiochus, God Manifest, Victory-bearer' (F. M. Abel, loc. cit., 245 f.). Antiochus made Jupiter Capitolinus or Zeus Olympios the chief and only God of all his empire. Consequently the local Syrian deities, especially Apollo, the tutelary god of Syria, and Tammuz (Adonis), the beloved of women, a Phoenician deity so-called because its annual festival was celebrated especially by women, fell gradually into discredit. Instead of the god of his forbears he will worship the god of the fortresses, very probably Jupiter Capitolinus, who had appealed to his imagination so strongly during his prolonged sojourn at Rome, and to whom later he built a temple near Antioch and gave rich gifts (Livy, 41, 20; 42, 6). 39a in MT is obscure and probably corrupt. As it stands it means: 'He will make a bulwark of fortifications with the help of a foreign god'. A slight textual emendation will give this sense: 'He will place as defenders of the strongholds (of Judah) a people of a foreign god', the reference being to the foreign soldiers who garrisoned the fortresses of Jerusalem and Judah; cf. 1 Mac 1:33; 3:36, 45. The king's favourites were greatly honoured by him, and to them he distributed the land in return for services and, possibly, for a bribe; cf. 2 Mac 4:8-10:24.

40-45 The End of Antiochus—Apparently these verses relate another expedition against Egypt after 168. So Goettsberger, p 87, following Porphyry (Jerome, PL 25, 598). Many Catholic interpreters regard them as a recapitulation of the chief events of Antiochus' reign from 171 to his death (Linder, p 474). This opinion may, perhaps, be improved upon if we assume that 40-45 are a duplicate and shorter relation of Antiochus' campaigns added to the longer one, 21-39, by an editor. 40. 'The time of the end' is not the close of Antiochus' reign, but the time appointed by God for the execution of his designs; cf. 8:17. The allusion is to the first Syro-Egyptian war; cf. 25-28. 41. On Antiochus' invasion of the 'glorious land' see 28. For strategical reasons three peoples were not attacked. The Edomites and the Ammonites were the enemies of Judah (1 Mac 5:1-8). 42f. He reduced many lands under his power; he appropriated the treasures of Egypt, and the Lybians and Ethiopians were among his tent-followers. The historical allusions are obscure. 44. The tidings coming from the north and the east are the rumours of the insurrections of the Armenians and the Parthians (1 Mac 3:37). He crossed the 511k Euphrates to the east, arrived at Elymais in Persia, and there he attempted to plunder the treasures of the temple of the goddess, but was driven off by the people of the place. Then the news reached him of the defeat of his forces in Palestine by Judas Maccabeus (1 Mac 6:1-7; 2 Mac 9:1-3). Enraged at these reverses Antiochus ordered his troops to march into Palestine, threatening the people of Judah with utter destruction (2 Mac 9:4). He was taken ill and died at Tabae in Persia (Polyb., 31, 11). 45a. 'And he will plant the tents of his palace between the Sea and the Holy Beautiful Mountain', i.e. Mount Sion; this statement refers to Antiochus' plan of campaign against Judah. Actually Antiochus never came to Jerusalem after his last expedition in the east. 45b. Antiochus' plans of attack upon Jerusalem will not be carried out, because he will come to his end in Persia. Antiochus death is narrated in 1 Mac 6:8-16; 2 Mac 9:5-23.

512a XII 1-3 The Final Triumph of the Righteous—The end of the persecution will be followed by a period of bliss. The faithful Israelites, the martyrs of the religion of the One God, will be raised up to everlasting happiness, and the wicked to everlasting shame. The chronological succession of the end of the persecution and the resurrection must be understood according to the principles of the prophetic perspective; see § 498e, f. 1. In the time appointed by God for the duration of the persecution, the archangel Michael, the patron-angel of the Jews (10:13, 31), will take up the cause of the faithful Jews. It will be a time of unprecedented distress. Another and a more violent persecution seems to be predicted. But the angel is here looking to the far distant future, and predicting the affliction which will befall the righteous at the end of the world, cf. Mt 24:21; Mk 13:19. Thus the age of Antiochus merges insensibly into that of Antichrist. From that persecution only those will be saved whose names are written in the book of life, i.e. the true worshippers of God, who are enrolled for eternal life. For the figure of the book of life or the book of God cf. Ex 32:32; Ps 68(69) 29; Is 4:3. 2. The doctrine of the resurrection and the last judgement is clearly stated, though still in an undeveloped form. The passage is a direct reference to all the Israelites who are represented in this chapter as falling into two classes, the pious and the unfaithful (12:10). There is no reason, therefore, for taking the word 'many' in a partitive sense, as if the resurrection were restricted to the persecutors and the persecuted; cf. E. F. Sutcliffe, The OT and the Future Life, 139 f. The dead will be raised up from their sleep in the grave for everlasting life or for shame and everlasting abhorrence according to their deeds. Although the universal resurrection is not explicitly asserted, it is at least implied in the eschatological outlook of the prophet, and in the application by Christ of 2b to the last judgement, which will certainly be universal (Jn 5:29). 3. Those who are 'learned' and those who teach others the way of righteousness form, according to the law of parallelism, one class comprising all those who have a practical knowledge of God and obey his law (cf. 11:32, 35).

c 4 The Closing up of the Vision—On the sealing of the book cf. 8:26. When the appointed time comes, many will go through the book, and, on seeing that their sufferings had been predicted long before and their victory assured, their knowledge of God's universal providence will be increased.

d 5-13 Conclusion—5. After the last vision had been closed up, two other angels appeared standing on each bank of the Euphrates. Their rôle was probably to act as witnesses of the oath guaranteeing the truth of the revelation (7). 6. Daniel asked the angel clad in white (10:5 f.) when these extraordinary things would be accomplished. 7. Before answering the angel lifted up both hands to heaven appealing to the Living God to confirm the truth of what he was about to say. The answer was the same as in 7:25. A further time determination is added which, however, is very vague. The shattering of the forces of the holy people refers, if the text is sound, either to the persecution of Antiochus or to the persecutions of the last days. Persecution will cease when the holy people appears to be annihilated. By emending the text this sense may be obtained: 'When the power of the oppressor comes to an end, i.e. when Antiochus is dead, persecution will cease, Antiochus being the last persecutor. 8. Daniel asks for further particulars about the last events preceding the end which will come as foretold in 7. 9. The angel refuses. The revelation is now closed and sealed up, and nothing can be added to it. When the appointed time comes, the readers will understand what Daniel did not. 10. But all will not understand. The 'wise' (11:32, 35; 12:3), who will purify themselves, make themselves white and refine themselves through sufferings and persecution, will understand that the time of their deliverance is approaching; but the wicked will not understand. 11f. These verses seem to break the sequence of ideas and are considered by most non-Catholic critics as early interpolations meant to correct the statement of 8:14. But if 12:11 is a correction of 8:14, and 12:12 of 12:11, we should expect further corrective statements seeing that the deliverance was not accomplished at the end of 1,335 days. The two verses contain different computations of the same period predicted in 8:14, and must be regarded as integral parts. The two time indications of 1,290 and 1,335 days point immediately to the Maccabean restoration, mediately to the Messianic restoration, ultimately to the final triumph of the righteous at the end of the world. 13. The prophet will not live till the time of the promised restoration. He will rest in the grave, but will rise up to enjoy the blessings of an everlasting age.

XIII, XIV The Deuterocanonical Appendices—The stories of Susanna and of Bel and the Dragon were collected by the Greek translators from a cycle of Daniel traditions and incorporated into the book of Daniel as an appendix, but they did not form part of the original book. The stories, as they are read in the LXX and in Theod.-Vg, differ from each other in their position in the book and in certain details, the differences being mostly attributable to the liberty with which the text was handled by translators and copyists. Jerome is very careful to note that ch 12 is the end of the Hebrew book of Daniel, and that the following stories are translated from the Greek version of Theodotion. 513a

XIII The Story of Susanna—In the LXX and the Vg it follows ch 12, but in Theod. it stands at the beginning of the book. This position is against the context, and has no claim to originality.

1-4 Susanna's Virtue and Social Condition—1. The story is located in Babylon during the exile. 2f. Susanna is introduced as the daughter of Helcias and the wife of Joakim, a beautiful and a God-fearing woman, trained up in the law of Moses. 4. Her husband was one of the most distinguished Jews, and it was in his house that the exiles met for the purpose of administering justice and teaching the law. It is not incredible that Jews possessed houses in their land of exile; cf. Jer 29:5.

5-14 The Two Lustful Elders—5. The Jews in their exile seem to have been allowed to retain their own laws and institutions. The time indication 'that year' either refers to a date which has not been preserved, or has a general meaning 'in a certain year'. Jewish tradition has identified them with the two false prophets mentioned in Jer 29:21-23. The quotation is either an unwritten prophetic saying or an allusion to some passage such as Jer 23:14 ff. 8-14. The description of the two elders' lustful desires is most realistic. They saw the woman many times and felt a passion for her. They willfully indulged in their sensual desires, forgetful of the law of God and unmindful of the punishment for such sexual offences. Fully conscious of the impropriety of their desires, they tried to conceal them from one another. Their uncontrolled passion betrayed them, and one day they had to disclose their common 518d feelings. This strengthened their passion, and together they planned how to satisfy their desires.

● 15-27a Attempted Seduction—This part of the narrative is condensed by the LXX into three verses corresponding to Vg 19b, 22b, 23. What a contrast between the lewd old judges enjoying the highest authority and the lofty moral principles of the helpless woman. The two men accosted her and were repulsed; they threatened her, but she trusted in God and stood firm in her resolution. The unfaithful wife was punished by death, Lev 20:10; Deut 22:22.

† 27b-43 Susanna falsely Accused and Condemned to Death—On the following day the two judges, while hearing the causes in Joakim's house, summoned Susanna before them. She well knew the reason of the summons and came accompanied by her sorrowful household. The unveiling of the suspected adulteress was prescribed in Num 5:18, though in later times the Mishna, tr. Sota 1, 5, forbade the uncovering of a handsome woman. The judges played the part of witnesses by laying their hands upon the head of the accused, cf. Lev 24:14. Then followed the act of indictment as concocted by the perjured judges (36-40). As according to a principle of Jewish juridical procedure, a witness could not be the judge, the sentence of death was passed by the credulous multitude. Susanna protested her innocence and appealed to God's supreme tribunal.

‡ 44-60 Susanna Acquitted—Appeal from the people's verdict was admitted, and a youth called Daniel appeared as counsel for the defence. Before a capital sentence was carried out fresh evidence had to be asked for (Mishna, tr. Sanhedrin 6, 1.2), Daniel came forward protesting that he was not responsible for the death sentence, and remonstrated against the rashness with which sentence had been passed on an honourable woman, declaring the judges' evidence to be utterly false. The astonished people hurried back to the place of judgement, and the elders, obviously not the two false witnesses but their colleagues on the bench, made Daniel sit down among them, recognizing in him a superior knowledge which none but God could give. Daniel cross-examined the witnesses separately.

h The way in which Daniel addressed the elders, recalling their past misdeeds and his denunciation of the first evidence before proving its inconsistency with the other, show clearly that divine inspiration was the source of his knowledge. In Greek there is a play upon the words: 'mastic tree (oxyros)' and 'shall cut in two (oxloei)'; 'holm tree (npivos)' and 'cut in two (nploei)'. For examples of paronomasia in Hebrew cf. Jg 7:25; 10:4, etc. The paronomasia of the Greek text lends no support to the theory of a Greek original. When the people saw that the two witnesses were convicted of perjury they burst out in voices of praise to God who had saved an innocent woman from death.

† 61-64 The two Judges Condemned to Death—The death penalty was inflicted on the perjured judges according to the prescriptions of Deut 19:18-21.

‡ XIII 65-XIV 22 The Stories of Bel and the Dragon—These two short stories, connected to each other in time and place but wholly unrelated to the story of Susanna, form a single narrative closing the book of Daniel. In Theod. they follow immediately after ch 12, and are preceded by the title 'Vision 12'. In LXX they follow 'Susanna' and bear the title 'From the prophecy of Habakuk, the son of Jesus, of the tribe of Levi'. The lesson which the two stories are intended to convey is the supremacy of the One, Living God and the nothingness of all heathen gods; cf. ch 6.

k XIII 65-XIV 1 Introduction—The last verse of ch 13 is not the conclusion of the Susanna story but the introduction to the following narrative. Astyages was the last king of Media; he was defeated and made prisoner by Cyrus, who annexed his kingdom to his own before the death of Astyages. As this verse is almost identical with 6:28, and the narrative of ch 14 is closely related in meaning to that of ch 6, it has been conjectured that ch 14 originally followed after ch 6 518k (Goettsberger, p 8). When ch 14 was later separated from chh 1-6, a new introduction became necessary, and so 6:28 was repeated in 14:1 with the name Darius changed into Astyages. Daniel is always represented as enjoying the favour of his heathen sovereigns, cf. 2:48; 5:29.

2-12 The Idol Bel and his Priests—2. Bel, a shorter form for Bel-Marduk 'the Lord Marduk', was the chief of the Babylonian pantheon. To him the Babylonians offered 12 'artabas' (= c 164 bushels or 6 hecto-litres) of fine flour, 40 sheep and 6 vessels (RV 'firkin' = c 9 gallons, which is almost the exact equivalent of the Greek μετρητής) of wine (LXX 'oil') every day. The daily offering of such ample provisions to the gods was a part of the Babylonian ritual; see *G. C. Gadd, Babylonian Myth and Ritual in Myth and Ritual (Oxford, 1933) 42. 3. Cyrus for political reasons worshipped, besides his own god, the gods of his conquered peoples; Daniel, however, worshipped no other god but his own, 4, who was the only God, creator of heaven and earth, all other deities being the work of man's hands. 5. Bel was believed to be a living god, and the proof was the enormous quantities of food daily consumed by him. 6. Daniel ridiculed the argument. Clay and brass do not eat. 7-12. The king began to suspect some fraud, but the priests assured him of their god's voracity and proposed to put the matter to a test. As they penetrated into the temple by a secret entrance, they never suspected that their fraud could be detected.

13-21 The Fraud Detected and the Priests put to Death m —The result of the test was, needless to say, contrary to the priests' expectations. Truth came to light and the priests had to acknowledge their crime. According to the condition laid down by themselves (11) they were put to death together with their wives and children. The acknowledgement by the king of the superiority of the God of Daniel is implied in the king's action. But the destruction of the temple (21b) is, very probably, a Jewish insertion. It is not mentioned in the LXX, and Herodotus (1, 183) relates that the temple was pillaged by Xerxes.

22-24 The Story of the Dragon—The word 'Dragon' n denotes here, like the Greek δράκων, a large serpent. There is ample evidence of serpent-worship in Babylon, though so far there is no evidence that live snakes were worshipped as gods; cf. S. Landersdorfer, Der Drache von Babylon in BZ (1913). But it is not improbable that they were.

22-26 Daniel Kills the Dragon—If a metal idol was not a god, a live serpent certainly was, and Daniel was therefore requested to worship the serpent. Daniel refused and asked to be permitted to kill the serpent without any weapon, and to show that the serpent was no more a god than Bel. The king believing in the immortality of the serpent-god granted the permission, and after a short time the serpent was dead.

27-31 Daniel in the Lions' Den—On seeing that their gods were being destroyed the Babylonians became furious, and demanded the death of Daniel. The king tried to save him, but had to yield. On the lions' den see note to 6:23. 30b in LXX follows after v 1.

32-38 The Intervention of Habacuc—While in the den Daniel was miraculously fed through the agency of Habacuc. The words 'a prophet in Judaea' are a gloss intended to identify Daniel's Habacuc with the homonymous prophet. The identity cannot be admitted for chronological reasons. The Habacuc episode, though loosely connected with the context, prepares the way for the miraculous liberation of Daniel.

39-42 Daniel's Liberation—On the seventh day, when the people's indignation had begun to cool down, the king went to the den to mourn for Daniel. To his amazement he saw him unhurt sitting amidst the lions. Recognizing the superiority of Daniel's God the king ordered that Daniel should be immediately taken out of the den, and that the same punishment be meted out to those who had plotted against Daniel's life.

b Name and Life of the Prophet—The prophet's name Osee (Heb. hōšēa' 'salvation, deliverance', Gr. 'Ὠσηέ') is identical with that of the last king of Israel (4 Kg 17:1) and with the original name of Josue, Moses' successor (Num 13:17). Of his place of origin, social position, and other circumstances of his life nothing is known beyond what can be gleaned from his book. He is described as the son of Beeri, 1:1. His interest in the Northern Kingdom, his intimate knowledge of its political and religious conditions and the absence of any mention of Jerusalem bear evidence of his Israeliish origin. As most of the metaphors and images in Osee's book are taken from agricultural life (cf. 4:16; 6:3; 8:7; 9:2, 10, 16; 10:1, 11-13; 13:3; 14:6-8), it has been inferred that the prophet was a farmer. The inference, however, does not seem to be sufficiently warranted, as the prophet's peculiar imagery may be due to his profound love of nature. He married Gomer, the daughter of Debelaim, from whom he had three children.

The story of the prophet's marriage has, since the days of St Jerome, been a subject of controversy. It has been repeatedly asked whether the prophet in the first three chapters is relating history, vision, or allegory. Long lists of names may be drawn up in support of the several interpretations which may be grouped in two classes: the literal and the non-literal. In favour of the non-literal interpretation it is urged: (a) that it is inconceivable that a prophet of Yahweh should dishonour himself by such a shameful marriage or that God himself should command a union so repugnant to the moral sense; (b) that the domestic events narrated in 1:3-9 took too much time to serve as the basis of a moral lesson to the people; (c) that the prophets were sometimes commanded by God to perform actions which it was impossible to perform except in a vision, cf. Ez 4:9-17; (d) that the close connexion between the act itself and its symbolical meaning, 1:2, clearly suggests that the prophet's main concern is the religious state of his people, not the story of his domestic life.

To these arguments the supporters of the literal interpretation reply : (a) what is in itself repugnant to the moral sense remains so even if it is the object of a vision or an allegory ; (b) the moral lesson is based not so much on the symbolical names of Osee's children as on his marriage ; (c) from the fact that certain actions commanded by God could not be performed except in a vision it cannot be inferred that all actions commanded by God to his prophets were performed in a vision, cf. 3 Kg 22:11, etc. ; (d) this is true, but does not show that the prophet's marriage was not real.

• All are agreed that the prophet's marriage has a symbolical meaning. A distinguishing feature of a symbolical action is its unusual and extravagant character. Thus Ahias rends his new garment in 12 pieces, 514e 3 Kg 11:30; cf. also Is 20:2; Jer 19:10. The symbolical action is really a dramatic representation of an abnormal moral or religious situation intended to make the people realize the situation more vividly.

Such actions, which no man under normal conditions will do, may be performed either actually or in a vision.
They are considered to be performed in a vision when the moral lesson is intended for the prophet alone.
But when the lesson is intended for the people, the symbolical action must be considered as really performed (Buzv, 21).

The application of these considerations to Osee's marriage shows that it was real. No one will deny that marriage with a woman of evil character is out of the common run. All will likewise agree that the moral lesson inherent in Osee's marriage was intended for the people not for the prophet who needed no proof of the people's wickedness. The people must have been shocked on seeing the prophet bringing home a dishonoured wife and, it is reasonable to suppose, manifested their disapproval, thus providing him with an opportunity to insist on the hideousness of their faithlessness to Yahweh despite Yahweh's immense love for them.

The literal interpretation may, however, be given another form. Gomer was, at the time of her marriage, of an irreproachable character. She is called 'a wife of fornications' on account of her later misbehaviour. After having borne three children she loved another man and was sent away by her husband. But Osee still loved his erring wife and after some time bought her back. This interpretation does not weaken the demonstrative force of the symbolical action, because the queerness or unusualness inherent in the symbolic action may well consist in Gomer's misbehaviour and in her being divorced and taken again by her husband. For a fuller discussion of the different views see Buzy, 33-93; P. Cruveilhier, RB (1916) 342-62; A. Reigner, RB (1923) 390-7.

Osee was called to the prophetic ministry during the reign of Jeroboam II (783-743 B.C., Kugler, Von Moses bis Paulus, 164). As the prediction of the fall of Jehu's dynasty made at the beginning of Osee's ministry, 1:4, was fulfilled in 743 B.C. with the murder of Zacharias, Jeroboam's son and successor, the prophet must have begun his ministry at least some years before 743. All are agreed on this. But opinions differ on the question of the duration of his ministry. According to 1:1 it extended till the reign of Ezechias (721-693 B.C., Kugler, op. cit., 163). Many interpreters, however, on internal grounds, reduce Osee's ministry within narrower limits. The fall of Samaria in 722-721 is represented as a future event, 8:5 f.; 9:5-8; 14:1. The people of Israel turning for help to Assyria, 5:13, 6:11, 8:9, still enjoy a certain measure of political independence which they lost in the reign of Phacee, 736-732 B.C. There is no allusion to the war of Phacee of Samaria and Rasin of Damascus against Achaz of Judah in 734 B.C. These facts suggest that Osee's ministry did not extend beyond the reign of Manahem, 742-737 B.C., and consequently the words 'Achaz and Ezechias' in the superscription are to be regarded as interpolated (Hoonacker, 1 f., 12). Osee's ministry is, therefore, made to cover a period of approximately ten h The Historical and Religious Background—Osee lived and prophesied in a time of internal political decadence and general moral corruption. The long and prosperous reign of Jeroboam II was the last flash of glory enjoyed by a crumbling kingdom. Zacharias, Jeroboam's son and successor, was murdered by Sellum after a six-months' reign, 4 Kg 15:10. Sellum himself was killed by Phacee who succeeded, with the aid of Assyria, in maintaining himself in power for six years, 742-737 B.C. (4 Kg 15:17). His son Phaceia was murdered by Phacee after two years, 4 Kg 15:23-25. Phacee entered on a military alliance with Rasin of Damascus against Assyria, 4 Kg 16:5; Is 7. But Tiglath-pileser defeated the allied armies, captured Damascus, overran the northern territory of Israel and deported the inhabitants to Assyria, 4 Kg 15:29. The Northern Kingdom, reduced more or less to the territory of the tribe of Ephraim, became a vassal-state of Assyria. The loss of political independence provoked a strong feeling of hostility against Assyria which made the people turn for help to Egypt. The intrigues and manoeuvres of the pro-Egyptian party were largely responsible for the downfall of Ephraim. Phacee, the leader of this party, was assassinated by Osee, a loyal pro-Assyrian who became king of Israel and paid unflinchingly his annual tribute to the Assyrian monarch so long as Tiglath-pileser lived. But on the accession of Shalmaneser V (727 B.C.) Osee fell into the trap of the anti-Assyrian party and refused to pay tribute. This was tantamount to an act of revolt. Osee was deposed, and after a three-year siege Samaria fell to the Assyrians in 721 B.C.

i The religious situation may be described as a confused medley of a perverted Yahweh-worship and an idolatrous Baal-worship due to a misconception of the true character of Yahweh. The calf-worship was the official cult. Though not originally an idolatrous worship, the calf being intended only as a representation of Yahweh, it was certainly against the prescriptions of Ex 20:4 and led most naturally to idolatry. When, later, king Achab, who had married a Phoenician wife, introduced Baal-worship into his kingdom, 3 Kg 16:30, not only was a new form of religion, characterized by its licentious cult, set up in the kingdom of Israel, but the Yahweh cult itself became evermore contaminated by idolatrous influences. As in the days of Elias, 3 Kg 18:21, the people worshipped Yahweh as well as the Canaanitish deities. They still kept the Sabbath and held their annual festivals, 2:11, offered sacrifices to Yahweh, 5:6, 8:13, and swore by Yahweh, 4:15. They worshipped Yahweh at Bethel, 4:15, and burnt incense and gave themselves up to debauchery on hill-tops, 4:13 f.; they made idols of silver and gold, 8:4; 13:2. Yahweh, their God, was conceived as one among other gods. He demanded sacrifices which they offered punctiliously, but he had no regard, they thought, to their moral conduct and internal dispositions. Hence religion came to be considered as the performance of acts of worship rather than a system of religious truths and moral precepts. Osee's preaching was directed mainly against the calf-worship, but in point of fact it was Baal-worship which constituted the heinous infidelity of Israel.

j Contents and Analysis—The theme of Osee's book is the expression of a strong reaction of love against ingratitude. Yahweh loved his people in spite of their unworthiness; he loved them still despite their backslidings; he threatened to cast them off; but, though they were not responsive to his persistent appeals, his wrath was that of a loving father ever ready to receive his repentant children into his arms. It is difficult to give a logical division of the whole book. Chh 1-3 are easily distinguishable from the rest. The prophet's affection for his unfaithful wife represents in a dramatic manner Yahweh's love for his ungrateful and unfaithful people. The remaining chapters contain, in an abridged form, some of the prophet's discourses loosely connected with one another, but all subordinated to the central theme—God's love and the people's ingratitude. Chh 4-8 form one group of discourses in which the prevailing thought is Israel's guilt with occasional references to punishment. The prophet denounces the depravity of the people which he traces back to their ignorance of God and to the bad example of the priests, ch 4. He then arraigns in a special manner the kings and the priests, the leaders of the nation, who are held responsible for the general degradation of public life, 5:1-14. If Israel will repent sincerely, God will forgive them, but at present their sins appear to be beyond remedy, 5:15-6:11a.

Revolutions, anarchy, and decay of national strength are the disastrous consequences of their having forsaken God, the only source of their strength, and turned for assistance to foreign powers, 6:11b-7:7 and 7:8-16. The prophet denounces once more Israel's most grievous sins: idolatry, an unlawful dynasty and foreign policy, and announces imminent punishment, ch 8. In chh 9-14:1 the leading idea is this imminent punishment with frequent references to Israel's sins. While the people are rejoicing in their harvest feasts, the prophet announces the exile into Assyria or Egypt, 9:1-9. He recalls Israel's inveterate wickedness and depicts with gloomy colours the dire punishment which will soon be meted out to them, 9:10-17. Altars and sacrifices will not avert the coming doom; on the contrary they only serve to increase Israel's guilt, 10:1-8. Punishment can be averted only by a change of life, 10:9-11:1. In a moving discourse, one of the finest passages of the whole book, the prophet recalls God's incessant care for Israel since their early days and depicts the reaction of God's love to Israel's ingratitude, 11:1b-11. The two last discourses, 11:12-12:14 and 13:1-14:1, develop some of the leading ideas of the whole book, Israel's infidelity, the unchangeableness of divine purpose, punishment. 14:2-10 form the conclusion of the book. After having atoned for all her sins Israel will repent, return to God, and enjoy God's favour once more.

Doctrinal Contents—These may be grouped under i two headings: God and Religion. Though Yahweh is generally represented as the God of Israel, 3:5, 4:6, 12, etc., and the only source of their welfare and salvation, 2:8, 21 f., 13:4, he is also the only God, 13:4, while the Canaanitish Baals and all other deities are nothing but the work of man, 8:4-6; 13:2. Osee's monotheistic doctrine was not a creation of his own or of the prophetic school of the 8th century B.C., but the basis of the religion of Israel from its very beginning. Idolatry was the result of the people's ignorance of Yahweh, 4:6, i.e. the people fell into idolatry on account of their misconceptions of the true nature of Yahweh whom they considered as one of the local Canaanitish deities. The prophets did not introduce a new doctrine but simply endeavoured to recall the people to the monotheism of their forefathers; cf. M. J. Lagrange, La nouvelle histoire d'Israël et le prophète Osee, RB (1892) 208 ff.

The relation between Yahweh and his people is represented under the figure of a covenant, 6:7, or of a marriage, 2:2 ff. The figure of a marriage which occurs first in Osee, and was probably suggested to him by his domestic experience, became common in later writings, cf. Is 54:6; Ez 16; and the Cantic of Canticles. In NT times the bridegroom is Christ and the bride the Church, cf. Jn 3:29; 2 Cor 11:2; Eph 5:23-32; Apoc 21:9. This symbolical marriage was contracted out of God's immense love for the people of Israel. As God's plans are unchangeable, so is the marriage bond indissoluble. He will never put away his bride though she may prove unfaithful. In point of fact the Israelites were never completely rejected by God: they were punished with the exile for their 514m infidelity, but afterwards they were taken up again by God and restored to their former rights and privileges. God's punishments are corrective, not vindictive. He punishes the sinner in order to make him acknowledge his sin and repent of it. He is represented as a loving father who cannot divest himself of his affection for his children even if they prove untrue to him. God is ever ready to receive the repentant sinner. Osee's conception of Yahweh as the God of love approaches very closely to the sublime doctrine of St. John on Christ's love; cf. 1 Jn 4:7-21.

n The religion of Osee considered in its practical aspect includes two elements, the sacrificial worship and the moral law. Osee apparently condemns sacrifice, 6:6; cf. Is 1:11-14. In reality, however, he only condemns those popular forms of worship that are either idolatrous or infected with idolatrous influences. This is made clear by his strong denunciation of the immoral cult-practices, 4:13 f., and the unlawful forms of worship, 7:14, 8:4-6, 11, 10:1 ff., 13:2, characteristic of the Canaanitish religion. Sacrifice and all other external acts of worship are acceptable to God only when they are accompanied by a true knowledge of the Only God and his law and a sincere love for God and men. In other words it is the internal disposition of the worshipper that renders the external act acceptable to God.

o The moral law of Osee covers the greater part of the decalogue. The fifth, sixth, seventh and eighth commandments are clearly implied in 4:2. Image-worship is forbidden, 8:4 ff.; 10:2, 5, 8; 13:2. The law of the Sabbath rest or festival is referred to in 2:11.

p Osee's Messianic doctrine is closely connected with his conception of the indissolubility of the marriage bond between Yahweh and his people. The people will be punished by exile but will not be utterly destroyed. After having atoned for their infidelity they will be reinstated in their position of people of God. This restoration, however, as described by the prophet, lies beyond the historical horizon of the post-exilic age. As the prophets do not generally distinguish between the near and the distant future, the historical post-exilic perspective and the Messianic perspective represent one restoration commencing with the return from the exile and culminating in the deliverance by the Messiah and the establishment of a universal kingdom upon earth. The main features of the Messianic restoration are: (i) an everlasting covenant established on justice and righteousness; cf. also Jer 31:31-34. (ii) the people will be innumerable as the sands of the sea, 1:10. (iii) the calling of the Gentiles is typically predicted, cf. 1:10; 2:24 and Rom 9:25 f.; 1 Peter 2:10. (iv) the Messianic people will be under one king of the Davidic dynasty, 3:5. On 6:3 and 11:1 see the commentary.

q Osee's Character—Osee was a man of a strongly emotional character and a deeply religious temperament. He is rightly called the prophet of love as St John is the Apostle of love. He was a loving husband and a loving father. His sensitive nature finds expression not only in his efforts to woo back his erring wife, but also in passionate outbursts of paternal love (11:8) and in the pathetic images by which he describes Yahweh's care for Israel (11:2-4). But his affections were centred mainly on Yahweh. His strong love for Yahweh provoked in him violent outbursts of anger against his ungrateful people. Justice demanded that the people should be punished. But love reacted to the claims of justice and triumphed. Transferring his human feelings to God the prophet pictures Yahweh threatening his people with severe punishment, but saving them from utter destruction. As the prophet could never be brought to keep his wife away, so Yahweh would not reject his people for ever.

r Text and Style—The Hebrew text of the book of Osee has been badly preserved and this to a certain extent accounts for its obscurity. Some passages may be confidently emended with the help of the LXX, but others are corrupt beyond emendation, and critical conjecture is the only means to make the text yield a reasonable sense. The Vg, though representing a form of text older than that of our MT, is of no help for the restoration of the original text. To the corrupt and unintelligible passages St Jerome added a number of mistranslations, thus 4:6 conticuit for perit; 7:10 humiliabitur for respondebit; 10:14 Salman is erroneously identified with Salmana of Jg 8; 11:8 prolegam for tradam (deliver up); 12:7 Chanaan for mercator; and others which will be noticed in the commentary. Osee's style is described by St. Jerome as 'commaticus', i.e. made up of short and abrupt sentences 'quasi per sententias loquens' (Praef. in XII Propb., PL 28, 1015). This is due not so much to a defective literary skill as to the prophet's strongly emotional nature, to conflicting and sometimes uncontrolled feelings and to his profound religious temperament. Though Osee's prophetic utterances are cast in a rhythmical form, they cannot be reduced to uniform metrical standard, and all attempts to rearrange the text metrically involve so many textual alterations as to render the rearrangement unacceptable.

A. I-III Osee's Marriage and its Symbolical Meaning 515a

—The prophet relates a personal experience of domestic life in order to outline more effectively the message which he is about to bring to his people, a message of love for an unfaithful people.

1 Superscription—See § 514g.

2, 3a Osee's Marriage—At the beginning of his ministry Osee was commanded by God to marry 'a wife of fornications'. For the meaning of this appellation see § 514f. The children share their mother's disgrace, although the appellation 'sons of fornication' does not necessarily mean that they were born in adultery. There is nothing in the text suggesting that they were illegitimate. It is probable that the symbolical meaning of Osee's marriage reacted upon the literal sense of the origin of his children so that a new symbolical meaning completely absorbed this literal sense. The prophet's children, representing as they did a people untrue to its God, are called adulterine in the same sense as their mother, the nation of Israel, is called adulterous because of her unfaithfulness to Yahweh. God explains the reason of this perplexing command. The people of Israel had turned away from Yahweh and gone after foreign gods as a wife who goes astray. In order that the people may realize the hideousness of their behaviour, the prophet is to marry a woman of disreputable character and thus excite a feeling of horror in their insensible hearts. Obeying God's command Osee married Gomer, the daughter of Debelaïm. The names of daughter and father have no symbolical meanings.

3b-9 His Children—3b-5 The first son was called Jezrahel. This symbolical name refers to the events narrated in 4 Kg 9:21-26, 30-37; 10:7-11. The sanguinary deeds there recorded were to be avenged by the downfall of Jehu's dynasty and the extinction of the kingdom of Israel. Two points deserve consideration. First, the birth of Osee's firstborn fell in the last years of Jeroboam or in the six months of the reign of his son Zacharias, the last of Jehu's royal descendants. Consequently Osee began to prophesy during the last years of Jeroboam II. Secondly, the prophet considered the overthrow of Jehu's dynasty as the beginning of a period of political decadence to culminate in the extinction of the Northern Kingdom. It cannot, therefore, be inferred that he expected the end of the kingdom of Israel to come with the downfall of Jehu's dynasty, especially as he lived under other kings after the fall of Jehu's house. The place of the collapse of the Israelite forces will have been the Vale of Jezreel which stretches from the town of Jezreel, the modern Zerin, in a SE. direction down to the Jordan. Jezreel, not Samaria, is mentioned here on account of the massacre perpetrated by Jehu and of its assanance with Israel.

6. The prophet's second child was a daughter, whom he 515d called by God's command 'Without mercy', thus symbolizing the inexorable doom impending over Israel. Times without number had God shown mercy to his people; but there is a limit to God's mercy and that limit has been reached. 7. God will, however, have mercy on the house of Judah. This parenthetical remark interrupts the narrative of the prophet's domestic story and is considered by many critics as an interpolation (Harper, Robinson) or as a transposition from ch 2 (Hoonacker). It extends the prophetic outlook beyond the political conditions of the kingdom of Judah. The house of Judah, i.e. the Davidic dynasty, will never be permanently cut off. As a political power it will be overthrown, but a time will come when, through the assistance of God and without military help, it will be restored to its former, and even to a brighter, splendour. The perspective is obviously Messianic. 8f. The third child, a son, was called 'Not-my-people', a name symbolizing the total rejection of Israel. As the Israelites have refused to recognize Yahweh as their only God, Yahweh will no longer regard them as his people.

6 10-II 1 Promise of a Brighter Future—10. All of a sudden the prophet's outlook becomes brighter, and the rejection is represented as a temporary punishment which will be followed by a magnificent restoration. The people of Israel will increase to extraordinary numbers and will be taken up again by God as his sons, the sons of a living God who can protect them from all evil. 11. The kingdoms of Judah and Israel will be reunited under one leader and will come up to Jerusalem from their land of captivity, because the day of Jezreel, a day of humiliation for the old Israel, will be a day of triumph for the new Israel. Although the prophet has clearly in view the return from the captivity, his vision extends to the Messianic age, when the children of Israel, the 'Israel of God' (Gal 6:16) or the Christians, will be the object of the divine favour and will become numerous as the sand of the sea (Rom 9:25 f.; 1 Pet. 2:10), forming one kingdom under one king, the Messias.

516a II 2-13 Gomer's Conjugal Unfaithfulness—After having borne three children to her husband, Gomer broke the conjugal bond. The children remained with their father who did all he possibly could to bring his wife back to him. This is the literal and historical sense. Symbolically, Gomer is the nation, the children are the individual Israelites, the husband is Yahweh. 2. The prophet urges his children to expostulate with their mother that she may put away her effrontery and her lewdness. 3. He threatens her with expiation and death. The day of her nativity is the time of the Exodus, the beginning of Israel's national life. Adultery was punishable by death (Lev 20:10) which is expressed here by the image of a dry and barren land. In 4 ff. there is an imperceptible transition from the historical to the symbolical sense. On the one hand Osee threatens his faithless wife, on the other Yahweh threatens the people for their idolatry.

her abject condition to her lovers who will be powerless to help her. 11-13. Now the figure of the erring wife fades away and that of the nation again becomes prominent. The joyful celebrations of Israel will cease; the vineyards and fig trees, believed to be the reward of her gods, will be devastated. God will punish the people for having worshipped the Baals in whose temples they arrayed themselves in jewels and sacred garments. Although the literal and the symbolical meanings run into each other, the symbolical sense is the more relevant. The people have gone after the Canaanitish gods and God called them back by some unspecified calamity. They will recognize the helplessness of their gods and will return to their God. Cf. the parable of the prodigal son, Lk 15:11-32.

14-25 The Last Act of the Drama of Divine Love— The prophet's wife goes off the stage and the only actors are Yahweh and the nation of Israel. When the people of Israel have paid the penalty of their faithlessness, God moved by their miserable condition will come once more to their rescue. He is represented as a husband wooing his erring wife. 14. In order to win her over he will lead her to the wilderness and there he will speak to her words of love. The wilderness is a figure for the land of exile. The figure is reminiscent of the first betrothal of Yahweh to Israel in the wilderness of Sinai. 15. In the land of exile Israel will repent and will be reconciled to her spouse who will give her back her vineyards, i.e. her former possessions, and the Vale of Achor will be for her a ray of hope. The reference is to Jos 7:25 ff. The first entrance of Israel into Palestine through the valley of Achor was accompanied by disaster, but the second entrance will be entirely successful. The restoration will be complete. In that quiet place Israel, overwhelmed by the irresistible power of God's love, will joyfully and submissively respond to her husband's appeals, as she did in her younger years. 16f. In that day—an expression used to introduce the Messianic age—Israel will no longer call Yahweh 'Baali', i.e. my Baal, but 'Ysi' 'my Husband'. Baal (lit. 'master') has sometimes the meaning of 'husband', cf. Gen 20:3, Lev 21:4, etc., and is therefore a synonym of 'Ysi' 'man, husband'. But Baal is also used to denote the Canaanitish deities and its use is condemned on account of its heathen associations. Cf. the NT conception of the Church as the Bride of Christ, Eph 5:32. In Osee's time Yahweh was worshipped under the name and by the cult of Baal (see § 514i), but the future relation of Israel to Yahweh will be that of a faithful spouse, and all memory of the Baal-worship will be wiped out.

18. The relations between Yahweh and the new Israel are described as a covenant; cf. also Is 55:3; Jer 31:31-34; 32:40; Ez 16:60; 34:25; 37:26. One feature of this covenant is peace and security; cf. Is 11:9; Ez 34:25; Mic 5:9 ff. 19f. The covenant is also represented as a permanent betrothal established on justice and righteousness and on God's love and mercy. To this betrothal both parties will remain faithful, and the people will acknowledge their God as the Yahweh of the Old Covenant, a God true to his promises. A fuller and deeper knowledge of God is another characteristic of the Messianic age; cf. Is 11:9; Jer 31:33. Therefore a new era commencing with the post-exilic restoration and reaching its fullness in the Messianic age will dawn on the reborn Israel. 21 f. It will be an age of abundance. Jezreel, i.e. Israel, will ask for temporal blessings, these will ask the land to yield an abundant crop, the land will ask the heavens to send the rain in its proper season, the heavens will ask God to be allowed to pour rain on the earth, and God will respond in faithful love. 23 f. are a striking contrast with ch 1. Jezreel, the scene of the overthrow of the Northern Kingdom, became a name significant of God's planting (lit. 'God sows') his people again on their land. They will become once more the people of God and the object of his favours.

516a III 1-5 Gomer's Reconciliation to her Husband—Gomer had deserted her husband (2:2) and was living with another man. Her rightful husband bought her back, but for some time she had to live in seclusion. This seems to be the historical meaning of ch 3 (Harper, Robinson, Hoonacker, Tobac). According to another interpretation, which may be traced back to St Jerome (PL 25, 842), the woman of ch 3 is not Gomer, hence Osee is said to have married twice (Crampon, 736 f; Knab. 60; Buzy 72-88). The first interpretation is more probable as it fits in better with the historical and symbolical meanings of chh 1-3.

f 1. The sensitive soul of Osee could not divest itself of its warm affection for his faithless wife. He loved her still, as the Lord loved Israel though she abandoned him and worshipped the Canaanite gods. The phrase 'lovers of raisin-cakes' characterizes the Baal-worshippers. 2. Unable to resist the impulse of his heart he bought her back for 15 shekels (c £2) and one homer and a half (12 bushels) of barley. Supposing the ordinary price of barley was a little less than one-half shekel per seah (4 Kg 7:18), or one-third of a shekel per seah, the price of one homer and a half (45 seahs) would be 15 shekels which added to the 15 shekels in money give an amount of 30 shekels, which was the price of a bondmaid (Ex 21:32). It may therefore be inferred that Gomer had become a slave concubine of her master and was afterwards redeemed by her husband by the payment of a fixed sum.

g 3. Gomer had now to give up her past licentious life and lead, for a certain time, a quiet life (DV wait) preparing herself to be reinstated in her conjugal rights. MT reads: '... many days thou shalt sit still for me ... and I also (will sit still) for thee'. Vg and DV reproduce the sense rightly though not literally. Both wife and husband, though reconciled, will live in a state of isolation for some time before re-establishing their old relations. This temporary separation is, of course, a punishment inflicted by the husband upon his faithless wife. Very probably the historical sense is, to a large extent, absorbed by the symbolical sense, i.e. the verse expresses not so much Osee's behaviour to his reconciled wife as Yahweh's attitude towards repentant Israel. 4f. The symbolical sense is formally declared. The people of Israel will not be restored to their former rights as soon as they turn back to Yahweh. For some time they will be denied Yahweh's familiarity. They will have to live, as it were, in seclusion, deprived of their political leaders and of the objects of their worship. In v 4 read 'pillars' for DV 'altars'. When the period of seclusion is terminated, the children of Israel united under one king (cf. 1:11) of the Davidic dynasty attach themselves again to their God trembling with joy before the Lord and his bounty. The prediction of Israel's post-exilic restoration foreshadows the Messianic age with all its spiritual blessings. This is borne out by the fact that the king of the restoration is called simply David, an appellation of the Messiah (cf. Jer 23:5; Ez 34:23 f.; 37:24 f.) and by the indefinite time-indication 'in the last days' which usually denotes the Messianic times (cf. Is 2:2; Jer 23:20; Mic 4:1, etc.).

517a B. IV-XIV 1 Commnatory Discourses—In plain but vehement language the prophet denounces the sins of the people and threatens them with punishment.

b IV 1-14 The Sins of the People and their Cause—The prophet addresses the people and their religious leaders announcing Yahweh's judgement or contention with them. 1f. This judgement is called for by their sins: (i) lack of truth, i.e. honesty in dealing with one another; (ii) lack of mercy or love for one's fellow-men; (iii) lack of knowledge of God, not mere theoretical knowledge, but practical knowledge consisting in obedience to God's law and the performance of duties towards other men; (iv) cursing or swearing; (v) lying (iv and v may be combined as the sin of false swearing); (vi) killing; (vii) theft; (viii) adultery; (ix) house-breaking (DV 'have overflowed'); (x) frequent murder.

8. The people will be punished by drought and famine. In 3d read 'all the fish will perish.' The land and the animals are frequently associated with men in punishment; cf. Is 16:8; 24:3-6; Am 8:8, etc. 4. Vg may be interpreted in two ways: The moral depravation is so deeply rooted that the people is like one who stands out against the priest, the representative of God; reproof is of no avail, correction hopeless; or let no one contend with God over the severity of the punishment; they fully deserve it because their sin is comparable in its gravity to that of resisting the authority of the priest. But the context represents the priest as the source of all the moral corruption not as the lawful representative of God. Hence it is perhaps preferable to emend 4b slightly and translate Heb. thus: 'Let no one find fault (or: surely, none finds fault) with the people; let no one reprove them: it is with thee, O priest, that I have a quarrel; or My people are like their priestlings'. The priest is to blame more than the people because he has neglected his duties. 5 is obscure. Heb. reads: Thou (O priest) shalt stumble by day, and the prophet too shall stumble with thee by night, and I will destroy thy mother. Priestlings and false prophets will be punished alike. The 'mother' is either the nation (Knab.) or the whole priestly clan (Harper). 6. The people have perished morally on account of the sins committed owing to their ignorance of God's law. It was the priests' duty to learn and to teach the law of God, the torah (3 Kg 12:31; 13:33; Agg 2:12; Mal 2:7), the basis of which was the belief in, and the worship of, Yahweh, the God of the Alliance and the Only God. The priests have wickedly neglected this instruction, and since they have shown such unconcern for God's honour, they will be rejected from the priesthood. The subject in 'thou hast forgotten' refers to the priest against whom the rebuke is directed, not to 'mother' of 5 (Vg). The children are the individual priests. The northern priesthood was certainly illegitimate (3Kg 12:31) and its rejection by God implies a more severe punishment. 7. Their sins increased in proportion to their number, but God will cover with shame the glory with which they have bedecked themselves. This is the general sense of Vg though somewhat vague. Many scholars adopt the Syriac reading 'they exchanged' for 'I will change' and interpret: They have exchanged their glory, i.e. Yahweh and his worship, for an ignominious idol-cult. This reading recommends itself both for its excellent sense and for its parallelism to the first half of the verse. Others, on the strength of Jewish tradition, moreover substitute 'my glory' for 'their glory'. The sense remains substantially the same. 8. The priests encouraged idolatry. As a portion of the sin-offering went to them (Lev 6:25 f.) they would have been deprived of a substantial source of income if the people offered their sacrifices in the temple of Jerusalem. Idolatry was therefore a lucrative business for the priests who fed greedily on the sins of the people. For 'souls' read 'greed'. 9. The priests will therefore be punished with the people. 10. The priests' desires will be unsatisfied; disappointment will be their reward. This is the general sense though the meaning of Heb. yiprōšū 'they break through, they spread out, they increase' (DV 'they have not ceased') is not clear.

11-14. Debauchery and drunkenness played havoc among the religious institutions of the Israelites. The people, led astray by a spirit of apostasy from God, turn to wooden images for advice and consult their divination rods. They worship their gods on hilltops with all the immoral ritual of the Canaanites. But the young, inexperienced women will be punished with less severity, all responsibility resting with their elders, whose example they follow, and with the priests, who encourage the licentious cult of the Canaanites. A people having no knowledge of God's law will perish (41c).

15-19 A Warning to Judah—15. The prophet warns those of Judah not to follow the example of Israel.

5171 They are to have no connexion with Galgal and Bethaven, important places of idolatrous worship, cf. 9:15; 10:5; 12:11. Bethaven ('house of iniquity') is an ironic designation of Bethel ('the house of God') which was raised to a centre of calf-worship by Jeroboam (3Kg 12:29; cf. the Hebrew of Am 5:5 'Bethel shall become [Beth]aven'). Swearing by Yahweh was not sinful (Jer 4:2); the prohibition is obviously restricted to swearing by Yahweh considered as a calf-god. 16. The obstinate Israelites have become like an unmanageable heifer; is it now possible that Yahweh will lead them like a lamb to spacious pastures? For the interrogative sense see GK §150a. 17. The prophet goes on addressing Judah. Ephraim, a designation of the Northern Kingdom very common in Osee, is associated with idols; let him meet his fate alone. 18 is corrupt. By introducing a slight textual change in 18a and adopting the LXX reading in 18c we translate: Those of Ephraim are a band of drunkards; they give themselves up to harlotry; they prefer their shame to her pride, i.e. Yahweh-worship. 19. Calamity will fall upon them like a storm-wind which will carry them away from their country and there they will have to acknowledge the uselessness of their idolatrous worship.

g V 1-14 The Doom of Israel is Inevitable—The moral corruption and the faithlessness of the people encouraged by the priests and the rulers have reached such a stage that a sincere return to Yahweh appears to be impossible and therefore no human power can avert the impending punishment.

1. The prophet arraigns the priests, the people, and the royal family. A sentence has been passed upon them because they have become like a snare on Mt Maspha and a net spread upon Mt Thabor and a deep pit dug in Shittim (2). God will punish them all. The metaphors 'snare, net, pit' denote the artful and insidious devices by which both priests and rulers entrapped the unwary Israelites in the meshes of idolatry. 3f. But though they have been thus ensnared, their internal dispositions are not hidden from God. They are hardened sinners; the spirit of apostasy has so overwhelmed them that they are unable to appreciate the holiness and justice of Yahweh and to return sincerely to him. 5. Their arrogance is evident on their faces; their confidence in their gods and their stubborn resistance to the warnings of the prophets will in the long run bring about their destruction and that of Judah. 6f. They may try to avert the disaster by sacrifices, but these will do them no good as they are not accompanied by internal dispositions of repentance and obedience (1 Kg 15:22). Yahweh has left them because they have treacherously broken the pact with him, as a woman breaking the marriage bond. The children begotten during this period of conjugal or religious infidelity are naturally illegitimate and in a short time they and their possessions will be utterly destroyed. 8. The suddenness of the destruction is vividly represented by a series of imperatives 'Blow the cornet', etc. As all the places mentioned here are situated near the border line of the kingdoms of Judah and Israel, the enemy is represented as having already occupied almost all the Northern Kingdom and is approaching its southernmost border, unless we are to believe that the attack on Israel will come from the south, i.e. from Judah (Knab. 92). The last sentence of 8 means that the enemy is already at the frontiers of Benjamin, which probably stands for Judah. 9. Devastation will be the fate of Ephraim, as it is surely predicted.

h 10-14 present another aspect of the dismal picture of the degeneration of Israel and Judah. The princes of Judah have become like those who displace landmarks. The moving of the boundary stones of landed property was expressly forbidden (Deut 19:14; Prov 22:28). Here, however, it denotes any encroachment upon the rights of God or man. 11. Even those of Ephraim, since they chose to go after the abominable gods of other nations, are guilty of deeds of violence and iniquitous judgements. 12. Internal disintegration will be their first punishment. In Osee's time national deterioration had already set in. 13. When Judah and Ephraim realized the seriousness of their internal political situation, Ephraim looked to Assyria for help, and Judah, which very probably must be supplied as the subject of the verb 'sent', turned for assistance to an anonymous king whom Vg and DV have dubbed 'the avenging king'. It is impossible to identify this avenger. The Heb. Yareb, seemingly a proper name, is either a nickname meaning 'contender, bellicose', or a corruption of rab 'great'. 'The Great King' was a title of the kings of Assyria (cf. Is 36:4). 14. But all human efforts are unavailing. Ephraim and Judah are like a prey in a lion's claws; who dares to rescue it? 15-VI 11a Israel's Present Wickedness and Future Repentance—The contrast between Israel returning to God (6:1) and Israel hardened in sin (6:7 ff.), has led some interpreters (Harper, Brown) to believe that Israel's conversion was not sincere. But there is nothing in the text suggesting such insincerity. The sense is: Israel will repent. Will God forgive them? Their past conversions were shortlived and their present conditions are such as to provoke God's anger rather than his mercy. God will forgive when Israel has adequately atoned for its sins.

V 15-VI 3 Israel's Repentance—Yahweh is represented as returning to his heavenly abode and abandoning the people to their fate until they atone for their offences. The prophet has the captivity in view. VI 1-3. There deprived of all human help they will acknowledge their fault and turn earnestly to God, recognizing him as the author of their calamity and the source of their life and welfare. They feel confident that God will deliver them in a very short time. For the use of the numerals in the expression 'after two days: on the third day' see Lk 13:32. The passage has been interpreted by many of the Fathers as a prediction of Christ's resurrection (Knab., 102 f.). This interpretation cannot be accepted except as an accommodation of the literal sense which foretells the national and religious revival of Israel after the exile (Tobac, 228-30). In the liturgy of Holy Week the passage 6, 1-3 is read at the beginning of the Mass of the Presanctified by an accommodation to the imminent resurrection of Christ. The conversion of Israel is also represented as an earnest effort to obtain a better knowledge of God. They feel confident also that God's aid will be as certain as the morning light, and his aid will be as beneficial as the autumn rain and the spring rain which are so necessary to agriculture, and were amongst the blessings promised by God to the faithful Israelites, Jer 5:24; Jo 2:23.

4-6 God's Refusal of Pardon—But God still hesitates before granting his pardon. In order to understand this attitude of God, one must place the two events—repentance and refusal of pardon—in their proper chronological sequence. 1-3 represent the future sincere dispositions of the people, while 4-10 represent their present insincere dispositions. Therefore 1-3 and 4-10 represent two separate periods in the religious history of Israel, the one referring to the contemporary age of idolatry, the other to the exilic age and to the Messianic age of restoration.

4. The people are unworthy of forgiveness because their piety, i.e. their love for God and for their fellows, is transitory as a morning cloud and as the morning dew which disappear quickly. This refers to the present and past not to the conditions predicted in 1-3. 5. On account of their inconstancy God punished them by means of the prophets who, like stone-cutters, dealt heavy blows on the people by delivering God's sentence against them. The commination of the death penalty was made in order that the justness of God's judgement (read 'my' for 'thy') might become manifest when punishment came.

6. Their lack of a genuine piety is emphasized by God's rejection of their acts of worship. Sacrifices are not acceptable unless they are accompanied by a true 518e knowledge of God and a sincere love for him; cf. Is 1:11-15; 66:3; Mic 6:6 ff.; Mt 9:13; 12:7.

f 7-11a Israel's Obstnacy—7. The people are hardened in sin. Like Adam in Eden they broke the covenant in the land where they had received so many benefits. The adverb 'there' seems to require a place-name in the first half-verse, hence some interpreters read instead of Adam a place-name such as Adom (Jos 3:16), Edom, Adamah, etc. The LXX take 'ādām for a common noun and translate 'as men (usually do)'. Hoonacker goes further giving the expression 'as men' the meaning of 'shamefully' (basement), a meaning which recurs in Job 31:33 (cf. P. Dhorme, Le Livre de Job, ad loc.). 8. Galaad, probably Ramoth-Galaad E. of the Jordan, is a city of mischief-workers, marked with bloody footprints. 9 is corrupt. The sense seems to be: The priests are a band of robbers lying in wait for the pious Israelites passing through Sichem on their way to Jerusalem to worship Yahweh on the prescribed festivals (cf. St Jerome ad loc.). 10. The general situation is one of the utmost moral corruption. Instead of 'the house of Israel' modern commentators read 'Bethel' (cf. 10:15; Am 5:6). The leading sanctuary of Bethel was a centre of apostasy and immoral cult. 11. The sense and connexion with the context are obscure. If 11b is shifted to the beginning of ch 7 the sense of 11a will be: O Judah, set a harvest (i.e. a punishment, cf. Jer 51:33) for thee, or: prepare thyself for punishment. But Heb. is: Judah too, a harvest is reserved for thee, or, more plainly: A harvest is reserved for Judah too. This sense links v 11 with v 4 providing an answer to the question there put. What will God do to Ephraim and Judah? Ephraim's sins demand a punishment; Judah too will be punished for having committed the same sins.

g 11b-VII 2 Hopelessness of Repentance—11b. God's efforts to bring the people back to him, 7:1, and to heal the disease of Israel served only to lay bare the wickedness of the people who persisted obstinately in their evil course practising falsehood, house-breaking, and highway robbery. 2. They did not even consider that God took their sins into account, and yet all their misdeeds stood around them and were committed in his presence.

h VII 3-7 Conspiracies—3 f. The prophet passes from the consideration of social disorders to political disorders. The people, or their political leaders, deal treacherously with their king. While they rejoice the king by an outward show of devotion, they are inwardly raging like a burning oven and plotting against his life. When their plans are mature, the conspirators wait for an opportunity to carry them out, just as a baker ceases to kindle and to stir the fire from the kneading of the dough until its leavening. 5. On a certain day, perhaps the king's birthday, the princes, i.e. the ringleaders, while banqueting with the king, went mad with wine and joined hands with assassins. 6f. Their hearts were really burning (LXX), as an oven, with intrigue. At one time their violent passion seemed to have abated, but all of a sudden it burst out like a blazing furnace devouring their rulers. 3-7 are an allusion to the eventful times which followed the death of Jeroboam II. Four kings had fallen victims of conspiracies, and yet none of them had turned to Yahweh for assistance. For the history of the last kings of the Northern Kingdom cf. 4 Kg 15:8-31; 17:1-6.

i 8-16 The Foreign Policy of Israel and its Result—8. Israel in her utter helplessness wanders farther from Yahweh seeking for aid from foreign nations. But instead of being relieved, she becomes plunged deeper into difficulties. Ephraim has become entirely imbued with a pagan spirit and now she is like a cake which is not turned while it is being baked and is therefore half-scorched and half-raw, consequently unfit for any use. 9. The moral strength and the temporal prosperity of Israel have been absorbed by those very nations with which it came into contact, and now it is powerless like an old man whose hair begins to turn grey. Yet they do not understand that their own perversity has reduced them to this wretched state.

10. Their arrogance is manifest on their faces, and they refuse to return to Yahweh. 11. Their foreign policy is one of indecision. Like a dove heedless of danger they turn now to Egypt and now to Assyria. 12. But no human help will avail them. As they wander away, God spreads his net over them and brings them down like birds and punishes them as the prophets have previously announced, or, according to others, as their wickedness deserves.

13. Destruction now awaits the ungrateful people. Though God has delivered them many times, they speak evil of him by misrepresenting him and making him like to the Baals. 14. They never sincerely cried to Yahweh, but howled on their couches while eating the sacrificial meals, and made incisions on their bodies (cf. 3 Kg 18:28) while crying deliriously for material blessings. 15. Yahweh gave them strength to win their victories (omit DV 'chastised') and yet they shamefully associated him with the conquered Baals. 16. The inanity of their confidence in other gods and foreign nations is further emphasized. They turn to them, i.e. gods, who can afford no help, and are like a bow which shoots the arrow in a swerving direction thus missing its mark. Theirs will be a disastrous end. Their political leaders, and chiefly the pro-Egyptian party, will perish by the sword of Assyria, and Egypt will delight in their downfall.

VIII 1-14 Israel's Sins and the Coming Doom—This chapter is a general indictment of Israel. The main charges are: violation of the covenant, unlawful dynasty, calf-worship, foreign policy, idolatrous worship.

1. The prophet is commanded to sound the alarm because the enemy, obviously the Assyrians, swift as an eagle, is about to fall upon the land of Israel, Yahweh's abode. First charge, 2f. As they have spurned Yahweh's law and service, Yahweh will not listen when they cry to him, but will leave them to the mercy of their enemies. Second charge, 4a. Their kings were not of the Davidic and only rightful dynasty. This is said of all their kings, not of the last kings only who were usurpers. Third charge, 4b-6. The calf-worship was introduced by Jeroboam I (3 Kg 12) and remained the official cult till the downfall of the kingdom. God wrathfully rejects the calf of Samaria which is a god of their own manufacture, and therefore no god at all. It will be shattered to pieces (6). Fourth charge, 7-10. Israel's foreign relations lead them to their own destruction. Their policy is as senseless as the sowing of wind, but the result will be as disastrous as the reaping of a whirlwind (cf. Gal 6:8). The perspective is that of the Assyrian captivity. They are like a crop having no ears and therefore yielding no meal. Their material prosperity is being swallowed up by their foreign allies (cf. 7:9) and they have become useless as a worthless thing that is thrown away. V 9 emphasizes the folly of Israel's foreign policy by contrasting them with a wild ass. The wild ass is fond of his unrestrained, natural freedom, shunning the habitations of men and the company of other animals (cf. Job 39:5-8), but the Israelites, though separated by God from all other nations, were losing their national independence by seeking the help of Assyria to whom they also gave love-gifts. But though they go bargaining for unprofitable alliances, they will not escape punishment. God will gather them as wood for the fire (cf. Ez 22:20 f.; etc.), and they will cease for a while from anointing (LXX) kings and princes. 11-14. e Fifth charge: Idolatrous worship. The temple at Jerusalem was the only lawful place of sacrifice (Deut 12:5-7). Jeroboam I chose the cities of Bethel and Dan (3 Kg 12:28 f.), but altars were set up in many other places. The Levitical prescriptions for the sacrificial worship were accounted as those of a stranger and therefore not binding. 12 is a clear allusion to the existence, in Osee's time, of a written code of laws which is commonly identified with the Levitical legislation contained in the Pentateuch. These sacrifices were not acceptable to God who threatened his idolatrous worshippers with captivity in Egypt. As 519e there is no evidence in the historical books of a captivity in Egypt following the downfall of the Northern Kingdom, interpreters believe that the punishment, i.e. the Assyrian captivity, is announced in figurative terms recalling the early servitude of the children of Israel in Egypt (Knab., Hoonacker), or that many Israelites will flee to Egypt, when the Assyrians fall upon their land, and will live there in exile (Robinson, 35). It may be that the prediction of a double captivity in Egypt and in Assyria (cf. 9:3, 6; 11:5) corresponds to the two opposite parties, the Egyptian and the Assyrian. Whichever party prevails, the people will be punished with captivity. Israel has forgotten God and built palaces. Judah too, over-confident in human strength, has increased the defences of his country. But God will destroy both palaces and defences (cf. Am 2:4 f.).

d IX:1-9 Prediction of the Exile—The prophet predicts the exile in clear and unequivocal language. 1. While the people celebrate their harvest festivals and express their gratitude to the gods from whom, they believe, all their material blessings come, the prophet severely condemns these heathenish rejoicings and announces their coming end. 2. The land will no longer yield its produce. 3f. The people will have to quit their homeland, and will be taken captive to Egypt (8:13) and Assyria, an unholy land. There, far from Yahweh's land, they will be unable to offer him sacrifices. Their bread will be like bread eaten in a house of mourning and therefore unclean (Num 19:14). It will be a bread which, not being presented in the house of the Lord as firstfruits, will be deprived of its spiritual character and will serve only to satisfy their hunger. 5. Their festivals will no longer be celebrated. 6. They will flee to Egypt (8:13; 9:3) and die in Memphis, while their dwellings and all their treasures in the land of Israel will be left to nettles and thorns.

e 7. When the days of punishment come, the people will learn by experience whether the prophet was mad or not. It was the enormity of their sins and their hardened stubbornness (7) that made his warnings excited like the utterances of a madman. Some interpreters believe that the prophet is alluding to the false prophets, who have always promised peace and prosperity, but will be convicted of folly and insanity when punishment comes (Knabenbauer). 8. Though he was the watchman of Ephraim, living in close intimacy with God, he encountered everywhere stiff opposition. 9. Their sins have matched the heinous crime of Gabaa (Jg 19), but will not be left unpunished (cf. 8:13).

f 10-17 Israel's Early Corruption—Israel has been ungrateful to God ever since the early days; conversion has become hopeless.

10. God found Israel in the wilderness with that joyful satisfaction with which one finds a bunch of grapes or a first ripe fig when they are not expected. Though he loved them dearly, they were faithless. The episode of Beelphegor (Num 25:1-3) was the beginning of a long series of backslidings. Man is like the things he loves, and so Israel became detestable like its gods. 11. The unrepentant Ephraim will now lose his glory with the swiftness of a fleeing bird. The glory of Ephraim is that signified by his name which is similar in sound to pārāh 'to increase' hence 'fruitfulness' (cf. Gen 48:19). In other words no more will there be birth, pregnancy or conception in Ephraim. 12. And the children whom they may now be bringing up will be taken away. 13. Ephraim was indeed destined to become a country great and prosperous as the city of Tyre, but in point of fact he will bring out his children to slaughter. Tyre is hardly an appropriate term of comparison, hence the text is variously emended and translated. Hoonacker translates: 'As a hind has its little ones destined for prey, so must Ephraim lead out his children to slaughter'. The sense is in perfect harmony with the context. 14f. Unable to repress his indignation at the people's depravity and his horror at the coming destruction the prophet utters a dire imprecation for the total extinction of the people (cf. 11). They practised Baal-worship in Galgal and in other places (4:15; 12:11); there God felt an irrepressible aversion to them.

16f. sum up God's dreadful message. Ephraim is like a tree which will bear no fruit because it is smitten by wind, heat, and worms, and its roots are dried up. They will be cast away by God and dispersed among the nations.

X 1-8 Israel's Prosperity, Idolatry, and Ruin—The theme of this discourse is that treated before: God's tender love for his people, the people's unresponsive attitude, and the impending disaster.

1. Israel has been prosperous like a luxuriant and fruitful vine; but the more prosperous she became, the more altars she built. 2. Men's hearts are divided between Yahweh and Baal, or, according to others, are 'false, deceitful'; they must be punished. 3 is a confession which the people will make ('now they shall say') when punishment overtakes them. Then they will acknowledge that it was the helplessness of their kings and their lack of fear of Yahweh that have brought about the national crisis. 4. The court diplomacy consists in words without truth, false oaths, and alliances with foreign nations; but punishment will spring forth like poisonous weeds in the furrows of a field.

5f. Their powerless gods will be carried to a foreign land. The inhabitants of Samaria will be seized by terror on account of the calf of Bethaven (cf. 4:15), they will mourn over it, and its priestlings will howl because both their god and its precious ornaments will be carried to Assyria and given as a present to the Great King (cf. 5:13).

7f. Samaria is inexorably doomed; the king, like a chip on the waters continually tossed by the waves, is unable to stand the onslaught of the conflicting political parties. Ruin cannot be averted. All the high-places will be destroyed and overgrown with thorns. And the people terrified at the approach of the Assyrian army will prefer to be buried under the crumbling mountains than to fall into the hands of their enemies.

9-XI 1a Repentance and Forgiveness still Possible—Though Israel has sinned from her early days, there is still time for her to return to Yahweh and secure his favour once more. If she persists in her evil ways, ruin will soon overtake her.

9f. are very obscure. Gabaa is again mentioned (9:9) on account of the outrage narrated in Jg 19. This is the general sense: There, in Gabaa, the Gabaaites took up a defiant attitude believing that war would not overtake them. But God will come (DV 'according to my desire') to punish the children of iniquity (the words 'the children of iniquity' being transposed from 9 to 10), i.e. the Gabaaites, and on that day he will rally against them the peoples, i.e. the tribes of Israel except that of Benjamin, to exact vengeance for the double crime of adultery and murder. In other words, Israel has from the very beginning taken the wrong way believing she would escape God's punishment. But the day will come when God will rally the Assyrian armies against them to take vengeance on their wickedness.

11. Contrasting the past with the future of Israel, the prophet compares Ephraim to a heifer to which was assigned the easy work of threshing. But the heifer became unmanageable and God had to lay a yoke on her fair neck making her draw the plough and the harrow. In other words the unyielding Israel will exchange the favours she has enjoyed for the hardships of captivity. Read 'Israel' for 'Judah'.

12. The impending ruin can be averted only by a change of life. Israel must sow in righteousness by living up to the standards of justice, reap according to piety by love of man and God, and break up the fallow ground by stirring up their insensible hearts, cleansing them of evil habits and preparing them to receive the seed of a new moral life. To such a change of life Israel is encouraged by the promise of the benevolence of God who will come to teach righteousness if they will but seek him. There is always time to p 13-15. So long as they directed their activities to evil-doing, disappointment was their reward. They have trusted in their chariots, 13b (LXX), and in the multitude of their warriors, but these will not save them. 14a must be connected with 13b. 14b introduces a new period which is continued in 15. As Salman destroyed Beth Arbel in war when the mother, i.e. the land, was laid waste with the children, i.e. the cities, so will it be done to you, O house of Israel. Salman, erroneously identified by Vg with Salman of Jg 8:5, is probably Salamanu, king of Moab, mentioned in the annals of Tiglath-pileser III (745-727). He must have destroyed the town of Arbela E. of the Jordan, near Pella, and massacred its inhabitants. And the king of Israel will pass away as suddenly as comes daybreak after the night, XI:1a.

519a repent, and God is ever ready to forgive the repentant sinner. As the teaching of righteousness is often represented by the prophets as one of the functions of the Messias (Is 2:3; 28:9; 30:20, etc.) we may see in 12b an allusion to Messianic times.

520a XI 1b-11 God's Tender Love for Israel—This is a very touching picture of God's loving care for his people. Israel, Yahweh's son, was brought up most tenderly. But he wandered away and Yahweh threatened him with destruction. But how can Yahweh destroy his beloved son? He will punish him, but then he will take him up again. The post-exilic and the Messianic restorations are blended together.

b 1b Yahweh loved Israel from his early year and called him out of Egypt. This is applied in Mt 2:15 to the return of Christ from Egypt. It is remarked, however, that the verb qārā' 'to call' must have the same meaning as in 2 where it means 'to appeal to'. Moreover, the preposition min may have a local meaning 'from' and a temporal meaning 'since'. For these reasons Hoonacker translates: 'I made appeals to my son since Egypt'. Other appeals were subsequently made, but Israel turned away offering sacrifices to the Baals. This makes excellent sense, but the force of Matthew's application is considerably weakened.

c 1b, 2 may be interpreted thus: God called Israel out of Egypt to follow him. Afterwards, when Israel began to turn away from Yahweh, others, i.e. the prophets, called them after Yahweh. The two actions of calling out and calling on are two aspects of, or two consecutive stages in, the process of the religious upbringing of Israel. Though the departure from Egypt is nowhere in the OT represented as a type of Christ's return from Egypt, Osee provided the ground for the typical meaning of that event by expressing God's attitude towards the young Israelite nation in a form that is applicable to the return of Christ, the true son of God, from Egypt. Consequently Matthew's words: 'That it might be fulfilled' must be taken in the sense of the fulfilment of a typical prophecy rather than an accommodation of a biblical passage to an historical event. 3. After having called Israel to be his son Yahweh guided the first experiences of national life, like a father leading his child by the hand, though they failed to recognize Yahweh's protection and care.

d 4. I used to draw them with cords of man and with bands of love, and I was to them as one who lifts up the yoke from upon their jaws and I bent to him and gave him to eat. The figure is that of a team of bullocks drawn by cords, that are suitable for a man rather than for an animal, and relieved of the yoke in order that they may eat. But the expression 'he lifts the yoke from upon their jaws' is a difficulty. By reading 'ūl 'a little child, a suckling' for 'ūl 'yoke' a better sense and a more gracious picture is obtained. Yahweh used to draw his little child close to him by humane and gentle cords (the image being that of a mother carrying her child against her hip bound with cords to prevent it from falling), and he was to him as one who lifts a babe to his cheek, bends to it, and gives it to eat. 5. Unmindful of all this affection Ephraim fell away from Yahweh and is now threatened with exile. Instead of 'not' read 'to him' and transpose to the end of v 4. 6. The sword will whirl in their cities destroying the bars of their gates (perhaps better 'their children') and devouring (their inhabitants) on account of their counsels, i.e. their religious conduct and foreign policy. 7. Those who survive will long for deliverance, but they will have to bear the yoke of captivity. This is the sense of MT, Vg and DV, but modern scholars regard the verse as corrupt. Hoonacker emends and translates thus: 'My people will be hanged near their habitations, and in the sight of those who go up to their cities: none shall remove them'. This sense completes the picture of wholesale destruction described in 6. 8. Yahweh is horrified at the thought of having to reduce his people to such pitiful conditions, and a struggle breaks out between his justice and his mercy. He is reluctant to deliver up the child whom he has fondled in his arms and destroy him as Adama and Seboim, two cities mentioned in connexion with Sodom and Gomorrah (Gen 14:2, 8; Deut 29:23). 9. God's love prevails. He will not exterminate his people because he is a merciful God not a revengeful man; he is holy and therefore he will keep the promises made to the Patriarchs; he will not exterminate. 10f. These protestations of mercy, though expressly addressed to Israel or Ephraim, are really made to Judah as well. The people as a whole was never destroyed. They were led into captivity; the northern tribes were absorbed by other nations, but the people of Judah were brought back to their homeland to start on a new life preparatory to the Messianic restoration. When the people have atoned for their sins in the exile, they will turn to Yahweh who, like a roaring lion, will summon his scattered people and they will come back hurriedly from the western coastlands (DV 'the children of the sea'), and from every land where they may be detained.

12-XII 2 Israel's Faithlessness and Punishment—Here too we have the same elements as in other speeches: idolatry, obstinacy, foreign alliances and impending punishment. A new feature is a digression on the patriarchal history. 12a. Yahweh is represented as surrounded by falsehood and treachery. 12b is obscure. The sense of DV is: Judah remained faithful to God with the saintly men, i.e. the patriarchs, prophets, etc., and thus turned out a witness against Israel. This sense however is doubtful, as Osee's estimate of Judah is mostly unfavourable, cf. 5:10, 12:14; 6:4, 11; 8:14. By reading q'dōšim instead of q'dōšim we obtain this sense: Judah is still inconstant with God, but faithful with the temple-prostitutes. Interpreters emend and translate the text in different ways.

XII:1. The unprofitable policy of Ephraim who, by means of endless falsehood and fraud, tries to gain the favour of Assyria and Egypt, to whom he makes presents of oil, is compared to the vain efforts of a senseless shepherd tending the wind and pursuing the burning sirocco. 2. Yahweh has a quarrel with Judah (read prob. 'Israel'); he will punish Jacob, i.e. his descendants the Israelites according to their deeds. XII 3-14 Jacob and his Descendants—In this passage we have a contrast between the patriarch Jacob and his posterity. Jacob was always faithful to God who protected him and delivered him from his enemies. His descendants in Egypt were also delivered because they were faithful to Moses, God's prophet. But the Israelites of Osee's time were unfaithful to their God, and were delivered up by God into the hands of their enemies because of their unfaithfulness.

3, 4a. Jacob's divine election and the assurance of divine help are illustrated by two well-known episodes (Gen 25:22-25; 32:24-28). 4b. In Bethel Jacob received the promise of a numerous posterity (Gen 35:1-15). 5. A doxology recalling God's own attestation in Ex 3:15. Mark the contrast. Bethel once consecrated by a divine apparition has now become a centre of idolatrous worship. 6 probably refers to a promise to Jacob on his way to Haran (Gen 28:10-22):

520j By the help of thy God thou wilt return (to thy land); be kind therefore and just with men and faithful to God. 71. But Jacob's descendants, like a merchant using unfair means, took to all sorts of fraudulent dealings; they have made a fortune; but all their gains are insufficient for the expiation of their iniquity.

k 9. The God of Ephraim, however, is Yahweh, the God of the covenant, ever the same, true to his promises and just in punishing sin. 9b is taken for a promise by Knab. following St Jerome. The people will peacefully dwell in tents as in the days of the Feast of Booths. The context however demands a threat. The people will have to wander away from their country and live in tents. 10. As they have persistently refused to listen to God's warnings, God will destroy them by means of his prophets, i.e. God will threaten them with destruction through the ministry of his prophets, cf. 6:5. 11 is obscure. The sense seems to be: Will their false gods deliver them? No, because Galaad is a nest of iniquity (6:8) and in Galgal the people practise a vain cult, offering sacrifices to powerless bull-gods. Their altars will be reduced to heaps of rubble.

l 12f. The prophet turns to Jacob. Though Jacob had to flee to Aram and work hard tending flocks in order to win a wife, God always delivered him from all dangers. After many years Jacob's sons became a numerous people in Egypt and God brought them out under the leadership of Moses, and through the ministry of Moses they were kept safe. 14. Now this people, Ephraim, has bitterly provoked God's anger by their unyielding attitude and will therefore have to pay the penalty for their offences.

m XIII 1-XIV 1 Utter Destruction the Fate of Israel—This speech develops the usual theme: faithlessness, punishment, and the helplessness of their king.

n 1 marks a contrast between Ephraim's glorious past and his miserable present. In the period of the Judges the numerical strength of the tribe of Ephraim gave it a certain pre-eminence over the other tribes. But they became guilty of Baal-worship and incurred the death penalty. 2. They have kept sinning up to the prophet's time making silver images. 2b is obscure in DV and probably corrupt in MT. By supplying the word Elohim 'gods', which can easily have fallen out, MT may be rendered: these [the idols] they call gods; (to them) they sacrifice; men kiss the calves (i.e. worship the calf-gods). 3. Extermination will be their reward. For 'chimney' read 'window'.

o 4. Despite their faithlessness God asserts his right over them. He is their God and their only saviour since their coming out of Egypt. 5. In the desert he took them up and was in close relationship with them. For 'I knew them' LXX reads 'I shepherded them', which agrees better with 6. It denotes God's unceasing care for his people in the wilderness. 6. But when they arrived in Palestine and enjoyed to the full the blessings of a prosperous life, their heart was lifted up and they failed to recognize the source of their prosperity (cf. Deut 8:11-15; 31:20; 32:15). 7f. The ungrateful people will be consumed as a prey devoured by a wild beast. 9. DV makes good sense; but MT agrees better with the context: I destroy thee, O Israel; yea, who will save thee? 10. The king is powerless. There is a reference here to 1 Kg 8:4 ff. and implicitly to the separation of the ten tribes from the house of David. 11. God gave the northern tribes a king to their own perdition, and now is about to take him away in order to deprive them of the help in which they trusted.

p 12. Ephraim's sin is kept for the day of reckoning, like a treasure tied up and hidden for safe custody until the time to use it arrives. 13. When that time arrives, the nation will be seized by internal convulsions comparable to the pangs of a woman in travail. But instead of bringing joy to the mother the child, an unwise son, will be an occasion of further sufferings because he will not have the strength to stand in the mouth of the womb (Vg etymologically and literally 'in the breach of the children') at the proper moment, i.e. the child will not have the strength to come to light. Ephraim is compared both to the mother and to her child. The internal troubles of the nation will be a cause of further affliction. 14. But Osee cannot bring himself to believe that God will exterminate his people. Looking further into the future he sounds a reassuring note of hope. God will not leave his people in the hands of death for ever; one day he will bring them back to life. He will prevail over death which will be powerless to detain its captives. 14b. Where are thy plagues, O death? Where is thy destruction, O Sheol? The promise of a new life is irrevocable. Read 'repentance' for 'comfort' and cf. Ps 109:4. This promise had its first fulfilment in the return from the exile, but reached its complete fulfilment in Messianic times; cf. 1 Cor 15:54-57. Many modern commentators interpret the verse in the sense of a threat. 'Shall I redeem them from the hand of Sheol? Shall I deliver them from Death?' A negative answer is implied. Death and Sheol are then commanded to let loose their plagues on earth because repentance is hopeless. 15 takes us back to a time preceding the final catastrophe. Though Ephraim may be flourishing (as a plant) among reed-plants, a scorching east wind from the wilderness will sap the source of its vigour and fruitfulness. Vg read yaprid 'he separates', but yapriah 'he flourishes' was probably the original text; 'ahim 'brothers, prob. stands for 'ahû 'reed-plants'. Even if Ephraim were as strong and flourishing as a reed-plant in the waters, he would not escape destruction. The wind represents Assyria which will carry off all the treasures of Ephraim. XIV:1. Osee winds up his discourse by setting forth God's judgement once more. Samaria will have to atone for her unfaithfulness by a dreadful punishment. MT need not be interpreted in an optative sense.

C. XIV 2-10 Israel's Conversion—This last discourse forms the conclusion of the book according to the general plan of the prophetic books in which punishment is followed by pardon and destruction by restoration.

2-9 The Triumph of Yahweh's Love—The repentant people will at last confess their sins and sincerely return to Yahweh. Yahweh's love will triumph over their wickedness, God will receive them with paternal affection and will bestow his blessings upon them. 2. As Israel's apostasy brought about her downfall, her return to God will raise her up again. 3. The people will return with words of repentance on their lips: Forgive all iniquity, accept what is good, and we will pay the fruit of our lips (Heb. and Vg 'calves'), i.e. words of praise and thanksgiving. 4. They will no longer look for help to Assyria, nor will they rely on Egypt and its cavalry. They will no longer call the idols made by themselves 'our God', because in God and in God alone will they, as orphans, find support. 5. Their conversion being complete and sincere, God will take them again into his favour. He will heal their apostasy, i.e. he will stir up again in their hearts their former affection for him and he will love them of his own free will because he is no longer wrathful with them. 6f. Forgiveness reinstates them in their friendly relations with God, and they will enjoy again the blessings of God's benevolence. 8. Once more they will dwell under his shadow, i.e. the children of Israel will dwell peacefully in their country under the protection of the new Israel compared to a tree (cf. v 7); they will flourish as the corn and will blossom as a vine and their fame will spread far and wide as the fame of the wine of Lebanon. 9. Ephraim will cast idols away and Yahweh will respond to their cries, and will look after them. Yahweh will be as an evergreen cypress, their protector and the only source of their prosperity.

10 Conclusion—The practical lesson which anyone of wisdom and discernment must draw from God's dealings with his people is that God's ways are right and lead man safely to life. The righteous walk in them and attain life; but the wicked meet their own death.

522a Bibliography—J. Knabenbauer, § 409b; A. Van Hoonacker, § 409b; *S. R. Driver, D.D., Joel and Amos, CBSC, 1915; *S. L. Brown, A New Commentary, London, 1928; V. Ermoni, art. Joel, DBV; M. Faulhaber, art. Joel, CE.

b The Prophet and his Date—Joel (Yahweh is God) son of Pethuel, from his frequent and exclusive references to Judah and Jerusalem, Sion and the Temple and the priestly ministrations, seems to have prophesied in Judah, probably in Jerusalem itself. No explicit indication is given of the period in which he lived. Older commentators mostly assign him to the 9th or 8th century B.C., probably under Joas (836–797). Modern critics prefer a date following the reforms of Nehemias and Esdras. His position in the Hebrew canon between Osee and Amos favours an early date. On the other hand, the absence of any reference to a king, the complete silence about the Northern Kingdom, the fact that the Babylonians and Assyrians do not appear as the actual enemies of the people, the assumption that the people knows no God but Yahweh and no worship but the Temple worship, harmonize better with a post-exilic date. Jl 3:2 seems to allude to the Exile as to a past event. The numerous allusions or reminiscences of other biblical and especially prophetic books, create a presumption that Joel is the borrower. It cannot be said, however, that any of these arguments is decisive.

c Contents—The prophecy falls into two parts: 1:2–17; 2:19–3:21, with 2:18 serving as connecting link. The first part consists of two discourses: 1:1–20, in which Joel describes a terrible locust plague and exhorts priests and people to penance; and 2:1–17, in which he repeats these thoughts more emphatically: these plagues are but the harbingers of greater scourges in the Day of Yahweh. The people does penance, turns to Yahweh, and he is appeased (18). In the second part, he promises prosperity, deliverance from the plague, the teacher of justice (2:19–27), an outpouring of the Spirit, and salvation (2:28–32, MT 3:1–5). He will judge the nations who have afflicted the Chosen People, in the valley of Josaphat (3:1–21, MT ch 4).

d Interpretation—Commentators, generally, are agreed that Jl 2:28–3 refer to Messianic times and the end of the world. There is less agreement as to the interpretation of chh 1–2, and their relation to the rest of the book. The Fathers and ancient commentators saw in the locust swarms of chh 1–2, a mere figure of future enemy invasions. Some moderns (e.g. Van Hoonacker) regard the whole prophecy as apocalyptic, and the locusts of chh 1–2 as a purely ideal vision of the signs preceding the Day of Yahweh. It seems, however, much more probable that ch 1 describes an actual locust visitation. In general, prophecy springs from contemporary conditions. Joel's question in 1:2 f., and his reiterated calls to penance and prayer are more intelligible in the hypothesis of an actual calamity. The depredations described are characteristic of destructive insects and of drought, not of war havoc. The realistic accuracy of his descriptions of the locusts and their ravages is undisputed. The horrors of a locust plague of exceptional severity might well evoke a vision of the calamities preceding or accompanying the Day of Yahweh. The latter concept in the prophetic writings is 'capable of embracing within itself by force of compenetration any particular crisis and Messianic times and the end of the world' (Fr Lattey on Mal 4:23, WV). In Jl 2:28–3, the Day of Yahweh embraces the Messianic era and the consummation, without any distinction of chronological perspective (cf. Ac 2:17–21). The cosmic disturbances associated implicitly with the Day of Yahweh in 1:15, and explicitly in 2:11 are associated in Is 13:9–10 with the fall of Babylon, and in Jer 4:23–24 with the misfortunes threatening Judah and Jerusalem. Particular crises are described in much the same terms as the final Judgement, either because they are types of the latter or because both events are combined in the same prophetic view. It would be a mistake to take too literally the images of cosmic ruin. They are part of the vocabulary of apocalyptic symbolism, which is hyperbolic in character.

It seems that the calamities of ch 1 represented for Joel a first rehearsal or anticipation of the Day. This thought dominates his discourse of ch 2, where he gives a fuller description of the signs of its approach and a more urgent call to repentance (2:1–17). The signs are depicted in imagery borrowed from the recent locust visitation, but the viewpoint shifts to the future and the vision takes on a more ideal character. Moreover new elements enter into the vision. In the supplications placed on the lips of the priests (17), and in Yahweh's answer (19), there is mention of Judah's 'reproach among the nations'. Modern critics refer this to the locust plague and translate 17: 'give not thy inheritance to reproach that the nations should make proverbs of them'. The reproach of Judah is, however, foreign domination, not a passing locust scourge to which the enemy nations themselves might at any time be subject. The Vg version: 'that the heathen should rule over them' is fully justified (see commentary). In 20, Yahweh's promise to expel 'the Northerner' appears to refer to a hostile human power (see commentary). It is true that the locust imagery is retained here, and this has led some commentators (e.g. Knabenbauer) to see in the locusts of ch 2 merely a figure of enemy nations. It may be, however, that we have here merely another aspect of compenetration. The locusts and their ravages symbolize indistinctly the disasters whether natural or political which presage the Day of Yahweh. The comparison of the locust swarms with an invading army would readily lead the prophet's thought to the vision of the heathen invaders of Judah as harbingers of the Day, and in v 20, the two ideas are blended. The reference to the enemy nations is also demanded by the unity of the book. It is for relief from the disasters of the locust plague and from foreign domination that the people does penance and turns to Yahweh (18), and in consequence the Day of Yahweh becomes a day of blessing and triumph for Judah, and of definitive judgement for the nations. The future blessings are conceived as the reversal of past calamities. The marvellous fertility of the Messianic age will compensate for the locust ravages (2:19–27) as a symbol and accompaniment of the spiritual blessings to be ushered in by the outpouring of the Spirit (2:28–32); and the reproach of Judah is removed by the definitive judgement and destruction of the nations in the valley of Josaphat (ch 3).

522f Doctrinal Value—Joel has the distinction of supplying the first biblical text of the first apostolic sermon (Ac 2:16–21). The passages from 1:13 f. and 2:17 ff. are still used in the Lenten liturgy. Notable Messianic passages are 2:23 'the teacher unto justice', and 2:28 ff. on the outpouring of the Spirit. The popular belief that the universal judgement will take place in the valley of Josaphat owes its origin to Jl 3:2, 12.

g The Teacher unto Justice, 2:23. In the midst of the material blessings promised to Judah, there is included (v 23), the promise of 'the teacher unto justice' (hammōreh liš' dāqāh). Many moderns read: 'the former rain in just measure', on the grounds that the context treats of the gifts of the earth, and that mōreh means the autumnal rain. Mōreh, however, means 'one teaching' in Is 9:14; 30:20, and this is its more usual meaning. sedeq or s' dāqād regularly signifies a moral or juridical quality. The autumnal rain is the object of a distinct promise in 23c, and would be redundant here. The promise of the teacher unto justice fittingly opens the discourse to the children of Sion. It presents a strong parallel with Is 30:20. Most Catholics interpret the promise directly of the Messiah, Knabenbauer of the prophets generally, including Christ.

h The Outpouring of the Spirit, 2:28–32. St Peter in his Pentecostal sermon (Ac 2:17–21) quotes Jl 2:28–32 as fulfilled in the miraculous gift of tongues. He quotes it according to LXX, substituting 'in the last days' for 'after this' of MT. Probably the latter phrase merely marks the transition from the consideration of material to that of spiritual blessings and does not indicate chronological sequence. The abundant outpouring of the Spirit is a feature of Messianic times (cf. Is 32:15; 44:3; 59:21; Ez 36:27; 39:29; Zach 12:10). In the past the Spirit had been manifested chiefly in the form of prophecy bestowed on a restricted group, and dreams and visions were among the principal means of divine communication. In the Messianic age the Spirit will be poured out abundantly on all. The gift of prophecy includes not only the prediction of the future, but also speaking under divine influence for instruction, exhortation and consolation. St Peter's interpretation is not exhaustive. He sees in the gift of tongues an initial and visible fulfilment of the prophecy and the manifest inauguration of the Messianic era. In Acts and Epistles the Holy Spirit is exhibited not only as the principle of prophecy and the charismatic gifts, but also and especially of the life of grace. All these varied manifestations of the Spirit are adumbrated in the words of Joel, and all classes and conditions will share in them: 'the servants also and the handmaids'. In the context the words 'all flesh' may refer immediately to the Israelites, the people of Yahweh, but of themselves they have a universal significance. St Peter does not as yet indicate this explicitly. It is clear from Ac 2:36 that he understands the formula 'call upon the name of the Lord', of faith in Christ as the condition of salvation; but it is left to St Paul to reveal the universal significance of this text in Rom 10:13, where he shows that there is no distinction between Jew and Gentile, and that faith in Christ constitutes the one way of salvation for all men.

i The Valley of Josaphat, 3:2, 12. The belief that the universal judgement of mankind will take place in the valley of Josaphat rests on Jl 3:2, 12, the only passages where it is mentioned in the Bible. Some commentators think that the reference is to the place where king Josaphat defeated the peoples of Moab, Ammon, and Edom (2 Par 20:20 ff.). A very ancient tradition identifies the valley of Josaphat with part of the Cedron valley east of Jerusalem. The belief that this will be the scene of the Last Judgement, survives in popular Jewish and Moslem as well as Christian eschatology. Joel, however, says nothing of a universal judgement, but speaks only of a judgement on the heathen enemies of Israel. According to its etymology (Y'hōšāpāt) means 'Yahweh judgeth', and most commentators nowadays hold that it is merely a symbolic name for the place where Yahweh will execute judgement on the enemies of his people.

1:2–11:17 A Locust Plague heralds the Day of Yahweh; 522a a Call to Penance.

2–4 An Unprecedented Visitation—Addressing the people, Joel invites the oldest to testify if they have ever experienced or heard tell of a calamity like this. Its memory deserves to be handed down to succeeding generations. In four successive swarms, locusts have destroyed the crops. 4. Four words in the Hebrew designate locusts, but their precise meaning is unknown. According to their etymology, the names may indicate various aspects of the locust's destructiveness, viz.: the shearer, swarmer, lapper, finisher.

5–12 All Classes mourn—The drunkards are roused b from stupor to mourn the loss of the sweet wine. In strength and multitude the locusts resemble an invading nation, cf. Prov 30:25 f. For destructiveness, their teeth are like a lion's (cf. Apoc 9:8) and their jaw teeth as of a lioness. They have ravaged the vine, made the fig tree a broken thing, and stripped bare the bark. The community (conceived as 'daughter of Judah') is to lament with the inconsolable grief of a virgin bereft of her betrothed. The priests mourn, because the daily sacrifices—the meal-offering and drink-offering—have ceased (cf. Lev 2:4; Ex 2 29:40–41; Num 28:3–8). The ground 'mourns' because its chief products, corn, new wine, fresh oil (cf. Deut 7:13) are destroyed. The husbandmen and vine-dressers are bidden mourn, because harvest, vintage and fruit-crop have perished. Drought completes the desolation. 6b, 'a lion's whelp': RV 'a great lion'; Heb. lābīf, alongside 'aryeh as in Gen 49:9; Num 24:9, probably signifies lioness here. 10, 'confounded': RV 'dried up'. Heb. hōbīš, occurs here and in 12 of the vine; in 17 of the corn; in 11 of the labourers. It is the Hiph'il of yābāš ('to be ashamed') rather than a derivative of yābēš ('to be dry'). Is confounded, i.e. wears the look of one ashamed. The verbs in 11a are best read as imperatives. 12c lit. 'Joy is confounded (away) from', etc.

13–20 A Call to Penance—The prophet summons the c priests to a solemn lamentation (cf. Jer 4:8). They are to lie all night in sackcloth in token of penance (cf. 9), to proclaim a solemn fast, convoke a national religious assembly, and cry to Yahweh: Alas for the day! for the Day of Yahweh is near and it shall come as devastation (sōd) from the Almighty (saddai). The locust visitation portends its approach, but by penance, fasting and prayer the punishment may be averted. The sacrificial food, the joyous offerings are cut off from the Temple. Drought completes the ruin. Barns and storehouses are dilapidated for lack of use. The domestic animals groan for want of pastures; the cattle are bewildered; the sheep suffer. The prophet cries for help to Yahweh, because the pastures of the wilderness are burnt up. The wild beasts look up longingly to Yahweh, for the water-courses are dried up and the pastures withered. 14, 'Sanctify': qiddēš is used for 'convoke, decree', either because of the holiness of the object in view or of the religious rites which inaugurated it. 15–20 probably contain the tenour of the supplications the community are to address to Yahweh. 16a, 'before our eyes . . . our God.' In 19, it is the community regarded as a single collectivity which speaks, or the prophet in the name of the nation. 17a is uncertain. LXX: the heifers leap at their stalls; RV: the seeds rot under their clods; Van Hoonacker: the presses are become filthy under their refuse. 18, How the beasts groan! LXX, omitting one letter: What shall we put in them? viz. the barns, etc., of 17. 20, 'As a garden bed . . . rain' is wanting in MT and LXX. The verb 'arag which is rendered by DV following Vg 'look up to', means 'to ascend', and then 'to desire' as in Ps 41 (42) 2. St Jerome has expressed this desire by the added comparison: 'as a garden bed', etc., influenced d II:1-11 The Day of Yahweh is near—Sound the alarm-horn on Zion's hill for the Day of Yahweh is near, a day of darkness and gloom, of clouds and thick darkness. The locust legions, strong and numerous, appear with the swiftness of dawn spreading on the mountains. It is an unparalleled invasion. They advance like a prairie fire; before them the country is like the garden of Eden; behind them, desolation. Nothing escapes them. They look like horses and their course is that of horsemen (or, steeds). The sound of their advance is as that of chariots on the mountains, as the crackling of flame in the stubble, like an army in battle array. Panic grips the populations. Irresistibly and in ordered ranks they advance, assault the city, scale the walls, enter the windows of houses. Cosmic disturbances accompany them. They are the army of Yahweh, harbingers of his dread day, and his voice resounds in their onset.

Here as in ch 1, the imagery is based on the habits of locusts. The image of darkness, traditionally associated with the Day of Yahweh, may be suggested (2) by a cloud of locusts obscuring the sun and darkening the sky; the fire and flame (3), by the appearance of a country ravaged by locusts; the locust's head resembles that of a horse (4; cf. Apoc 9:7). The comparison with chariots is suggested by the noise of a locust-flight heard from afar; the crackling sound by the noise of their eating (5). Their irresistible, ordered advance has often been described. 6b 'like a kettle': all faces gather in beauty, i.e. lose colour and freshness (cf. Nah 2:10). 7c, they march everyone in his ways: and they entangle not their paths. 8b, For 'in his path' Van Hoonacker suggests 'in his breastplate'. 8c, they burst through the weapons, and break not (their ranks). 9. In the East, windows consist merely of an opening with lattice work.

e 12-17 The Judgement may still be averted—Even now the judgement may be averted. In the name of Yahweh, Joel summons priests and people to penance and prayer to ward off the menace. They must return to Yahweh by a sincere conversion of heart; their repentance must show itself not only outwardly, but above all inwardly. Yahweh's character is such that he is ready to pardon those who turn to him (cf. Ex 34:6; Jon 4:2). Perhaps he will turn back from the path of judgement and leave behind him the means of offering and libation. Sound the trumpet as signal for a public fast and assembly. None must be absent from oldest to youngest; even the newly married must leave their nuptial tent. In the court of the Priests, let the priests supplicate Yahweh with tears to spare his people and inheritance, and deliver them from the yoke of foreign domination. 12. And even now, etc. The heart was for the Hebrews the centre of intellectual life. Conversion to God, therefore, implied the submission of man to God with all his powers and faculties. 13. 'Rend your hearts and not (only) your garments.' Joel does not condemn external signs, but insists on the necessity of interior dispositions, cf. Os 6:6 for a similar turn of phrase. 'Ready to repent of the evil', viz., which he inflicts or threatens. 16. 'Sanctify the Church', i.e. call a sacred assembly. 17. 'Between the porch and the altar', i.e. the porch of the sanctuary (3 Kg 6:3), and the altar of holocausts in front of it (3 Kg 8:64); in the inner court, therefore, or court of the priests. The priests would address their prayers towards the sanctuary. For 'rule over them', many moderns read 'make proverbs of them', i.e. an object of mockery. The verb māṣal could mean this, but with bet of the object it regularly means 'rule over', etc. (cf. Knabenbauer, p 223). The reproach of Judah is foreign domination (cf. Jer 24:9).

f 18-III:21 Yahweh's Answer to his People's Prayer—The assembly is held and Joel states its happy results. Appeased by the repentance of the nation, Yahweh promises the blessing of bounteous harvests. Judah will no longer be an object of reproach among the nations. He will remove 'the Northerner' into the wilderness south of Judah, with his forepart towards the Dead Sea and his rear towards the Mediterranean. The locust imagery remains in the picture of putrefying carcasses. The motive for his chastisement is pride (lit. 'great things').

18-20 The Judgement is averted—18. It is assumed, not expressly stated that the assembly is held. 20. 'The Northerner' (hass'pōnī): some suppose this to refer to the locusts as coming on this occasion from the north, instead of as usual from the south or south-east; but this would not justify the unqualified application to them of the description 'the Northerner'. Moreover our passage has analogies with Jer 1:13-15; 4:6; 6:1; Ez 26:7; 38:6; 39:2, which announce the enemy, the evil from the north. The Jews saw in Jl 2:17 an allusion to Gog and Magog. Joel, therefore, seems to have in view enemy peoples, a human power. This harmonizes with vv 17, 19b and 20c, which can only be understood of actions inspired by pride.

21-27 Promise of Material Blessings—Developing the promise of v 19, Joel addresses: (1) the land: its trials are ended, and there is room henceforth only for joy; (2) the animals: the burnt up pastures are springing forth again; (3) the children of Zion, who are promised 'the teacher unto justice' (see § 522g), and the autumnal and spring rains (conditions of a fruitful harvest). The threshing floors will overflow with wheat, the presses with new wine and fresh oil. Yahweh will restore the years devoured by the locusts. Plenty will replace want, and thus they will know that Yahweh is in the midst of his people, protecting them against hostile attack, and will realize the unique character of the God of Israel. The repeated assurance 'my people shall not be confounded for ever' (26c; 27c) implies a return to the promise of the deliverance of the people from foreign domination.

28-29 The Outpouring of the Spirit—With the material blessings, symbol of the felicity of the Messianic age, there will be an abundant effusion of spiritual gifts (see § 522h).

30-32 The Day of Yahweh—Terrifying prodigies, on earth the ravages of war, eclipses and blood-red moons in the heavens, portend the Day. The true worshippers of Yahweh alone will escape the judgement of condemnation and share in the Messianic blessings; for in mount Zion and in Jerusalem there will be survivors, as Yahweh has said (cf. Abd 17), as also among the Jews of the Dispersion who are called by Yahweh. III:1-16a The Judgement of the Nations—In the time when Yahweh will restore Israel, he will contend in judgement with the nations gathered in the valley of Josaphat (see § 522i), for their crimes against his people. He will require the Phoenicians and Philistines for enriching their palaces with the plundered treasures of Judah, and for selling the Jews as slaves to the Greeks. Yahweh will redeem the children of Judah, who will in their turn sell their enemies in slavery to the Sabaeans. The nations are challenged to muster for battle in the valley of Josaphat. The surrounding nations are summoned; but Joel prays Yahweh to send his celestial warriors down for the battle. Yahweh answers the call. He will judge the nations hostile to his people. By their wickedness they are ripe for the harvest of judgement. Multitudes throng in the valley of decision, because the Day of Yahweh is near. Cosmic upheavals accompany it; in thunder and earthquake Yahweh will speak from Zion and Jerusalem.

1-2. The reference here seems to be to the Babylonian Captivity. Israel here as in 2:27, 3:16, is the name of the people of God as such. 3. 'Cast lots': cf. Abd 11; Nah 3:10. 'Put in the stew', i.e. sold as salary to a harlot. 'Sold for wine', i.e. cheaply, for a passing sensual gratification. 4. 'But what have you to do with me?' Lit. 'And also what are you to me?' 4b indicates that the sense is: What can you do against 523k me? 'The districts of the Philistines', i.e. the division of the territory according to their five chief towns. 5. 'My silver', etc., either the Temple treasures or treasures which are Yahweh's because Judah is his inheritance. 'Your temples' (or 'palaces'). 6. 'to . . . the Greeks'. Syrian slaves, among whom Jews would be reckoned, were much sought after in Greece, cf. 1 Mach 3:41; 2 Mach 8:11. 7. 'for which' you have sold them. 8. The Sabaeans: a people of SW. Arabia with whom the Jews had trade relations (cf. 3 Kg 10:2, 10; Jer 6:20). 10. A reversal of Mich 4:3; Is 2:4. 11. From round about, i.e. Philistines, Phœnicians, Edomites. 'There will the Lord cause', etc.; read 'Make thy warriors go down, O Lord'. 'The strong ones', i.e. the warriors of Yahweh: the angels. 13. Yahweh speaks to his strong ones (cf. Mt 13:24; Apoc 14:15).

1 16b-21 The Glorification of the People of God—It is implied that the nations are destroyed, but Yahweh will be a refuge and a stronghold to the children of Israel. Thereby Israel will experience that Yahweh is its God, dwelling in its midst on Sion. Jerusalem will be unprofaned by the presence of the heathen or foreign conqueror. The land will be blessed with marvellous fertility. The arid water-courses of Judah will flow; a fountain issuing from the Temple will water the Valley of the Acacias. The enemy countries, of which Egypt and Edom are types, will become barren wastes, because they have shed the blood of inoffensive refugees in their land; and Judah will be inhabited for ever. Yahweh will avenge their blood and will not grant impunity: and he will dwell in Sion. 523 l

18. 'The mountains shall drop down sweetness', etc., cf. Amos 9:13. The fountain issuing from the Temple is a symbol of divine blessing, cf. Ez 47:1; Zach 13:1; Apoc 22:1. 'The torrent of thorns': Heb. nahal haššittim, Wady of the Acacias. Nahal means a rocky water-course dry except in the rainy season. Some identify the place with Abel Shittim, the camping site of Israel opposite Jericho (Num 33:49); others with the Cedron valley. Acacias grow in dry soil, and the meaning seems to be that even the deserts will become fertile, a further symbol of felicity. 21. MT: 'I will cleanse their blood (which) I have not cleansed', i.e. Yahweh will no longer permit the oppression of his people which he so often suffered in the past. Van Hoonacker reading u'niqqamti for u'niqqéti in 21a: 'I will avenge their blood and I will not grant impunity'. This is much the same as LXX. By his punishment of the Egyptians and Edomites God shows that he avenges the crimes, which he appeared for long to have passed over. The book ends with the promise already repeated more than once, that Yahweh will dwell in Sion.

b Historical Background—Jeroboam II (the first king of that name is always called the son of Nabat) reigned over Israel when Amos delivered his prophecies in the Northern Kingdom, 1:1; 7:10. He was the fourth ruler of the dynasty founded by Jehu. Israel under Jehu and his successor Joachaz suffered much at the hands of the Syrians. During Jehu's reign Hazael of Damascus overran and took possession of the transjordanic part of Israel, viz. Bashan and Galaad, 4 Kg 10:32 f.; during the reign of Joachaz Hazael reduced Israel still more by decimating its armies and by wresting from it various cities, 4 Kg 13:7, 25. Hazael's son and successor Benhadad III continued the aggressive policy of his father, and during the first years of the reign of Joas who succeeded Joachaz Israel had still to suffer. A change came, however, when the Assyrians under their energetic king Adadnirari III (805-782) resumed their policy of expansion towards the west. The Assyrian expeditions with the resulting devastations weakened Syria. Assyria then withdrew and with the exception of some minor incursions into Syria was fully occupied with wars against the kingdom of Urartu on its northern borders.

Taking advantage of Syria's weakness and Assyria's inactivity as far as Israel was concerned, Joas was able to recover the cities which Joachaz had lost, 4 Kg 13:25, and his successor Jeroboam II succeeded in restoring the border of Israel from the approach to Hamath, a Syrian town on the Orontes to the Sea of the Arabah, the Dead Sea, 4 Kg 14:25. The limits of the old Davidic kingdom, except for Judah and Edom, were thus regained, and Israel, besides receiving tribute from subject states, was free to devote its energies to reconstruction, to international commerce and to private enterprise.

c Date of the Prophetic Activity—The superscription (cf. 1:1) informs us that Amos delivered his oracles sometime in the period when Jeroboam of Israel was contemporaneous with Ozias of Judah. Jeroboam II was co-regent of Joas of Israel from 793 to 782, and he reigned alone thereafter until 753, while Ozias of Judah was co-regent of Amasias of Judah from 791 to 767, was sole ruler thereafter until 750, and had Joatham as his own co-regent until 740 (so Thiele in the Journal of Near Eastern Studies, July 1944). The earliest date, therefore, of Amos' prophetic activity would be 791, and the latest 753. The further statement that Amos came on the scene 'two years before the earthquake' (1:1b) would have dated his preaching for his early readers but is of little help to us in defining the date more precisely since earthquakes were not infrequent on the coast of the Mediterranean. The internal evidence of the book, however, points to the latter part of Jeroboam's reign as the period to which the discourses of Amos are to be assigned. It was a period of great wealth and luxury, and hence Jeroboam's battles must have been already fought and won.

The Life of Amos—(a) Private Life. Amos was a common man, not necessarily poor, but presumably not in high social position. We are told in 1:1 that in private life he was a nôqêd. This same word is applied to Mesha, king of Moab in 4 Kg 3:4. Its meaning is seen from the cognate word in Arabic which applies it to one who raises a peculiar breed of stunted sheep valued for their excellent wool. In 7:14 Amos declares that he was a bôqêr (cattle-tender), but this may be as scribe's error for nôqêd. We learn from 1:1 that Amos pastured his sheep in the neighbourhood of Tekoa, the modern Teku'a lying on an elevated Judean hill six miles south of Bethlehem. From 7:14 it appears further that the future prophet was employed in dressing sycomore trees (not our trees of the same name). The fruit of those trees resembles a fig in shape and size and grows in clusters. The dressing probably consisted in nipping (LXX κνίζων; Vg vellicans) the fruit, and so releasing an injurious insect which prevents it from ripening. The trees grew in the lower part of the semi-wilderness which slopes down from Tekoa to the Maritime Plain on the west and to the Dead Sea on the east. In this region of moor and semi-desert Amos lived, and his writing is rich with imagery from the life of the sparsely-inhabited Judean uplands: the wagon swaying under its load of sheaves, 2:13; the roaring of the lion, 3:4; the snaring of birds, 3:5; the shepherd rescuing remnants of a sheep from a lion; 3:12; a serpent lurking in a cranny of the house, 5:19; an ever-flowing stream, 5:24; rocks on the hill-side, 6:13; a basket of ripe summer-fruit, 8:1.

(b) Public Life.—Amos himself tells us that he was actually engaged at his ordinary occupations when Yahweh said to him: 'Go, prophesy to my people, Israel', 7:15. In obedience to the divine call Amos, though a Judean, went to the Northern Kingdom, there to prophesy against the social and religious vices of the nation. The main scene of his public preaching was the royal sanctuary of Bethel. Here he met with opposition from the local priest Amasias. The latter denounced him to Jeroboam, who seemingly took no notice of the partly-distorted report which he received from his priest. Whereupon Amasias, addressing Amos contemptuously as a visionary, exhorted him to leave at once for his native Judah and there earn his living. Amos replied that he was no professional prophet, nor did he pretend to any trained skill in prophesying, nor derive his commission from any society of men. There and then the prophet daringly predicted enemy invasion, barbarous treatment of Amasias's own wife by the invading soldiery, the massacre of his children, the confiscation of his land, and his death outside the borders of Palestine. Finally Amos predicted the captivity of Israel. When his mission was concluded, the prophet returned home and there placed on permanent record the substance of the speeches which Israel refused to heed.

The Social and Religious Conditions censured by Amos—(a) Social Conditions. The nation comprised 525a but two classes of people, viz. the very rich and the very poor. The former lived in houses of hewn stone panelled with ivory; they partook of sumptuous banquets and looked with disdain on their unfortunate brothers and sisters at the other end of the social scale. The poor were in dire distress and, as the inequality in the distribution of wealth increased, their lot became more wretched still. They were, moreover, oppressed and exploited by the rich. Over a period of years the agricultural population had suffered losses not only from the Syrian hosts which overran the land, but also from the drought, the blasting and the blight which affected the crops, cf. 4:7-9. Some people were therefore compelled by financial distress to borrow money for which they had to pay a high rate of interest and in addition to mortgage their holdings of land. Failure to meet the money-lender's demands resulted in foreclosure. Although the laws of Israel (Lev 25:25 ff.) decreed that the former owner could at any time redeem the land for money and that at the year of jubilee it was to be returned free, nevertheless the administration of those laws was, in the days of Amos, in the hands of a corrupt executive which was not above accepting bribes from the wealthy. When the borrower of money had no land he was compelled to mortgage his person, and failure to repay resulted in slavery. The wealth derived from slave-labour, from the excessive interest charged on loans, from exorbitant rents, and from commercial deceit went to provide further luxuries for the rich and their already well-pampered women-folk.

b (b) Religious Conditions.—The Israelites worshipped at the shrines of Bethel, Galgal, Dan and Beer-sheba. We gather from Amos that this worship, though nominally that of Yahweh, was in reality that of a god invented by the imaginations of the worshippers. Yahweh as Amos knew him was a different being from the Yahweh whom he saw the people worship, for their conceptions of him were decidedly false. The popular idea of Yahweh was so radically erroneous that it could no longer be said that he was worshipped by Israel; cf. *L. B. Paton, JBL 13 (1894) pp 80-90. Since Amos regarded the god who was worshipped by the great majority of the people as other than Yahweh, there was no reason to single out for particular condemnation the symbolism of the bull-calf, for if the god who was worshipped was not Yahweh, it was a very minor question, indeed, whether or not this god should be worshipped under the form of a calf. We should note the following passages: 3:14 speaks, not of the purification of a perverted worship of Yahweh, but rather of the entire abolition of the cult at Bethel (cf. 7:9; 9:1-4); in 4:4 f. Yahweh is not pleased with the sacrifices offered because he does not regard them as offered to himself (cf. 5:21 ff.); in 5:4 f. Yahweh is clearly distinguished from the god whom the Israelites worship, for here Yahweh declares that it is he whom they must seek if they are to survive as a nation, and not the god whom they adore at the sanctuaries (cf. 8:14).

c The Doctrine of Amos.—(a) Yahweh is the Creator and Governor of the Physical Universe. He formed the mountains and created the winds, he can in a moment darken the sky with his clouds, 4:13. He made the constellations Pleiades and Orion; he causes day to alternate with night, 5:8. He controls nature to the advantage (cf. 9:13) or disadvantage of man (cf. 4:6-11). His power over nature is manifested in the phenomenon of the waves which at his command inundate the land, 5:8; cf. 9:6.

d (b) Yahweh is God of all Nations. He is a universal God for he determines the destinies of the nations of the earth. He brought the Philistines from Caphthor (i.e. either Crete or Carpathos near Rhodes) and the Syrians from Qir, 9:7; he caused the Amorites to flee before the Israelites, 2:9; he will send the Syrians back whence he brought them, 1:5; he will raise up a nation (viz. Assyria) to invade Israel, 6:15. Yahweh will likewise judge all nations: he will chastise not only Israel and Judah but likewise all the peoples in the vicinity for their acts of inhumanity which are breaches of the laws of universal morality, 1:3-2:3. Those heathen nations Yahweh will punish not as God of Israel and not because they have offended against his chosen people (cf. 1:6 ff.; 2:1 ff.) but he will arraign them as their God.

(c) Yahweh, the God of the Universe, is in a Special Way the God of Israel. Israel alone he knew, for he freely chose this people from among the nations of the earth and with them entered into a covenant, 3:2; his will he had clearly made known to them through the covenant laws and also through the voice of the inspired prophets, 2:11; 3:7. Israel, however, is not to imagine that the special choice of Yahweh carries with it immunity from judgement. Against those who for example thought, as the Moabites did of Chemosh, that his existence was bound up with theirs and that, therefore, their preservation was vital to him, Amos insisted that Israel is Yahweh's people not through any natural necessity but solely through his free choice. In fact Yahweh's judgement on his chosen people will be a rigorous one, because his relations with them involved special obligations which they failed to honour.

(d) The moral attribute of Yahweh on which Amos lays most emphasis is his righteousness. While the prophet Osee regarded Israel's sin as especially an outrage on divine love, Amos thought of it as especially a provocation of divine justice. Yahweh being himself pre-eminently just will not tolerate injustice in the world over which he rules. But Yahweh is also a merciful and loving God, for the exhortation 'seek ye me and ye shall live' (5:4b) is the invitation of one who waits with loving heart to receive back his erring children.

Amos' Familiarity with Israel's Past.—The words 'his brother' in 1:11 show that he was acquainted with the story of Jacob and Esau, Gen 25. From 2:8 we may infer that he knew of the law against retaining pledged garments over night, Ex 22:26. He knew of the Exodus and the Conquest, 2:9 f.; 3:1 f.; 5:25; 9:7. He was acquainted with the history of David, 6:5.

Biblical Citations from Amos.—The book is referred to in Tob 2:6 and a citation made from 8:10; in Ac 7:42 f. where Am 5:25 f. is quoted from the 'book (DV 'books') of the prophets', i.e. the twelve Minor Prophets regarded by the Hebrews as one book; in Ac 15:16 f., a quotation from Am 9:11.

Division of the Book.—The book may conveniently be divided into four sections as follows: (1) A prologue (chh 1-2) which comprises a series of prophecies against Israel's neighbouring states and against Israel itself. (2) Chh 3-6, further oracles against Israel. (3) Five visions interspersed with some addresses, chh 7-9. (4) An epilogue describing the restoration of David's kingdom, 9:11-14.

I 1 Superscription—see § 524c.

2 The General Tenor of all Amos' Utterances.—b Yahweh roars, i.e. proclaims his anger against sinners. His voice is as loud and as awe-inspiring as the roar of a lion in the act of springing upon its prey, and as the peals of the rolling thunder (cf. Ps 17:14). The voice comes from Sion, Yahweh's earthly abode. The terror which it inspires is described figuratively as drying up vegetation.

3-II 5 The Crimes of the Nations and the Inevitable Punishment.—In each of the oracles against Israel's neighbouring states the prophet follows a fixed pattern, viz. 'Thus saith Yahweh: For three crimes of . . . yea, for four, I will not revoke it (i.e. the sentence of doom); because . . . (one specific sin and the punishment are here mentioned)'. In the expression 'For three crimes of . . . yea, for four . . .' the two numbers together suggest a large but indefinite number. One specific transgression is mentioned as a typical example. All the nations will be punished by fire which symbolizes the devastations of war, and d 2-5 Judgement on Damascus—Damascus was one of the many states of Syria. Threshing instruments of iron (DV 'iron wains') were frequently composed of heavy planks joined side by side by means of wooden cross-pieces, and studded underneath with basalt or iron teeth. They were pulled by oxen over the heaped-up corn on the threshing-floor; the corn was thereby shelled and the straw cut into pieces. The charge against Damascus is probably not to be taken literally, but rather as figuring the cruel treatment meted out to the inhabitants of Galaad. 4f. In punishment Yahweh will send the flame of war (for fire as a symbol of war, cf. Jg 9:20) into the royal palaces once occupied by Hazael and Benhadad III, the two recent kings who caused such suffering to Israel. He will cause an invading enemy to break the bar which fastened the city gates, in other words, to prize open the fortifications. Moreover, Yahweh will extirpate from the plain of Aven (DV 'the idol'; LXX 'On') whoever dwells there, and from the house of Eden (DV 'pleasure') the supreme official, and the people will be taken into exile to Qir (DV 'Cyrene'). The three places mentioned here cannot now be identified with any certainty; the first may be the plain between Lebanon and Antilebanon, while the site of Eden may have been where now is Jubb 'Adin, 25 m. NE. of Damascus. The district called Qir may be the land of the Karites between the Tigris and the Euphrates.

e 6-8 Judgement on Philistia—Four of the five federated city-states are mentioned, Gath being omitted. The sin with which Philistia and pre-eminently Gaza is taxed is that of carrying off whole groups of captives to deliver them over to Edom, presumably to be resold to Arabia. In those days Edom must have been engaged in the slave-trade. The text does not say that the sufferers were Israelites. Yahweh, through his prophet, declares that those city-states will be devastated and what remains of the Philistines after such devastation will perish subsequently.

f 9-10 Judgement on Tyre—Tyre's sin, likewise that of slave-trading, is aggravated by the crime of perfidy. Since there is nothing in the context to suggest that the captives delivered up to Edom were Israelites, it seems that the 'covenant of brethren' which the Tyrians disregarded was one formed with other Phoenician cities. Moreover, it may not have been a specific treaty but rather one of mutual obligations enjoined by kinship.

g 11-12 Judgement on Edom—Edom, with hereditary and unchecked hatred, persecuted Israel, its blood-relation (cf. Gen 25). Theman here refers not to a district of Edom but as sometimes in the Bible (cf. e.g. Jer 49:20) to the whole kingdom. Bosra was an important Edomite city, probably represented by the present-day town of El-Buṣayreh, 20 miles SE. of the Dead Sea. It has been urged that according to the historical books of the OT Edom, until the period of the Exile, suffered more from Israel than the latter from Edom. However, it must be remembered that not all the occurrences of the unsettled period of the Israelite monarchy are referred to in the Bible.

h 13-15 Judgement on Ammon—Ammon's crime is that with the sole intention of acquiring more land its inhabitants massacred pregnant women of Galaad. *G. R. Driver in JTS 39 (1938) 261 objects to the rendering 'they have ripped up women with child', one of his reasons being that the verb bāqa' (rip up) in its qal form as here is elsewhere applied to breaking into a country. He suggests that the noun hārōt (pregnant women) is the name of a district belonging to Galaad. For this crime their king (DV 'Melchom'; so also Syr.) and his princes are doomed to an ignominious captivity. Against those critics who retain the reading 'Melchom', the name of the national god of the Ammonites, may be urged that the words adjoined, viz. 'his princes', point to the king, that the condemnation is not because of the nation's idolatry, and finally that the references in other judgements are to the civil rulers, cf. 1:5, 8; 2:3. Rabba stood on the site of the modern Amman, capital city of Transjordan.

II 1-3 Judgement on Moab—The Moabites desecrated a royal corpse, that of a king of Edom, by cremation. Nothing further is known of this act. In ancient times such an indignity was looked upon as a heinous crime which called for vengeance. Yahweh will punish this inhumanity, although Edom was actually the enemy of Israel, Yahweh's chosen people; see g above. The exact location of Carioth, referred to again in Jer 48:24, 41 and also mentioned on the Moabite Stone, is unknown. The Carioth to which the family of Judas belonged would be in Judah. The trumpet, the horn of a cow or a ram, was sounded on various occasions, but principally when danger threatened.

4-5 Judgement on Judah—The people of Judah are charged with revolting from Yahweh, and allowing themselves to be led astray by their idols (lit. 'their lies') which their forefathers worshipped. The idols were images of Yahweh or, perhaps, the reference is to other gods.

6-16 The Crimes of Israel and the Sentence—The prophet, whose mission was to Israel, prefaces his oracles against the Northern Kingdom by a rapid survey of its neighbouring states, and thus skilfully leads up to a climax. The Israelites would have been only too pleased to hear the sins of their neighbours denounced and to agree that the threatened punishment was well deserved. Having thus gained the attention and good-will of his audience, Amos unexpectedly points to their own transgressions of the same moral laws against which their neighbours have offended. Israel's crimes are aggravated by ingratitude for Yahweh's special favours. Punishment is inevitable. 6b. The money-lenders sold into slavery the honest man who was forced by circumstances to borrow, and at the appointed time was unable to meet their demands, and they sold the needy man for a trifling debt (lit. 'a pair of sandals'). The clause 'they sold the poor man for a pair of shoes' does not mean that the price obtained for the poor man was something trifling, because assuredly those rapacious money-lenders would get as much, not as little, as they could. A less probable interpretation of the clause is based on the custom of casting a shoe on a piece of land as a sign of taking possession (cf. Ru 4:7; Ps 59:10; 107:10). This interpretation makes Amos refer to the cheating of the poor out of their land (cf. Is 5:8), and is supported by the LXX reading of 1 Kg 12:3: 'from whose hand have I taken a bribe, and a shoe?' which are the words of a protestation made by Samuel. 7a. The rich ground down the poor; the lowly found their modest purposes thwarted. 7b. The young woman was probably the servant-maid of the house (the word 'same' is not in MT). Amos gives but another example of the oppression of the poor by the rich. The master and his son have carnal relations with the maid. This abuse is a profanation of Yahweh's holy name for it is an act inconsistent with his infinite holiness. Some commentators hold that the young woman is one of the prostitutes who were a feature of the Canaanite ritual at the shrines. Those who had intercourse with one of those prostitutes were thought to place themselves under the patronage of the particular deity which she represented. The inevitable consequence of 5361 this crime was that Yahweh's name, in virtue of his connexion with Israel, was brought into discredit. m Deut 23:17 prohibits the practice. 8. The civil code of Israel (cf. Ex 22:26 f.; Deut 24:12 f.) decreed that if a poor man was obliged to pawn his outer cloak the creditor must restore it to him before sundown, for use at night when it was often his only covering. Those whom Amos condemns reclined during the sacrificial banquets on clothes held in pawn in contravention of the law. They believed, perhaps, that if the garment could be used in a religious service the needs of worship would supersede those of civil law. At the sacrificial banquets the wine they drank was purchased with the money of those whom they had mulcted. In this verse as in the preceding the emphasis is on the oppression of the poor. Amos uses the words 'the house of their god', for he wishes to insinuate that there was nothing in common between Yahweh and the god whom those people worshipped as Yahweh.

n 9-12. The people's guilt is enhanced by the benefits conferred upon them by Yahweh. The name 'Amorite' is here used as a general designation of the pre-Israelite population of Canaan on both sides of the Jordan (cf. Jos 24:18). 10. It was Yahweh who cared for them during the forty years in the wilderness and eventually led them into the promised land. 11 f. He raised up men who taught them by their doctrine (prophets) and example (Nazirites). The Nazirites were men consecrated to God, and one of their vows was to abstain from wine. The Israelites, however, debauched the Nazirites and commanded the prophets to be silent.

o 13-16 Judgement is pronounced on Israel—13. Behold I will make it (i.e. the ground) sway under you as a wagon sways that is full of sheaves. Many interpretations of this difficult verse have been put forward; the one here adopted involves the slight change of one consonant, viz. ayin to pe, in both verbs (cf. Robinson, p 18). The swaying ground denotes Yahweh's coming in judgement. 14 f. Against the divine visitation the Israelites cannot stand: refuge will fail the swift; the valiant will not be able to assert their strength; the warrior (DV 'the strong') will not save himself; the bowman will be routed; neither the infantry nor the cavalry will secure their safety; even the most courageous will cast away his armour and rush from the battlefield in attempted flight. The sentence will surely be accomplished; it is 'the oracle of Yahweh' (DV 'saith the Lord').

537a III 1-8 The Certainty of Chastisement on Israel—1. This oracle, though primarily intended for the Northern Kingdom, seems also to include Judah. 2. In the preceding discourse (2:6-16) the prophet foretold the destruction of Israel. Those who heard him refused to believe him. Yahweh had chosen the Israelites from among all nations to be his own, and therefore they could count on him to preserve them. They had fallen into the habit of thinking after the manner of the heathen (cf. 4 Kg 18:33 f.; also the Moabite Stone) that each nation had its own god who would not readily punish his own people, unless perhaps he was angry with them for some reason not related to their moral conduct. Yahweh is surely not angry with Israel, for the people are duly performing the ritual and supplying an abundance of sacrifices. Amos retorts that because Israel is Yahweh's special people, the morally guilty nation is all the more deserving of punishment.

3. Will two walk together unless they know one another (so LXX)? There can no longer be fellowship between Yahweh and his people because the latter have broken off friendly relations; their election was for service, and they have failed to give it. The words of MT and Vg which mean that two do not meet unless they have made an appointment may be relevant if spoken to the inhabitants of the sparsely-populated district of Tekoa, and not, as here, to the throngs who frequent Bethel. 4 f. The judgement threatened by Yahweh is an awful reality and will most certainly come to pass. Amos represents it as already in execution. A lion only roars when it is springing upon its prey; Yahweh has roared, so his prey is at hand. 5. Will a bird fall to the earth (omit with LXX 'into the snare') when there is no trap for it? Will a bird-snare spring up from the ground and have taken nothing? Yahweh has set the trap, and Amos envisages Israel as actually caught. 6 f. The sound of a horn is the signal of approaching attack, and the people of the city are terrified because they know that attack is certain. The calamity (DV 'evil') which Yahweh has threatened to send upon his people is equally certain, for the voice of the prophet, who is but proclaiming what Yahweh has revealed, has sounded the alarm. 8. Amos summarizes his discourse. The lion has roared; Yahweh, represented by a lion, has made known his vengeance and Israel's ruin is real. Yahweh, the author of this imminent calamity, has told his prophet, and the prophet cannot refrain from proclaiming it.

9-15 The Doom of Samaria—9 f. The crimes of the Israelite aristocracy are such that those who inhabit the palaces of the great nations of the earth, viz. Assyria (so LXX; DV 'Azotus') and Egypt—heathens all and given to luxurious living—are invited to assemble on the mountains of Samaria (i.e. the whole Northern Kingdom). They are to look over the land and mark the great tumults (DV 'many follies') and especially the social crimes committed there. Wrong-doing has become second nature to the many who store up in their mansions the wealth they have amassed by violence and rapine. 11. Because of those crimes, for the existence of which there is ample evidence, an enemy will encircle (cf. sōbēb) the land and will strip from thee thy strength, and thy mansions will be plundered. 12. Thus saith Yahweh: As the shepherd saves from the mouth of the lion two legs or a bit of an ear, so shall the children of Israel who inhabit Samaria be saved with (only so much as) the corner of a divan or the cross-piece from the leg of a couch. This, that of *N. Herz in JTS 15 (1914) 262, seems the most probable rendering of a difficult verse. The word bigmeseq (DV 'of Damascus') is divided into two by Herz and pointed differently, viz. bad miššeq. Amos institutes a comparison between the bits of the sheep rescued by the shepherd from the lion and the scraps of their expensive furniture saved by the voluptuous Israelites from the catastrophe which will overtake them. A shepherd was held responsible by the owner for the safety of every sheep. It was, however, recognized that he could not altogether prevent damage by lions, so if he could produce any fragment of the carcase with the marks of the lion's teeth, he was absolved from restitution (cf. Ex 22:13). 15. This verse seems out of place after 14 and originally probably followed 12. Their beautiful mansions will be destroyed. The winter house and the summer house were probably parts of the same building, the latter being an additional apartment built on the flat roof of the winter house (cf. Jg 3:20; Jer 36:22). Houses of ivory were those panelled or adorned with ivory (cf. 3 Kg 22:39; Ps 44:9). A slight change in the Hebrew word for 'many' gives us 'ebony', and this may have been the original reading. Those stately mansions, with their divans and couches, were for him, who owned but a mountain-hut with a sleeping-mat, symbols of excessive luxury. 13 f. The well-to-do nobles of Assyria and Egypt who in 9 above were bidden to come and note the wickedness of Samaria are here invited to hear and affirm the divine sentence given in 14. Yahweh, the God of hosts, declares that in the day in which he will punish Israel for its transgressions he will also destroy the altars of Bethel, the chief shrine of the Northern Kingdom. The Northern Kingdom is here called 'the house of Jacob'. In Amos it is also referred to as 'house of Israel', 'house of Joseph', 'house of Isaac' (in 7:9, 16 where DV reads 'idol'), Samaria. The title 'Yahweh, God of hosts' or more frequently simply 'Yahweh of hosts'

527b is pre-eminently a prophetic title of Yahweh. The word 'host' is, in the Bible, applied to (i) an army of men, (ii) a company of angels and (iii) the army of the heavenly bodies. Although differences of opinion exist as to the original meaning of the title 'Yahweh of hosts', there seems to be no doubt that for Amos it designates Yahweh as the Ruler of the hosts of heaven and earth (cf. LXX πρωτοκράτωρ). The 'horns' of the altar were horn-shaped projections from the four corners. At the oblation of the victim the priest touched the horns with his finger which was dipped in the victim's blood.

c IV 1-3 Amos Censures the Women of Samaria—He likens these well-pampered and wanton upper-class women to the kine of Bashan (DV 'fat'), Bashan being a district beyond the Jordan noted in OT times for its well-nourished flocks and herds, Deut 32:14; Ps 21:13; Ez 39:18. Those lazy women fatten upon the poor; they imperiously urge on their husbands (DV 'masters') to provide the means of indulgence by fair methods or by foul, not caring what their luxuries cost their less fortunate sisters. Yahweh, however, will cause them to suffer for such conduct. They will be led away with hooks, and the last among them with fish-hooks (2b)—the image is now that of fish being hauled out of their native element. Their departure from the city will be through breaches made by an attacking enemy in the walls, each woman going straight before her for she is being dragged out by the enemy, and they will be chased towards Mt Hermon. The Heb. of 3b gives no clear meaning; it reads 'ye will cast towards Harmon'. Harmon (DV Armon) is unknown. The emendation followed is that of Van Hoonacker, p 234.

d 4-13 The People's Zeal in Worship—The stark contrast between the sedulous performance of religious services and simultaneous moral wrong-doing manifests their belief that provided they did not fail in his ritual, Yahweh would overlook their evil lives. 4 f. The invitation is ironical. The transgression lies in the very fact of going to Bethel and to Galgal, not in the making of incorrect offerings at those shrines. The offerings mentioned, viz. morning sacrifices, tithes every three years (DV 'days': the plural 'days' is used sometimes in the OT in the sense of 'years': Lev 25:9; Jg 17:10; 2 Par 21:19), thank-offerings without (see note below) leaven and free-will offerings were all according to the law. 5a. The law (cf. Lev 2:11) decreed that leaven might not be consumed upon the altar as part of a sacrifice. Here, however, the context seems to show that the Heb. preposition, min, is not partitive, meaning 'from', i.e. 'made up of', but rather privative, meaning 'without' (cf. Robinson, p 24). 5b. Proclaim free-will offerings (cf. Lev 7:16; Deut 12:17), make them known. This also was the correct procedure laid down in the law (cf. Deut 12:18) that members of the offerer's household and others were to partake of the sacrificial banquet, and, of course, they had to be notified. The statement 'for so you love' (DV 'for so you would do') refers not to the clause immediately preceding, but rather to the ironical invitation as a whole; the people are ever ready to go to those shrines.

e 6 ff. Yahweh on his side showed his displeasure by sending various chastisements, famine (6), drought (7 f.), blight (9), epidemic disease (10) and earthquake (11). The divine visitations had not, however, the desired effect, for the people continued to worship a god who in reality was not Yahweh. The refrain 'you have not returned to me' is repeated after the description of each visitation; the repetition seeks to impress the fact upon the listeners. 6c. 'And I also have given you cleanness of teeth in all your cities': the teeth were clean because of lack of food. 7 f. On one occasion Yahweh withheld the rain which usually falls in Palestine in the form of heavy showers in the months of March and April. The corn thereby suffered a serious setback and could not fully recover. On another occasion Yahweh caused the winter or 'former' rains to fall in one place and not in an adjoining district. This he did in order that the people might observe that the lack of rain in some parts was not a mere accident. Only in those comparatively few cities where the rains fell did the water-cisterns contain water, and the inhabitants having but little to spare from their own wants could not satisfy those from the neighbouring towns who, weakened by thirst, staggered (DV 'went') in to find water. 9. The grain and fruit crops were destroyed by the sirocco and by a blight. In addition locusts ravaged all herbage. 10. The fourth divine visitation comprised a pestilence after the manner of the pestilences which are endemic in the marshy lands on the Egyptian frontier. In addition there was warfare in which Israel's choice young men were slain together with their captured (or, according to G. R. Driver in JTS 39 (1938) 262, collected) horses. The air was filled with the stench of unburied corpses. Yet, notwithstanding, the people failed to learn that, in Yahweh's eyes, zeal in worship does not compensate for wickedness of life. 11. From the terrible visitation of an earthquake Israel emerged like something charred.

12 f. Since the above calamities failed to teach f Israel that the real Yahweh is a righteous God, a worse disaster will come. The nature of this disaster is not stated but is deliberately left indefinite by the word thus (DV, 'these things'). As man fears the unknown more than the known, ignorance of the nature of threatened disaster inspires greater fear. Let Israel expect forthwith to meet an offended God, coming to execute vengeance; he is omnipotent and omniscient. 12b. because I will do this to thee, prepare to meet thy God, O Israel. 13. This is the first of three doxologies given by Amos, the others being 5:8 f. and 9:5 f. Yahweh made the mountains and the wind; he declareth unto man what is his musing, for he can penetrate the secrets of the human heart; he maketh the dawn darkness, by causing clouds to appear; he rides on the high places of the earth, i.e. on the thunder-clouds as they sweep over the hill-tops (cf. Mic 1:3); Yahweh, the God of hosts is his name.

V:1-8, 8, 9 A Dirge, Israel's Coming Destruction—g The prophet utters a dirge (1b-3; MT, 2) over fallen Israel, as if it were already ruined. He then declares briefly how (3) and why (4 f.) Israel will come to that abject state. Finally, Amos exhorts his hearers to do, even at this eleventh hour, what heretofore they have neglected to do, viz. to seek Yahweh, who is the Creator and Governor of the physical universe and the Ruler of the world of men (6, 8 f.) Verse 7 is out of place and should immediately precede 10.

1a. Hear this word which I take up for a dirge over you. In Hebrew poetry a dirge has a special rhythm, for the lines of the verse have each five beats or accents with the caesura as a rule after the third; this is known as qinah rhythm.

1b-2. She is fallen to rise no more, the virgin of Israel; She is forsaken upon her own land, none to upraise her.

The nation as a whole is personified under the figure of a virgin. 3. Ninety per cent of Israel's fighting forces will be destroyed. 4 f. Israel merits the fate which has just been pronounced against it, because the people did not observe the moral law of Yahweh, who, being himself righteous, demands above all else right-living from men. 6. Amos turns in exhortation to the people to seek Yahweh that they may live, that the nation may not be overthrown by war (here symbolized by fire). The prophet hoped that even at this late hour the nation might find the real Yahweh. 8. Pleiades (DV 'Arcturus') and Orion are two constellations mentioned again in Job 9:9; 38:31 f. The participles with which, in MT, this and the following verse open are in apposition with Yahweh mentioned in 6. 9. Lit. 'Who causes devastation to smile upon the strong, and devastation comes upon the stronghold'. G. R. Driver in JTS 39 (1938) 262 suggests that the verb 'causes to smile', which is unsuited to devastation, should be emended to 'wrecks' (hamm' gabbél). For 'comes'

527g read with all the versions 'causes to come'. If men defy the will of Yahweh, then though they be strong and live in strong fortresses, he will destroy them.

7, 10-17 Amos censures the Corrupt Judges—The sense seems to demand that the word 'woe' be supplied (cf. 5:18; 6:1) at the beginning of 7, Woe to them that turn judgement to wormwood, and cast justice to the ground. Amos is referring to the corrupt administration of law. Wormwood, a species of the genus Artemisia, is a bitter plant (cf. Deut 29:18; Jer 9:15; 23:15). 10. They who sit in judgement at the gates of the city hate him who pleads the cause of the innocent. 11. Judges were bribed by the landlords to give decisions against the tenant farmers; the latter were thus required to hand over exactions of grain (DV 'choice prey'), i.e. an extortionate share of the produce of their land. Yahweh, however, will not suffer such crimes to pass with impunity; the corrupt judges will not live to enjoy the houses and vineyards on which they have expended their unjust wealth. 12. Israel merits the judgement threatened in 11. 13. Things have come to such a pass that, lest he provoke greater evils, the prudent man is keeping silence. 14 f. contain a call to repentance. A necessary condition of Yahweh's active love is the moral uprightness both of their private and of their public lives when they are acting as judges of the people. If this condition is fulfilled, perhaps Yahweh will have mercy on the remnant of Joseph. The Northern Kingdom had already been reduced to a remnant because the life of the nation had gradually been sapped by exploitation and oppression on the one hand, and luxury and dissipation on the other. Some, e.g. de Vaux, RB 30 (1933) 528, say that the 'remnant' in 15 is what will be left after judgement. 16 f. The opening word 'therefore' would suggest that the prophet, before delivering the sentence contained in these verses, paused for some sign from his audience that they were prepared to implement the condition necessary for national life. As no indication that they would do so was forthcoming, Amos predicted a calamity which would cause wailing and lamentation in town and country-side.

18-27 Yahweh is roused to Anger by the Worship at the Shrines—The sinful nation will be severely chastised, and that by Yahweh himself, whose ethical character the people have entirely neglected. 18. The expression 'day of Yahweh' is of frequent occurrence in the prophets, where it means the day on which Yahweh will notably intervene in historical events; cf. A. Jones, 'The Eschatology of the Synoptic Gospels' in Scripture, vol. 4, pp 222 ff. There may be many such interventions, and therefore, many 'days of Yahweh'. Amos' contemporaries looked forward to a day when Yahweh would intervene and confer upon his special people some crowning victory. Amos, however, makes known that on the day about to come Yahweh will procure the victory of righteousness over sin by chastising the morally guilty nation. 19 f. The day of Yahweh will bring in ineluctable disasters; a man will escape one peril only to fall into another; calamity will seek out its victims even in their homes. 21 ff. Yahweh will not spare them for their zealous discharge of ritual observances. Their sacrifices, festivals, sacred chant and music are condemned. We should note that the condemnation here is not absolute in the sense that such acts do not belong to the religion of Yahweh. We have here rather a relative condemnation, a condemnation, namely, of the cult practices at the northern shrines; cf. C. Lattey, JTS 42 (1941) 155 ff. The Israelites who worshipped at those shrines thought of Yahweh in much the same way as the Canaanites thought of Baal or the Moabites of Chemosh. Yahweh was simply a tutelary god who loved Israel only, and would always protect it against other nations, all of whom he hated; he was a god whose demands were satisfied by a show of ritual. Yahweh rejected the religious practices of those Israelites because their idea of him was so erroneous that he did not consider the worship as given to himself. 24. But let judgement roll down as the waters, and justice as a never-failing torrent. The real Yahweh desires the constant and universal practice of social righteousness. Amos does not deny that the real Yahweh likewise demands sacrifices; we have here another example of the usage by which biblical writers emphasize too exclusively; cf. Ac 5:4b. 25 f. The answer to be expected to the question in 25 is 'no' which is, however, a relative 'no'. The prophet speaking for Yahweh does not deny that the Hebrews offered sacrifices during the forty years in the desert, but he denies that those sacrifices were genuinely offered to Yahweh. The worship during that period was only nominally that of Yahweh for actually it was the worship of false gods. We should note that the prophet is speaking in general terms of the nation as a whole; there were, no doubt, many individuals who were genuine worshippers of Yahweh. 26. This verse is obscure. In MT (taking the consonants only) there is mention of the Assyrian deities Sakkuth and Kaiwan. Sakkuth, besides being the god of war, was the god of the sun and of light; Kaiwan was the planet Saturn. It is extremely unlikely that Assyrian deities were worshipped in the desert. We might gather, however, from Deut 4:19 and 17:3 that the Israelites in the desert were given to sun and star worship, and a scribe copying this passage in Amos after the fall of the Northern Kingdom to the Assyrians might have introduced into the text these Assyrian names. 27. Israel is doomed to a captivity in the unknown regions beyond Damascus.

VI 1-15 The Condemnation of the Conceited and Wealthy Aristocracy—1. Woe to them that are at ease in Zion and in security on the mount of Samaria, the men of repute of the first of the nations, unto whom the house of Israel comes (viz. for judgement). The 'men of repute' are the nobles or the ruling classes. Israel is referred to as the first of the nations in ironic allusion, perhaps, to Israel's own opinion of itself. 2. Why would the nation's leaders be conceited? Let them look at Calneh (Kullanhu in NE. Syria), Hamath (on the Orontes) and Gath (in Philistia) and observe their equally prosperous condition. And yet those latter states are smaller in extent than Israel. Are there better (i.e. more flourishing) than these kingdoms? Is their territory greater than your territory? 3. You that thrust off the evil day, and cause the seat of violence to come near. They refuse to believe that the nation will perish, while at the same time they hasten by their actions the day when violence will rule the land. 4-6. They lounge in extreme luxury; they devise for themselves instruments of music as David did (5b). And while they are so conducting themselves their eyes are blinded to the affliction of Joseph, i.e. to the physical misfortunes and sufferings of their brethren (cf. 4:6 ff.). Or, perhaps, the reference in 6b may be to the moral corruption of Israel.

7-15. Yahweh will chastise the proud nobles; their land will experience war and siege with the attendant evils of pestilence and devastation. 7b. And the revelry of them that stretched themselves will cease. 9 ff. A household of even ten men will be wiped out by a plague. Before the last of the ten succumbs a kinsman of one already dead, his burner, will arrive at the house to burn his relative's pestilence-infested body and will be told by the survivor that he is the only one still alive. He will further be requested to keep silent for the name of Yahweh must not be mentioned. 11b is the language of despair, as if the case was hopeless and it was useless to pray. 13. The end of the nation is only what is to be expected. A condition of affairs exists which is as unnatural as the galloping of horses upon rocks or the ploughing of a sea with oxen. Do horses gallop upon rocks? Does one plough the sea with oxen? The adopted reading of this second clause involves a division into two and a different vocalization of the one Hebrew word, viz. babb'qārīm to be read b'baqār yām. 14. They rejoice in their material prosperity (lit. 'a thing of nought') and they boast of their national power. The 'horn' is a figure used to denote power, cf. Deut 33:17;

527k Ps 74:5. 15. The torrent of the desert was some river which flowed into the Dead Sea from the south.

528a VII:1-3 The Vision of the Locusts—In chh 7 ff. Amos recounts what he had seen and heard in five symbolical visions. With regard to the first two visions, they 'are parallel with the list of inflections in 4:6-11, others might have been added, but those two were typical of all the efforts which had been made to turn Israel from her evil way. . . . These (i.e. the first and second) visions are not premonitions of coming disaster, but rather interpretations of actual afflictions' (Harper, p 164). 1. Thus the Lord Yahweh showed me: and, behold, he was forming locusts in the beginning of the shooting up of the late corn-crop: and, behold, it was the late corn-crop after the corn-crops of the king. The meanings here adopted for leqes (DV 'latter rain'; current rendering 'late grass') and for gizzel hammelek (DV and current rendering 'the king's mowing') are those of E. Power in Bi 8 (1927) 87-92. The corn-crops of the king were those sown in the winter months prior to the 20th of January on which the king made a levy. The late corn-crop was that sown between the 20th of January and the end of February. The prophet wishes to declare that the locusts were being formed 'at such a time as to destroy the entire corn-crop. . . He represents them therefore as coming when the late crop is beginning to spring up . . . that is to say at the exact time when they shall naturally destroy the late-crop itself as well as the more developed earlier crop. If the invasion were earlier the late crop still underground would be safe: if it were later the early crop might have been already reaped' (E. Power, p 89). 21. And they were making an end (so *C. Torrey, JBL, 13 (1894) 63, who divides and vocalizes differently the first nine consonants of MT) of devouring the green herbage of the land (2a) but Amos interceded with Yahweh. He urged the insufficiency of the nation's resources and Yahweh put a stop to the destructive work.

b 4-6 The Vision of a Devouring Fire—Yahweh called out that punishment by fire should overtake Israel for its crimes. The fire devoured the great deep, i.e. the mass of water which according to popular conception lay below the flat earth. It would have eaten up the land of Israel (DV 'a part'), but the prophet prayed and Yahweh again averted disaster. 4b. The Heb. word rendered 'a part' in DV means literally 'the portion', viz. that given by Yahweh to his chosen people (cf. Mic 2:4); so Targum.

c 7-9 The Third Vision (Iron)—The same Heb. word, viz. 'anāk, occurs four times in the description of this vision, and in DV it is rendered once by 'plastered' and three times by 'mason's trowel'. The meaning of the word is much disputed, and various meanings have been proposed, for which see J. M. Rinaldi in VD 17 (1937) 82 ff. The rendering 'iron' (cf. LXX ἄδάμας) given by A. Condamin in RB 9 (1900) 586 ff. seems the most probable. Amos beheld Yahweh stationed upon a wall of iron, with iron in his hand. The wall of iron symbolizes the invincible might of the enemy (viz. Assyria), Yahweh's instrument in the coming destruction of Israel. The iron which he holds and which he will place in the midst of his people (cf. 8) is the destroying sword. 8b. Yahweh will not pardon them (DV 'plaster them over') any more. 9. The hill-top sanctuaries of Isaac (DV 'the idol') will be destroyed, and the royal house will perish.

d 10-17 A Biographical Narrative—This section which describes the clash between Amos and Amasias, the priest of Bethel, gives us information concerning the life of Amos before his call to prophesy, his prophetic activity and the reception accorded to him. This information is noted in the general Introduction, § 524d, e. We might remark here that Amos did not say as Amasias reports him as saying (cf. 11a) that Jeroboam would die by the sword. What Amos had said referred to the house of Jeroboam (cf. 9b). This whole section is closely connected with the preceding vision, for in explaining the third vision Amos predicted ruin for the dynasty to which Jeroboam belonged. 528d

VIII 1-3 The Vision of the Basket of Summer (i.e. Ripe) Fruit—Amos sees a basket of summer fruit. The summer fruit is a symbol of Israel ripe in its sins and ready to be devoured. There is a play upon the Heb. words gayis (summer fruit) and qēs (end) of similar sound. Amos sees gayis, but this brings to mind qēs, the end which is to come upon Israel. 3. The singing women (sārōt) of the palace will howl in that day, saith the Lord Yahweh; many will be the corpses; in all places they will be cast forth! Hush!

4-14 Dishonest Merchants exposed and Retribution threatened—This section is in the form of an address giving reasons why the end referred to in the explanation of the previous vision is coming. Avaricious, dishonest, and mean traders are impoverishing the poor. Yahweh's anger is aroused and he swears that Israel will suffer a terrible retribution. 5. The merchants are irritated when they have to suspend business on the festivals of the New Moon (DV 'the month') and of the Sabbath, for on those days they may not open (i.e. display for sale) the wheat. They are thus deprived of an opportunity of engaging in their nefarious practices on those days. On business-days they diminish the ephah (which was equivalent to about eight gallons of dry measure), i.e. the measure by which they sold, and they enlarge the shekel (which was about 160 grains), i.e. the weight used for weighing in the silver received from the buyer; they use false balances. 6. They buy from the money-lenders (cf. 2:6) the poor whom they themselves have so impoverished that they cannot repay what they owe. Finally these dishonest men sell the refuse of the wheat that is not fit for bread. 7. Yahweh has sworn by the pride of Jacob that the wickedness of Israel will not go unpunished. The expression 'the pride of Jacob' is ironical, insinuating that the pride of Jacob (i.e. Israel) is so unalterable as to be the suitable reinforcement of an oath.

8 ff. The terrestrial and celestial wonders are not foretold literally but are received prophetic imagery to depict Yahweh's coming in judgement. An earthquake will shake the land, the movements of which are compared to the undulations on the surface of the Nile (so Van Hoonacker). The generally accepted opinion maintains that the term of comparison is the annual rising and fall of the Nile, but one could hardly compare the short rapid shakings of the earth when it quakes with the gradual change of the waters of the Nile at the annual inundation. The land will rise, all of it, as the Nile and it will be tossed and will fall (reading the verb šāqa as in 9:5) as the Nile of Egypt (8b). 9. The theophany in the day of Yahweh will be accompanied not alone by an earthquake but also by a complete eclipse of the sun at noon-day. 11 ff. A most terrible chastisement is here threatened: the people will rush about from one part of the country to the other, from the Dead Sea to the Mediterranean, from the north even to the west, seeking through a prophet an oracle from Yahweh. They will seek in this national crisis to know Yahweh's will, but they will seek in vain. 14. Such will be the punishment inflicted on those who now swear by a god who is Yahweh only in name. They have failed to recognize his true nature; they have localized him in different sanctuaries and correspondingly broke him up as it were into different deities, viz. the god of Samaria, the god of Dan, the god of Beer-sheba. MT has the words 'the guilt (DV 'sin') of Samaria', but the word 'guilt' is due probably to the intentional substitution by a scribe, just as bōšet ('shame') was deliberately inserted in place of 'Baal' in 2 Kg 2:8; 11:21; Os 9:10; Jer 3:24; 11:13. Translate 14b by As surely as thy God, O Dan, lives; As surely as thy (divine) patron, O Beer-sheba, lives. To get the reading 'your patron', derek ('way') is to be emended to read dōd'ka.

IX 1-6 The Vision of the Smitten Sanctuary—The h

528b people are assembled for worship in a sanctuary. The prophet sees Yahweh standing beside the altar and commanding that the building be thrown down on those assembled. The few who manage to escape death here will not ultimately elude the divine anger. Though they were to dig through to Sheol, or climb to the heavens; though they were to hide on Mount Carmel, or go down to the bottom of the sea; though they were to flee to a foreign land, they would not escape the avenging justice of Yahweh who is all-powerful. 1a. Strike the capitals (which held up the roof) that the thresholds may tremble, and cut them off on to (DV 'for there is covetousness in') the head of them all. 8. The serpent is the sea-monster Leviathan which, according to the ancients, dwelt in the depths of the sea (cf. Is 27:1). 5f. This is the third of the doxologies which celebrate the power and majesty of Yahweh, the author of the forthcoming searching and rigorous judgement. 5. Yahweh touches the earth in the phenomenon of lightning, cf. Ps 143:5 f. Yahweh is the author of the phenomenon of earthquake when the land rises up, all of it, as the Nile and falls as the Nile of Egypt, cf. 8:8b. 6a. It is he that builds his upper chambers in the heavens, and that has established upon the earth his vault (DV 'bundle'). The vault is the sky conceived by the ancients as an arch resting at its extremities on the earth. 6b. Yahweh has power over the waves. 7-10 Israel not immune from Destruction—Amos points out that Israel by nature, or in its natural state, is in Yahweh's eyes on the same level as far-distant Ethiopia. Yahweh gave their first beginnings to all nations (Israel, Philistia, Syria) and, independently of his free choice which has ordained otherwise, Israel is no more to him than any other nation. The Philistines who came from Caphtor and the Syrians from Qir were hated by the Israelites. 8a. The 'sinful kingdom' is Israel. There is, however, no implied contrast with Judah. 8b. The Israelite people will not be wholly destroyed. Although in 9:1-4 judgement falls on all without distinction, it is clear from the body of the prophecy that the sins of the upper classes determined the fate of the nation. The doctrine of a remnant which will be spared and eventually return from Exile to Palestine to form there the nucleus of the new Israel is implicit in this clause. 9f. Though there were, no doubt, many faithful followers of Yahweh, chiefly among the poor whose cause Amos champions, the nation as a whole was corrupt and both the faithful and the wicked would suffer the disaster of exile. The purpose of the exile was twofold: to punish the nation for its crimes, and to sift out and destroy the wicked elements. Yahweh will sift the house of Israel among all the nations, as though it were shaken in a sieve. The nations were the various subject peoples of the vast Assyrian Empire among whom the exiles were planted. We should note that MT makes no mention of corn, and it is probable that the comparison is to the sifting of sand by a sand-screen. The latter allows the fine sand to pass through and retains all the stones. The nations are Yahweh's sieve. Among them Israel is shaken; the good element represented by the pure sand passes through, falls to the ground, and is preserved, while the unworthy element represented by the stones fails to pass through and is cast away. Of the loyal adherents of Yahweh who went into exile some fell away under adversity while the others became yet more purified and more attached to their religion. These latter (their descendants) will be reinstated in the home-land. The sinners of 10 are the stones which are cast away. The threat that the sinners will die by the sword is to be understood figuratively; they will no longer be reckoned among the people of Israel.

11-14 A Promise of Restoration—This promise is concerned with the faithful minority which together with those of the kingdom of Judah who survive the Babylonian Exile will be re-established in their ancient home. 11. Amos sees, rising up beyond the ruin of Judah (cf. 2:5), the re-building of the dynasty (lit. 'hut') of David which would cease to function on the capture of Jerusalem (586). In a coming era Yahweh will restore to its former splendour the dynasty of David; he will heal the schism which took place in the days of Roboam (cf. 3 Kg 12). 12. This verse is concerned with the pre-eminence of the restored kingdom in the future. Its glory will consist in the possession of what remains of Edom and also the nations, all of which belong to Yahweh. The reference is to the future conversion of the gentiles (cf. Is 2:2, etc.). 13. The superiority of this future kingdom is described under the figure of an extraordinary fertile soil. The harvest will be so bounteous that the reaping will not have been completed when the ploughing for the next season's crops is due to begin, and the vintage so abundant that the cereal-sowing will arrive before the vintage has been finished. The vineyards will pour down streams of sweet wine. 14. Yahweh will restore the fortunes (DV 'bring back the captivity') of Israel (i.e. the united kingdoms). The people will work to beautify their country, confident that they will no more be removed from their native land. The golden age which Amos has in mind is the Messianic era (cf. Ac 15:16 f.), the age of great spiritual blessings, figured by images of the most abundant plenty.

ABDIAS

(OBADIAH)

By S. BULLOUGH, O.P.

530a Bibliography—St Jerome, Commentarii in Abdiam Prophetam, PL 25, 1097-1118; *E. B. Pusey, Minor Prophets, 1860; Knabenbauer, S.J., cf. § 409b; Condamin, S.J., L'Unité d'Abdias, RB 9 (1900) 261 ff.; Van Hoonacker, cf. § 409b; *J. Bewer in ICC, 1912; *H. C. O. Lanchester in CBSC, 1918; *H. Wheeler Robinson in Peake's Commentary, 1920.

b This is the shortest book in the OT, consisting of a single chapter, but St Jerome wrote (on v 1) that 'quanto breuius est, tanto difficilius'. The considerable difficulty of the Book arises from its brevity, from the references to historical events not easily identifiable, from the absence of any date or autobiographical material, from the problems raised by parallels elsewhere, and lastly from several grave textual obscurities.

c About the Prophet himself St Jerome reports a Jewish tradition that he is the same as the steward of King Achab, who bore the same name, who sheltered the hundred prophets, 3 Kg 18:3-16, and whose tomb was shown at Samaria together with those of Eliseus and John the Baptist. The prophet's name in MT is 'Obadyāh (that of the man in 3 Kg is, with a negligible variant 'Obadyāhū), and it appears in AV as Obadiah. The name means 'Servant of Yahweh'. There are in all 12 characters in the OT (chiefly in the lists in Par) bearing this name or its variant. The tradition about the pronunciation seems to be quite unstable, various forms of Abdias or Obadiah being current: LXX, according to the codices and in the different texts, provides many variants of both patterns, and for the 12 persons Vg has 4 times Abdias, thrice Obdia, twice Obedia, once Obadia, once Obdias and once the acc. Obdiam. It is impossible seriously to identify the prophet with any of the other 11, and it must be admitted that beyond the prophecy itself nothing is known of the author.

d The Theme of the Book is the pride of Edom (the neighbouring kingdom to the south, and akin to Judah being descended from Esau), 2-4, and their destruction, 5-9, on account of their unbrotherly attitude to Judah at the time of the latter's calamity, 10-14, which will bring on them God's wrath, 15-16, and retribution from Judah, who will triumph over all nations, 17-21. This last section envisages the restoration of all Israel and concludes with a Messianic sentence on Yahweh's universal kingship.

e The Jeremias Parallels—Jer 49:7-22 is also a prophecy against Edom, wherein are some sections which are almost verbal parallels with Abd, not, however, in the same order. The parallels are these (3b and part of 5 have no parallel):

Abd	1b	2	3a	4	5a	5b	6
Jer 49:14		15	16a	16b	9b	9a	10

Some literary dependence must be supposed, either of one on the other, or of both on an older source. The supposition will depend on the date assigned to Abd. There are some isolated phrases with parallels in Joel: in Abd 11 & Jo 3:3, Abd 15a and Jo 1:15, Abd 15b and Jo 3(4):4 and Abd 17 and Jo 2:32 (3:5).

f The Problem of the Date.—The only fair treatment is to place before the reader the principal evidence in Abd on which he may base a conjecture. A date must be sought when the following circumstances may be verified: (1) Edom feels secure, but ruin is coming upon her at the hands of her former allies, 1-9, (2) Jerusalem has been invaded by foreigners, and men flee from the city, 11-14, (3) Edom meanwhile stood aloof and even joined the invaders, 10-14, (4) Both Israel and Judah are in captivity, 20. The inheritance of Palestine and the punishment of Edom by the returned exiles is seen in the future, 15-16, 17-21.

There are three main groups of opinions: (1) A pre-exilic date, emphasizing the hostility of Edom (e.g. Knabenbauer). Edom began (and continued) a state of revolt against King Joram of Judah c 847 B.C.; 4 Kg 8:20-22; 2 Par 21:8-10. About the same time the Philistines and Arabs invaded Judah and Jerusalem itself, 2 Par 21:17, and since Edom was still in revolt it may be supposed that they joined the invaders. Amos' prophecies against Edom (esp. 1:11 on their hostility), dating from about 760 B.C., look back to these events, and similarly Joel's remarks about deportations by Tyrians, Sidonians and Philistines, Jo 3(4):2-7, refer to this period, so that Joel, Amos and Abdias form a more or less contemporary group in the 8th cent. B.C. The position assigned by tradition to Abdias among the XII is also adduced in support of this date. On this theory Jeremias was of course long posterior to Abdias. Calamity upon Edom is to be taken as a threat, not as a past event.

(2) An exilic date (held by St Jerome and many since), emphasizing the invasion of Jerusalem, which is identified most easily with the catastrophe of 586. Edom's hostility is not indicated in the historical account of 586, but it is clearly suggested in contemporary exilic documents such as Lam 4:21-22; Ez 35 (the whole ch has the same theme as Abd, esp. v 5); and Ps 136(137) 7 ('filiorum Edom in die Jerusalem, qui dicunt: Exinanite, exinanite'), a Ps which at any rate in its present form is plainly exilic. The calamity that overtook Edom is supposed to be at the hands of the Babylonians (whom they had supported in 586) after the fall of Jerusalem when they penetrated into Egypt, overrunning Moab and Ammon en route, Jos, Ant. 10, 9, 7, and therefore probably Edom also. On this theory the Jeremias parallels are contemporary, and both may depend on older sources reflecting the earlier troubles with Edom in the time of, e.g., Amos. The identification of place-names of the Babylonian exile in Abd 20 is connected with an exilic date for Abdias (6th cent.).

(3) A post-exilic date, emphasizing the chastisement of Edom (e.g. Wellhausen and many moderns, incl. Van Hoonacker). Here the captivity of Jerusalem is regarded as past, and the chastisement of Edom by her former allies is beginning. A connexion is made with Mal 1:2-4, written c 480 B.C., where Edom is described as already devastated, and although Petra, one of the principal cities of Edom, was not occupied by the Arabs until 312, as Diodorus Siculus relates, 19, 94, it is easy to suppose Arab invasions of their territory long before this, especially as already c 444 we find an Arab element of some importance in Palestine offering resistance to the work of Nehemias at Jerusalem, Neh 2:19 ff. The Edomites may well at first 5801 have made common cause against Judah with the Arabs in Palestine, only as the Arabs grew stronger to be abandoned by them and eventually defeated. On these suppositions Abd is dated a little before Malachias, c 500 B.C., and the texts in Jeremias are of course older, though it is unlikely that they are source of those of Abd.

A few authors (e.g. Hitzig) place the book as late as the ruin of Petra in 312 and claim that the deportation of Jews refers to that by the Egyptians about this date, recorded by Josephus in Ant. 12, 1, 1.

J The Unity of the Book, small as it is, has been questioned, chiefly on the grounds of chronological incoherence, it becoming thus possible to assign each section to the most convincing date. P. Condamin, RB 9 (1900) 261 ff., demonstrated the unity of the book on a metrical basis, and although one might admit the incorporation of older material, esp. in the opening verses, it seems unnecessary to postulate a multiplicity of authors.

k The style is regular classical Hebrew without obvious signs of either archaic or late post-exilic diction, if one excepts the word qetel in 9, which occurs only here. Its root is unknown in the earlier books and is found only in Job 13:15; 24:14 and Ps 138 (139) 19. The metre is in some places regular but in others inconsistent, while certain sections appear to be in prose. The text of some verses is uncertain.

m A report we have heard from Yahweh, and an ambassador among the nations has been sent; the LXX and the Jer parallel have 'I have heard'. After 'Thus saith . . . ' we expect a divine utterance, which this section appears not to be. Van Hoonacker (henceforth written Van H.) takes the section, together with the substance of the report, 'Arise . . . ' as an 'aside', introducing Yahweh's words in 2. Others take the three sentences 'Thus saith . . . We have heard . . . An ambassador . . . ' as a triple introduction to the divine utterance 'Arise . . . ' (thus Schegg, and Mgr. Knox's translation suggests this). Knabenbauer, following LXX 'I have heard . . . ', takes the speech as beginning at that point, and as the utterance at once of God and the prophet.

n 2-4 Edom's Pride—2. Jer 49:15 for 'exceeding' has 'among men'. 3. MT reads 'The pride of thy heart hath deceived thee'. 'Rock' (singular), Sela has no article in Abd (though it has in Jer 49:16a), and is perhaps a proper name (cf. RVm) as in Jg 1:36; 4 Kg 14:7 and Is 16:1, where Vg translates 'Petra' (with capital), though DV has 'rock' except in Is: 'from Petra of the desert'. The identification with the present Petra in Transjordan, an Edomite stronghold (cf. i supra), is doubtful since there were several such rock-hewn cities in that area, as St Jerome (on 4) already observed. 'Who is saying, Who shall . . . ' is not in Jer.

o 5-9 Edom's Fate—Difficult verses. In 5 the Jer parallel (49:9) has the thieves and grape-gatherers in inverse order, and their activities are not a question but a statement: the grape-gatherers will not leave a remnant, the thieves damage till they have had enough. This yields a more reasonable sense. Furthermore the awkward 'How wouldst thou have held thy peace?' (HT 'How art thou destroyed!') does not appear at all, and the Vg mistranslation here perhaps makes it suspect—Van H. transfers the sentence to the beginning of 6. Jer seems here to have preserved a better reading, and in view of this and the next v here, the meaning seems to be not that something will be left, but that Edom will lose all at the hands of invaders under the figures of thieves and grape-gatherers. I would therefore reconstruct as follows: If thieves come to thee, if raiders of the night, shall they not steal their fill? If grape-gatherers come to thee, shall they leave a remnant? 6: the last Jer parallel (49:10), and no longer verbal in Hebrew. Knox, translating Vg, sees a contrast to the preceding: 5800 5 'at least they had been content to carry off what needed them . . . ' 6 'But now, see how Esau is ransacked . . . ', which offers an explanation of Vg. 7. In HT this verse begins with 'Even to the border', which enables some (incl. Van H.) to attach the words to the end of 6. St Jerome noted but rejected this possibility. Yet it simplifies translation: sought out his hidden things even to the border. If, however, the phrase really belong to 7, the question arises, whose border is indicated? The abandonment of Edom by her allies is described. If it is the allies' border, then the sense is that Edom's delegates (or refugees) are turned out of those lands; if it is Edom's own border, the probable meaning is that the Edomites are turned out of their own land, at least as far as their own border, or else that Edomite conquerors are driven back within their own borders (cf. Knox); but in any case the rendering is forced and requires much supposition. 'They that eat with thee' is an artificial translation in Vg: MT has simply lahm'kâ, 'thy bread', which might conceivably be attached to 'men of': 'men of thy peace, thy bread', but this is unsatisfactory and various emendations have been proposed. Van H. attempts to derive a word from a cognate root (found in Syriac and Arabic) and translates 'tes associés'. Since, however, LXX ignores the word, I prefer to omit it as a dittography of the preceding word. 'There is no understanding in him' is by some considered to form part of the rhetorical question in 8. 9. 'And thy valiant men, O South, shall be afraid, so that man may be cut off from the mount of Esau': the 'South', Tēmān, represents Edomite territory (cf. Am 1:12, where linked with Bosra), and their dismay will itself be the cause of their own failure.

10-14 The Reason of the Calamity is Edom's unbrotherly conduct towards Judah. 10. 'For (= because of) the slaughter' in MT is part of 9, but LXX and Vg rightly include it in 10. Abdias has a slight peculiarity of style according to which such brusque juxtapositions of nouns and verbs are not unusual: e.g. 5 'If thieves . . . if raiders', 7 has no conjunctions, and 12 'in the day of thy brother, in the day of his estrangement', so that here 'for the slaughter, for the violence' (HT has no 'and') is not surprising. 11. 'When thou stoolest aloof' (cf. Knox). 12. DV's 'his leaving his country' = Vg 'peregrinatio': MT nōker, 'estrangement' only here, but cf. the cognate nēker only in Job 31:3 where it is parallel to 'ed', 'misfortune', which occurs in 13 here. The word therefore does not necessarily refer to an exile (cf. Knox). 'Enlarge not thy mouth', perhaps in laughter, though 'mouth' may merely mean 'words' (as in Deut 17:6), and so the phrase may mean 'talking big', 'be not arrogant, or taunting'. 13. 'Thou shalt not be sent out against his army', probably 'Lay not a hand upon his glaci': In MT the active verb 'stretch out' has a fem. ending, for which read yād, 'a hand'. The word hēl, 'glaci', occurs together with 'wall' in Lam 2:8 (Vg 'antemurale', DV 'bulwark'), and Nah 3:8, where, as here, Vg has read it as hayil, 'strength'.

15-16 The Day of the Lord, a frequent notion in the prophets, sometimes considerably developed from the day of triumph of Judah to the eschatological notion of the everlasting Day of the Lord at the end of time, cf. esp. §§ 554a-b and 551i. The meaning here seems to be chiefly the first, though 'all nations' in 15 and the last words of 21 suggest a more universal application. The wider horizon from this verse to the end has suggested to some that this section is a later composition. Yet the theme of the condemnation of Edom continues: as Edom has done, so shall it be done to her, she shall share the fate of the nations. 16. 'As you have drunk', probably the cup of bitterness (a common figure, cf. Jer 25:16; Mt 20:22). 'You' most probably refers to Judah, and then the nations in their turn shall drink the same cup, and become nonentities, when Judah triumphs (Van H., Knox, others). Some,

530t however (e.g. Knabenbauer) understand the phrase of Edom having joined the drunken orgies of the invaders of Jerusalem, and of the nations then holding similar orgies in Edom (though Knabenbauer himself in the second member sees the cup of bitterness). 'Sup up', lā'û, a verb occurring only here and of uncertain meaning. The various readings of LXX suggest a faulty text. Some would read bāl'û, 'swallow down', which is easy.

- u 17-21 The Triumph of Judah—17. 'Salvation': y'šlāh, might mean this, but usually indicates a 'remnant that is saved'. 18. Jacob stands for Judah, and Joseph for the Northern Kingdom, as does Ephraim in 19. It is important to note that 17-19 envisage a restored Israel without 'partition', who will inherit once more the whole of Palestine including its outlying districts. Israel's vengeance upon Edom is pictured also in Ez 25:14. 19. A geographical description of the triumph of the united Israel: southwards they shall possess Edom (Esau), westwards Philistia (on the coast), northwards 'Ephraim shall possess the country of Samaria' (this reading involves the rejection of the accusative 'the country of' before 'Ephraim', which certainly looks like a confusion), and eastwards Benjamin (the area north of Jerusalem) shall possess
v Galaad (which is across the Jordan). 20. The extension north and south is further described together with the return of the exiles. A very difficult verse. Many emendations have been proposed. An obvious one is to read yir'sû 'shall inherit' for 'āšer, providing at least a verb for the first section. The most convincing for hahēl hazzeḥ is Bewer's reading baḥ'lah,

'in Halaḥ', which is the place in Assyria whither 530v Israel had been deported, 4 Kg 17:6; 18:11; 1 Par 5:26, DV 'Hala'. This provides the balance of another place-name, and supports an exilic date for the book. With these emendations the text can be translated, but a slight shuffling provides the following lines with a perfect parallelism:

'And the captivity of the children of Israel which is in Hala shall inherit Canaan as far as Sarepta [far north of Palestine];

And the captivity of Jerusalem which is in Sepharad shall inherit the cities of the south'.

There remains the problem of S'pārad: the name comes only here in the OT, and in later Hebrew it indicates 'Spain' (so that Spanish Jews are still called Sephardim, as opposed to the Ashkenazim or Jews of Central and Eastern Europe). St Jerome said that the Jew who taught him told him it meant the Bosphorus, whither (he said) Hadrian had deported the Jews. St Jerome himself, however, adds that the obvious meaning is somewhere in Babylonia. Modern commentators have suggested Saparda in Mesopotamia (mentioned in Sargon's inscriptions). Upholders of a date in the Persian period prefer to identify with Sparda (= ? Sardis) in Asia Minor (mentioned in the Behistun inscriptions).

21. 'Saviours', the title applied to the heroes of old, Jg 3:9, 15, who delivered the people, though LXX reads the passive, 'those who are saved'. The book ends on a Messianic note, 'And the kingdom shall be for the Lord'.

b The Prophet Jonas—It is recorded that Jeroboam II (782-753) 'restored the borders of Israel . . . according to the word of the Lord the God of Israel, which he spoke by his servant Jonas, the son of Amathi, the prophet, who was of Geth, which is in Opher', 4 Kg 14:25. As this prophet and his father have the same names as the prophet of our book and his father, it can hardly be doubted that they are the same persons. Our prophet was, therefore, probably a contemporary of Jeroboam and a member of the Northern Kingdom. Nothing further is known of him beyond what is recorded in our book.

c The Author—If there is no conclusive argument that Jonas was himself the author of the book, neither is there that he was not. Only he could have been the source of the story narrated and it is perhaps more probable that the frank delineation of the prophet's shortcomings is from his own pen than from that of another. The statement that 'Nineveh was a great city', 3:3, does not prove that the narrative was written after 612 B.C. when the city was destroyed, any more than St John's remark that 'Bethania was near Jerusalem about fifteen furlongs off', 11:18, proves that Bethania was no longer near Jerusalem nor of the same distance away at the time he wrote his Gospel. The sacred writers often speak in this way of the precise point in hand while prescinding from other aspects of the question. The knowledge of Hebrew usage at different times and places is too scanty for any decisive argument to be derived from the occurrence in the book of certain Aramaisms. The allusions to late psalms in Jonas' prayer are of doubtful evidential value, since it is probably a later addition; and the argument from borrowings or allusions is apt to be a two-edged weapon.

d Doctrine—The central doctrine of the book is the universality of God's love and providence extending beyond the bounds of the Chosen People to pagan nations. It contains also the important type of Christ's Resurrection, Mt 12:40. Yahweh is the God of heaven, who made earth and sea. All is subject to his rule. He sends the storm, calms the sea, provides shade and destroys it. Nineveh, a pagan city, is entirely in his power. His wisdom has means to secure the compliance of unwilling man. Evil displeases him and calls for just punishment, but he is merciful and moved to pardon by the penance even of pagans, and he hears their prayers for temporal benefits. His loving providence embraces all his creatures including infants and dumb animals. His desire is to spare them all.

e The Historical Character of the Book—The Book of Jonas occurs among the prophetic writings but has the form of historical narrative. The explanation is that a prophet is one who has a mission from God and delivers the message that God puts into his mouth.

Jonas was sent by God to Nineveh and preached as God bade him, 1:2; 3:2. He uttered one prediction, 3:4, but such foretelling of the future is no necessary part of a prophet's function; see § 409c.

Is the narrative intended to set forth actual happenings or is it a pious fiction designed to teach a lesson? The guidance given by the Church shows the possibility of such literature as symbolic history being inspired and canonical; see §§ 52j, 53l. The question is an open one. Until recent times, however, the historical character of this narrative was never seriously doubted in the Church. Now several Catholic authors, such as Van Hoonacker and Condamin, have denied or questioned it. They explain the book as a parable or in some similar way.

The following reasons may be urged in favour of the historicity of the narrative. The story is narrated in the same simple direct way as are, for instance, the historical narratives of Elias and Eliseus. Not only does our Lord say, 'As Jonas was in the belly of the sea-monster three days and three nights, so shall the son of man be in the heart of the earth three days and three nights'; not only does he speak of the men of Nineveh doing penance at the preaching of Jonas in exactly the same way as he speaks of the queen of the South coming to hear the wisdom of Solomon; he goes beyond what is found in the Book of Jonas and adds that 'the men of Nineveh shall rise in judgement with this generation and shall condemn it', Mt 12:40-42. If the men of Nineveh did not do penance but are only imagined to have done so, what force would there be in Christ's words?

Moreover, the prophet Jonas is shown to have acted in ways far from virtuous. He is disobedient to Yahweh's command, 1:3; he is angry at God's pardon of the Ninevites, 4:1; he shows impatience at his own physical discomfort, 4:8; he even addresses God disrespectfully, 4:9. If Jonas was guilty of these defects, it is intelligible that they should have been put on record, as have so many defects of the Apostles in the NT. But if Jonas did not act thus at all, the narrative would be inexplicable. It is hardly credible that an inspired writer should, without any basis in fact, have cast such aspersions on the character of one known from the Books of Kings to have been a prophet of God.

Some of the great Fathers speak strongly on the matter. St Augustine in answering a query sent by a friend mentions that the story of Jonas was derided by the pagans. He proceeds: 'The answer to this is that either belief must be withheld from all divine miracles, or there is no reason why this should not be believed. We should not believe that Christ himself rose on the third day, if the faith of Christians feared the jeers of pagans. But as our friend has not asked the question whether it should be believed that Lazarus was raised on the fourth day or whether Christ himself rose on the third day, I find it very astonishing that he sets down the incident about Jonas as incredible, unless perchance he thinks it easier for a dead man to be raised from the tomb than for a living man to be preserved in the great belly of a beast', PL 33, 382. Similarly St Jerome: 'I am not unaware that some will consider it incredible that a man threatened with ship-wreck could have been preserved three days and 581f three nights in the belly of a sea-monster. These, of course, will be either believers or unbelievers. If they are believers, they will be obliged to believe much greater things: how three youths cast into a furnace of blazing fire were so completely unharmed that not even their clothes smelt of fire . . . and much of the same kind', PL 25, 1132. Again St Cyril of Jerusalem, speaking of Jonas saved in the fish and of Christ's resurrection, says: 'If the former is credible, so is the latter; if the latter is incredible, so is the former', PG 33, 848.

St Gregory of Nazianzen treats the story as historical, PG 35, 505-8, 953; 36, 596. The fact that he draws an allegorical meaning from the name of Joppe, PG 35, 508, is comparable to St Gregory the Great's mystical interpretation of St Peter and St John running to the sepulchre as denoting the Church and the Synagogue respectively. In both cases the historical character of the facts is presumed. Theophylact gives an allegorical interpretation of the story proposed, he says, by 'some' and based by them, he is careful to add, on the historical character of the narrative, PG 126, 960 f. The first part agrees verbally with the allegorical exposition of St Gregory of Nazianzen, PG 35, 508.

In favour of the fictitious character of the book it is urged that though miracles as such constitute an argument neither for nor against its factual character, still some of the miracles narrated appear bizarre and unworthy of the wisdom of God. It may be answered that if an inspired author had so regarded them, he would not have invented them. Moreover, is it surprising that God should have worked a remarkable miracle as the type of our Lord's resurrection, itself the central miracle of the Christian faith?

That the book has an important lesson to teach is not, of course, a proof of its being parabolic. That the fatherly care of God embraces not only the Hebrews but even the pagan nations hostile to Israel is a lesson more cogently taught if God actually sent a prophet to preach penance to the Ninevites than if such a mission is merely a pious imagination. But it is urged that this lesson points to a time of narrow nationalistic outlook on the ground that a prophet's message is directed against prevailing tendencies, and that the book is thus indicated as post-exilic and non-factual. Against this may be quoted striking pre-exilic expressions of universalism such as Is 2:2-4.

Another argument urges the absence of many details said to be required in a narrative meant to be historical, such as where on the coast Jonas was restored to land, and the name of the king of Nineveh. This seems to rest on a misunderstanding of the nature of Hebrew historical narrative. History in the Bible is never related for its own sake, but for its religious significance. Consequently, as can be observed also in the Gospels, it did not occur to the sacred writers to set down many facts that we moderns should like to know.

Finally the inherent improbability of certain features of the story is said to favour its purely didactic character. But truth is stranger than fiction, and a writer composing his own story would presumably take pains to conform with verisimilitude. Certain other points are touched on in the notes and in § 531c.

582a I 1-3 The Flight of Jonas—To avoid the unwelcome task of preaching repentance to the Assyrians, who were the enemies of his people and whose capital was Nineveh, Jonas decides to escape as far from Palestine as possible. He, therefore, takes ship for Tarshish, probably Tartessus in Spain, at the other end of the then known world. As he proclaims himself to be a worshipper of Yahweh, 'the God of heaven, who made both the sea and the dry land', 1:9, he cannot have imagined that he could escape from God. Still, in fleeing from the Holy Land he was escaping from the face of the Lord, as God had there manifested himself in an especial manner and he appears to have hoped that after this sign of determined reluctance God would leave him alone. 'To stand before the face of God' is to be in his special service', 3 Kg 17:1; 18:15, and this special service Jonas wished to avoid.

4-10 Jonas in the Storm—Jonas had gone down into the hold of the ship and fallen into a deep sleep before the storm arose. Like our Lord, also overtaken in sleep by a dangerous storm, Jonas was not awakened by its violence. He was overcome by the fatigue and emotion of his flight; cf. Lk 22:45. The lot fell on Jonas, as St Jerome says, not through any power inherent in the method of casting lots, but 'by the will of him who guided the chances of the lot'; cf. Act 1:26. To discover the nature of his crime the sailors interrogated him. They knew whither Jonas was going, but asked 'Whence comest thou?'

11-16 Calm over the Sea—Whatever Jonas' defects, he displays true magnanimity in his readiness to die that the crew may be saved. The peril of the storm brings home to him the gravity of his disobedience. Seeing that the others are in danger on his account, whereas he alone deserves punishment, he suggests to the sailors to remove him from the ship by casting him overboard. From the moral point of view this is similar to the action of a person who jumps into the sea from a burning ship. The sailors repay generosity with generosity, pagans though they were, and at the risk of their lives attempt to row back to land. As the men were polytheists, their prayers and sacrifices to Yahweh do not prove that they embraced the religion of Israel, only that they acknowledge his to have been the divine power that saved them.

II 1-2 The Great Fish—It is not said either here or in the Gospels what kind of great fish it was that swallowed Jonas. Both the shark and the sperm whale are found in the Mediterranean and are capable of swallowing a body bigger than a man's. The period of three days and three nights signifies in Hebrew usage a part of three days including the whole of the second day; cf. Est 4:16; 5:1; Mt 12:40. As Jonas prayed in the belly of the fish, 2:2, it does not seem possible to hold that he died and was restored to life.

3-10 Jonas's Prayer—The prayer recorded does not purport to give exactly the prayer the prophet prayed. Reminiscences of the psalms readily occur in the prayers of those who constantly recite them. Jonas cried out of the belly of Sheol (or the underworld), but this does not imply his actual death; cf. Ps 85:13, 'Thy mercy is great towards me; and thou hast delivered my soul out of the lower hell'—the prayer of one delivered from what was only imminent danger of death. To be cast away out of the sight of God's eyes is to be far removed from his temple, where he had deigned to manifest his presence. The mountains are spoken of as sending their roots down into the depths of the sea. Those that observe empty vanities are the worshippers of idols, and such forsake God the source of all mercy.

III 1-4 Jonas preaches in Nineveh—This time Jonas has learnt his lesson and at once obeys the divine command. According to Diodorus Siculus II 3 the circumference of Nineveh measured 480 stadia and Herodotus V 53 assigns 150 stadia to a day's march. These figures have suggested the idea that 'a great city of three days' journey' meant one so great that three days would be required to pass round its circumference. But this does not fit the following words that Jonas began 'to enter the city one day's journey'. This shows that the three days are used hyperbolically of the time required to pass through the city. No one will have supposed that the city actually extended in a straight line for some 60 miles. See also on 4:11. The message preached by Jonas quickly became known throughout the city and the inhabitants believed and began to do penance. Although the sentence of destruction was preached in an absolute form of words, the Ninevites understood that God would revoke his sentence and spare them if they did penance, 3:9. Jonas also knew that the sentence was conditional, 4:2. 'Forty days' is the reading of HT and Vg, 'three days' that of LXX.

532g 5-10 The Effect of the Preaching—The fast was observed presumably from sunrise to sunset in accordance with oriental custom, and was to last till God's pardon was assured by the continued safety of the city.

Surprisingly enough, the story has been classed as didactic fiction on the ground that there is no record in the Assyrian monuments of any change from polytheism. But our text does not hint at any such conversion, and the repentance from wrong-doing was not likely to be recorded. The conversion may well have been aided by calamities that befell the Assyrians about the middle of the 8th cent. The records of several years speak of civil disturbances and pestilence. It is surprising that the animals should have been included in the fast and covered with sackcloth. Some think that the mention of them in connexion with the sackcloth is an accidental repetition from the previous verse; but this explanation is not necessary. We ourselves garb our horses in black at funerals. As regards the fast, it would appear that the Ninevites wanted universal penance and universal manifestations of it without considering philosophically what the effect of the animal fast could be. And Schaumberger has shown that it accords perfectly with known Assyrian custom.

h IV 1-4 Jonas grudges Nineveh Its Pardon—Jonas would not have attempted to avoid his mission, had he believed that God would actually destroy the city. He was guilty of an unforgiving spirit, a certain national vindictiveness. As he knew God's mercy, patience and readiness to forgive (cf. Ps 85:5; Jl 2:13), he had foreseen the pardon; but when it actually came, he was so moved by chagrin that he grew tired of life. 532h God's expostulation meets with no response in the heart of the angry prophet. Subsequent events force him to see reason.

5-11 Jonas' Lesson concerning his Fault and the Loving-kindness of God—In 5 omit 'then', an addition in DV and against the sense. Jonas had gone out of the city after his preaching and before it was plain that God had granted a pardon. Hence some think that this verse was originally after 3:9. But although misplaced in the chronological order of events, the verse is in its original position. Hebrew writers—and this important point is often overlooked—attend at times more to the grouping of their matter than to chronological sequence. 5 is entirely in place as introduction to the account of the marvellous growth and destruction of the broad-leaved plant that gave him such welcome protection from the fierce heat of the sun, for which purpose the shack he had put up for himself was inadequate. This plant is called 'ivy' in Vg for the simple reason that St Jerome could not find a more suitable equivalent in Latin. Probably it was the castor-oil plant or a gourd. Worms quickly destroyed it—not 'a worm', as Hebrew often uses a singular noun in a collective sense. 11. By this incident God brings home to the prophet what were the divine sentiments towards the inhabitants of Nineveh, pagan city though it was, and how loth he was to destroy the men—and the beasts—he had made. The number of inhabitants cannot be computed from the figure given for infants and small children. The expression denotes graphically and hyperbolically the great size of the city. On the number $120 = 60 \times 2$ see on Gen 6:3.

538a Bibliography—See § 409b.

- b The Prophet—Micah is the sixth of the Minor Prophets in MT and Vg, but follows Osee and Amos in LXX: that is chronologically better, for he was a younger contemporary of Osee, though his long ministry covered nearly the same years as that of Isaias (c 740–695). His name 'Who is like Yahweh' is not uncommon. It had been borne by a ninth-century prophet (3 Kg 22), from whom he is distinguished by the epithet 'the Morasthite', after his birth-place Môrešet-Gaš, a village about 30 miles SW. of Jerusalem.
- e His Message—Two prophecies of Micah's deeply impressed his countrymen: the threat to Jerusalem, and the promise of a Saviour from Bethlehem. Both are at the heart of his message; which is, that Israel's hope would indeed be fulfilled, but only after deep humiliation and loss. Like Amos and Osee, he had to warn Israel that 'the Day of the Lord', for which the people longed, would be 'Darkness and not Light'. It would not be a triumphant vindication of Israel, in view of the promises, by a divine judgement upon the nations, but a grim purging of Israel, in view of her sins, by a catastrophe which would indeed involve the world. Israel was not to advance in unbroken prosperity to the place of rest, but was to meet with a disaster in which both the bearers and the object of the promises were to be transformed; and the Day of the Lord was to come finally, not by human merit, but only from the mercy of God.
- d With his contemporary Isaias, Micah now proclaims that Israel is to be reduced to a 'remnant' before she can be worthy of the 'faithful mercy' promised of old to Abraham (Mic 7:20). To the scattering of the Northern Kingdom must be added the ruin of Jerusalem itself (3:12); and the ultimate gathering together of the sundered and exiled Kingdoms will be the work of a mighty Ruler from a tiny village. Thus in the womb of 'a Mother' (5:3) the promised Salvation takes the form of a Saviour, whose history is mysteriously eternal.
- e The doom of Samaria and Jerusalem is placed in a cosmic setting (1:2), because it is prelude and route to the establishment of the new Zion to which all nations stream (4:1 ff.). For this Israel is to be prepared by a change of heart, when not merely her sin is purged (7:19), but even her reliance on human aids (5, 9 ff.) and her attachment to local and transitory religious forms give way to adoration in spirit and truth (6:6). Parallel always is the execution of judgement on the nations superbe delirantes, blinded by their brief triumphs (4:12), yet coming to feel the weight of God's hand (4:13; 5, 5 ff.; 7:13). Thus they too learn 'to be ashamed of their strength', and come in humble reverence to adore (7:16 f.).
- f Micah therefore announces a Universal Judgement, which strikes the Northern Kingdom first, then overwhelms Judah, and envelopes the nations. Sent as he was, however, to Jerusalem, he is chiefly occupied with exhorting his own people of the south. The fate of the nations is in the background, but part of the one process of redemption. They are broken, judged and taught by one who rules in the might of 'the Lord of all the earth'. Micah's vision, for all its limitations, is still of God's great plan: 'to enclose all in disobedience, that he may have mercy on all' (Rom 11:32).

This is the inner unity of Micah's message. His statement indeed is often fragmentary and obscure; this arises from the very pregnancy of his oracles, which are but the representative summaries of a long ministry. But a deeper source of obscurity lies in the fact that one great principle was not yet made clear: that suffering is not merely the punishment of sin, but the very means of redemption. Only when the woes of the world are revealed as shared and sanctified by the Just Servant of God are they seen in their true and necessary relation to redemption. But enough was revealed to Micah to give a consistent picture of the ways of God to men.

The Unity of the Book—The misgivings of some critics, therefore, with regard to the unity of the book, need not be taken seriously. They were based on the principle that no pre-exilic prophet could combine hope of salvation with threat of doom. But here they offended gravely against all religious sense. For no prophet could seriously seek to convert his people by holding out only unconditional threats of irreparable disaster. But the critics missed also the whole trend of prophecy as the historical facts show it. How vivid and widespread were the hopes raised by the traditional promises to Abraham, in whose seed all the nations of the earth should be blessed, is amply shown by Amos' challenge to the common view of the 'Day of the Lord', and by Osee's and Isaias' efforts to correct the principles of that hope. Micah had a like task. There is no question of their denying the hope of Israel. They are its spokesmen, but have to re-affirm the necessity of Israel's keeping the Covenant in purity of heart. If they foresaw her failure, it was only to proclaim that God indeed would make good his promises; now by saving but a remnant in the shadow of the Cross.

I-III Sin and Punishment of Israel—The first section of the prophecy attributes the ruin of Samaria to the sins of the Northern Kingdom, and threatens Jerusalem with a like fate. The Temple itself will not save Judah; for the presence of the Holy One of Israel is regarded perversely as a shield for sin, and not recognized as a call to repentance.

12-5 The Wrath to come—Not only the earth and the nations, but God himself witnesses against the sins of Israel. 3-4. And when his holiness flames forth to destroy sin, it is more terrible than thunderstorm and earthquake. 5. Such a judgement will come upon Israel, whose two capitals have been no better than idol-shrines corrupting the land.

6-9 The Doom of Samaria—6. Of the city crowning the hill there will be left only a few stones; and there vineyards may be planted, so bare will the site remain. 7-9. Her riches will go with her idols: for they came from worldly trading and must go back to the profane traffic of the nations. The city had already been sacked by 720. But Micah sees that the ruin is final and that the shadow darkens over Jerusalem also.

10-16 The Invasion in Vision—The enemy threatens the city from the south-west, and the names of the towns in his path become omens of disaster. Micah

534d begins with a reminiscence of David's lament over Saul and Jonathan (2 Kg 1:20)—as if we should say: 'If you have tears prepare to shed them now,' though here it is said that tears are vain. 10. In Beth-ke-'Aprāh 'House of Dust' there will be cause for grief. 11. Sāṭir 'Beautiful Place' must fly in disorder; Ṣa'anān (as if 'Landscape') has no escape; Beth-hā-'Eṣel's (as if 'Bystand') mourning will deprive you of the stay which she seemed to promise. 12. 'Though she has yearned for good things, she that dwells in Mārōt' ('Bitterness'), yet is evil coming upon her'. 13. Lachis must yoke the steed to the chariot (rakṣ) and fly. The great station on the route to Egypt is called the beginning of sin; the reason is not clear. 14. Therefore must Israel give up Morešet-Gaṣ; lit. give farewell-presents for it, that is, the portion given away with a bride. Morešet may suggest 'bride' as well as 'inheritance'. And Akzib (the town's name means a river which fails in summer) is truly a deceitful hope. 15. God will bring one who dispossesses to take over Maresa, whose name again suggests 'inheritance'; and once more shall Israel be homeless and hunted like David in the caves of Odollam. 16. Hence Micah bids Israel mourn. Isaias (chh 10 and 15) uses the same literary form to describe invasions; Micah here adds the note of inevitability to disaster by linking it to the very names of the threatened towns.

II:1-5 The Doom and its Cause—1. Men have set their hearts on sin; the evil which they plan, they execute vigorously because their hand has strength to do so, and they know no other law. 2. They evict the poor from their holdings, demolishing their cottages to make way for great estates, cf. Is 5:8. 3. But God too has his plans; and upon the nation which tolerates such things, he will lay a still heavier yoke. 4. The day will come when Israel itself is despoiled and her grief echoed mockingly: 'We are laid waste and spoiled; the portion of my people is changed: how it departs from me! To the infidel he divides our land'. 5. And none of the Chosen People shall be left, to cast measuring-line on a plot of the Promised Land.

I 6-7 The Covenant and the Doom—6. Like other prophets, e.g. Amos (cf. Am 5) and Isaias (cf. Is 28), Micah was contradicted. False prophets now speak, insisting that Yahweh has committed himself to the protection of Israel. 'Prophecy not, they prophesy: one may not prophesy such things. Confusion shall not come upon us.' 7. Therefore the house of Jacob flatters itself that the Lord is not impatient; such is not his way. And Micah must reaffirm the true terms of the Covenant: 'Nay rather, it is with him who walketh uprightly that God makes good his word'.

8-10 The Doom and its Justice—8. They have forfeited their claims upon God by their violence and injustice: have taken away the cloak from off the coat from them that passed harmless, from men averse to war. 9. They have driven out unprotected women, and taken from the children the rich blessings which God had designed for his people. 10. Therefore the Promised Land can be no lasting city or place of rest, cf. Deut 12:9; it has been defiled by sin, and it shall be devastated, grievously devastated.

h 11. Knowing himself disdained, Micah denounces the spirit of the times: 'If a man going after windy falsehood should lying say: I will prophesy to thee of wine and strong drink', that is, encourage the people in their coarse and sensual habits, 'he indeed could be prophet for this people'.

I 12-13 Refugees and their Miraculous Salvation—This is a fragment out of its context; it would suit better 4:6 ff. For its promise of restoration could well follow upon a threat of punishment, but hardly upon a denunciation of sin. The imagery is taken from the raising of a siege. 12. All who have fled before the invader God has gathered in a place of safety, like sheep in the fold: 'it shall hum with men'. 13. And then from behind their defences, they shall march out in triumph, their king, protected by the Lord, leading them, as Moses under Yahweh's guidance led the Exodus. The prophecy refers at least typically to the Messias. Such a scene was enacted at the time of Sennacherib's invasion 701.

III:1-4 Micah before the Princes—1-3. The judges whose duty it was to uphold justice have only plundered the people. Their savagery is compared to the butchering of cattle for food. 4. But the time of distress will come, when they will cry in vain to the Lord, as the poor have cried in vain to them.

5-8 True Prophet against False—The false prophets make all depend on their receiving gifts. Flattering the great and conniving at injustice, they insist that all is well; though in reality the encouragement which they give is as dangerous as a serpent's bite (5a). 'Bite with the teeth and preach peace' may however be taken with 5b and then would mean: As long as they may eat their fill, they answer 'All is well'. But if anyone refuses them gifts, they denounce and menace him. 6-7. They were never inspired instruments of revelation. But they had a certain semi-official standing, beside the priests, as exponents of the revelations contained in the Sacred Books. They constantly travestied the Covenant by reducing it to a charm against danger, and surrounded their oracles with the apparatus of wizardry. They could point to prosperity as a proof of their words of comfort. But 'the Day of the Lord, darkness and not light' would disgrace and destroy them. They will be able to give no explanation of their former assurances; and like the prophets of Baal on Carmel, at the time of testing, they will call in vain on their God. 8. In face of these sycophants, who dared not oppose the holiness of God's law to the sins of the great, the true prophet stands forth conscious of his divine call, with authority to challenge the world; he has strength from the Spirit of the Lord, he has a keen sense of justice, he has courage to denounce a nation's sins.

9-12 The Fall of Jerusalem—Accused of one great conspiracy of venality, fraud and oppression, now prince and judge, as well as prophet and priest, are confronted with the most terrible threat of all, the destruction of the Holy City and the Temple. It amazed and shocked them like a blasphemy. 10. But the real offence against the inviolable holiness of God was to strengthen and embellish his city through forced labour and unjust exactions. 11. It was a delusion to rely on God the essentially holy, in order to sin with impunity. 12. Therefore, for the sins of the nation's representatives, only possible because the people as a whole were ready accomplices, the nation's centre and sanctuary shall be reduced to a wilderness.

For a similar threat to the Temple, a hundred years later, priests and false prophets demanded the death of Jeremias. He was only saved by the intervention of some of the Elders, recalling the prophecy of Micah and asking: 'Did then Ezechias, the King of Judah, and the whole people, kill him for it? Was not Ezechias rather moved to fear the Lord and to placate him, so that God was pleased to repent of the evil with which he had threatened them?' (cf. Jer 26). Thus the people were moved to repentance, and Micah had the reward of the true prophet: the conversion effected by his preaching averted for a time the punishment which he had foretold.

IV-V Messianic Hopes—Micah never revoked his sentence of doom. It was but suspended, and as the Assyrian armies swept through the land on various campaigns between 720 and 700, the execution of the sentence must often have seemed imminent. But Micah was granted a vision full of splendid hope, which shone steadily beyond and above the dark ways ahead. He saw that God would establish before the eyes of all men, a universal Kingdom of justice and peace. And he saw something of the coming of the Kingdom. There would be disaster first, and the people of God sadly diminished. But there would

b IV:1-5 The Messianic Jerusalem Centre of the World's Worship—The last days are the final stage of revelation. They run from the time of the last great intervention of God in human history, when all types and shadows have been fulfilled, when no more revelation will be added, when the New and Eternal Testament is in force: from the foundation of the Church to the end of the world. 1. Under the image of a Jerusalem towering above the surrounding hills, Micheas sees the divinely appointed source of light and holiness revealed to all men. It is 'prepared', that is, 'established', high above the hills, supreme and conspicuous as it is enduring. 2. It is only from the New Zion that God will teach men his truth and the way of life: here appears the Church Visible with all the notes of Universality, Uniqueness and Divine Authority. 3-4. There too God arbitrates and gives judgement for the destinies of nations; by the heavenly light of which Zion is the centre, all can direct their actions. The crude appeal to force is outlawed. No happy age of universal disarmament and mutual trust has ever in literal fact graced the pages of history. But the prophecy does not speak of material good things. The promise of the New Testament is Eternal Life, and the spiritual blessings which lead to it. And in fact the Church is in glad and quiet possession of infallible truth which no error can endanger, and of sanctifying graces which neither unworthy ministers can impede nor human frailty exhaust. Thus in the indefectible holiness of the Church of Christ, each Christian finds that heavenly peace which the world can neither give nor take away. And this is promised by the 'Lord of Hosts', as if solemnly invoking all his power and majesty. 5. The call to the Kingdom is universal; though as yet the peoples are still serving their idols, they are bound to follow the example of Israel and worship the one true God.

c 6-7 Exile and Salvation—The vision changes from the lofty and distant prospect of Messianic peace, to the dark and painful ways through which it must come. The most flourishing, extensive and populous part of the Holy Land, the Northern Kingdom, had already been ravaged, and great numbers of the people transported. Judah too was suffering from the Assyrian campaigns. Under Sennacherib only Jerusalem itself escaped. To prophets like Isaias and Micheas, for whom North and South made but one indivisible 'People of God', the First Exile had already begun. It is then of a crushed and diminished Israel that God promises now to make a 'Remnant', the vigorous nucleus of a new Kingdom, which will never fail, for it is protected by God's own royal power.

d 8-10 A Call to Confidence in God—8. 'And thou, Tower of the Flock, Hill of the Daughter of Zion, unto thee shall it come, yea, the former realm shall return.' After all losses, the rule of Israel will expand again to the full extent of God's promises, symbolized of old in the dominions of Solomon. 9. She must not despair; there is yet on the throne a ruler from the house of David, to whom God had sworn 'I will establish the throne of his kingdom for ever' (2 Kg 7:13)—and so in the King they have a sign of God's protection. 10. But there is indeed cause for grief. Incredible disaster must come first. For now (the future vividly present to the prophet) the city must surrender to its foes and the inhabitants march out defenceless, to be exiled and scattered among the towns of the Assyrian Empire, notably Babylon. Not in Jerusalem will they find salvation (cf. 2:10); they will not in the end be preserved from exile, but exiled and then delivered. It is a greater sign of God's power to raise from the dead than to preserve from death.

e 11-V 1 Quare Fremuerunt Gentes!—From regarding a particular event, the Exile, the vision changes to embrace the whole course of history: seeing the kingdoms of this world massed against the Kingdom of God.

585b Once more the future is vividly present. The enemies of God's people assert the sovereignty of their gods.

11. 'Let her be profaned, that we may gloat over Zion's ruin.' Her inviolable holiness is to be proved a sham; in her moment of weakness, they can ask (cf. 7:11) 'Where then is her God?' 12. But their brief triumphs are only apparent. In reality they are gathered together only to work out God's purposes; they shall not crush the Kingdom of God, but they themselves shall be crushed 'like sheaves on the threshing-floor'. 13. God can raise up what seems to have gone down in ruin. And to fallen Zion the call will come, to rise up and trample upon those sheaves. For her God is 'Lord of the whole earth' and all nations must learn, if needs be by being broken, that all their work and wealth is to be dedicated to the service of God. V:1. But before turning to the Messias, under whom the Kingdom shall prevail, Micheas mourns once more the disasters of Israel; she is called Robber-daughter, because herself so long engaged in robbery (cf. chh 2 and 3). V 2-6 The Ruler from Bethlehem—Just as the threat of doom pronounced over Jerusalem (3:12) gave way to the serene contemplation of the new Jerusalem to which all nations stream; so now to the humiliation of Zion's king (4:14) succeeds the triumph of the Messias. God will intervene to restore the promised realm to Zion. But now his power is to be enshrined in the person of a Ruler who arises, not from royal Jerusalem, but from lowly Bethlehem. It was indeed 'a little one among the seats of the clans of Judah' ('thousands' is used here locally, like the English 'hundreds' or 'tithings'). It had figured as David's birthplace, but was too inconsiderable to play any further part in the history of the royalty. First Hebron and then Jerusalem had been chosen as seat of David's government. But Bethlehem was to be glorified by the birth of the Messias. Hence, Mt 2, the Jews answer the Magi according to the implications of the prophecy: 'And thou, Bethlehem . . . not the least among the princes of Judah', that is, not least in dignity, though small in size. So the Epiphany hymn:

O sola magnarum urbium
Maior Bethlehem, cui contigit
Ducem salutis coelitus Incorporatum gignere.

2a. The solemnity of the moment calls for the place's full title: Bethlehem, of (the district of) Ephrata, of Judah; to add 'Ephrata' and 'Judah' was immemorial when speaking of Bethlehem. All texts and versions read Bethlehem, though LXX adds 'house of' before Ephrata—an insertion found elsewhere in the Greek. Thus this striking prophecy is as well-established as it is definite. Bethlehem means 'House of Bread' and Ephrata, 'Fruitful'.

2b. There the Ruler, raised up by God's power, marching out in God's cause ('unto me') will appear. Jewish and Christian tradition always understood this, rightly, of the birth of the Messias in Bethlehem. Thence indeed the Ruler goes forth in the flesh; but his personal history does not begin there. For he has been going forth from of old; he has an origin hidden in the depths of eternity. 'His going forth' is plural in the Hebrew, and suggests 'activities, appearances'. The word is used of the sun's setting out on its course (Ps 18:7); of companies marching out, and, in the common phrase, 'goings out and comings in', to denote activities in general. 'From the beginning' etc. are the widest possible terms for eternity, used of the strictly divine (Prov 8:23), though of patriarchal times (Is 51:9). To the coming Ruler, then, are ascribed activities from of old, such as were the interventions of the Angel of Yahweh in the destinies of Abraham, Jacob, Moses, etc.; cf. Is 63:9 'The Angel of his face saved them . . . all the days of old'. This teaches the heavenly pre-existence of the Ruler, previous to his birth in Bethlehem. Thus it foreshadows 1 Cor 10:12

535g 'From the spiritual Rock which followed them they drank: but the Rock was Christ'. 'Goings forth', however, may also be taken as equivalent to an abstract noun 'origin': hence Vg and Syr. egressus. It would then mean 'His origin, that is, birth, is most ancient'. This is of course implied above; to have been active, he must have existed from of old. The full literal sense, as expounded by Catholic tradition, is the eternal origin of the Son from the Father. Many moderns follow the later Rabbis in reducing the meaning of 2e to 'His ancestry shall be the ancient (Davidic) one'. But this would not distinguish the coming Ruler from Ezechias or his son; and the antiquity of David's family was no greater than that of other Israelite clans, all deriving from the Patriarchs. To understand it of his having 'ancient titles to royalty' is to re-write the text. It is to be noted against the modern interpretation that 'origin' here cannot mean source, e.g. dynasty, in the sense of something preceding and distinct from that which comes forth. It means only the person himself, but viewed at his origin, birth or going forth. The person of the Ruler, then, must be mysteriously eternal.

h 3. Because it is God's plan to raise up a Saviour, not from royal Sion, but from Bethlehem, he will leave Israel at the mercy of her enemies, till a Mother bears child. Then begin God's blessings, with the return of the Child's exiled brothers. Abrupt and succinct, this prophecy evidently supposes a great current of Messianic prophecy then familiar to all. It harmonizes perfectly with Isaiah 7:14. There is the same sign of deliverance: the appearance of a Mother, the coming of the Child, then the return of the exiles; cf. Is 7:3 'A Remnant will Return'. Through the centuries which prophetic vision has to pierce, only figures gigantic in their import can be distinguished. But, however indistinctly perceived, a Woman looms large throughout the great prophecies of Redemption. In the Proto-Evangel Gen 3, in Isaiah and in Micah salvation comes through one who always associates with himself a Mother. Thus the Catholic Church follows out fundamental lines of revelation in the honour paid to the Virgin Mary, Mother of God, and in acknowledging her significance in the economy of Redemption.

1j 4. The Ruler takes his stand to guard his kingdom, as the Shepherd takes a commanding position to guard his flock. He is not merely invested with authority from God, like Saul or David, but he embodies marvels of divine majesty and might (cf. Is 11:2). And so his people dwelt secure, for now (again the future made vividly present) his power and prestige shall embrace the whole earth. For Isaiah, the ruler is the Prince of Peace (cf. Is 9 and 11). Micah now sums up the Messianic blessings in words alluded to in Eph 2:14; 'And he shall be peace' (5a), that is, source of peace. Should then the Assyrian, named here because forerunner and representative of the enemies of God's people, attempt to invade the land, there will be an abundance of great leaders to ward them off. 5b. The numbers rising in gradation signify 'enough and more than enough'. 6. They will even lay waste the hostile countries; thus the Messiah, using human means, just as his own human nature is instrument of God, is to bring victory. Ps 44 too associates human princes with the work of the Messianic King: 'Constitues eos principes super omnem terram'.

k 7-9 Israel Supreme—Like rain which men can neither bring down nor hinder, like the lion whom none dare challenge, the new Kingdom is absolutely independent of man and his works. Its mission is divine. Therefore the Church can neither depend on human aid, nor be subject to the temporal power, nor need she fear it. Note that it is not said here that Israel will be a blessing to the nations nor again, that Israel will be a menace to them, as if the beneficial effect of rain (7) were contrasted with the ravages of the lion (8). The point of the comparison is that they cannot be controlled by man: and so the Church must be sovereign and supreme. The section ends with a conventional cry of triumph (9).

10-14 The Land in Messianic Times—After the Prince and his victories (2-8), and the People's role in the world (7-9), Micah describes the Land (10-13), ending with a glance beyond its borders (14).

Israel had long relied on armament and fortified city 'in forgetfulness of his Creator' (cf. Os 8:14). Now all that shall be swept away. 10-11. It is not a period of devastation that is here foretold, but the disappearance of martial installation. The gates of the city lie open day and night (cf. Is 60) because God alone is the one and sufficient defence. The Kingdom is not of this world, and needs no worldly weapons. 12-13. Not only shall the worship of the true God prevail, but he shall be rightly worshipped. No superstitious elements shall debase the true religion. This prophecy echoes the long campaign of Isaiah and Micah against pagan infiltrations into the cult of Yahweh. The statues (12) were the large stone pillars of the Canaanite cult, the massêbôt; the groves (13) were the 'āšêrîm, wooden emblems of a female divinity set up beside the altar of Baal. These had been copied in Israel's own sanctuaries; and the reforms of Ezechias bear witness to Micah's successful polemic against the forms of worship used on the 'High Places'. 14. Finally Micah returns to the universal call of the nations (cf. 4:1 ff.; 5:4) with the warning that the call can be disregarded by them only to their own ruin. Christ and his Church are necessary to the world, even for the kind of peace which the world seeks.

VI-VII The Trial, Sentence and Pardon of Israel— 536a

A judicial process was announced against Israel in 1:2, which was continued in fact to the end of ch 5. Now the process is resumed, almost in formal terms, with dramatic changes of speaker. A serene tone, both in grief and joy, may be noted; there is more sadness than anger in the prophet's denunciations, more tenderness than jubilation in his promises.

VI 1-2 The Prophet speaks—He is to make his accusation over against the mountains, so that all nature, witness of the enduring goodness of God, may witness to Israel's ingratitude.

3-5 Yahweh speaks—This moving complaint is beautifully adapted in the Improperia of Good Friday, to express the feelings of the suffering Redeemer. It is one of the express biblical foundations of devotion to the Most Sacred Heart of Jesus, whose unrequited love calls for reparation (cf. 6)—God has never burdened the people with costly sacrifices; on the contrary, he has delivered them from slavery; the curse which Balac intended, he turned to blessing on the lips of Balaam (Num 22); brought them miraculously across the Jordan, from Setim to Galgala and so into the Promised Land. These things are to be remembered; constant meditation on the mysteries of Redemption provides the great motives for a loving service of God.

6-7 The People ask Counsel—Can they placate d Yahweh with gifts? They are ready even to give up their firstborn to the good pleasure of God; this either a reminiscence of Abraham's generosity, or perhaps, since every firstborn was 'holy unto the Lord', implying that they will renounce their privilege of buying him back from the service of the Temple. Under the next king, Manasses, human sacrifice was offered to idols. Micah therefore must have used this figure of speech at a time when there was no danger of its being mis-used to condone something utterly abominated by the prophets. It is therefore an indication that it was written before the time of Manasses. 8-9 The Prophet answers—Justice, charity and careful obedience to God come first. Integral and acceptable worship is a union of outward offering with interior dedication of the will. The material gift is precious in the sight of God (cf. Ps 49) only by reason of the religious attitude which it embodies. Addressing 536e men whom he is accusing of ingratitude and injustice, Micheas urges a truth often expressed in Sacred Scripture : 'The victims offered by sinners are hateful to the Lord' (cf. Prov 15:8). He does not belittle their gifts, but demands that their lives be all that their gifts imply. So too our Lord, when he says : 'He that believes in me, believes not in me, but in him who sent me' (Jn 12:44), does not exclude belief in himself, but points to all it implies.

f 10-16 Yahweh speaks—The people are totally corrupted by injustice and fraud (10-12), therefore he condemns them to deprivation and famine (13-16). For Jerusalem has committed all the crimes by which the kings of the North brought ruin on Samaria. Therefore she shall be the object of the world's scorn.

g VII 1-6 The Prophet—Like one in the stripped and deserted vineyards at the end of autumn, he finds no fruit of good works, to which he might appeal to avert the anger of God. 2. This recalls our Lord's comment on the world before its Judge : 'When the Son of Man comes, think you that He will find faith upon earth ?' 3. 'The evil of their hands they do well ; the prince is exigent, the judge demands bribes, the magnate tells what he wants, and they intrigue together.' 4-6 describe the breakdown of civil and family loyalties ; cf. Mt 10:36. Therefore the city is ripe for the destruction, which the Day promised by the watchmen (4b), the prophets, will bring.

h 7-10 The People repents—Made the mouthpiece of the prophet's hope, they proclaim their confidence in 536h God, known of old as Saviour, who will hear the cry of the contrite heart (7) and raise up in mercy what he has cast down in anger (8). Humbly confessing that in punishing them, God has only vindicated his justice, they may hope that now he will vindicate his promises. Only the capital had escaped Sennacherib's ravages, and an enormous tribute had to be paid.

11-13 The Prophet's Comfort—11. 'The day will come when thy defences are built up ; in that day shall thy boundary reach far and wide.' 12. Israel will hold universal sway (cf. 4:1 ff.). For 'from Assyria and from Egypt, from Egypt and even from the River (Euphrates) ; from sea to sea and from mountain to mountain', that is, from the ends of the earth (cf. 5:4) all nations shall come to pay homage. 13. Whereas the pagan world 'which disobeys' (5:14) must pay the penalty and be laid waste.

14-17 The Prophet's Prayer—14. The isolated people is now confined to poor land on Carmel, west of Jordan ; may it regain the rich pastures on the east, which the Promised Land of old included ! 15-17. May God show again his power in miracles, not merely to help Israel, but to reveal his Godhead to the nations, and so make his worship universal !

18-20 Magnificat I—Micheas' name means 'Who is like God ?' And he sums up his message in rapt and joyous adoration of his incomparable Majesty. God is most wonderful in his mercy and his love, in his infinite and enduring fidelity.

NAHUM

By S. BULLOUGH, O.P.

537a Bibliography—St Jerome, Commentarii in Naum Prophetam, PL 25, 1231–72; J. Knabenbauer, S.J., cf. § 409b; Van Hoonacker, cf. § 409b; *S. R. Driver in CBI, 1906; Dom Hugh Bévenot, O.S.B., in WV, 1937.

b The Prophet—All we know is that he was an 'Elcesite', MT 'Elqōšī, AV 'Elkoshite'. The place is unknown in OT, but there are three main theories of the identification of Nahum's home.

(1) Alqush, about 24 m. N. of Nineveh, where Nahum's tomb is still shown, and is a place of pilgrimage for Christians, Mohammedans and Jews. There is, however, no evidence of this tradition before the 16th cent., and although a birthplace near Nineveh might seem to be supported by Nahum's apparently accurate topography of that city, 2:6(7), and his graphic account of its calamity, it is more probable that this identification was made later on account of his prophecy.

(2) Elcesi, a village in Galilee, was proposed by St Jerome (prologue). He writes of 'usque hodie in Galilaea viculus, parvus quidem et vix ruinis veterum aedificiorum indicans vestigia; sed tamen notus Judaeis, et mihi quoque a circumducente monstratus'. Perhaps = modern el-Kause near Ramah in Galilee (WV, xxiv). Although Carmel and Lebanon are named in 1:4, a Galilean village is unlikely at the time of Nahum, whose interest furthermore centres on Judah, 1:15 (2:1) and 2:2 (3).

(3) Elqosh 'beyond Bēth-gabrē of the tribe of Simeon' is the solution given in The Lives of the Prophets attributed (doubtfully) to St Epiphanius, a native of Judaea (403) (PG 43, 409 reconstructed text). Bēth-gabrē probably = the modern Beit-Jibrin (Eleutheropolis), 20 m. SW. of Jerusalem; about 6 m. E. of this village there is a well called Bir-el-Qaus (Driver). This is the most likely identification. The prophet's name Nahūm means 'comfort', an expanded form being 'Nehemias'.

c The Date of the Prophecy—The mention of the fall of Thebes (No-Amon; in Egypt) as a past example, in 3:8–10, gives us 663 B.C. as a terminus a quo, while the fall of Nineveh in 612, described as impending, gives us a terminus ad quem. But the period may be further narrowed by the consideration that Nahum alone among the prophets has no word of vituperation for the Jews, which may indicate the period after 622 when Josias' reforms were in full vigour: his only word to Judah, 1:15 (2:1), is an exhortation to the observance of festivals; cf. 4 Kg 23:21. Nahum's prophecy may have been occasioned by the beginning of Assyria's collapse with the fall of Asshur, 50 m. S. of Nineveh, to the Medes under Kyaxares in 614. A date in this period would make Nah a little later than Soph, contemporary with Jer and a little earlier than Hab.

d The Problem of the Acrostic Poem—Several of the Pss (§ 335e), Lam and Prov 31:10–31 are constructed as an alphabetical acrostic, each verse or section beginning with a new letter. It has been observed that Nah 1 contains traces of a similar construction, and since Bickell in 1880 various attempts have been made to reconstruct the text on the basis of the whole alphabet. As it stands, the Heb. text from 1:2 to 1:9 provides an acrostic (with certain lacunae) of the first half of the alphabet. After 1:9 the provision of an acrostic requires considerable alteration of the text and shuffling of lines. On these suppositions the opening poem reaches to 2:2 (3), excluding 2:1 (2). (Note that in LXX, Vg and English Bibles 1:15 = HT 2:1, with consequent different verse-numbers in ch 2; Heb. vv are placed in brackets in this commentary.) An example of a complete acrostic reconstruction is to be found in Van H. Authors are, however, divided, and the difficulty is that the acrostic in 1:2–9 is so convincing that it is hard to ignore it, while the evidence after this is so vague that it is hard to admit it. It is generally supposed that the section 1:2–2:2(3) represents either a complete acrostic poem, or else part of one followed by another non-acrostic fragment, the whole being prefixed to the prophecy on Nineveh by way of introduction. Authors are also divided about whether the introductory poem or poems are by Nahum himself, or by another, but there is no direct evidence against his authorship, and it seems most likely that he himself made use of relevant sections of other poems of his own to serve as an introduction to his main prophecy. Indeed Nahum's vivid style seems to run through the whole book.

Theme and Analysis of the Book—On the above basis 1:2–15 with 2:2 (1:2–14 with 2:1, 3) are the introductory poem or poems, the theme of which is the power of God and consolation of Judah. The main prophecy begins at 2:1 (2), excludes the misplaced 2:2 (3), and continues to the end of the book. The theme is the fate of Nineveh, the oppressor.

The Style is highly coloured and poetical, representing f some of the most vigorous poetry in Hebrew literature, making use not so much of rare words as of unexpected forms, especially of verbs. The metre is often excited and irregular, and the ring of the words, to which we call attention occasionally in the commentary, is by no means entirely obscured in translation.

I 1 The Title—'The burden': cf. § 550c. 'Elcesite': 538a see § 537b.

2–15, II 2 (2–14, II 1, 3) The Introductory Poem(s): b a Description of God's Power.

2–6 The Lord is mighty—2. This verse begins with aleph ('Ēl), starting the acrostic. 'Jealous', a word which with its by-form is used only of God: Knox, well, (explaining) 'a jealous lover'. The Basic OT (1949) has 'who takes care of his honour'. 5. 'The earth hath quaked', MT tiššā 'is lifted up', so RV 'upheaved'. 6. 'Are melted', reading nišš'fū, 'are smashed'.

7. The Lord is good to those that trust him, 'a refuge' e in the day of trouble.

8–11 The Lord is Severe—8. 'The place thereof'. d LXX provides a solution: 'his rebels and enemies darkness shall pursue', so that we can read b'qāmāw, translating 'make an end of those who rise against him, and . . .'; cf. Ps 17 (18) 49. 9. 'Ye'—God's enemies in general: the poem has no particular application. 'Not a double affliction': one is enough to annihilate them. 10. From the Vg reading 'like (k') thorns', and kōh, 'so', we can reconstruct, 'For as tangled thorns [which burn easily], so at their drink [kōh b'sōb'ām] the drunk have been consumed'. 11. 'Contriving treachery in his mind': HT 'Counsellor of Belial (= worthlessness)'; cf. 1:15.

538e 12-15, II 2 (12-14, II 1, 3) The Second Introductory Poem (or second part of the one): the Consolation of Judah—The analysis of these verses is difficult and the text uncertain: 13, 14, 15 (2:1), 2:1(2), 2(3) seem to be addressed alternately to Judah and to the oppressor. 2:1(2) (to the oppressor) begins the main prophecy, and it is usually supposed that 2:2(3) (to Judah) should follow upon 1:13, or 1:15 (2:1). The following is an analysis fairly generally held (Van H., WV and cf. Driver): 1:12-13 and 2:2(3), the consolation of Judah through her deliverance from the oppressor. 1:14, an oracle against the oppressor. 1:15 (2:1), the promise to Judah of peace. It may be that 14 and 15 are fragments of another poem altogether, used by Nahum to conclude his introduction on a hopeful note. 12. Difficult: DV = MT almost literally. LXX is very different and the whole passage is doubtful. In any case for 'he shall pass' read 'they shall pass away', adding the pl. termination. 13. 'His rod with which he struck thee'. II 2 (3). 'Rendered' for Vg 'reddidit', 'restored'. 'Pride', or glory, or majesty (WV). I 14. WV alters to the 3rd person, 'concerning him' (the oppressor), which cases the transition from the previous v, if this v is indeed part of the same poem. 'The house of thy gods'. 15 (2:1). An Isaian figure (52:7), with the exhortation to Judah that suggests the period of reform. 'Belial', usu. an abstract noun 'worthlessness' as in 11, and very rarely, as here, applied to a particular person (cf. 2 Kg 23:6 and perhaps Job 34:18); Basic OT, well, 'the good-for-nothing man'. The reference is of course to the detested officials of the Assyrian army of occupation, who now will no more be seen in the land.

h II-III The Main Prophecy.

II 1-6 (2-7) The Attack on Nineveh—1 (2). 'He that shall destroy', lit. 'The Scatterer' in MT and Vg. To revocalize as mappēs, 'shatterer' (cf. Jer 51:20, and the verb 9 t. in 51:21-23) is perhaps more expressive (so WV, cf. RV, Basic OT 'crusher'). 'The Scatterer is come up before thee! Fortify the fortress! Watch the way! Gird [lit. strengthen] thy loins! Confirm thy strength!' A series of ironic commands to the now hapless oppressor. 3 (4). 'The shield . . . is reddened'—either by the sun (WV, cf. 1 Mac 6:39), or being of copper, or painted. 'Scarlet', the colour of the military cloak (cf. Mt 27:28 and Xenophon, Cyrop. 6, 4, 1) and of more recent soldiers' uniforms. 'The reins': the simplest emendation is to lappidōt, 'torches': 'his chariots are like [reading kē] the fire of torches', though admittedly the word occurs in the next v. 'The drivers', reading pārāšim for MT b'rōšim, 'fir trees' = (?) 'spears' (RV); 'are stupefied', lit. 'reel' as of a drunken man, and so 'act wildly'. 4 (5). A typical Nahum verse with its colourful verb-forms. 5 (6). 'Mustering up' (cf. WV) for Vg 'recordabitur' which = MT. The problem is to whom the verse refers: either to the desperate defenders, whose confusion makes them 'stumble', who man the walls and prepare a 'covering' (a word found only here, presumably part of the fortifications); or else to the Babylonian attackers, who 'disappear among the embankments' (WV for 'stumble', i.e. stumble deliberately), attack the walls and prepare the 'mantelet' (RV) or shelter for those who work the battering-ram. 6 (7). 'The gates of the rivers' = MT lit., indicate either (1) 'river sluices' (WV), letting in the water—and cf. references to the flooding of Nineveh at its fall in Ctesias and Diodorus Siculus (see Van H.), or (2) 'moat-sluices', emptying them—and remains of dams and sluices are still visible, or (3) gates where the river Khusur or the canal passed through the city—vulnerable points (see Driver), or (4) 'bridge-gates'. Probably the reference to flooding is the most likely, esp. in connexion with the figure in 8(9). The temple, or the palace, is melted (lit.).

I 7-10 (8-11) The Sack of the City—9 (10). 'Plunder silver! Plunder gold! And there is no end to the store'

(WV)—the cries of the invaders are imagined—'it is more precious than all articles of delight!' MT kābōd, 'precious', is not represented in Vg and may be a corrupt copy of the preceding or following word. This v finds a striking parallel in line 45 of the Babylonian tablet (now in BM), commemorating the fall of Nineveh (publ. 1923 by C. J. Gadd).

10 (11). Again typical of Nahum's vigorous Hebrew. (N.B. in BOW 1914 Douay text 'lions' is misprinted for 'loins'.) 'The faces of all of them become drawn' (lit. withdraw beauty). The word for 'beauty', pārūr, occurs only here and in the same phrase in Jo 2:6, and is connected with tip'ārāh (same meaning), and not with pārūr 'a pot'!

11-13 (12-14), III 1 The Lions' Den is destroyed—k

11 (12). 'Feeding place', MT mir'eh, 'grazing'. But lions do not graze, and m'ārāh, 'cave' (of wild beasts in Is 32:14) is usually proposed. 'To enter in', lābī, is more likely another word for lion (as 'lionesse' in 13), spelt identically. There are 4 different words for 'lion' in these vv. 13 (14). 'Behold I come against thee', a phrase common in Jer and Ez for God's reproof. Thy chariots: we expect the lion figure to continue and could read with Davidson and Driver sib'kēk or subb'kēk, 'thy thicket', used in Jer 4:7 of the abode of a lion. 'Thy messengers', once more the occupying power. III 1. The wicked city is still seen as a lions' den, full of 'rapine'—the same word as 'prey' and cognate with 'rapine' in 12(13) above.

III 2-7 The Disgrace of the Harlot—The fate of the city is now described under a new figure. 2-3 are particularly colourful examples of Nahum's excited style.

3. 'Horseman mounting, flame of sword, flash of spear, heap of slain, mass of corpses: no end to the bodies, men stumble among them'. 4. 'Mistress of witchcraft'. 6. 'An example', 'a gazing-stock', 'a public show' (Knox).

8-10 The Warning of the Fate of No-Amon—8. m

This was the city in Egypt, near the modern Karnak, known to the Greeks as Thebes. Amon was the god in whose honour its great temple was built. No = Egyptian net, 'city', so sometimes merely called 'No' as in Jer 46:25; Ez 30:14 ff. In Ez 30:15 occurs the famous pun on the god's name, h'mōn Nō, 'the multitude of No', which gave rise in rabbinic tradition to the identification here of Amon and 'multitude', whence Vg 'populorum' and AV 'populous No'. St Jerome, writing 'Alexandria', is conscious of the anachronism and explains that he is merely giving the modern name—though the identification happens to be wrong. 'Rivers', the proper word for the Nile (on which Thebes is situated), and referring to the many branches and canals. 'Sea', the vastness of the Nile. 'Riches', reading hayil 'strength' for hēl 'glacis, rampart'. 'Waters are its walls', reading mayim, which is better than MT miyyām, 'from the sea is its wall'. 9. Cush (Ethiopia, S. of Egypt), Egypt itself . . . Put (Africa) and the Libyans. Put is always translated 'Libya' in the versions, except here, where the Libyans (Lūbīm) are also named. 10. We cannot but remark once more on Nahum's sturdy-sounding verb-forms here. No-Amon (Thebes) was captured by the Assyrian Ashurbanipal in 663, and this completed for the time the subjugation of Egypt begun about 10 years previously by his father Esarhaddon. The disaster, though some 40 years before Nahum's prophecy, was evidently still fresh in men's memories.

11-19 Final Apostrophe to Assyria—11. n

'Be despaired', a word usually meaning 'hidden' and of doubtful meaning here. 13. 'The gates', i.e. the mountain passes forming entrances to the land, cf. e.g. the 'Cilician Gate'. 14. Ironic commands to fortify the city; cf. 2:1(2). Clay was kneaded with the feet. HT has 'Walk in the mud, and trample in the clay, seize the brick-mould' (probable meaning of this last), mentioning two kinds of material: excavations, e.g. those near Nineveh itself in 1935, show the use of sun-dried mud-bricks, as well as of fired clay-bricks (v. Bévenot in WV).

588o 15-16. But the fortifications will be of no avail, for 'There fire shall devour thee, sword shall cut thee off, young locust devour thee'—this last reading involves the omission of kaph before the locust, and a masc. verb. The young locust (yeleq 'bruchus'), before it can fly, is the most destructive; ravaging the land it becomes a mature insect ('arbeh'), strips off its wing-sheaths and flies away (v. Driver). So far the locust is the scourge of Nineveh. Now, with sarcastic imperatives, it is symbol of what Nineveh might be: now if thou wouldst, 'be numerous as the young locust (and destroy), be numerous as the mature locust (and fly to safety), multiply thy merchants as the stars of the sky—the young locust bares (its wings) and flies away!' All thy mercantile glory is of a sudden disappeared, as a swarm of locusts that has taken to flight. For 'thou hast multiplied' in p 16 it is preferable to read an imperative. 17. 'Thy guards . . . thy scribes', two Assyrian titles of un-

588p certain meaning, probably connected with Assyrian roots of these meanings. The second is found only here and in a by-form in Jer 51:27 (Vg Taphsar), but has nothing to do with lap, 'children', as Vg here. All will be lost like a swarm of locusts: merchants, soldiery, scholars. 'Locusts of locusts', spelt differently in Heb., the second form being found besides only in Am 7:1, and being probably no more than a correction of the first, not found elsewhere. 'Their place was not known' is certainly the correct reading; MT has 'his place was not known; where are they?' the latter phrase being a corruption of the plur. suffix to 'their place'. 18. 'Thy princes have slept', with LXX. 'Thy people are scattered', so Jerome in his commentary, though Vg has 'latitavit'. 19. Lit. 'There is no dimming of thy destruction' (Vg 'non est obscura contritio tua'), an unusual phrase, the noun occurring here only, though from a root of established meaning.

HABACUC

(HABAKKUK)

By S. BULLOUGH, O.P.

539a Bibliography—St Jerome, Commentarii in Abacuc Prophetam, PL 25, 1273-1338; J. Knabenbauer, S.J., cf. § 409b; Van Hoonacker, cf. § 409b; *S. R. Driver in CBI, 1906; Dom Hugh Bévenot, O.S.B., in WV, 1937.

b About the Prophet himself we know nothing. He may, or may not, be identified with the prophet Habacuc in Judah who in Dan 14:32-38 was miraculously transported to the lions' den in Babylon. Chronologically it is possible, though the king in Dan is unnamed and so the story undated. Pseudo-Epiphanius' Lives of the Prophets puts Habacuc's birthplace at Bethzocher, which may be the same as Bethzacharam in 1 Mac 6:32 f., the modern Beit-Sakariyeh not far from Bethlehem and the traditional 'Hill of Habacuc' (cf. on 2:1). The prophet's name is in Hebrew Habaqqûq, of peculiar form and uncertain meaning.

c The Divisions of the book are clearly marked. The first part, 1:2-2:4, is cast in dramatic form, being a dialogue between the prophet and God. There follow the 'Woes of the Wicked', 2:5-20, and lastly the Canticle, ch 3.

d The Theme and Manner of Habacuc are quite his own. He is deeply preoccupied with the age-old problem of injustice on earth and God's apparent inactivity. A definite rhythm of thought runs through the whole book. At first there is the dialogue in which the problem is stated, and on the answer coming from God that he will indeed intervene, the problem is pushed a stage further with the consideration of the wickedness of him whom God sends to punish the evil. Habacuc has a manner of soliloquizing—in 1:14-17 he broods over the iniquities of the coming invader, and in 2:1 he speaks to himself. The argument culminates in God's reassurance that, come what may, it is the faithfulness of the just man that will count in the end, 2:4; this is the passage that is quoted three times by St Paul. In the next section, the 'Woes', the prophet once more turns to reflect upon men's wickedness, and he formally stigmatizes certain sins. Finally, in the Canticle we find Habacuc's thought still running to the same rhythm, though here presented in lyric form: the prophet again asks God to come, 3:2, and then describes the might of his power, 3:3-11; he considers his terrible judgement, 3:12-15, and confesses his own terror, 3:16-17, but in the end, as before, he feels reassured that trust in God, come what may, will bring consolation.

e The Date of the Prophecy—Habacuc's argument is so perennial that it fits every age, not least our own. The reference, however, to the Chaldeans (Babylonians) places it at a time of their ascendancy, but evidently before their invasion of Palestine. It was the victory of the Babylonians at Carchemish, under Nabuchodonosor (Nebuchadnezzar) in 605 that made them masters of Western Asia. It was not long, before Nabuchodonosor invaded Palestine and King Joakim 'became his servant three years', 4 Kg 24:1, which cannot have been later than 602-599 (the latter's death). We can therefore suppose Habacuc to have prophesied between the years 605 and 602. This is further borne out by the fact that since Josias' death in 609 his religious reforms had been set aside and his successors Joachaz and Joakim both 'did evil before the Lord', 4 Kg 23:32, 37, and Habacuc's words in 1:2-4 and 2:5-19 certainly reflect the unhealthy moral condition of those reigns.

Suggestions, however, have not been wanting, which place the prophecy later, during the exile (the prophet's name is claimed as a Babylonian type), or even as late as the time of Alexander, though the moral reflections are by most regarded as early. The Canticle is frequently held to be late, especially by those writers who regard the psalms to be mostly of late post-exilic composition.

I 1 The Title—'Burden', cf. § 550c. 'The prophet': only Hab, Agg and Zach receive this formal title in the heading.

I 2-II 4 The Dialogue.

2-4 The Prophet speaks, uttering his complaint that there is strife and injustice in the world, while God remains silent. 2. 'I shout to thee "Violence!" and thou savest not'. 3. Vg and, still more, LXX have a better disposition of the phrases than MT, and we follow them in reading the infinitive 'to see' rather than 'thou shalt see' of MT. 'Why dost thou shew me iniquity and trouble, to see ruin and violence? Before me there is strife, and contention is raised'. The last word here, from nāšā', must be read in the Niph'al—the Qal is never intransitive. 4. 'Therefore teaching grows numb' and judgement goes out no more'. 'Prevaileth against' is a doubtful word: in Pi'el = 'lie in wait for'.

5-11 God's Answer—He will intervene, eventually. His intervention came with the Babylonian invasions. 5 is quoted in Acts 13:41 with reference, of course, to Christ. 6. Chaldeans, Kasdīm, or Babylonians. 7. 'Burden'—something raised up, probably 'dignity' (RV). 8. 'Their horses are swifter than leopards; and keener than evening wolves are their horsemen'. The word pāšū (DV 'shall be spread abroad'), of doubtful meaning, should be omitted as a doublet of pārāšāu, 'his horsemen'. The repetition of this word is probably also a doublet, so that we proceed at once 'They come from afar . . .' (cf. the neat rendering of Basic OT). 9. 'terror goes before their face'—a most likely suggestion of Van H.'s. 10. In 7-11 the use of sing. and plur. for the Chaldeans is irregular. So here: 'He shall mock at kings'. 11. 'Then he sweeps by as a wind and passes through' (with RV). Bévenot in WV has a brilliant suggestion: 'and he sets up his altar to his god' (cf. Jer 11:13), which pictures the pagan invader entering the holy city. The reconstruction explains every letter in MT.

12-13 The Prophet speaks again, explaining further his concern: indeed the Lord will intervene, but what of the injustice of the appointed scourge itself? 12a. 'We shall not die' = MT and all older Vss, but this is one of the 18 Tiqqânê Sôp'rim or Corrections of the Scribes, included in the Massoretic notes, where the text was deliberately altered to avoid an apparent irreverence (cf., e.g. Pope, Aids, 1, 165). The supposed original here was 'Thou shalt not die', altered to avoid the suggestion of such a possibility. This is probably the true reading, and is followed by WV, Basic and many moderns. 12b. Vg lit. (= MT) 'and a strong one [lit. rock] to give correction thou hast founded him'. God as a refuge or protection is often addressed as f 14-17 The Prophet's Reflexions on the ruthlessness of the coming scourge. 14. 'He will make men like fishes': 'he' is the wicked of 13, and is surely to be read here (with WV and Basic), since the fishing figure continues in 15-17 in the 3rd person. The words for the fishing tackle are all rare, but their meaning is obvious from the context. 16. He deifies his weapons (cf. 11 if the text is there right); Driver notices that according to Herodotus 4, 62 (rather than 59-60) the Scythians were wont to offer sacrifice to a scimitar as a symbol of Ares. 'Portion . . . fat and food rich'. 17. MT 'Shall he therefore . . . ?'

g II 1 The Prophet's Soliloquy—'Watch' from root 'to guard', and 'tower' either = fortified place (Vg, RVm), or = watch-tower (DV, RV), from another root 'to guard'. Bévenot says that the traditional 'Hill of Habacuc', about 3 m. S. of Jerusalem, not far from Bethlehem, is a magnificent vantage-point, WV, xxv and 33. 'what answer he (yāšib for 'āšib) will return to my argument' is given by the Syriac, and is followed by Van H., WV, and Basic, and is preferable to MT, LXX and Vg.

h 2-4 God's Answer—2. The prophet is to write the message plainly, 'that he may run that readeth' (AV, RV), that it may be read quickly and easily. Hence the well-known saying. 3. MT 'For a vision is yet for the appointed time'. It is not certain what 'vision' is referred to. It may be (1) the oracle of 4 (the most likely), or (2) the theophany of ch 3, or (3) the fulfilment of the threats in 1:5-11, or (4) the Messianic triumph at the end of time. 'Apparebit in finem, et non mentietur: si moram fecerit, expecta eum, quia veniens veniet' is used of the coming of Christ in the Advent liturgy (3rd Sunday, Resp. i at Matins), and similarly 'Qui venturus est veniet, et non tardabit' in Resp. iii and vi. The latter passage is quoted in Heb 10:37, also according to LXX, introducing the important quotation of 4. St Jerome here deliberately wrote 'visus' rather than the feminine 'visio', because of the application to Christ.

i 4. 'He that is unbelieving': probably we should read (with Van H. and WV) 'he fainteth', lit. 'is covered', which corresponds to LXX. 'The just man shall live by his faithfulness'. The Heb. word conveys this rather than 'faith', though, as Bévenot observes, 'faith' = belief in the divine mysteries, is a NT conception legitimately developed from the OT idea of faithfulness to the divine precepts. Basic has 'good faith'. St Paul quotes this passage in Rom 1:17, Gal 3:11, Heb 10:38. In Rom and Gal 'his' is not included, but LXX here has 'my faith' and Heb. transfers the possessive to 'my just one'.

j The Woes of the Wicked 5-19.
5-6a i Woe to the Proud and Deceitful—5. Difficult. Probably: 'Woe to [hōy] the treacherous, the proud man, and arrogant' (yōneh with LXX). The first Woe results therefore from this reconstruction. 6a. 'Dark speech', Vg 'loquellam aenigmatum', two nouns, 'taunt' and 'riddles', in HT. 'One shall say' I would attach to the preceding.

k 6b-8 ii Woe to the Usurer—6b. 'Thick clay': MT 'aḥiṭ, 'usury' (only here, but cf. 'aḥōt in Deut 24:10-13). 7. 'Bite', so HT lit.; but from this root is the word nelek, 'usury' (piece bitten off), so here 'thy debtors'. The Chaldaeans seem in particular to be the cruel usurers here, who will, however, come to a bad end.

l 9-11 iii Woe to the Embezzler—9. 'Him that getteth ill-gotten wealth'. 10. 'Confusion' = 'shame'. 'Thy soul hath sinned' is a quite unhebraic notion, but translate, as in Prov 20:2, 'Thou forfeitest thy life' (so Van H., Driver, WV). 11. 'The stones will cry out', Lk 19:40, on the lips of Christ, takes up the figure from here. 'The timber', a rare word found only here (LXX 'beetle'!), MT continues 'from the wood(work)', but Jerome follows Symmachus and Theodotion (v. his comm.).

12-14 iv Woe to the Extortioner, cf. Mic 3:10 of m Jerusalem. 13. 'These things', i.e. town and city. 'For the people labour for the fire, and the nations toil for nothing', cf. Jer 51:58 of the useless labour of Babylon, which will so shortly be destroyed. 14. The parallel in Is 11:9b guides us to a better rendering 'filled with [acc.] the knowledge of the glory'.

15-17 v Woe to the Debauched—15. 'Woe to him n that giveth his neighbour to drink from the cup of his wine, and getteth drunk, in order to behold their nakedness.' I would read hamrō 'his wine'; cf. Deut 32:14; Is 27:2, and Aramaic. 16. In the context of drinking, the familiar figure comes easily of the 'cup of the Lord' (cf. 'calix in manu Domini', Ps 74(75) 9). 'Shameful vomiting': 'disgrace'. 17. 'For violence done to [as in 8] Lebanon'. 'Terrify thee', cf. LXX. 17b is a repetition of 8b.

19, 18, 20 vi Woe to the Idolater—18 evidently fits o after 19, which begins this Woe. 'A molten and false image': 'An idol and a teacher of falsehood'.

III The Canticle of Habacuc is a lyric psalm of great p poetical power, somewhat loosely attached to the rest of the book, though the dominant ideas reoccur. The text in MT is frequently uncertain, but Vg generally preserves a surer reading; it will not be possible, however, here to explain fully all the details of reconstruction of MT that are involved. In general pattern and in several characteristics the canticle resembles the Psalms, especially in the presence of presumed musical directions at the beginning and end, and the indication selāh in 3, 9 and 13. Hence some suppose that it is a liturgical fragment appended to this book. The Canticle appears in the Breviary at Lauds (II) on Friday. The Canticle may be summarized thus: The poet contemplates God's power and asks for his mercy, 2, he pictures his coming in majesty, 3-4, and the terrible effects upon nature, 5-11, the punishment of the wicked, 12-14, and his final triumph, 15. Finally the prophet expresses his fear, 16-17, but immediately also his trust in God's mercy, 18-19.

1 The Title—'For ignorances', Šigyonōt, cf. in the q title of Ps 7 Šiggayōn (Vg 'Psalms'). Probably a musical term, of uncertain meaning. Some connect with the root šāgāh or šāgag, 'wander', hence Vg 'error', or 'in a wandering (free) rhythm' (Driver); or with an Assyrian root 'mournful' (WV). Many leave untranslated.

2 Introduction—WV and NP (1945) after LXX read r 'I have heard thy report, I have seen thy work', with better parallelism. For 'in the midst of the years bring it to life' LXX has the peculiar reading 'in medio duorum animalium', a text preserved in the Dominican Breviary (5th Resp. at Christmas Matins), though not in the Roman, which does, however, retain 'ut animalia viderent Christum natum'. This text is probably the origin of the traditional ox and ass at Bethlehem. 'In the midst of the years' means either (1) in the course of history, or (2) in a few years' time, or (3) now—between past and future. 'Thy work', to be revived, is God's work of mercy.

3-4 The Theophany—3. 'South . . . Pharan', towards s Sinai, the site of the original theophany. 4. 'Horns', a symbol of power, and cf. Moses' countenance 'horned' after the vision, Ex 34:29 f., 35. 'Hid', a doubtful word.

5-11 The Effects on Nature—5. 'The devil', rešep, t 'a flame': Jerome tells us that the Jews claimed this as the name of a prince of devils (like Beelzebub), and the one who tempted Eve. 6. 'Melted', a doubtful word, yaltēr, which we should perhaps read from roots nāṣaf or nāṣaf, 'break down' or 'root up', both used of nations. 'The eternal hills were bowed down; his journeys are eternal'. 7. 'Tents of Ethiopia under

- 540t affliction'; 'under' with an abstract noun is otherwise unknown. Among emendations proposed that of Nowack and WV (cf. Van H.), of yir'u (the tents) shall fear for rā'it, 'I saw', should be noticed.
- u 8b. 'That thou ridest upon thy horses, thy chariots of salvation', a kind of apposition, GK 131r. 9a. MT 'Nakedly thy bow is aroused'. 9b. Difficult. I would suggest '(the bow) full of [sib'al] arrows', though admittedly this usage of 'rods' has no warrant, and connect ōmer with the next sentence. 9c. I would read āmārtā (from 9b) lann'hārōt baqq'u 'ereš, 'thou saidst to the rivers, "Cleave the earth"'. 10. Sudden floods in the dry wadys after a severe storm are a source of terror to the desert tribes (cf. note in Driver, 99). 'The deep' (2nd time), MT 'on high': and note that it is a distinct word in Vg. 11. In the brilliance of God's storm the sun and the moon have no further function: 'for light, thy arrows go; for brightness, the flash of thy spear' (cf. Van H.). For God's arrows cf. Pss 7:14; 37(38) 3.
- v 12-14 The Effects on the Wicked—13a. 'With thine anointed': LXX omits 'with', perhaps rightly. It may refer (cf. the parallel) to the people or to the king or to his Messianic successor. 13b. The house of the wicked is imagined as a man, whose head is struck off, laying bare the neck; though NP and many for 'neck', šawwā'r, read šūr 'rock' (of the foundations). 14. Perhaps we should read pārāšāw, 'his horsemen' for 'his warriors'. RV, WV and many understand the staves (or sceptres) as belonging to the victim, though NP, Basic and others emend to 'thy staves'. Maṭṭeh, 'staff', is not, however, used of a spear-like weapon, any more than of an arrow (cf. 9b), but only for support in walking, and (occasionally, figuratively) for beating. LXX has 'in ecstasy'—?

15. God's Triumph—'Thou treadest the sea with thy horses, in the surge of many waters', 'Surge' from root hāmar as in Ps 45(46) 4.

16-17 The Prophet's Fear—16b. 'Rottenness enters my bones, and beneath me falter my steps', reading šūrai with Wellhausen and others. 16c. 'I will rest'. LXX is more probable 'the people around me'—perhaps negdī. 17. The picture of the desolation that will follow God's scourge.

18-19 The Prophet's Consolation—18. He who trusts y will rejoice, 'in the God of my salvation'; Jerome, interpreting directly of Christ, leaves the word untranslated, to show the connexion between the Holy Name and its meaning. 19. 'And upon my heights he will have me tread'. The 'conqueror' and 'singing psalms' are but musical directions often found in the Psalter: 'for the choirmaster, on n'gînōt' (perhaps a musical instrument), as in the title of e.g. Ps 4 (DV 'unto the end, in verses'). The last verse in Vg is lovely poetry.

SOPHONIAS

(ZEPHANIAH)

By S. BULLOUGH, O.P.

541a Bibliography—St Jerome, Commentarii in Sophoniam Prophetam, PL 25, 1337-88; J. Knabenbauer, S.J., cf. § 409b; Van Hoonacker, cf. § 409b; *S. R. Driver in CBI, 1906.

b The Name and Person of the Prophet—Sophonias, MT S'panyah, transliterated in AV as Zephaniah. Vg follows LXX. The name means 'The Lord has treasured'. The prophet was of royal descent, 1:1. He does not appear elsewhere in OT, nor is his great-grandfather Amarias, son of King Ezechias, mentioned in the historical books.

c The Date is given in the title as 'in the days of Josias, king of Judah', 640-609 B.C., 4 Kg 22:1. It was in his 18th year (622) that he had the great religious reform, abolishing idolatry, repairing the temple and restoring its worship, finding 'the Book of the Law' in the temple, and restoring the observance of its precepts and of the prescribed festivals, 4 Kg 22:3-23:25. Sophonias' references to idolatry, 1:4 ff., and his appeals to the people to return to the worship of the true God (e.g. 2:3) are indications of a date probably just preceding the reform of 622: indeed Sophonias' preaching may have contributed to it. He was thus a contemporary of Jeremias, who began his work in the 13th year of the reign, 627, Jer 1:2, and also of Nahum. Nahum was wholly occupied with the impending fate of Nineveh, but Sophonias merely mentions it as a dreadful warning to Judah, 2:13-15. In fact disaster came to Nineveh within 10 years, in 612.

d The Theme of the Book is a call to the people to repentance, and an assurance of God's love for them, esp. 3:15-17, but the approach is through the direst threat of calamity: the technique is that of the 'hell-fire sermon'. God's judgement is presented in 1:7-18 in terms of the 'Day of the Lord' ('Dies irae dies illa'), a figure frequently used by the prophets, esp. previously by Jo Am and Is (whence Soph may have got the idea), and later by Jer (only his later work, 46:10 and Lam), Abd Ez Zach and Mal (cf. § 542e). There is danger in the air: Assyria, the mighty power, has already devastated Palestine just 100 years before, and her own catastrophe will come with that of all the nations. Judah, if she remain faithless, will share in their fate (as in fact she did some 36 years later, in 586), but the Lord will remember the faithful remnant, and will restore them to glory, and indeed all the nations will come to adore him in the end. It is here, just for an instant, that Soph opens out a wider eschatological view, 3:9-10.

e The great and abiding religious value of the book consists in the profoundly earnest moral tone which pervades it, and in the prophet's deep sense of the sin of his people and of the stern need which impels Yahweh, who would only too gladly rejoice over his people, if it would permit him to do so, 3:17, to visit it with a discipline which will purge away its unworthy members' (Driver, 106 f.).

f The simplest division of the Book is according to its chapters: I The Threats of God's judgement, II The Call to Repentance, with examples of the calamities around them, III The Denunciation of Jerusalem, again with examples, 6-7, a promise of the recognition of the true God among the nations, 8-10, and of the salvation of the faithful remnant, 11-13, concluding with the song of consolation, 14-20.

The Unity of the Book—The older critical school (from Kuenen, 1889, to Marti, 1904) rejected various portions of the book, sometimes a verse here and there, sometimes a longer section, as post-exilic additions or interpolations. Driver (1906) considered many of these opinions 'arbitrary' (p 109); he himself limited the interpolated glosses to 2:7b, 11 and 3:9-10, 18-20, sections which, he felt, either fail to continue the argument of the context or represent a post-exilic viewpoint. Van Hoonacker considers 2:7b, 10 and perhaps 11, and a phrase in 3:10 to be later glosses. These writers represent a moderate critical view. Generally speaking, however, the book presents a literary unity. The style is regular of the period, but the text is in several places very insecure, notably 2:2, 6, 14; 3:1, 5, 10, 18, 19.

I 1 The Title—Sophonias has the longest genealogy of any of the prophets, probably in order to include his royal forbear, Ezechias. The fact that there are four generations in his line after Ezechias while in the royal line there are but three (Manasses, Amon and Josias) is explained when we remember that Manasses reigned 55 years, 4 Kg 21:1.

2-6 The Threat against Judah and Jerusalem—3. b

'Shall meet with ruin': MT and Vg have a noun, but a verb is better, probably we should read a hiph'il 'I will overthrow'. 4. Although the foregoing threat might apply to every land, here Judah and Jerusalem are specifically mentioned. 'Wardens of the temples': Vg aeditui, which Jerome explains, adding vel fanatici ('wardens of a fanum') ; HT has the word reserved for pagan priests. The contemporary account of Josias' reform, 4 Kg 23:5, includes their elimination (Vg there aruspices, DV 'soothsayers'), together with all worshippers of Baal, or of sun, moon or stars (cf. 5). 'With the priests' or read me'im, 'from among the priests', i.e. at the same time shall be eliminated the degenerate priests of Yahweh who were turning to idolatry. 5. Acc. to MT 'swear to the Lord... swear by Melchom', which is awkward. Omit 'swear' the first time: 'who adore the Lord and (at the same time) swear by Melchom'. This points to idolatrous worship being practised together with that of Yahweh. Melchom (MT, AV Milcom) was the god of the Ammonites, 3 Kg 11:5, 7, 33; 4 Kg 23:13, one of several Semitic deities (as Moloch) whose name derives from melek, 'king'.

7-9 The Day of the Lord: calamity will come on that day, the victim of the sacrifice being Judah and the guests her foes. 8. 'Visit upon' = 'punish' (common). 'The king's sons': LXX, 'the king's house'. This is the more likely reading since at the time of his reform King Josias was but 26 years old—he was 8 when he ascended the throne, 4 Kg 22:1—and would hardly have had sons capable of serious iniquity. One notices that the young king himself does not come under the condemnation. 'Strange apparel', i.e. alien idolatrous customs. 9. 'that leapeth over the threshold' refers either (1) to a pagan superstition (cf. that in 1 Kg 5:5) (Driver), or (2) to rapacious courtiers hastening to cross the threshold of the king's palace (Van Hoonacker), or (3) connect-

d 10-13 The Dismay of Jerusalem—10. The Fishgate, mentioned in Neh 3:3; 12:39; 2 Par 33:14, was in the N. wall not far from the NW. corner. Jerusalem is approached from the N. by an invader. 'The Second', thus lit. MT = 'the second quarter of the city' (also named in 4 Kg 22:14; Neh 11:9) was probably a new section added to the city (cf. Knox 'the New Town'), perhaps that enclosed by the new outer wall of Manasse, 2 Par 33:14, which included the Fishgate. 11. 'The Mortar', only found here, Prov 27:22 (a mortar for grinding), and Jg 15:19 (a cavity in a jaw-bone). Presumably it refers to a valley either shaped like a mortar, or where the inhabitants will be pounded, or both. 'Wrapped up in silver' = 'rolling in money'. Vg read ℣̄lōtē for ℣̄fllē 'laden' in MT. 12. The figure of the Lord cleansing the city, using lamps to illuminate the murky corners.

e 14-18 The Day of the Lord is Near—14. 'The voice' in Heb. often = 'the sound', and sometimes (as perhaps here and in 10) an exclamation 'Hark!' 15. 'Dies irae dies illa' comes from this verse, developing the meaning to the eschatological sense of the Day of Lord at the end of the world. 16. The trumpet ('tuba mirum spargens sonum') has become through the Gospel, Mt 24:31, and St Paul, 1 Thess 4:15; 1 Cor 15:52, a familiar feature of the picture of the Parousia (cf. also Handel's Messiah, n. 48). 18. God's 'jealousy': the traditional translation covering the senses both of zeal for his people and of exclusive claim to worship (cf. e.g. Ex 20:5): Knox, well in this context, 'his slighted love', also in 3:8.

f II 1-3 The Call—1. Judah is to come together in unity (cf. 3:9), and as a nation is to turn to God. 'Not worthy to be loved': 'undesirable' from an obscure Heb. root (so Jerome), or more probably 'unabashed' as in Targumic Hebrew, Pss 34(35) 4; 68(69) 7 in Targum; Driver. 2. Difficult: MT 'Before (i.e. scarcely) the decree is born, the day passes like chaff', but the figure of windblown chaff is hardly applicable to the Day. LXX 'Before you become like a flower which passes' suggests that for the unlikely 'the decree is born' LXX read lō' p̄hyū 'you shall not become'. Now the conjunction b'jerem ('before') may be used with a negative, as it is twice later in this verse, so that this reading brings the phrase into line with the syntax of the whole verse. The word 'day' is not in LXX. We can reconstruct, therefore (with Nowack), 'Before you become like blown (or passing) chaff'.

g 4-7 The Fate of the Philistine Cities—4. 4 are named, but not the 5th, Geth (Gath), which had apparently ceased to exist after the 8th cent., cf. § 550e. 'At noonday': in broad daylight, with no difficulty whatever. This seems more likely than a reference to siesta-time or the discomfort of midday heat, which are the usual interpretations. 5. 'O nation of Kerethites' (or Cretans; cf. LXX), probably Cretan emigrants in Philistia; cf. Am 9:7, Deut 2:23. St Jerome rejected the reading 'Cretans', saying that 'Chorethim' means 'perditorum', following Aquila, Theodotion and Symmachus. 6. LXX ignores the 'sea-coast' and for k̄rōt (a word otherwise unknown) read Keret, 'Crete', as the subject of the fem. verb. Again we can take Kereth to indicate Cretans in Philistia and translate 'And Kereth shall be pastures of shepherds'. 7. Philistia shall belong to 'the remnant of the house of Judah'—the first indication in Soph of the triumph of Judah over the neighbouring lands, a theme that returns in 9. The sentence about the 'captivity' seems to many writers to be a post-exilic gloss, though it may be part of the prophet's view of the coming disaster.

h 8-11 The Example of Moab—Moab will be punished for their hostility to Judah (cf. Abdias on Edom) and will eventually be dispossessed by the remnant of Judah. 9. 'Dryness' (or perhaps 'a field'), 'thorns' and 'heaps' are all rare words of uncertain meaning. 11. Yahweh's triumph over the false gods—he will 'consume' them (probable meaning of a rare verb).

12 The Example of Egypt—MT 'Cush', LXX Vg 'Ethiopians'. These sections make the circuit of the compass: Philistia to the W., Moab to the E. (beyond the Dead Sea), Egypt to the S., and finally Assyria to the N.

13-15 The Example of Assyria—13. 'The north', a common designation in Is, Jer and Ez. The invaders came round the northern edge of the desert. Even Assyria will succumb. For 'the beautiful city' HT has Nineveh, the Assyrian capital. 14. The animals are a famous crux (cf. Knox in CR 30 [1948] 220), but the main point is that they are descriptive of desolation. They have been variously identified. The voice (qōl), esp. of the porcupine, is unlikely, and Marti suggested reading kōs, 'owl'. The best reading is, I think, 'pelican, porcupine, owl, crow', all of which might be found in ruins (St Jerome assures us that there is a desert species of 'onocrotalus' or pelican). 'I will consume her strength' represents a reading 'erzeh' 'uzzāhh for MT 'arzāh 'erāh 'one has stripped off the cedar-work', i.e. panelling, doors and window-frames. 15. 'Wag his hand', a gesture of contempt or pity: 'Shake his head' would be to us more expressive, as is also Knox's 'Shake his fist', though this is rather a gesture of rage.

III 1-7 The Denunciation of Jerusalem—1. 'Ho! Defiant and polluted! The merciless city!' DV 'redeemed': there are two roots gā'al, 'to redeem' and 'to defile', and the second (though only found in exilic or post-exilic books, Lam Dan Esd Neh Mal and Is [59:3 and 63:3]) is the more likely here. 'The dove': but it is much more probably the fem. participle of yānāh, 'to oppress', whence the above translation (cf. RV). 3-4. Judgement on her princes, judges, prophets and priests. The judges are 'evening wolves: they left nothing for the morning'—so voracious are they' (Driver). The verb for 'left' occurs only here and is of doubtful meaning, but this is the usual translation. The prophets are 'wanton, men of deceptions'. 5. 'Morning by morning he gives his judgement'. The rest in DV represents MT, but the text is uncertain; LXX adds a phrase that raises critical problems for both LXX and MT. The phrase 'bring to light' is foreign to Heb., and I suspect that 'to light' and 'shall not be hid' (or perhaps the Heb. means 'has not failed'), as well as the LXX addition, are corrupt doublets of 'he knows no iniquity', so that perhaps the original HT ran '... gives his judgement and knows no iniquity'. 6-7. The example of the nations: their fate is to be a warning to Judah. 'Their ways': 'their streets'.

8-13 The Promise—8. 'Therefore wait for me, saith the Lord, for the day when I rise as a witness'; cf. LXX. God as a witness for or against men is a familiar notion, esp. with the judgement that follows, whereas the 'everlasting resurrection' would be obscure. Others (as RV) read k̄'ad, 'for the prey'. 'My judgement is to assemble nations and gather kingdoms', without articles in HT. 9. 'For then I will restore to the peoples [pl.] clean lips', i.e. all the nations will serve Yahweh. 'With one shoulder' = HT literally; Knox 'straining at a single yoke'. The shoulder in OT is usually in a context of bearing a burden. 10. DV represents MT (though lit. 'daughter of my dispersed ones'), but the context is hardly of dispersed Jews and rather indicates pagan nations. Further, LXX 'among my dispersed ones' leads us to suspect the text. It was Ewald who first observed that a frequent parallel to Cush (Vg here Ethiopia) is the land of Put = Libya, or perhaps the Egyptian Punt, Somaliland, Nah 3:9; Jer 46:9; Ez 30:5; 38:5; cf. Gen 10:6; DV 'Libyans' or 'Libya' in these texts (but 'Africa' in Nah), and he proposed reading Pūt here in place of p̄yāt, 'my dispersed ones', which 542m provides a tolerable text. But I consider that the word “lārāi, ‘my suppliants’, is as it stands not only of uncertain meaning (it occurs only here and LXX translated ‘I will receive’) but fails to fit the context, and is probably a doublet of ‘ēber, ‘beyond’, with the letter mem ‘from’ belonging to Pūh, so that the original text may have been ‘From beyond the rivers of Cush, from Put they will bring my offering’. Van Hoonacker, accepting MT, rejects the reference to the dispersal as a gloss. 11-18. ‘In that day’, when God shall greet the faithful Israel, she shall stand before him purified, with occasion no more for shame, as so often in the past, for her crimes she shall commit no more. Précis of St Jerome’s comment: Thou shalt no longer be ashamed of thy former sins, when the Gentiles believe and the scribes and Pharisees and the proud are no longer in thy midst, but rather the poor, such as fishermen, who will be the remnant.

- 14-20 The Song of Consolation—15. ‘The Lord hath withdrawn the judgements against thee’ (cf. GK 135m). 17. ‘The Lord thy God is in the midst of thee, mighty to save’. The phrase ‘He will be silent in his love’ is a line of poetry.
- 18. ‘The triflers that were departed from the law’, nūgē mimmo’ed. Nūgē is, however, a niph'al participle

(only here and Lam 1:4) of yāgāh, ‘to be sorrowful’, cf. the attempted translation of RV. But the reasonable reading is preserved in LXX, which attached the phrase to the preceding and read kimē mo’ed, ‘as in the days of a feast’, cf. Os 12:9(10). The rest of 18 is also difficult: HT, LXX and Vg are all different: HT ‘I have gathered from thee: they have been a burden upon her, a reproach’. The best plan is to accept the idea of LXX ‘I have gathered thy smitten ones’, and for MT mimmēk, ‘from thee’ to read makkayik, ‘those that smite thee’: ‘And I will remove [gather] those that smite thee: they have been a burden upon thee [2nd person], a reproach’. It is not clear what HT St Jerome had to work upon. 19. Also difficult. Vg seems to have the true reading by supposing the word kālāh, ‘destruction’ (as in 1:18): ‘I am making destruction of all . . .’ Israel is seen under the figure of a flock of sheep, some of which are lame, others lost. ‘The land of their shame’ supposes the absence of the article before ‘the land’. 20. The reference to ‘captivity’ again (cf. on 2:7) suggests to some that 18-20 are post-exilic, though it may be just a part of the prophet’s view of Judah’s calamity and her subsequent peaceful restoration according to God’s loving promises. 542o

(HAGGAI)

By S. BULLOUGH, O.P.

543a Bibliography—St Jerome, Commentarii in Aggeum Prophetam, PL 25, 1387 ff.; Van Hoonacker, cf. §409b; *S. R. Driver in The Century Bible, 1906; *W. Emery Barnes in CBSC, 1917; *R. H. Kennett in Peake's Commentary, 1920.

b The Background to the Prophecy—There is hardly a Book in the OT that is easier to place in its historical setting than Agg, for each of its four prophecies is carefully dated. The prophet's name is in Hebrew Haggai, probably connected with the word hag, a feast day (whence Jerome interprets 'festivus'), AV Haggai, LXX 'Αγγαιος, from which Vg Aggaeus and DV Aggeus. Nothing is known of him apart from his book and the references to his preaching and that of his contemporary Zacharias, and to the good effect thereof and the fulfilment of their prediction of prosperity, in Esd 5:1 and 6:14. But Aggeus stands out clearly as a forceful character, who addressed the leaders and the people of Judah in a time of religious crisis. It will be easiest to understand the work of Aggeus and Zacharias if we set it upon the large background of their time, the first century of Persian rule in Palestine. The following table shows the history of the rebuilding of the Temple, the principal pre-occupation of Aggeus. (Note that Hebrew months do not coincide with ours, since the first day is about the middle of our month, so that two month-names stand for one Hebrew month, cf. § 83i-j.)

586 Destruction of the temple and deportation to Babylon.

538 Cyrus conquers Babylon (reigns till 529).

537 (1st of Cyrus) Decree authorizing return under Zorobabel and Jesus (Esd 1:2; 2:2).

7th month (Sept.-Oct.) Altar built (Esd 3:2).

536 2nd month (Apr.-May) Work of rebuilding begins (3:8). Foundations are laid (3:10). Older men remember the former temple (3:12 cf. Agg 2:4).

The Samaritans hinder the work, and the building stops 'all the days of Cyrus . . . even until the reign of Darius', i.e. from 536 till 520 (Esd 4:5, 24).

529 Cambyses.

521 Darius I Hystaspis (till 485).

520-19 (2nd of Darius) Aggeus and Zacharias prophesy (Esd 5:1).

1/6/2, i.e. 1 Aug.-Sept. 520. Aggeus I (Agg 1:1).

24/6/2, i.e. 24 Aug.-Sept. 520. His message takes effect and work starts again (Agg 2:1; Esd 5:2).

21/7/2, i.e. 21 Sept.-Oct. 520. Aggeus II (Agg 2:2).

8th month, i.e. Oct.-Nov. 520. Commission of Zacharias (Zach 1:1).

24/9/2, i.e. 24 Nov.-Dec. 520. Aggeus III, IV (Agg 2:11, 21). Work resumed on the foundations (Agg 2:19; Esd 5:16).

24/11/2, i.e. 24 Jan.-Feb. 519. The Visions of Zacharias (Zach 1:7). Note Zach 4:9, 'The hands of Zorobabel have laid the foundations of this house, and his hands shall finish it'.

518-7 (4th of Darius).

4/9/4, i.e. 4 Nov.-Dec. 518. The Enquiry made to Zacharias (Zach 7:1).

516-5 (6th of Darius).

3/12/6, i.e. 3 Feb.-Mar. 515. Completion of the temple (Esd 6:15).

499 Revolt of the Ionians.

490 (32nd of Darius) Marathon: Greeks repulse the Persians.

485 Xerxes I: 480, Thermopylae, Persian victory; 480, Salamis; 479, Plataea, Greek victories. These are of interest here in view of the mention of the Greeks in Zach 9:13.

464 Artaxerxes I.

458 (7th of Art.) Esdras arrives in Jerusalem (Esd 7:8).

445 (20th of Art.) (Mar.-Apr.) Nehemias arrives (Neh 2:1, 11). (Aug.-Sept.) The wall of Jerusalem is finished (Neh 6:15). Neh 3 describes the wall, cf. Zach 14:10.

The immediate occasion of the prophecy of Aggeus is probably the beginning of the disintegration of the Persian Empire that showed itself in the reign of Darius (in his first nine years as recorded in the Behistun Inscription), and culminated in the war with Greece. (For a full treatment of this, see Barnes xxxiv-ix.) This will have been the sign for a bid for local independence in the provinces, the rights of minorities and a strengthening of local government.

Theme—It was now seventeen years since the first exiles had returned, and although the altar had been erected, the work on the temple site had been abandoned through difficulties with the local population. Zorobabel, who had been appointed governor by the Persians, and Jesus, the high-priest, had shared the general discouragement of the people. It was left to Aggeus to see the grave peril to the whole treasure of the Hebrew revelation. The temple with its liturgy had always been the centre of the Jewish worship of the True God. If this life of the people without a temple were allowed to go on, their fidelity to God would be threatened. Aggeus rose up, a man of courage and hope, before a discouraged, defeated, deported and barely reinstated people, who were struggling to bring back their civic life to normal. Now he addresses the governor and the high-priest, now the whole people. He takes them to task, encourages them, rallies their hopes, promises them the rewards of God's blessing and brings them to a realization of God's designs for them.

The central figure in the message is Zorobabel, son of Salathiel (Esd 3:2, 8; 5:2; Mt 1:12; Lk 3:27), son of Jechonias (thus called in Jer 22, 1 Par 3:16-17 and Mt), otherwise Joachim (4 Kg 24:15), the king of Judah who was deported into Babylon. Zorobabel was therefore of the royal line of Judah, as the Gospel genealogies show, though Mt traces Zorobabel and Salathiel through the kings to Solomon, son of David, and Lk traces them to Nathan, son of David by Bethsabee (2 Kg 5:14; 1 Par 3:5). This double descent from David may be the reason of the coupling in Zach 12:12 f. of the 'house of David', i.e. the royal house through Solomon, and the 'house of Nathan'. Zorobabel had been appointed governor (pāhāh) of the Persian province of Judah at his return with the first exiles. He first appears in the 7th month after the return under Cyrus in 537 (Esd 3:2), having been listed (Esd 2:2) first among those who returned. It was he who superintended the first effort at rebuilding the temple in 536 (Esd 3:2, 8; Zach 4:9), and so is probably to be identified with Sassabasar (Sēšbāšsar), the leader (nāiif) of Judah appointed by Cyrus to 543f bring the people back (Esd 1:8, 11), especially in view of Esd 5:14, 16 'Sassabasar . . . appointed governor (pehāh) . . . laid the foundations of the temple'. It was also Zorobabel who completed the work in 518 (Esd 6:15; Zach 4:9). It would seem that already Salathiel, his father, was born in exile, for no sons of Jechonias (Joachim) are mentioned at the exile, although he had wives before leaving (4 Kg 24:15) even at the age of eighteen (4 Kg 24:8) ('8' in 2 Par 36:9 must be a mistake). Jeremias, however, called him 'barren' (22:30), but adds that 'not a man of his seed shall sit upon the throne of David'. Lk (3:37) makes Salathiel to be of Neri, otherwise unknown, and so of Nathan and David. With Zorobabel is closely linked the high-priest Jesus, son of Josedec. Josedec was the high-priest who was taken to Babylon by Nabuchodonosor along with Jechonias (1 Par 6:15), who in turn was the son of Saraia (6:14), killed by Nabuchodonosor (4 Kg 25:18-21). So the high-priest Jesus was in direct descent from the priestly tribe of Levi (1 Par 6:1-15). His name is always written 'Jesus' in Vg and DV of Agg and Zach (and Ecclus 49:14), following the LXX form 'Ἰησοῦς' (adopted in NT) of the Hebrew name Y'hōshua or Joshua (AV, RV), in the other Hebrew parts of the OT always written Josue by Vg and DV, even when this priest is referred to in Esd (2:36; 3:2, 8, 9; 4:3; 5:2) and Neh (12:1), in which passages, however, the Hebrew is Yēšūa (RV Jeshua), which is the Aramaic form that our Lord would have used. It is in Zach (esp. in 6:13, and see § 547c and § 548f) that we see the ideal 'Church and State' relation built upon Zorobabel the prince and Jesus the high-priest, with the 'counsel of peace between them both'.

1 This brings us to the Messianic Ideas in this book. Zorobabel is a Messianic figure throughout Agg and Zach, as guardian of the Chosen People, as rebuilder of God's house, and in particular in the closing verses of Agg as the one who has restored the dignity of the house of David after the disgrace of 586. (The share of the high-priest Jesus in the Messianic role is more developed in Zach: § 547c and § 548f.) Zorobabel is to be a 'signet' on God's hand (Agg 2:24; Ecclus 49:13), and to be the leader in God's triumph over the Gentiles in the Messianic age. In this connexion comes the famous passage: 'And the desired of all nations shall come' (Agg 2:8, see § 544g), traditionally interpreted of the future Redeemer of the world, who was to be born of the stock of David through the line of Zorobabel. God is addressing the governor and the priest, and is telling them how he will move heaven and earth and all nations, and through the Redeemer will fill the new temple with glory (2:7-9). Here we should note the typical sense in the traditional interpretation of the new temple, to be rebuilt by Zorobabel and Jesus, not merely as the centre of Jewish worship, but as a type of the universal Church of Christ, whither all nations will come to adore: 'Great shall be the glory of this last house more than of the first, saith the Lord of hosts: and in this place I will give peace' (Agg 2:10). For the development of this idea in Zach, see esp. Zach 2:11; 8:22-23; 14:16-21; and § 545d, e.

k Brief Analysis—First prophecy: the temple must be rebuilt (1:1-11). Appendix: the effect: work begins (1:12-2:1). Second prophecy: the people are encouraged in their work (2:2-10). Third prophecy: the people must examine their consciences (2:11-20). Fourth prophecy: the promise to Zorobabel (2:21-24).

1 The Text of Agg presents few difficulties, and there is no dispute over the date, authorship or unity of the book.

544a I 1-11 FIRST PROPHECY: the Temple must be Rebuilt (1/6/520)—Addressed first to Zorobabel and Jesus, and after v 4 to all the people.

1-4 The Temple is still in Ruins—The date shows the passage of seventeen years since the first abortive attempt to rebuild after the return of the exiles under Zorobabel. In the face of Samaritan opposition the work had been abandoned, and Aggeus is calling the people to task. 1. Darius I Hystaspis, king of the Persians 521-485, relative, but not direct descendant of Cyrus who captured Babylon in 538 and released the Jews. He was the Darius who sent the expedition against Greece, which was defeated at Marathon in 490. For Zorobabel, see § 543f. 'Governor', pehāh, is apparently a loan-word from the Assyrian pahāh, a governor, and is used only twenty-eight times in OT (4 Kg, Esd, Neh, Est, Is, Jer, Mal and here, always of Assyrian, Babylonian or Persian governors or satraps; 3 Kg 10:15; 2 Par 9:14 of Solomon's governors; 3 Kg 20:24 of Syrian captains). For Jesus, see § 543h. 2. 'The Lord of hosts', a favourite phrase of Agg, occurring no less than fourteen times.

5-7 The People are to consider their Ways: they have had many troubles, but now if they will obey things will change.

8-11 God is commanding them to set to work on the rebuilding, and God will reward them. Perhaps the fact that it is only timber that is to be fetched indicates that the stonework was there, but in ruins. 10. MT lit. 'heavens withheld from dew (miṭṭal)', read ṭallām 'withheld their dew'.

12-II 1 APPENDIX: The Effect of the Prophecy: d Work begins (24/6/520, i.e. 23 days after the words of Aggeus)—12. 'to them' is not in MT. 13. 'And Aggeus, the mal'āk-Yahweh with the mal'ākūh-Yahweh to the people, spoke, saying: "I am with you, saith Yahweh"'. The word mal'āk, lit. 'messenger', is used in a technical theological sense of an angel (cf. Gk). Frequently in the OT we find the mal'āk-Yahweh speaking in the person of Yahweh himself (e.g. Gen 16 Num 22). And it appears to be so here. (The word mal'ākūh, 'message', occurs only here, and LXX and Vg read mimmal'ākē, 'from among the angels of'.) But the mal'āk-Yahweh is always a supernatural being or a manifestation of Yahweh himself (cf. Zach 1), and this cannot be applied to the prophet here. Some simply omit the words, as copied from the following words. If the text is right, it is the only time that a prophet receives this title. Jerome records the opinion that Aggeus actually was an angel, but prefers to consider it a special title here. I would suggest the omission of the first letter of l'émōr 'saying' (the previous word begins with this letter), and read āmar, translating: 'And Aggeus said: "The Angel of the Lord, with the message of the Lord to the people, said: "I am with you, saith the Lord"'. II 1. The printed Hebrew Bibles, followed by AV and RV make this v 15 of ch 1, so that it reads: '... did work on the 24th day of the month in the sixth' ('month' at the end is not in HT). LXX and Vg attach, awkwardly, to ch 2; their verse-numbers of ch 2 are therefore one higher. Yet the Hebrew Bibles have a paragraph mark after v 14, which some attribute to a feeling of conflict with 2:19, but the point is rather that the work began on 24/6/2, and that the foundations were laid three months later on 24/9/2 (2:19). The work in 2:1 is the preliminary work of clearing the site (Driver).

II 2-10 SECOND PROPHECY: The People are Encouraged (21/7/520)—2-8 Encouragement, and Comparison to the Temple's former Glory—2. In the date DV omits the day, though it is in HT and Vg. 4. Cf. Esd 3:12-13: it is suggested that Aggeus had seen the original temple sixty-six years before, and was therefore now an old man (Pusey). 6. 'The word' ef-haddābār with accusative prefix, made by Vg to be the object of 'perform' in v 5, necessitating the parenthesis. RV adds 'according to the word'. 'Covenanted' is simply the word 'cut', the usual verb in Hebrew with brīt 'covenant'. It is easier to omit the accusative prefix 'et' as a dittography of the two preceding letters, and to read habb'rīt 'the covenant which I made', taking 'perform' absolutely: i.e. 'work'. LXX omit the whole phrase 'the word . . . Egypt'.

7-10 The Messianic Age will come, and the New Temple will be more Glorious—'Yet one little while, 544i and I will move'; MT lit. 'Yet once, a little is it, and I will shake'. LXX omit 'a little is it', and read 'Yet once I will shake', and the passage is so quoted by St Paul in Heb 12:26 f. This is probably the best reading. St Paul quotes the passage as Messianic, emphasizing the 'only once more' of the Second Coming of Christ: 'There was no escape for those others, who tried to excuse themselves when God uttered his warnings on earth, still less for us, if we turn away when he speaks from heaven. His voice, even then, made the earth rock; now, he has announced to us that it shall happen again, only once' (Heb 12:25-26 KNT). 8. 'The desired of all nations shall come': in HT the verb is plural, from which it would appear that the noun is a collective: 'the desirable things' (RV), referring to the gifts brought to the temple. Strictly the word means the desire, and is only used of the thing desired here and perhaps 1 Kg 9:20. The traditional rendering of Vg, followed by AV, referring directly to the personal Messiah, the longed-for Redeemer of all nations, and used at Lauds on IV Sunday of Advent (2nd ant.), needs the alteration of the plural verb bā'ū to the singular bā'. Jerome claims to have read HT as he translates it, for he remarks on the reading of LXX, which corresponds to our present HT. 9. This verse admittedly bears out the interpretation of v 8 of the temple treasures.

h 11-20 THIRD PROPHECY: The People must examine their Consciences (24/9/520)—The date is that of the laying of the foundations (v 19), three months after the work had been begun on the site, although some preliminary work on the foundations had already been done in 536 (Esd 3:10).

11-14 Two Examples from Ceremonial Uncleanness—12. 'Ask the priests for guidance': the word tôrāh means something taught, hence frequently of the Law of Moses or the Pentateuch, but here in a general sense. 13-14. Casus 1: 'If a man carry home some blest meat (his share after a sacrifice) in his garment (i.e. in the pocket formed above his belt by the double breast of his tunic), and with this garment touch other food at home, does this other food count as blest food?' Obviously not. But Casus 2: 'If a man be ceremonially unclean because he touched a corpse (lit. unclean of a soul—a legal phrase, Lev 22:4; Num 5:2; 9:10), and then touch these things, do they become ceremonially unclean?' Yes, for what is holy hallows only what it itself touches (Lev 6:27), 544b while what is unclean infects not only the person in contact with it, but whatever he touches as well (Num 19:22): 'uncleanness had thus a greater infectious power than holiness. So it is thus with the people' (Driver).

15 The Moral from these Examples—Because the people are unclean, all that they touch is unclean, including their work and their acts of religion in the past.

16-18 Yet they have not learnt their Lesson—Let them consider their tribulations during these years of remissness about building the temple (cf. 1:5-7). 17 is a description of their want. The verse starts with an impossible word in MT: mihyôfām, 'from their being', with no connexion with the rest of the sentence. RV and RVm attempt to translate it; others emend to 'who were you' or 'how fared you', based on LXX, but little sense results. I would omit the word as a miscopy of min-hayyôm ('from this day') in the line above. The verse then reads: 'One went to a heap of twenty, and there would be ten; one went to the vat to draw fifty (insert from) the press, and there would be twenty'. The measures are inserted in the Versions as an explanation. 18. 'There was none among you that returned to me': MT 'There is not (accusative prefix) you to me', an awkward phrase. The parallel (including the blight and mildew) in Am 4:9, and also LXX here, have 'and you did not return to me', reading w'lô šāptem 'ēlay.

19-20 God's Blessing follows on their good Resolution to rebuild the temple—19. 'From the day that . . .' identifying the day of the foundation with the day of the prophecy. 20. 'Is there still seed in the granary? Is any more (reading 'ôd with LXX) the vine or fig or pomegranate or olive tree not bearing?' (reading nōš'im with LXX)—a rhetorical question to express their fruitfulness.

21-24 FOURTH PROPHECY: The promise to Zorobabel (24/9/520), see § 543f, i—24. 'A signet', Driver: 'a mark of honour and distinction, given by a monarch to an important minister, as a mark of confidence and authority' (cf. Gen 41:42; Est 3:10). In Jer 22:24, when God rejects Jechonias (Joachim), he says that if he 'were a ring on my hand, I would pluck him thence'. Here God's Messianic promises to the house of David after the degradation of Jechonias are transferred to his grandson Zorobabel, who thus becomes a type of Christ.

ZACHARIAS

(ZECHARIAH)

By S. BULLOUGH, O.P.

545a Bibliography—St Jerome, Commentarii in Zachariam Prophetam, PL 25, 1415 ff.; Van Hoonacker, cf. § 409b (so often quoted that I have abbreviated Van H.); *S. R. Driver in The Century Bible, 1906; *W. Emery Barnes in CBSC, 1917; *R. H. Kennett in Peake's Commentary, 1920; Touzard in RB (1913) 285-94, (1917) 123-33.

b The Person of the Prophet—Zacharias, Heb. Z'karyāh ('Yahweh remembers'), AV & RV Zechariah, probably a younger contemporary of Aggeus (§ 545j), is mentioned precisely elsewhere only in Esd 5:1 and 6:14, as preaching with Aggeus. He was commissioned by God to preach, in the month between Aggeus' 2nd and 3rd prophecies (in the 8th month 520). He is given in Zach 1:1, 7 as the son of Barachias (Berek'yāh), son of Addo ('Iddō). Whether the Addo ('Iddō) in Neh 12:4, one of the priests who returned with Zorobabel in 537, is the grandfather of the prophet cannot be proved. If he is, then his youth is shown by the presence of his grandfather among the returning exiles, when Zacharias himself would not be above his twenties, and his thirties at the time of his first prophecies. Esdras, however, calls him simply 'the son of Addo' (instead of grandson as in Zach). But in Neh 12:16 in the list of the priests who returned with Zorobabel, under the group of (DV) Adaia (Heb. 'Iddō as in v 4) the first name is Zacharia, in Heb. identical with the name of the prophet. Whence it has been supposed that 'son of Addo' shows membership of a group of priests, rather than son- or grandsonship. In which case the prophet is himself already one of the priests who returned, and the argument about his age is not so obvious. Anyway he seems to belong to a priestly family, and his interest in ceremonial matters has been observed, e.g. the lamp in ch 4, the garments and headgear of the high-priest in chh 3 and 6, and the fasts in chh 7-8. We should note a coincidence in Is 8:2, where one of Isaías' witnesses (c 740 B.C.) is (DV) 'Zacharias the son of Barachias', but in Heb. the names are slightly different (Z'karyāhū and Y'berek'yāhū), perhaps names that ran in a family? And see on Mt 23:35.

c Historical Background—The prophecies of the first part of the book are dated as are the prophecies of Aggeus, and occur in the same or in the succeeding two years (2nd and 4th of Darius, 520-518 B.C.), and Zacharias joined Aggeus in calling for a rebuilding of the temple, e.g. in the 1st Vision (1:16), 5th Vision (4:9), and Conclusion to the Visions (6:12-13), and for a mending of the people's ways, e.g. 1:3-6, 6th Vision (5:3-4), and 7th Vision (5:6-8); so that with respect at least to the first eight chapters the historical background is exactly the same, and the reader is asked to turn to the outline of the period in § 543c. The relation of the latter part of the book (chh 9-14) to the period will be discussed in § 545j.

d Division and Theme of the Book—The book falls obviously into two parts, chh 1-8 and chh 9-14, and the style and treatment are notably different in the two parts, but there are certain themes that run through the whole. Both parts are essentially Messianic in character: in the first part (as in Aggeus) Zorobabel is presented as a Messianic figure, by his restoration of temple-worship and of prosperity to the land a type of the Redeemer who will restore all things 545d (cf. § 543f, i); in the second part there is no more mention of Zorobabel or of the need of restoring the temple (this work was apparently by then completed—in 515, cf. § 545j), and the Messianism is one that looks directly into the future at the Redeemer to come and to the triumph of the New Jerusalem, a notion in which the twin ideas of the Church of Christ on earth and the everlasting Jerusalem of Heaven are fused in a picture of an earthly restoration (see esp. 2:11; 8:22-23; 14:16-21 with notes). In the first part Zorobabel receives the Messianic title of semah 'branch, shoot, bud (DV Orient)' (3:8; 6:12, see § 547f); while in the second part the Messias is announced as 'the King' (9:9) (a title never applied to Zorobabel), and this Messianic King will be 'just and victorious', and 'his power shall be from sea to sea', but in contrast he will be 'poor and riding upon an ass' (ibid. § 550g), and in the last chapter Yahweh himself shall stand upon the earth, shall go forth to fight and 'shall be king over all the earth' (14:3, 4, 9). The Messianic promises in Aggeus to Zorobabel have but a suggestion of the universal rule of the Messias (Agg 2:7-8, 22-24), and this is little more apparent in the first part of Zach (e.g. 8:22-23), but the universality of the Messianic Kingship is striking in 9:9f. and in ch 14. A Messianic role is further acted by the prophet in the second part, in the type of the shepherd rejected by the rulers (11:4-14), a passage whose Messianic nature is attested by the NT (Mt 26:15; 27:9). Again in the first part the prophet looks back on the years of oppression and misery, and sees in the joint rule of Zorobabel the prince and of Jesus the priest a new era of prosperity (esp. ch 8), marking the end of the dark period since 586, and typifying the Messianic age to come. In the second part he looks forward through the trials and tribulations of future history to the happiness of the Messianic age, identified mysteriously at the end with the 'Day of the Lord' (14:1, 4, 6, 7, 8, 9, 13, 20, 21), when (according to our reading of 14:6, see § 554c) 'there shall be a great light', day that shall be neither day nor night, but everlasting light. In this apocalyptic ch 14 we see Zacharias' eschatology, identifying with typical prophetic 'compensation' the restoration of Jerusalem with the first and the second coming of Christ. Cf. here Malachias' teaching on the 'Day of the Lord' Mal 4:1-3, § 555f.

Thus the Messianic theme, though differently treated e in the two parts of the book, runs through the whole. Another theme that appears all through the book is that of God's Providence, e.g. in Yahweh's zeal for Jerusalem (1:14; 8:2), his dwelling in their midst (2:10 12: 8:3), his vigilance symbolized in the seven eyes engraved on the stone (4:10), his care for his people (8:7-8), his control of the nations (9:4 ff.; 12:2-6; 14:12-15) and his bringing victory to Judah (ibid.) and his purifying of Jerusalem (13:2, 9). Linked with the Messianic idea of the restored Jerusalem is the theme, common to both parts of the book, of the return of the exiles (e.g. 2:6 and 9:12) and the promise that the nations also will come (e.g. 2:11; 8:22-23 and 10:10; 14:16-19). God's forgiveness is also taught in both parts, e.g. 8:11-15 and 10:6 when Yahweh will no longer punish the people. Yet this 545e depends upon their conduct (1:3 'Turn to me, and I will turn to you'): the need is for a spiritual religion, i.e. not merely external ritual, but a change of heart. This teaching is most important in Zach: truth, mercy, fair judgement are urged, and 'let not a man devise evil in his heart' (1:4; 5:3-4; 7:5-10; 8:16-19), i.e. the intention is important: a central point of Christ's teaching in the Sermon on the Mount, e.g. Mt 5:22, 28. These passages should be compared with James' definition of religion clean and undefiled before God, in his Epistle (Jas 1:27). In this teaching Zacharias anticipates that of the NT.

f To sum up therefore the foregoing: the principal religious teaching of Zacharias consists in the Messianic theme, in 1-8 under the type of the restoration of Jerusalem and temple-worship under Zorobabel, in 9-14 under the figure of the new and everlasting Jerusalem and of the universal kingdom of Yahweh, and under the type of the shepherd rejected (and contrasted with the type of the Antichrist in 11:15 ff.); in the showing of God's providence and forgiveness; and in insistence upon religion not merely concerned with external rites, but with a right attitude of heart and a cultivation of truth and mercy.

g Literary Forms—The notable difference between the two parts of the book is largely due to difference in literary form. Chh 1-6 are a series of visions or dreams (1:8 'by night'), each with a distinct message. Van Hoonacker (pp 579 ff.) considers these to be a special literary form, in which the prophet puts his preaching into the form of visions, frequently transported in imagination to events of the past, and that this particular form of preaching is proper to Zacharias. He adopts this view, rather than the commoner one that the chapters simply represent an account of actual visions received, because several of the visions seem to refer to past events, the revelation of which by means of a vision seems rather pointless, whereas it is easily explicable if they are a literary device intended to bring home graphically to hearers the situation in the past. On the other hand it can be claimed that it is not the fact of the past event, but the message involved, that is the object of the revelations if they are real visions. Be that as it may, the vision-form of chh 1-6 naturally involves a different style. A notable feature of these visions is the introduction of an interpreting angel, as in Dan 7:16; 8:16; 9:21 ff. and in Apoc 17:1 ff.; 21:9. The phrase 'that spoke in me' is peculiar to Zach (1:9, 13, 14; 2:3—not in DV; 4:1, 5; 5:5, 10; 6:4) and its precise significance is uncertain. It is only paralleled in Num 12:2, 8 of God speaking to Moses. 6:9-15 is a symbolic action connected with the theme of the visions. Chh 7-8 again have the special literary form of an enquiry made to the clergy (cf. Agg 2:12-14), followed by the prophet's answer on the need of a spiritual religion. This also may be either the record of an actual enquiry or a literary device. The literary forms in chh 9-14 are the more familiar styles of OT prophecy, including the enactment of the roles of the good and foolish shepherds (11:4-17) which may be compared with the symbolic action of 6:9-15 and with Osee's marriages (Os 1:2 ff.; 3:1 ff.), with Micheas' going naked (Mic 1:8), Isaias' going barefoot (Is 20:2), his writing the name of his son (Is 8:1), and Ezechiel's many symbolic actions, e.g. eating the book (Ez 3:1), drawing a plan (4:1), moving his furniture (12:3), etc. We find also in the second part of Zach prophecies ('burdens') against Judah and the nations, and passages of apocalyptic description (esp. ch 14), which are familiar features of prophecy.

h Analysis—In view of the complicated nature of this book, a fairly full analysis is desirable here. (N.B.—I have added an asterisk to references where an alteration in the order of the text is called for. Many such shufflings have been proposed. Those made in the 4th Vision [the lampstand] and in the parable of the foolish shepherd receive general acceptance. Explanations will be found in the commentary.)

FIRST PART A: The Visions 1-6

545h

(After each vision is printed in italics the gist of the angel's interpretation)

Introduction: 'Turn from your evil ways' 1:1-6 (dated 8/520)

1st Vision: The Angel & the 4 Horses 1:7-17 (dated 24/11/519)

(Jerusalem shall be rebuilt)

2nd Vision: The 4 Horns and the 4 Smiths 1:18-21 (HT 2:1-4)

(The oppressors shall be destroyed)

3rd Vision: The Man with the measuring-line 2:1-13 (HT 2:5-17)

(The exiles shall return to Jerusalem, and the nations shall come)

4th Vision: The Lampstand 4:1-3, 11-14 *

(The Temple shall be restored by Zorobabel & Jesus)

5th Vision: The high-priest 3:1-8

(Jesus is called to his new work in the temple)

The Stone 3:9a; 4:4-10; 3:9b-10 *

(The temple shall be rebuilt by Zorobabel)

6th Vision: The Flying Scroll 5:1-4

(The land shall be purged of injustice)

7th Vision: The woman in the barrel 5:5-11

(Iniquity shall be removed far away)

8th Vision: The 4 Chariots 6:1-8

(The oppressors shall be chastised)

Conclusion: Symbolic action: Jesus and Zorobabel, and 'the counsel of peace between them both'.

FIRST PART B: An Enquiry and its Answer 7-8

(i) An Officer's enquiry about fasting 7:1-3 (dated 4/9/518)

(ii) The Prophet's answer: Truth and Mercy are more important than fasts 7:4-8:23
(In the past the people rejected God's commands of Truth and Mercy, and therefore they were punished: but now he gives the Messianic promises as an incentive to these virtues. In the Messianic age fasts will be turned into holidays)

SECOND PART A: The First 'Burden' 9-11 with 13:7-9

(i) The Triumph of Judah 9-10

(a) Prophecies against various cities of Palestine 9:1-8.

(These cities will either be humiliated or destroyed, while Judah will prosper)

(b) The Messianic hope for Jerusalem 9:9-10
(Jerusalem shall rejoice, for her Messianic King, poor and humble, will come)

(c) The Triumph of Judah 9:11-10:12
(The exiles will all return, and Judah in spite of her past infidelity shall have victory and prosperity)

Interlude: the Destruction of the Forests 11:1-3

(ii) The Shepherds (two parables enacted) 11:4-17; 13:7-9

(a) The rejection of the good Shepherd 11:4-14
(The Shepherd is appointed, but the flock is doomed by its owners. The Shepherd breaks his two symbolic rods, and is rejected by the owners)

(b) The fate of the foolish Shepherd 11:15-17; 13:7-9 *

(The foolish Shepherd has no care for the flock, and is stricken down. The flock is scattered, but a remnant shall remain faithful)

SECOND PART B: The Second 'Burden' 12-14 less 13:7-9

(i) The fall of Jerusalem shall be a calamity to the nations 12

(Jerusalem in her fall shall wreck other nations, but shall eventually triumph, though she shall mourn over the rejected Messias)

- 545b (ii) The cleansing of Jerusalem 13:1-6 (Idolatry and magic will be cast out, and the ex-prophet shall turn husbandman)
- (iii) The Day of the Lord 14 (Jerusalem shall be captured and the people shall flee, but the Lord shall come. Judah and Jerusalem shall be restored in the Messianic age, and though her enemies will be discomfited, yet a remnant of the nations shall adore the Lord)

1 Historical Allusions in IX-XIV—The allusions to current events at the time of the dated prophecies of the first chapters are for the most part quite obvious (including events back to 586, and mention of Babylon in 2:7 and 6:10); but the allusions in the latter part are particularly important for the dating of chh 9-14. Assyria (a defunct power since 612) is mentioned in conjunction with Egypt in 10:10f. The Jebusites (a tribe in Jerusalem, which ceased to exist in the time of King David c 1000) are mentioned in 9:7. The Philistines (a people resident along the sea-coast, for long rivals to the Hebrews in Palestine, and who apparently received a new prosperity in Persian times —v. EBCB art. Philistines) are named among the Palestinian cities in 9:6. Ephraim (9:10, 13; 10:7) and the house of Joseph (10:6) apparently stand for the Northern Kingdom or the ten tribes, who were taken into captivity in 722. The earthquake in the time of Ozias, king of Judah (14:5) took place c 750. The sons of Yāwān (Ionia or Greece) are mentioned in 9:13. This is an important allusion, for although the name occurs as far back as Gen 10:2, it seems in earlier passages to connote a remote race, and not a great power as it does here. Although Greece begins to appear in world history about the time of Marathon (490) (see table in § 543c), the reference here raises a special problem (see § 550j). References to David or his house as symbols of power (12:7, 8, 10, 12; 13:1) suggest a time when there was a Davidic ruler (such as the kings or Zorobabel). Finally we should remind the reader of the following dates to which there are possible allusions: 586 Captivity. 537 Return under Zorobabel. 515 Completion of the temple. 458 Return under Esdras. 444 Walls of Jerusalem finished. 333 Alexander's victory over the Persians at Issus (Greek domination). 197-142 Seleucid power in Palestine. 175-161 Maccabean revolt.

2 The Dating of IX-XIV—In view of the varied historical allusions in these chapters, it is not surprising that there are varied opinions on their date. What may be called the traditional view is that they are by Zacharias himself, composed after chh 7-8 (518), and probably after the completion of the temple in 515 (since mention of this matter is absent from the second part of the book). The fact that there are certain themes that run through the whole book (§ 545d, e) supports this view. If it is true that Agg 2:4 suggests that Aggeus in 520 was an old man who remembered the temple of sixty-six years before, and that he died before its completion, since he does not mention this fulfilment of his desires, it may well be that Zacharias was a much younger man when they both began to prophesy in the year 520 (Esd 5:1), and indeed he always has second place. Further, if Addo of Neh 12:4 was his grandfather, Zacharias would be at most in his thirties in 520 (but cf. § 545b). It is then quite possible that he would still be preaching even forty years later at a time when the political scene was changing considerably.

k I would maintain therefore that the vision or dream writing of the first part, with all its hopes in a new era, is the work of a young man (of about thirty) in 520-518, while the more forbidding and remotely hopeful prophecies of the second part are the work of the older man (of about seventy), when the future of the Persian Empire had become less secure, after the revolt of Egypt in 486, the death of Darius in 485, and the failure of the expedition against Greece (Salamis 480, Plataea and the final Ionian revolt in the year 479). It is likely that Zorobabel was dead —he is not heard of later than 520 (Agg 2:1; Esd 5:2), though Zacharias in his earlier prophecy promised that he would complete the temple (Zach 4:9), which happened in 515 (Esd 6:15, though Esd does not mention him here by name). If Zorobabel was dead before 490 (he had become governor in 537), it would explain the absence of the Zorobabel theme in the second part of the book. It would appear from the references to the house of David in ch 12 that his successors in government were also of the royal line. By the time of Esdras, however (458), this was not so any more, but nothing is known of the government of Jerusalem between Zorobabel and Esdras. The difference in style and treatment between the two parts of the book is also explained by the difference in the author's age and the changing political circumstances. The famous reference to Greece in 9:13 may conceivably be interpreted in the light of current affairs. The allusions to Assyria (10:10 f.) must be taken either as archaisms, or else as general terms for the imperial rulers of Mesopotamia, be they Babylonians or Persians. Similarly allusions to Ephraim or Joseph have to be understood as symbolic complements to Judah, completing the whole of the ideal Israel; and the Jebusite in 9:7 has to be taken as a symbol for a race absorbed into Israel.

Van Hoonacker, holding that the visions in 1-6 are l a special literary form, maintains that allusions to nations or events of the past are either deliberate archaisms or part of the mise en scène deliberately staged for graphic effect. He finds this method in both parts of the book (e.g. his exegesis of the destruction of the forests and identification of the shepherds in ch 11 with a mise en scène of 586, cf. § 545g). On this principle Van H. explains the 1st-5th visions as staged in exilic times, through the destruction of Babylon (2nd vision) to the gradually more settled life at Jerusalem after 537, and again the 6th-8th visions as beginning before 586 (Babylon therefore taken literally in the 7th vision), and ending with the chastisement of Babylon in 538 in the 8th vision. Similarly the enemies of Judah in 12:2 ff. refer to the difficulties in building during the years 536-520, already past at the time of writing, and the apocalyptic scenes of ch 14 are a merging of the 586 situation and present difficulties into a picture of the future. With this theory Van H. is easily able to defend the Zacharian authorship of the second part of the book, and seems to consider it to have been written only shortly after the first part, Yāwān in 9:13 being taken as a later interpolation (see § 550j); Van H. pp 579-81, 650-62. A semi-traditional view is that of Barnes (pp xiv-xxii), who m holds that though the second part is by a different hand ('Zechariah the disciple'), it was written shortly after the first, and certainly before the time of Nehemias (444). Indeed in the views expressed above under k, l, m, the time of writing is after the dated writings of the first part (520-518), probably after the completion of the temple (515), and certainly before the time of Esdras (458) or Nehemias (444), when the rule of the Davidic line had already ceased.

Since the denial of the unity of the book in the 17th cent. n there have been many opinions, frequently dividing the book into many fragments. Almost all commentators agree in accepting the dates given in the book for chh 1-8. With regard to chh 9-14, there are three chief schools of those who hold that they are not by the author of the first part. (1) The older critics, e.g. Hitzig (1863) and Ewald (1868) held that these chapters are chiefly pre-exilic, later absorbed into the book of Zach. Their claims are based principally on pre-exilic historical allusions, including the deportation of the ten tribes by the Assyrians in 722. (2) Driver p (1906, pp 228-35), following Stade (1882) and Nowack (1904), places these chapters in the time of Alexander, after his victory over the Persians in 333. This is suggested in the first place by 9:13 (Greece), but also by the absence of any reference to Zorobabel or the f Although one can admit the possibility of the various identifications suggested above, it seems to me probable that the names of the oppressing nations stand quite symbolically for the forces of evil in the world, while Judah (including Ephraim and Joseph in chh 9-10, representing the fullness of the New Israel of the Redemption) stands for the power of Christ in the world, against which the gates of hell will not in the end prevail. In this case many names could, and were intended to, carry several simultaneous identifications in history, past, present or future.

545p temple, by the different Messianic treatment and by the state of war, siege and plunder reflected in this part of the book. Ephraim stands for the Diaspora, and Assyria for oppressing powers in general, probably Persia. (The traditional view, of course, also takes these names as symbolical.) (3) The third school is represented by Kennett (1920, in Peake, p. 579), following Wellhausen (1898, and his art. Zechariah in EBCB, 1907) and Marti (1904), who all date these chapters in Maccabean times, about the year 170, claiming that this period is faithfully reflected in 'Deutero-Zechariah', and that Greece in 9:13 refers to the Seleucids, as also does Assyria. Kennett writes that there is no record in post-exilic times of such storm and stress as Zach depicts, until the second cent. Arguments from the classical Hebrew style of Zach are countered by the example of the classicism of Ecclesiastes, c. 180 B.C. The solution of the difficult problem of the identity of the shepherds in ch 11 depends upon the school to which the exegete belongs (see § 551b, e, h).

g Text—The Hebrew of Zach is in good classical style, with no obvious signs of either archaic or late usage. There is a difference of vocabulary and phraseology between 1-8 and 9-14, but no more than might be expected from the different treatment and different subject-matter, or from the youth and age of the same author; and there are indeed notable analogies. (For the elaborate linguistic arguments both ways, see Van H., pp 657-60.) The text is frequently unsound—often they are small points that do not affect the sense (and most of these we shall omit to mention in the commentary); in many places the LXX or Vg have the better reading, but quite often the corruption is already reflected in those versions. In some passages the Hebrew is simply not patient of the traditional translation, or even of the effort of the RV, and certain critical emendations are almost universally recognized, while for other passages various proposals old and new will have to be put forward. In chh 3-4, and in the placing of 13:7-9, a transposition of verses seems to be demanded by the sense.

t Interpretation—It is well to bear in mind that Zacharias is one of the most difficult and enigmatic books of the OT. St Jerome himself several times laments (though not without humour) the difficulty of interpretation. For instance in the Prologue to ch 6 (the last vision) he says: 'Ab obscuris ad obscuriora transimus', and on 10:1: 'Omnis hic locus obscurus et dubius est, et debet nobis lector ignoscere, si in his quae ambigua sunt, et nos pendulo incedimus gradu'. When he faces ch 11 he writes: 'Transimus ad Libanum, et ad duas virgas, tresque pastores . . . et ad triginta argenteos . . . et ad stulti vasa pastoris, et caetera . . . quae tantis sunt contexta mysteriis, ut misericordia Dei et tuis indigamus orationibus'. Sometimes even the literal sense or allusion is obscure, but sometimes the spiritual sense is plain, as in certain Messianic passages or in the references to the new and eternal Jerusalem; sometimes indeed it is guaranteed by NT or liturgical usage, but at other times we also must leave God's word a mystery and commend ourselves to his mercy.

FIRST PART A: The Visions I-VI

546a I 1-6 Introduction—1. The date: the 8th month (Oct.-Nov.) 520, the month between the second and third prophecies of Aggeus. Darius I Hystaspis, King of the Persians, 521-485 (v. § 544a). Zacharias, his person and parentage, § 545b. 3. 'Turn ye to me, and I will turn to you' is commented on by St Thomas in I-II 109, 6 ad 1, where he says that although it is true that 'man turns to God by his free will, yet not unless God turns to him' (i.e. by the gift of habitual grace, 'the principle of meritorious action', ibid. corpus). He quotes Lam 5:21, 'Convert us, O Lord, to thee, and we shall be converted'. 4. 'Turn ye from your evil ways and from your wicked thoughts', a summary of the teaching of the 'former prophets', rejected by the people in the past.

7-17 1st Vision: The Angel and the Horses—The object of this vision is to show Yahweh's vigilance through his emissaries (11), and to convey his message of zeal for Jerusalem (14, 17; cf. 8:2) and his promise that the temple and city would be rebuilt (16). As so often (and quite patently in ch 14, where the events described are after the final coming of God), Jerusalem is to be understood in the spiritual sense of the Church first on earth and then in heaven. The literal sense here of course refers to the need of rebuilding the temple in Jerusalem, which was not in fact completed until 4 years later (see § 543c).

7. The date 24/11/2 (519). Note the Babylonian name of the month (Jan.-Feb.), only here and 7:1 in Agg or Zach; it had probably become current among the returned exiles. 8. Myrtle, a shrub standing 3-4 feet high. 'Bottom' is an old English word (still found in place names) for 'valley or hollow'. Note the definite article, probably indicating a particular hollow near Jerusalem. The word is generally used of the depths of the sea or a river (cf. 10:11). The three horses behind were bay (red), sorrel (RV, i.e. mixed white and bay) and white. 9. 'Spoke in me' is literal, and the expression is peculiar to Zach, see § 545g. 10. 'The man', i.e. the rider on the front horse. 11. 'The Angel of the Lord' is now identified with the front rider, and is distinct from the Angel that spoke 'within' the prophet. The other three riders are God's emissaries who have been to inspect the earth, and have found that 'all the earth is inhabited', in contrast to the desolation of Jerusalem. 12. '70 years'—67, to be exact, since 586.

18-21 (HT 2:1-4) 2nd Vision: The 4 Horns and the 4 Smiths—(In Hebrew Bibles ch 2 begins here.) The horns are the powers that have scattered Judah into exile (cf. horns on the beasts=nations in Apoc 13:1, 11), and the craftsmen are come to repair the damage. 18. (1) Horns (of an animal) are a metaphor for power, so that 'to lift up the horn' is a usual metaphor for 'to act haughtily', as in v 21 (4). 19. (2) 'Spoke to me' here in DV, although HT and Vg have 'in me' as usually in Zach. 21. (4) 'Scattered Judah so that no man lifted up. . .'

II 1-13 (HT 2:5-17) 3rd Vision: The Man with the Measuring Line—Cf. Ezekiel's 'man with a measuring reed in his hand' who takes the prophet in spirit about Jerusalem (Ez 40 ff.). The restored Jerusalem, after the return of the exiles, will be too great to be (figuratively) contained within walls (4): Yahweh himself will be the wall (protection) (5), so the services of the young stonemason will not be required. The exiles are to come from Babylon (6-7), for there were many who had not yet returned: Esdras' party did not return until 38 years later (in 458, Esd 7-8, v. § 543c).

4. (8) The young man is the stonemason of v 1. 6. (10) 'The north', frequently used by the prophets (esp. Jer) as a vague description of the lands of the exile. Actually of course invaders from across the Euphrates (Assyrians, Babylonians, Persians) would follow the fertile crescent, cross the Euphrates in its upper reaches and enter Palestine from the north, rather than come direct from the east across the desert. The Vg reading 'I have scattered you into the four winds' supposes b'arba' for MT k'arba' 'according to the four winds'. But the LXX reading mē'arba', and āsapti for pārastī ('I have scattered') is 546d preferable, with the translation: 'From the four winds I have gathered you'. 8. (12) 'After glory' is very difficult. RV 'After glory hath he sent me', AV as DV. Driver makes the whole phrase a parenthesis, and takes 'to the nations' with 'saith the Lord'. Among various emendations the most satisfactory is that of Van H. kōbēd ('suffering', cf. Is 21:15) for kābōd (glory). The words of the prophet (speaking of Yahweh in the third person) are identified with God's authority ('Thus saith . . .') (as in 3:2 and 8:20-22). Translate: 'After the suffering, he (Yahweh) hath sent me (Zach) to the nations who rob you, for whoever touches you, touches the apple of his (Yahweh's) eye'. The word for the apple of the eye is not the usual one, and occurs only here. The third person suffix is in MT (and in Jerome's commentary). 10 (14) refers presumably to the restored temple. 11. (15) The nations shall come: a Messianic idea, cf. § 545e. Here the restoration of Jerusalem as the centre of universal worship (cf. esp. 14:16-19) can only be fully understood in the spiritual sense of the universal Church of Christ. 13. (17) Cf. the 'silence in heaven' of Apoc 8:1.

• This verse leads on most easily to the vision beginning 'And the angel . . . waked me' (4:1), after the silence. Some shuffling is anyway necessary in chh 3-4; 4:11-14 are clearly the explanation of the Lampstand in 4:1-3, so that the dialogue beginning in 4:4 must refer to something else: I would therefore attach 4:4-10 to the 'Stone' passage in 3:9 (v. further explanation in § 547g). I have chosen to place the Lampstand vision first, in view of the wakening after the silence.

547a IV 1-3; 11-14 (chh III and IV 4-10 follow) 4th Vision: The Lampstand—2-8. The vision of a 'lampstand all of gold, and a reservoir upon the top of it, and its seven lamps above it, and seven pipes to the lamps which are upon the top thereof'. 2. 'Lampstand' with seven lamps: the same word is as used of the 'seven-branched candlestick' of the temple (Ex 25:3 ff.; 37:17 ff.), wherefore it is taken here as a figure of the temple and its worship (cf. the point of the next vision: its restoration), 'and in a more sublime sense' (Challoner) of the Church of Christ. 'Reservoir' gullāh (a bowl). The mappiq in the he is probably an error, supposing a word gōl with suffix: 'its bowl'. (After the words 'above it' MT has again 'seven', rightly omitted by LXX and Vg.) 8. 'And two olive trees beside it.'

• 11-14. (for vv 4-10 see § 547g-i). The interpretation follows with its usual dialogue (cf. 1:9; 1:21; 2:2; 4:4; 5:2; 5:6, 10; 6:4). 12. 'Olive branches', properly 'ears', as of corn. 'Beaks', a word occurring only here, related to the word for 'pipe' or 'spout' in 2 Kg 5:8 and Ps 41(42):8. 'In which are the funnels of gold', MT lit. 'which empty from upon them the gold'. RV adds the word 'oil', supposing a poetic diction quite inadmissible after the mechanical description of the apparatus. Vg read a noun for the verb 'empty', but the sense arrived at is unlikely. Either a phrase has dropped out, or better, we must for 'from upon them' read the word mūsāqōt 'pipes' (as in v 2), translating: 'which empty from the pipes of gold'. 14. 'Sons of oil', i.e. full of oil (cf. Is 5:1 'son of fatness', DV 'fruitful place'). This word for oil is used of oil freshly pressed from the olive, not that prepared for anointing, so probably here (Kennett) the idea is not that of anointing, but of fruitfulness.

• The Lampstand, a figure of the temple, is supplied with oil by the two fruitful olive trees, obviously Zorobabel and Jesus, the restorers of the temple and its worship: cf. the next vision (5th) and the concluding prophecy (6:9-15 § 548d), where is emphasized the Messianic significance of Zorobabel (cf. Agg 2:24 and see § 543i) and Jesus, combining between them the kingly and priestly power, fulfilled together in Christ. The 'two olive trees and the two lamps that stand before the Lord of the earth' of Apoc 11:4 are there connected with the temple, and are presumably taken from this passage. Jerome mentions a traditional interpretation of the two trees as the OT and NT. 547b

III 1-8 5th Vision (first part): The high-priest— d In the first part of this vision the prophet sees the high-priest rebuked by God for his slackness, symbolized by his slovenly liturgical attire (a matter of interest to Zacharias the priest). His iniquity (4), presumably his remissness over rebuilding the temple, is removed and he is clothed with new vestments, symbolizing his preparedness for the restoration of temple worship. In the second part he sees the cornerstone for building, which is to be put in position by Zorobabel, lying before the high-priest (9a). The interpretation of the whole vision is in 4:4-10 and 3:9b-10.

1. Jesus, the high-priest, see § 543h. 'Satan', in e Heb. 'the Satan', i.e. the Adversary par excellence. Used without article for any adversary, e.g. in Num 22:22, 32 (Balaam) of the angel standing in the way. 2. Satan is rebuked: Jerusalem is to belong to Yahweh and not to him. The high-priest is a 'firebrand plucked out of the fire', i.e. having narrowly escaped destruction at Satan's hands (same metaphor in Am 4:11). 4. The high-priest's 'iniquity' is his remissness. In 4:9 the work is obviously begun, but not yet finished—this is 24/11/519, and Aggeus' preaching had its effect in starting the work on 24/6/520 (Agg 2:1), five months before to the day. But work was apparently slow, for they needed encouragement again on 21/7/520 (Agg 2:2), after less than a month. Jesus is to be prepared for his new work in the restored temple. 5. 'He said: Put . . .', MT 'I said: They will put . . .'; Vg better. 7. The angel is speaking: 'Some that are now present here', i.e. other angels, members of the celestial court to which Jesus is now admitted. Here is a compenetration of the ideas of the earthly and the heavenly Jerusalem. 'I will give thee mahl'kīm 'walks' (of place or distance: a rare word, only in Ez 42:4, 4; Neh 2:6; Jon 3:3 and here). Probably best translated as in AV and RVm: 'places to walk among these that stand by'. 8. Men of portent, the assistant priests with a glorious future before them.

• 'The Orient'—one of the Messianic titles, here applied f to Zorobabel (cf. Agg 2:24, v. § 543i) as restorer of the temple, and so, by compenetration applied to Christ, saviour not only of Israel but of the world (cf. § 550g). Zachary in the Benedictus (Lk 1:78) refers to Christ as the 'Orient' (AV RV 'Dayspring') (cf. the 'O Antiphon' for Dec. 21), Gk ἀνατολή, sunrise, east; this is the word here in LXX for Heb. šemaḥ, meaning a 'shoot of a plant' and used Messianically in Jer 23:5 'I will raise up to David a just šemaḥ' (LXX ἀνατολή, Vg germen, DV branch) and Jer 33:15 (LXX A ἀνατολή, B βλαστός, al. κέρας, Vg germen, DV bud). (AV & RV have 'branch' in all passages, but RVm adds in Zach 'or shoot, or sprout', and in Jer 23 'or shoot, or bud'.) It is doubtful whether ἀνατολή can mean the rising of a plant, and the origin of the LXX and Vg rendering remains obscure, though the title has been accepted by NT usage and liturgical tradition. The title occurs again in 6:12, where the reference to Zorobabel is quite obvious.

III 9a IV 4-10 III 9b-10 5th Vision (second part): g The Stone—9a. The mention of Zorobabel ('Orient') in 3:8 brings a new stage in the vision: the building-stone for the temple, laid in the vision before the high-priest, and engraved with 7 eyes, a sign of Yahweh's vigilance as explained in 4:10, in the interpretation of the vision. (These two references to the 7 eyes are the key to the present rearrangement.) Barnes mentions a stone engraved with 7 eyes found at Gezer, the device was therefore known to Palestinian masons; cf. PEF (1908) 201. (Mention should be made of Wellhausen's view that the reference is to a precious stone with 7 facets, a diadem for Zorobabel's crown.) IV 4-5. The familiar dialogue, obviously not part of the Lampstand vision, for that has its dialogue in 4:11-13. In the order as the text stands, this vision (of the high-priest and the Stone) alone

- 547g has no dialogue: I therefore maintain that 'these things' (4:4) refer to the happenings to Jesus and to the presence of the stone before him. The whole vision is concerned with the restoration of the temple, which is the theme of the interpretation 4:4-10.
- 6. 'Not by force nor by might', i.e. not by human effort alone will the rebuilding of the temple be done, but by the spirit of Yahweh.
- 7. Zorobabel as civil governor is to lay the final stone himself. A very difficult verse. MT lit. 'Who art thou, mountain the great, before Z., for flatness? And he shall bring out the top stone—noises—grace, grace to it'. RV's attempt: '... before Z. thou shalt become a plain. And he shall bring forth the head stone with shoutings of "Grace, grace to it!"', which, although adopted by Van H., undoubtedly forces the Hebrew. LXX '... before Z. for setting upright? And I will bring out the stone of inheritance, equality of grace, grace to it'. Syr. '... before Z., but like a plain, and he brought out the head stone of equality and of mercy'. These divergent readings at least suggest weaknesses in the text, rendered also suspect in its first words by the absence of the article to 'mountain', while the adjective has it. Some would read here uʿšamit ʿet hāhār 'and I shall set the mountain', but I feel that the mountain is quite out of place here, and for mī ʿattāh har ('who art thou, o mountain') I would read kī nāʾatit hāʿeḥen 'For I have set the stone'. The LXX for setting upright' points to a verb such as ʿyāšār (Piel) for ʿmāšār ('for flatness'), and the LXX, Syr. and Vg 'equality' suggests a word from root (I) šāwāh, for which I would propose uʿšiwwāh 'and he will place it' from root (II) šāwāh. Further, the repeated hēn ('grace') offers for one of them the reading uʿhinnēh 'and behold'. I would therefore translate the reconstructed verse: 'For I have set the great stone before Zorobabel to erect straight, and he will bring out the top stone and will place it, and behold it has beauty'. This reconstruction preserves the theme of the building-stone throughout. If, however, we retain the reading 'mountain', it must be understood of obstacles to
- 1 Zorobabel's work, which will be smoothed out. 9. The promise to Zorobabel that he indeed will finish the work of rebuilding the temple, to be fulfilled 4 years and 1 month afterwards (3/12/515 Esd 6:15, cf. § 543c, f).
- 10. 'Little days', i.e. days of insignificant things, small beginnings. Those who once despaired will now rejoice. 'Tin plummet', lit. 'the stone, the tin' (in apposition). This is not the usual word for a plummet as in Am 7:7, and it stands awkwardly. Van H. reads habbādūl ('reserved') for habbādūl ('tin'), but I would suggest haggʿdōlāh, translating '... see the great stone (referred to above, and immediately afterwards) in the hand of Zorobabel'. This reading brings us easily to the stone with 7 eyes, which in turn leads us back to III 9b where Yahweh himself will engrave the 7 eyes, symbolizing his vigilance, and 'take away the iniquity of that land', i.e. Judah, 'in one day', i.e. quickly and completely. Jerome takes the stone itself, pierced, as a type of Christ, who will 'take away iniquity in one day'. 10 completes the whole with a picture of peace and prosperity in the Messianic age, with husbandmen calling to one another from under their fruitful trees.
- 548a V 1-4 6th Vision: The Flying Scroll—Yahweh's judgement on the thief and perjurer: part of the work of cleansing the land. Cf. the moral exhortations to truth, justice and mercy in 1:4; 7:5-10; 8:16-19, and see § 545e. 1. 'Volume', i.e. a scroll that can be rolled up. 2. Obviously here unrolled, showing its full dimensions: 30 × 15 ft. 3. 'Shall be judged as there is written', MT lit. 'has been cleared out (more frequently used of acquittal) from now according to it (mūzzeh kāmōhā)'. For this last Wellhausen proposed zeh kāmōhā ('how long?'), translating: 'How long has the thief gone unpunished?' 4. 'I have brought it forth, and it shall come ...'
- b 5-11 7th Vision: The Woman in the Barrel—Under another figure the iniquity of the land is removed. The evil woman in the barrel of iniquity is removed to Babylon, 'the proper home of all that is evil' (Driver). 6. 'Vessel', i.e. a grain measure or barrel, an ephah (RV) (ʿēpāh) = about 7 gallons (cf. § 82j). 'Their eye', lit. from Heb. ʿēnām. RV 'their resemblance' (Driver adduces Num 11:7 and Lev 13:5 for the meaning 'appearance', i.e. what appears to the eye), but much better read with LXX ʿuʿbām, and translate: 'This is their iniquity in all the land'. 7. 'Talent' Heb. kikkār = something circular (cf. RVm), perhaps simply the lid of the barrel, but the word came to be used regularly of the leaden weight, a talent (108-130 lbs), and all the Vss convey this. Barnes comments: 'Those who sinned by fraud are appropriately punished by measure and weight'. 8. 'Weight', lit. 'stone'. 9. It is probable that the two women have no special significance, but are merely a vivid part of the picture of the transportation of the barrel to Babylon. If, however, we adopt a mise en scène of 586 for this vision (v. § 545f), then they obviously represent the Babylonians. 'Kite', Vg milvus, which Jerome avers is the meaning of hʿšidāh, though LXX has 'hoopoe' and RV and BDB 'stork'. In other passages it is translated heron (LXX, Vg) or pelican (LXX), onocrotalus (a kind of pelican, Vg—DV bittern) or kite (Vg). 11. 'Sennaar', where Amraphel had been king (Gen 14:1), i.e. the territory of Babylon (so LXX here). It is either a symbol of all that is evil, or to be taken literally if the vision refers to 586.

VI 1-8 8th Vision: The 4 Chariots—God's chariots go forth to punish the oppressing nations. 1. The chariots come out from between the two mountains of brass. In v 5 we understand that they came from the presence of Yahweh. Barnes therefore suggests that the prophet is using a current Babylonian idea (reflected in the Koran ch 18) that a brazen or copper rampart divided earth and heaven. Others suggest that the article indicates a well-known image, or an unrecorded part of the 1st Vision (Driver), or that they stand for the 'brazen' strength of God's abode (Kennett, cf. Jerome), or the fabulous metallic wealth of remote regions (Van H.). 2-3. The 4 horses are bay, black, white and dappled ('spotted' of sheep in Gen 31:10, 12: Vg here has 'varii' as for the sorrel horse in 1:8. DV here 'grised' and 'speckled' in 1:8 for the sorrel horse). The dappled horses are also described as 'strong' (ʿmūssīm, only here and v 7, and probably a corrupt repetition of ʿdūmmīm 'bay', and so probably to be left out, as in Syr.). 5. 'Go forth from standing before the Lord'. 6. 'That in which were', MT lit. 'which in it'. These words have little connexion with the sentence and make little sense: probably they are corrupt copies of the preceding word and the following article: the participle ('went forth') after the horses is anyway plural. Read 'The black horses were going forth'. 6-7. The mission of the horses: (1) the black ones are going forth to the north, (2) the white ones to the west (I would read ʾahʿrōnāh, cf. Num 2:31, for the almost meaningless ʾahʿrēhem 'after them'), (3) the dappled ones to the south, and (4) the bay (reading ʿdūmmīm, cf. v 2, for ʿmūssīm 'strong'—the bay would otherwise be unmentioned) sought to walk about the earth. 8 & 8. 'The north' = Babylonia (cf. 2:6 § 546d), visited by the black horses, is singled out. The collapse of Babylonia at the hand of Cyrus in 538 springs to the mind, when Yahweh's wrath against Babylonia is 'quietened'. Other kingdoms have been assigned to the other horses, notably (if we retain 'after them') the white horses who went after the black (Cyrus) being identified with Alexander, those who went to the south with Egypt, and the bay (or strong) horses who went through all the earth, with the Romans (v. Challoner, following Jerome).

9-15 Concluding Prophecy: a Symbolic Action—Jesus the high-priest is to be crowned with crowns made from gold and silver belonging to returned exiles, as a sign of his priestly dignity and authority; and 548d (12) with him is to be united in the rule of the restored Jerusalem the man whose name is 'the Orient', who shall build the temple, i.e. Zorobabel. This again looks ahead to the Messianic hope of the New Jerusalem and its divine leader, Christ (18), uniting in himself the priestly and the kingly dignity (Jerome). Lastly, the nations shall contribute to the building of the new temple (cf. Agg 2:7 'the Desired of all nations', v. § 544g), which can hardly be understood but in the spiritual sense of the New Temple, the Church of Christ.

- 10. 'Of the captivity', i.e. of the body of the returned exiles: Holdai (who reappears in v 14 as Helem—both names otherwise unknown), Tobias, Idaias, and Josias the son of Sophonias (who reappears as Hem—Heb. hēm, which is probably a corrupt repetition of the following word ben 'son of', so in v 14 read simply 'and to the son of Sophonias'). 12. 'The Orient', semah, Messianic title as in 3:8 (q.v. & § 547f). The reference to Zorobabel as builder of the temple (cf. 4:9) is obvious here. 'Under him', a usual Heb. idiom for 'where he stands'. 'Spring up', a verb from the root of semah, 'a shoot', translated 'Orient'.
- 13. 'And he shall be a priest upon his throne'. For 'on his throne' read with LXX 'at his right hand', translating: 'And there shall be a priest (Jesus) at his (Zorobabel's) right hand, and the counsel of peace shall be between them both'. This last sentence, speaking of two people, bears out the LXX reading. The passage is important as representing the ideal government, with the 'counsel of peace' between priest and prince, Church and State, but the emendation from the LXX is necessary for its proper understanding.

FIRST PART B: An Enquiry and Its Answer VII-VIII

- 549a VII 1-3 The Occasion: an Officer's Enquiry about Fasting—1. The last date in Zach, 4/9 (Nov.-Dec.)/4 (518), exactly midway (2 years and 3 months) between the resumption of work on the temple at the insistence of Aggeus (24/6/520) and its completion (3/12/515), and just over 1½ years after the visions (see § 543c).
- 2. MT lit. 'And there sent Bēl-ēl (or, the house of God) Šar-ēser and Regem Melek and his men to entreat . . . LXX & Syr 'And there sent to Bethel . . . For Regem the LXX has various corruptions in various MSS, and Syr has Rabmāg. The place Bethel (as RV) is unthinkable. Van H. reads Beth-Israel, but Wellhausen's suggestion that it is the first component (the name of a deity) of the following Babylonian name Šar-ušur is very convincing. In Jer 39:3, 13 we have the name Nērgal-šar-ēser who has the title of Rab-mag among Babylonian officers, who are called Rabbē or Šārē hammelek 'officers of the king'. Nērgal is of course the name of a Babylonian deity. In this case we might suppose the first component was Baitil, the name of another deity. And for Regem we can read Rab, a usual word for a Babylonian officer. So the passage reads: 'And Baitil-šar-ušur, an officer of the king, and his men, sent to entreat . . . The sing. verb here and in v 3, and the sing. suffix 'his men', are thus also explained. The man must have been a Jew who had obtained a commission in the army during the exile, and returning to Jerusalem to the half-built temple, had a question about liturgical observance.
 - 3. 'Weep', i.e. ceremonial mourning observed on the 10th day of the 5th month (July-Aug.), the day of the destruction of the temple in 586 (Jer 52:12; 4 Kg 25:8); 'sanctifying myself', i.e. fasting (omit 'or' according to MT). His question is whether now that the temple is being rebuilt he must still observe the day of mourning over its destruction? Kennett remarks that it is odd that an enquiry is made in November about a fast-day in July, and suggests that the text should include the other fasts mentioned in 7:5 and 8:19, viz. 9/4 (Jerusalem taken Jer 52:6), 3/7 (Godolias murdered Jer 41:2—Barnes states that the 3rd day was only fixed in rabbinic times) and 10/10 (siege began 4 Kg 25:1).

VII 4-VIII 23 The Prophet's Answer: Truth and Mercy are more Important than Fasts—four sections, each introduced by 'And the word of the Lord came to Zacharias'.

VII 4-7 In the Past, were Fasts kept for God?—5. 'These 70 years', i.e. 68 since 586. 7. Did not the 'former prophets' (cf. 1:4) preach the same thing before the exile, 'when Jerusalem was as yet inhabited and quiet . . . and there were inhabitants towards the Negeb (proper name of S. Judah) and the Shephelah (a definite area, the lowlands [RV] W. of the Judæan mountains)'?

8-14 God commanded Truth and Mercy by the hand of the 'former prophets', and forbade evil devices in the heart (9-10) (this doctrine of Zach on intention is important, cf. NT teaching, see § 545e), but the people refused to obey; so God punished them with exile. In 11 'they gave a stubborn shoulder', same phrase in Neh 9:29. 'Stubborn' as in Os 4:16 of a heifer unwilling to work (DV 'wanton'); cf. the phrase 'to give the cold shoulder'.

VIII 1-17 And now God is giving Messianic Promises as an Incentive—He will no longer punish them (cf. § 545e). On the contrary he makes to them seven promises, each beginning 'Thus saith the Lord of hosts'. 2. 1st promise: Yahweh is zealous for Jerusalem. 3. 2nd promise: he is returning thither, with his presence in the temple. 'City of Truth', i.e. Faithfulness, from the same root as Isaia's well-known phrase 'the faithful city' (Is 1:21, 26). 4. 3rd promise: he will give prosperity in the Messianic age, longevity and offspring. 'Staff in his hand for very age' (RV): longevity as a sign of prosperity. 5. 'One of the very few indications in the OT of a love for children as such' (Kennett). 6. 4th promise: Yahweh assures them of his power to do this. 'Hard' in the sense of 'difficult'. 7. 5th promise: he will bring back the exiles to Jerusalem, 'and they shall be my people and I will be their God'—almost verbally Jer 7:23. 2 Cor 6:16 quotes either Zach or Jer. (Similar passages are Ex 6:7; Lev 26:12; Ez 37:23, 27; cf. Deut 27:9; Ps 32(33):12; 143(144):15). 9. 6th promise: he will bring prosperity instead of the curse of former days before the rebuilding of the temple had begun. 10-11. In those days unemployment and class-warfare were rife: now it will be so no longer. 12. 'But there shall be the seed of peace: the vine shall . . . A difficult passage. MT lit. 'For the seed of peace, the vine shall . . . The text as it stands can be translated by the insertion of a verb as in DV & RV, or else with the 'seed' and the 'vine' in apposition (as in the lit. trans. above). The LXX however for 'the seed of' (zera') has 'I will show', whence the word has been variously emended into a verb or participle: reading zārua' 'peace is sown' (Barnes); 'ezr'āh 'I will sow peace' (Wellhausen); zār'āhh šālōm 'her seed is peace'; but I would prefer 'ezr'ēhā b'šālōm 'I will sow her (the remnant) in peace' (cf. Zach 10:9 of 'sowing' the exiles among the nations); or perhaps reading yizrah 'peace will dawn'. 14. 7th promise: he will no longer afflict the people, but they must obey his commands to truth and mercy, and avoid evil in the heart and perjury. (Cf. 7:9-10 and also 1:4; 5:3-4, the Vision of the Scroll.)

18-23 The Answer to the Officer's Enquiry—19. The fasts (see note on 7:3 § 548e) shall be turned into holidays—'only love ye truth and mercy', which is much more important. 20 'Yet nations shall come' (reading 'ōd with LXX as in MT, but omitting 'ašer. Vg read 'ad 'ašer). 21-23. 'And the inhabitants of one (fem. sc. city) shall go to another (fem.)', and not only the land, but the Gentile nations shall come to worship Yahweh. This again is only fully understandable of the Church of Christ which embraces all nations.

SECOND PART A : The First 'Burden'

IX-XI with XIII 7-9

550a For the discussion of the authenticity and the date of this part of the book, see § 545j-g. For its distinct Messianism § 545d, for its literary forms § 545g. The general theme of chh 9-14 is that God will bring happiness and prosperity to Judah, especially with the advent of the Messianic King, but discomfiture or absorption to her enemies (9-10); yet Judah will reject her shepherd and have a bad ruler (11); but finally, though Jerusalem will be destroyed, she will yet be cleansed and restored, and the remnant of the nations will join her in adoring Yahweh (12-14).

b The precise interpretation of these various elements is difficult, for there is much prophetic 'foreshortening' in the time-perspective, from the past events of 586, through the present of the restoration of the Jewish nation and worship, to the future settling of the country, the further future of Christ the Redeemer and the New Jerusalem, his Church, and the remote future of his second coming in the calamitous end of the world. These various perspectives must be kept in mind when reading these chapters. Although the identification of particular persons and events is difficult, the symbolic meaning of the whole, the final triumph of God's cause and of right in the world, and the defeat of evil, is plain enough (cf. § 545r). The first 'Burden' falls into two parts with an interlude. Ch 9 is textually the most difficult in the book.

c IX-X The Triumph of Judah.

IX 1-8 Prophecies against Various Cities of Palestine, as a prelude to that on Jerusalem (cf. Am 1:3-2:3 as a prelude). 1-4 mention cities of Syria, 5-7 Philistine cities of SW. Judaea.

d 1. 'Burden', prophecy or (RVm) oracle, a common title in prophecy (Is, Jer, Ez, Nah, Zach, Mal), Heb. maššā', from the verb nāsā' 'to lift up' (the voice), distinct from maššā' a burden (that is lifted up). Perhaps here it stands alone as a title (see translation below). Among the Syrian cities, 'Hadrach' is found only here, and is usually identified with Hatarika, an area of Syria mentioned in Assyrian inscriptions, or with Hazrach of an Aramaic inscription. For 'the eye of a man' 'ēn 'ādām, we should doubtless read (with Klostermann) 'ārē 'ārām 'the cities of Aram (Syria)'—a generally accepted emendation. For 'Israel' yisrā'ēl (which seems irrelevant) the reading šm'el 'left', i.e. 'north', has been suggested. So the reconstructed verse reads:

'An Oracle.

*The word of Yahweh is upon Hadrach,
And Damascus is his resting-place;
For to Yahweh belong the cities of Syria
And all the tribes of the North (or Israel).*

e 2. Either (1) translate MT 'Emath (Hamath) also shall border on her', or else (2) follow LXX and Vg, reading big'būlāhh 'within her border', the sense being (in either case) that even this city in the very north of Palestine will border on Yahweh's land. But (3) Kennett's reading 'Emath and G'bal' (cf. Ez 27:9), a Syrian city on the coast=Byblus (one of the four provinces of Phoenicia) is attractive. The Syrian cities mentioned are therefore Hadrach, Damascus, Hamath, (Gebal), Tyre and Sidon. 3-4. The vast riches of Tyre and Sidon shall also belong to Yahweh. These were the centres of Phoenician trade, which prospered greatly under Persian rule (EBCB art. Phoenicia). Tyre was captured by Alexander in 332, and some understand the impending disaster of this event (§ 545p); but the general idea that the great kingdoms of the earth will have no future in the Messianic age can be taken as a purely symbolic meaning.

f 5-8. The Philistine cities near the coast will also fall under Yahweh's judgement. Four cities are mentioned: Ascalon, Gaza, Accaron (Ekron), Azotus (Ashdod); the fifth, Geth (Gath), had apparently ceased to exist after the Assyrian invasions of the 8th cent. and is not mentioned after Am 6:2 and Mic 1:10. But the cities mentioned here continued in prosperity, first as vassals of the Babylonians and then of the Persians. A vassal-king at Gaza (5) is still named in Babylonian times, and Herodotus (c 450) describes the city as very prosperous (EBCB art. Philistines, Gaza). 6. 'The divider shall sit' (Vg 'separator'), Heb. mamzēr, only here and Deut 23:2 among those forbidden entry to the church or assembly. It is usually understood to mean a 'bastard' (DV there has 'mamzer' with explanation), so here 'a bastard race (RVm) or half-breed shall dwell in Azotus' (cf. LXX). One of the calamities that will befall Philistia: and indeed from the beginning they seem to have mixed with the local population, a mixture probably increased by the invasions from the east (EBCB, ibid.). 7. 'Abomination': Ez 33:25 speaks of the heathen inhabitants of Palestine during the exile committing various abominations, including eating the blood of their victims. 'Governor' 'allūp: probably should be pointed 'elep, translating: 'He (Azotus) shall be as a tribe in Judah' (Driver), which is completed by the parallel sentence: 'And Accaron as a Jebusite', i.e. treated as a fellow citizen, as were the Jebusites in Jerusalem before the time of King David (Jos 15:63). The difficulty is to see clearly the fate of the Philistines: Syria is to be struck by Yahweh and her wealth appropriated, while Philistia shall fear, lose her king, her race and religion, and apparently be incorporated into Judah.

g 8. MT 'And I will encamp for my house miššābāh from one passing and returning'. BDB suggests a noun (cf. maššāb) meaning garrison, translating: 'I will encamp as a watch for my house' (cf. RVm), but for 'encamp' hānīš, read hinnahtī (Hiph. of nāh) 'set' (cf. LXX 'leave posted'), translating: 'I will establish a garrison for my house, from those who pass and return' (i.e. the occupants of the land): for Jerusalem is now mistress of Palestine, and uses the inhabitants for her own purposes. The Vg DV AV and RV are attempts to translate miššābāh as if it were miššābā' ('from an army') 'For now I am watching': the perfect in Heb. here expressing conditions acquired before, but of which the effects still remain in the present (GK 106g).

h 9-10 The Messianic Hope for Jerusalem—Here the thought suddenly broadens out from the narrow sphere of Palestinian affairs to the Messianic idea of world peace, and the King 'who will come to thee, poor, and riding upon an ass'. 'From, the Jewish hopes opens the universal destiny for all men; . . . the prophets . . . no longer speak only to their own race, but speak a sign of contradiction to the whole world (sono contraddittori che parlano al mondo)', Paolo Orano, Ebrei in Italia (Rome, 1937) 33-4. The Saviour-King who will be poor is indeed a contradiction to the previous verses, as was his entry into Jerusalem the Jewish hopes of the time, founded on too literal an interpretation of the prophets' foretelling of the final victory of Judah. Indeed, the mystery of the combination of mightiness and lowliness was not to be fulfilled until Christ himself. Mt 21:5 quotes this passage, combined with Is 62:11, 'Tell the daughter of Zion, behold thy Saviour cometh'. Note that Mt 21:2 has two animals as in Zach, and that the ass and colt already appear in the Messianic passage about Judah in Gen 49:11. The verse 'Exulta satis . . .' is used in the Liturgy as Communion-verse at Christmas (2nd Mass), and Offertory on the 3rd Sunday of Advent. 9. 'Saviour' Niph. Ptcp. lit. 'having been saved', i.e. 'victorious' (Driver), otherwise follow LXX and Vg, reading mōšīā' Hiph. Ptcp. 'saviour' (of God in Is 43:11; 45:15, 21; 63:8). 10. The Age of Peace. 'The River', i.e. the Euphrates, the edge of the civilized world.

i 11-X 12 The Triumph of Judah—The exiles shall all return, and Judah, in spite of her past infidelities, shall have victory and prosperity. This brings us back to Palestinian affairs, and the general idea of God's victory.

550l 11-12 The Return of the Exiles—'Blood of thy testament', i.e. the daily sacrifices, by whose intercession the remaining captives are returning. MT 'I have sent forth'. The sharp contrast between the desolation of a waterless pit, and the hope that the captives should have in God, who will restore them to a double prosperity.

12-16 The Victory of Judah—It is not patent who the vanquished are. They may be identified with various oppressors (§ 545i-9), or may be a pure symbol of the forces of evil, while Judah and Ephraim stand for the power of good. Such a symbolical interpretation makes Zacharias's message a message for every age (cf. § 545r). 13. The famous reference to the Greeks: 'For I have bent my bow, O Judah, I have filled it (i.e. fitted the arrow), O Ephraim: and I will rouse thy sons, O Sion, against the sons of Greece'. 'Sons of' cf. LXX. 'Greece' Heb. Yāwān, i.e. Ionians. The name occurs in Is Dan Ez and Jo among the prophets, but its presence here, evidently indicating a power hostile to Judah, is difficult to explain in a passage written even as early as 480 or 479 when the Greek victories over the Persians, although in fact showing the first assertion of Greek power, can nevertheless hardly be considered to constitute a threat to the nations of the East. The phrase certainly suggests a background of the time of Alexander the Great (c 333) or of the Seleucids in Maccabean times (c 170), and this is one of the elements in the arguments for a late date for these chapters (cf. § 455p, q). If, however, we date this part of the book in the old age of Zacharias, c 480 (cf. § 545k), although the reference to Greek power is just conceivable, it is much more likely that the phrase is a marginal gloss inserted at a later age to give point to the prophecy. This view is strongly supported by considerations of metre and parallelism in that verse, which without the gloss would run as follows:

*I have bent my bow, O Judah—I have filled it, O Ephraim:
I will rouse thy sons, O Sion—I will make thee as a sword of a hero*

Cf. Van H. in loc., who, however, follows Vg (and DV) in taking Judah and Ephraim as accusatives, standing for the bow and arrow respectively.

15. 'With stones of the sling': 'with' is not in HT, but is rightly suggested in LXX. 'They shall be inebriated', hāmū 'they have made a noise' (cf. RV), but tense and sense are unsuitable. LXX (B) has 'them' (hēmināh), and LXX (A) has 'their blood' (dammām), according to which we can translate: 'And they shall drink them (or their blood) like wine'. 'Bowls' lit. 'tossing-vessels' AV 'basins' (Ex 27:3; 38:3 where DV 'fleshhooks'), temple utensils in which the blood of the sacrificial victims was collected and tossed against the sides of the altar, thus drenching also the 'horns' (EBCB art. Sacrifice 26, cf. Lev 1:5). The use of these sacrificial words supports the reading 'their blood' above. The whole verse is a wild metaphor, 'but it reflects, no doubt, the animus with which a people that had suffered much regarded its oppressors' (Driver). 16. 'Yahweh . . . will deliver them, his people, like a flock'. 'For holy stones' (ʾāp̄nē-ṣēṣer: stones of consecration) are lifted up'. Van H.: 'les mots ne disent rien du tout', but many explanations have been attempted: royal or priestly crowns (cf. RV), magic charms, etc. Van H. reads ʾābād nōšēr, 'the guardian has perished', but I think that less violent and more suitable is bʾnē-ṣēṣer 'foreigners' (as in Is 56-62, Ez, Nehl). I would also derive miṣnōš-šōf (lifted up) from the root nās to flee (cf. Ps 59[60] 6), though it is usually connected with nēs 'an ensign' and so considered to mean 'lifted up'. Read of course the masculine miṣnōš-šīm and another mem for the preposition 'from'. I would therefore translate: 'For foreigners are fled from upon his land'—the final relief at the departure of the invaders.

m IX 17-X 2a The Prosperity of the Land after its Deliverance—17. 'For how great is his (Yahweh's) goodness, and how great is his beauty! Corn shall make the young men flourish, and new wine the maids' (RV). 'Spring forth' from the root 'to fructify, hence, to flourish'.

'Elect' baḥūrtm, a usual word for 'young men' (i.e. choice, in their prime). X 1. 'Rain in the latter season' malqōš=rain in Mar-Apr., as opposed to yārah or mōreh=rain in November. 'Snows', hāzifīm only here and Job 28:26; 38:25 variously translated by LXX and Vg as 'phantasies', earthquakes, uproar, snows, storms, thunder. Probably=lightning (RV). 2a. 'Diviners have seen a lie and told idle dreams'. X 2b-7 God was Angry at the People's Past Infidelity, but now will give them the Victory—3. 'Shepherds': chief leaders; 'buck-goats': subordinate leaders. 4. 'Corner stone . . . tent peg' as essentials (cf. figure of the priest in Is 22:23-25). 'Exacter'=ruler even in a good sense. 6. 'And will answer them'.

8-12 God will assemble the Exiles and make them o Prosper—10. The exiles are to be gathered both from 'Assyria' (an archaism for Babylonia, see § 545i, k, o, unless it refers to those deported in 722) and from Egypt. In fact, during the exile, after Godolias the governor appointed by the Babylonians had been assassinated as a 'collaborator' by Jewish partisans, many of these, in spite of Jeremiah's warnings, fled into Egypt for fear of reprisals by the Babylonians (4 Kg 25:26, and in full detail Jer 41:17 to 44:30, with a prophecy of the calamities to come upon Egypt and the return of a remnant 44:28). 'Galaad and Libanus': an archaism for Palestine. 'Place shall not be found' because of their multitude (cf. 2:4). 11. MT lit. ' . . . pass over the sea, straitness' (apposition). Many would read for šārāh ('straitness') Miṣrayim ('Egypt'), and translate: 'over the sea of Egypt'. 'The River' yōr (without article), almost a proper name for the Nile. (Cf. 9:10 for Euphrates.) 12. 'Shall walk' yihallākū: probably we should read with LXX yihallālū 'shall glory'.

XI 1-3 Interlude: The Destruction of the Forests— 551a

A difficult fragment to place. The destruction of Palestine does not seem to attach to the preceding or to the following themes. It is probable that the cedar is merely a symbol of height, and the oak of might (cf. Am 2:9), the shepherds of leadership and the lions of strength, to be applied to the oppressors, the place-names being irrelevant and merely adding colour to the metaphor.

2. 'The fenced forest', lit. 'cut off', i.e. 'inaccessible' (Driver), on the steep hillsides of Libanus. 3. 'The pride of the Jordan': its thick undergrowth once the lair of lions. The same phrase occurs in Jer 12:5; 44:19; 50:44 (DV AV, 'swelling'), in the last two places, also connected with lions.

XI 4-17 with XIII 7-9 The Shepherds (two parables enacted by the prophet)—Driver: 'This prophecy is the most enigmatic in the OT'.

XI 4-7a The Task of the Good Shepherd—God addresses Zacharias who is to play the part of the shepherd appointed by God. 4. Jerome's paraphrase: 'Feed the flock of the slaughter, i.e. now let it prosper and grow, for soon it will be killed by enemies, the Romans who have taken possession of it and own it by right of victory. They will kill the sheep, and sell what they have spared not through pity, but through desire of the price of them'. He adds that these things came about in the time of Hadrian (i.e. after the rejection of Christ). That the shepherd is a type of Christ is shown by the NT use of vv 11 and 12 (q.v.). The immediate identification of the shepherd and the owners (v 5) or buyers (vv 7, 11 emended) depends entirely upon the theory held about the mise en scène (586, post-exilic, 330 or Maccabean) or purely symbolic interpretation (§ 545f, l-r). The owners may be (1) foreign oppressors (Babylonians, Persians, Alexander or Seleucids), or (2) the very heads of Israel who betray the people, or (3) in general, God's enemies past, present or future. Similarly the shepherd may be (1) Yahweh himself, who permits the castigation by the oppressor, or (2) a good leader (e.g. Onias for the Maccabean scene), or (3) simply the symbol of 551b God's goodness in the world. In every interpretation the Good Shepherd is rejected, and thus is a type of Christ.

6 5. The verbs in MT are confused between sing. and plur. (DV all plur.), probably due to the fact that sing. and plur. forms for 'shepherd' and 'owner' with suffixes are often identical (GK 935s). 'Blessed be the Lord' is either cynical, or (Kennett) a euphemism for 'cursed', i.e. we don't care. 7a. 'For this, O ye poor of the flock' lāḵēn 'anīyyē haṣṣ'ōn; LXX 'into Canaan', which suggests lik'na 'anīyyē haṣṣ'ōn 'for the buyers of the flock' ('Canaanites' frequently for merchants, e.g. 14:21). This emendation is generally accepted.

d 7b-11 The Symbolic Action of the Shepherd—7b. The two shepherd's staves are named 'Beauty' and 'hōb'īm', lit. 'Ropes'. hebel frequently means 'a plot of land', measured by rope—so LXX here. BDB 'union', Van H. liaison, i.e. a tying together (RV 'bands', RVm 'binders'). Kennett compares the naming of the staves with the modern cartoon where objects are symbolically inscribed. 8. The identification of the three shepherds cut off in one month is very difficult, and again depends on the mise en scène. Three worthless leaders with very short reigns, or a short-lived ruling clique, are sought. For pre-722, Zacharias, Sellum and Manahem (4 Kg 15) are proposed; for pre-586 Joakim, Joachin and Sedecias; or Joachaz (Sellum), Joakim and Joachin (Jechonias) (4 Kg 23-24; Jer 22) (Van H.); for Persian times three unknown high-priests (Driver); for Maccabean times, Jason, Menelaus and Lysimachus (2 Mac 4); or the sons of Tobias; or the satellites of Simon the Benjamite who fought against Onias (2 Mac 3) (Kennett). Others suggest three foreign powers, such as the Assyrians, Babylonians and Persians, or the Persians, Greeks and Romans; or else three oppressing kings, such as the three Seleucid emperors of Maccabean times who all met their death within a month of (i.e. 30) years: Antiochus Epiphanes, Antiochus Eupator and Demetrius I (Wright). Lastly it may be that no identification is intended—'part of the furniture of the allegory' (Kirkpatrick)—or that the meaning is wholly allegorical, of e.g. the triple power of king, priest and prophet, brought to an end by Christ, the Good Shepherd. (For all this, see Driver, p 254.) 'My soul was shortened, i.e. impatient in their regard, and their soul felt loathing in my regard'.

10. The symbolic action of the breaking of the staff 'Beauty', thus making void 'my covenant which I had made with all the peoples' (RV). The action signifies 'that the covenant which he (Yahweh) had (metaphorically) made with the nations that they should not molest Israel was now annulled' (Driver). The breaking of the first staff is therefore the sign for calamities to come upon Israel from without, just as the breaking of the second staff (v 14) heralds disruption and tribulations from within. 11. 'The poor of the flock' read 'the buyers' as in v 7. 'That keep for me' hāṣṣōm'rim 'ōfi 'that were watching me' (BDB), but Van H. reads cleverly hāṣṣōk'rim 'ōfi '(the buyers) that were hiring me' (cf. next verse).

f 12-13 The Rejection of the Good Shepherd—These verses, quoted in Mt 26:15 and 27:9 show the typical interpretation of Christ to be authentic. 12. 'They weighed for my wages' LXX ērronaw 'appointed', and thus quoted by Mt. 30 ḡqālīm = about £4-£6. 13. 'Statuary' yōšēr i.e. modeller, usually of clay, i.e. 'potter' (RV). LXX has 'foundry', Syr. 'treasury' whence some propose the reading 'ōšār. 'Cast it to the potter—the magnificent price at which I was priced by them!' (cf. WV on Mt 27:9). The reference to the potter is enigmatic, but the buying of the 'potter's field' (Haceldama) (Mt 27:7) is regarded as its fulfilment.

g 14 His Second Symbolic Action—He breaks the staff 'Union', thus symbolically breaking the union of the flock.

h 15-17 with XIII 7-9 The Prophet acts the Part of the Foolish Shepherd—In so far as the Good Shepherd is a type of Christ, Jerome's opinion that this shepherd stands for Antichrist seems correct. Not only will he mislead the flock, but in the end he will be smitten and only a remnant of the flock will be saved (see esp. the continuation of this prophecy in 13:7-9). If an immediate historical identification is sought, it will follow those of the shepherds of vv 4 & 8 (q.v.). For 586 Sedecias is proposed, who was the last king of Judah and fled from the besieged city (4 Kg 25; Jer 21) (Van H.); or for post-exilic times an unknown high-priest; or for Maccabean times Jason or Menelaus.

15. 'Instruments' k'li often used for 'things', i.e. 'accoutrements'. 16. 'Scattered', correctly reading hanniddahat (cf. Ez 34:4) for the impossible hanna'ar. 'Which standeth', i.e. in good health. 'Break their hoofs' either to prevent them walking, for fattening (Van H.), or else by driving them cruelly over rough places. 17. 'O shepherd of worthlessness': Vg's 'idol' follows a particular use of 'ill for a 'worthless god'. This verse, on the fate of the Foolish Shepherd, with its reference to the sword, so obviously attaches to 13:7, where the subject of the shepherd's fate by the sword is resumed, that one does not hesitate to consider 13:7-9 displaced. XIII 7. 'The man that cleaveth to me', lit. 'a man, my companion', i.e. the leader of my people. 'Strike the shepherd...' is quoted by Christ (at Gethsemani) in Mt 26:31; Mk 14:27. It is an 'accommodation', i.e. merely an apt quotation, for of course the foolish shepherd is not a type of the Redeemer. NT has 'I will strike', a reading of 3 codices of the LXX in Zach, and probably right; cf. 'I will turn' which follows. 'Against the little ones', i.e. the flock, who shall be destroyed except for a remnant who will remain faithful. This picture of the work of Antichrist coincides esp. with that of Mt 24; Mk 13; 1 Jn 2; Apoc 11:7 ff.

SECOND PART B: The Second 'Burden' XII-XIV less XIII 7-9

XII (1) Jerusalem shall fall, yet she shall triumph— 552a

Again the prophetic perspective is difficult to see (cf. § 550b): the earthly Jerusalem shall indeed suffer, and the nations with her, but she shall rise as the New Jerusalem of Christ 'coming down out of heaven from God' (Apoc 21:2, 10), symbolized in the warlike triumph of this chapter. Or again, if the earthly Jerusalem represents the Church of Christ, then the reference is to the Church's suffering and martyrdom amid the torments of the world, to be replaced by Christ's final victory.

1-3 The Fall of Jerusalem will be a Calamity to the Nations—1. 'Burden': title, see on 9:1. 2. 'Lintel of surfeiting', sap ra'al. There are two words sap: (1) cup, (2) threshold. The root ra'al means 'to tremble, totter, reel'. LXX has here 'tottering porches'; Barnes 'quaking threshold'; RV 'cup of reeling' (Driver & Van H. understand of intoxicating drink, Barnes of the cup of God's wrath that causes men to stagger, if the sense 'cup' is right), cf. Is 51:17, 22 kōs tar'ēlāh 'cup of reeling' (RV) (DV 'cup of deep sleep'). Be it in the sense of an intoxicating cup or of a dangerous place to stand on, her fall will wreck the nations. 'And Judah also...', MT 'And also against Judah'. Vg rightly omits 'against', giving a sense consonant with v 7 and 14:14, where even Judah joins in the fight against Jerusalem. 3. Jerome says that still in his time many Palestinian villages kept a heavy stone for weight-lifting contests.

4-9 Jerusalem shall triumph—Note the reiterated phrase 'In that day' in each of these promises of victory (vv 4, 6, 8, 9), and cf. the formula in the promises of ch 8. 5. 'Let the inhabitants... be strengthened for me', lit. 'be a strength for me', but the usage is doubtful. Probably for 'amāh if we should read 'ems'āh (with Stade, BDB cf. LXX) 'may I be found sufficient for the inhabitants'. 6. 'Fire-

553e brand amongst cul corn. 8. 'That hath offended', Vg 'offenderit', i.e. 'stumbled'. 'As David', i.e. as strong and valiant. These references to David (vv 7, 8, 10, 12; 13:1) suggest that the ruling house was still that of David (and of Zorobabel): § 545i, k.

d 10-14 But they shall mourn over the Rejected Messias

—In all the triumph of the New Jerusalem there will remain the note of mourning as a reminder, like the wounds in the Body of the Risen Christ, or the permanent Crucifix in our churches. 10. 'They shall look on me whom they have pierced': quoted (with 'on him' 'ēlāw probably rightly for 'ēlay 'on me') in Jn 19:37 after the death of Christ, with reminiscences of Zach in Apoc 1:7. Note that Jn quotes from HT, not from LXX which here has 'insulted' for 'pierced'. If we follow Jn's reading 'on him', we can understand the passage of a person of whom God is speaking. 12:10-11 with 13:6-7 is the Lesson of the Votive Mass of the Passion or of the Five Wounds. 'Plangent eum quasi unigenitum' is used at Lauds on Holy Saturday (2nd ant.) and on the Compassion of Our Lady (5th ant.). 11. Adadremmon is a place otherwise unknown, in the valley of Mageddon (Megiddo). 2 Par 35:22-25 mentions the death of King Josias near Mageddon and the lamentations that had become an institution in Israel. 12-13. The royal house of David, and of Nathan son of David, and the priestly houses of Levi and of Semei, grandson of Levi. One recalls the position of Zorobabel and Jesus in Aggeus and the first part of Zach, and notes the mention of Nathan as interesting, since in the Gospel genealogies of Zorobabel, Mt traces the line to David through Solomon, but Lk through Nathan (cf. § 543f, h). The separation of the men and women was part of the penitential solemnity (cf. Ex 19:15 before the giving of the Law).

553a XIII 1-6 (II) The Cleansing of Jerusalem.

XIII 1-3 Idolatry and Magic shall be cast out—1.

'There shall be a spring'. 'For the washing . . .', lit. 'For sin and for uncleanness' (RV). The latter word is niddāh, cf. in Num 19:9, 13, 20, 21 bis 'the water of niddāh' in ceremonial purification (RV 'separation', DV variously 'aspersion, expiation, purification'). The sense is that the city shall be purified of both moral and ceremonial transgression. 2. 'False' is inserted, after LXX & Vg 'pseudoprophetas'. 3. 'Prophecy', i.e. in the manner of the false prophets. In the Law (Deut 13:6-9, 18:20) a false prophet is punished with death, and his own family are to be the first to denounce him.

b 4-6 The ex-Prophet shall turn Husbandman—4.

The prophet shall be 'confounded', i.e. 'ashamed of his own vision', and 5. he will abandon his profession and take to husbandry, 'for Adam is my example' kf 'ādām hiqnani, lit. 'for a man (or Adam) acquired (?) me' (Hiph. of qānāh 'possess' only here). LXX has 'begot me', which shows that the text is doubtful, though it may be that LXX is merely associating this passage with 'I have possessed a man' in Gen 4:1 (birth of Cain). Most would read with Wellhausen kf 'ādāmāh qinyāni 'for the earth has been my possession'. 6. 'These wounds in the midst of thy hands', lit. 'between thy hands', i.e. arms, i.e. on thy breast? The text is used, in an accommodated sense (i.e. the ex-prophet is in no way a type of Christ: cf. §§ 102b, 551j) of Christ in the Liturgy (Lesson of the Votive Mass of the Passion or of the Five Wounds). Perhaps it is, in the literal sense, connected with the self-inflicted wounds of ecstatic prophets, cf. the enactment of a parable by a prophet in 3 Kg 20:25-43, or the prophets of Baal at their sacrifice in 3 Kg 18:28 (Van H. & Barnes after Marti).

c 7-9 Conclusion of the Fate of the Foolish Shepherd —Generally regarded as attaching to 11:17, because of the continuation of the ideas and vocabulary from there. These verses are commented with ch 11 (§ 551h, j).

554a XIV (III) The Day of the Lord—In this last prophecy are gathered together the Messianic notions of the victory of Judah (11-12), and the earthly Jerusalem itself rebuilt (10), with the restored worship of Yahweh at Jerusalem, in which the nations will take part (16-21), by 'compensation' eschatologically identified with the New Jerusalem that will rise after the calamities of the Last Day (1-5), when the Day of the Lord will dawn, the day of everlasting light (6-9, see exegesis of 6). If we understand Jerusalem in the Messianic spiritual sense of the Church of Christ, then calamities to the Church at the end of time are foreshadowed, when even her own people (Judah 14) will fight against her, but in the end, when the Day comes, she will be transformed into the New Jerusalem of Heaven (cf. §§ 550b, 552a and 545d). If we seek to identify the events historically, the matter will depend once more on the period of the mise en scène (see § 545l-r).

1-5a The Capture of Jerusalem and the Flight of the People—1.

'A Day is coming for the Lord'. The idea of the Day of Yahweh includes the eschatological calamities gradually turning into the everlasting Day (cf. Mal ch 4, § 555i). 3-4. These apocalyptic vv are used on Advent Ember-Wednesday at Matins (3rd Resp.). 4. 'A very great valley'. 5a. MT lit. 'And you shall flee to the valley of my mountains, for the valley of the mountains shall reach unto 'āsal'. Vg read 'eslō 'unto next-to-it', which explains DV and is probably the best reading. RV follows LXX and translates as an unknown proper name. For 'my mountains' hārāi Wellhausen suggested hinnōm: 'Flee to the Valley of Hinnom (Gehenna)', which lay to the SW. of the city. The earthquake referred to is mentioned in Am 1:1 and occurred c 750 B.C.

5b-9 The Coming of the Lord—Phrases from these verses appear in the Advent Liturgy: in the Communion verse for Ember Friday (see note on v 6), and on Sundays I (Lauds 3rd ant.) and II (Matins 2nd Resp.). 5b. 'And all the holy ones with him' (MT 'with thee') is usually taken to mean the angels. 6. A difficult verse. MT lit. 'There shall not be light yqārōt ('precious' fem. pl.) uf qippā'ōn ('and congelation', or Ktīb yiqpā'ūn 'shall congeal'). LXX & Vg read for yqārōt a word related to qār 'cold', probably a better reading. Most other attempts (such as AV RV RVm) connect 'precious' with 'glorious' or 'bright' and refer to the stars. The next verse, however, far from suggesting darkness or night, speaks of perpetual light. In fact the liturgical text (Adv. Emb. Fri. Comm.) differs greatly from Vg and reads 'Et erit in die illa lux magna'. On the basis of all this I am inclined to reject the negative and consider the two difficult words as a doubled corruption of a word such as gādōl 'great' (cf. Is 9:2), translating: 'And it shall come to pass in that day, that there shall be a great light; (7) and there shall be one day . . . not day nor night', i.e. the eternal light of the Messianic age, when the Kingdom of Christ is fully arrived. If we retain the negative, the passage must be explained (with Jerome) by Is 60:19 'Not the sun, but the Lord, will be your light'. 8. 'East sea', i.e. the sea 'in front', the Dead Sea. 'Western sea', i.e. the sea 'behind' (DV 'last sea'), the Mediterranean. Hebrew compass-points assume that one faces east.

10-11 The Restoration of Judah and Jerusalem—10.

'And he shall encompass all the land, even to the 'Arābāh (almost a proper name for the barren part of the lower Jordan valley), from Gabaa (Jos 21:17-6 m. NE. of Jerusalem) to Remmon (Neh 11:29-35 m. SW.). This describes the Kingdom of Judah. Now the city: 'From the gate of Benjamin (N.—Jer 37:12 road to Babylon), past the former gate, to the corner gate (NW.—Jer 31:38; 4 Kg 14:13; 2 Par 26:9); from the Tower of Hananeel (NE.—Jer 31:38 (mis-spelt in DV); Neh 3:1; 12:38), to the king's vinepresses (SE.—probably in the "king's garden" by Siloe Neh 3:15). Cf. the description of the wall in Neh 3.

12-15 The Discomfiture of the Nations that fought against Jerusalem—13.

'Take the hand', i.e. to kill 554e him. 14. Even Judah is in the fight against Jerusalem at the end: see above § 554a, and cf. 12:2 (Vg & DV) and 12:7, although here (as in 12:2) the meaning may be 'at Jerusalem' (RVm), perhaps fighting for her.

f 16-21 The Remnant of the Nations shall adore the Lord—The most striking exposition of the universal Messianism of the second part of Zach (see § 545d), only fully intelligible of the Church of Christ embracing all nations (cf. § 545e, and esp. 2:11; 8:22-23). 16. 'The Feast of Tabernacles', i.e. Sukkot or Booths, in early October, commemorating the homeless wandering in the wilderness (Lev 23:39-43). 17. 'No rain', a major calamity to an agricultural population. 18. 'If the family of Egypt go not up, nor come (omit with LXX in MT "neither shall it be"), upon them shall be the destruction wherewith . . .'. 19. 'This shall be the sin-offering' (cf. the use of niddah in 13:1). 20. MT lit. 'In that day upon m'sillôt the horses holy to the Lord': m'sillôt 'things that tinkle' (BDB), so

RV 'bells', part of the bridle (which is the translation of LXX & Vg). For 'at upon', probably read kôl 'all': 'all the bells of the horses shall be holy', but RV takes 'holy to the Lord' as an inscription on the bells; cf. on the high-priest's mitre (Ex 28:36-38). Some would avoid both the bells and the horses (sûs), which indeed seem rather unlikely in the context of temple utensils, and read 'at mašlîṭ (a word invented from root šālāh 'roast': I would prefer šēlāhôt 'dishes' as in 2 Par 35:13) u'str, translating: 'On the dishes and pots "Holy to the Lord"'. In other words, so widespread will be the worship of Yahweh that the commonest things will be used in his service, and the liturgical ceremonies of Jerusalem will require a multitude of utensils. 21. 'Merchant' Heb. Canaanite, cf. emendation in 11:7, 11 (§ 551c). The meaning is either that foreigners (Canaanites) shall be excluded, or else traffickers in the sense of those whom our Lord himself drove out from the House of God. Jerome decided in favour of the latter.

MALACHIAS

(MALACHI)

By E. F. SUTCLIFFE, S.J.

555a Bibliography—St Jerome, Commentarii in Malachiam Prophetam, PL 25, 1541 ff.; L. Reinke, Der Prophet Malachi (1856); J. Knabenbauer, S.J., cf. § 409b; Van Hoonacker, cf. § 409b; C. Lattey, S.J., The Book of Malachy, WV, 1934; E. F. Sutcliffe, S.J., Malachy's Prophecy of the Eucharistic Sacrifice, IER 5 Ser 19 (1922) 502-13; *J. M. Powis Smith, The Book of Malachi, ICC, 1912.

b The Name and Person of the Prophet—It cannot be said for certain that there was a prophet with the personal name of Malachias. St Jerome in the Prologue to his commentary on the book mentions, and himself adopts, the opinion of the Jews that the author was Esdras, PL 25, 1541 f. The Aramaic paraphrase of Pseudo-Jonathan inserts the name of Esdras in the first verse, and the LXX in place of Malachias has 'of his messenger'. It thus appears that early Jewish tradition retained no memory of a prophet named Malachias, a strange fact if a prophet of that name exercised his ministry after the exile and was the last of the long line of prophets before the coming of John the Baptist. On the other hand analogy suggests that the title of the book must contain a personal name, and, as such, 'Malachy' of MT is quite suitable. Etymologically it could mean 'my messenger', but a child would not be given a name with such a meaning. The LXX and the Vg have the form Malachias, which supposes the Hebrew to be an abbreviation for 'Messenger of Yahweh', just as Phalti, 2 Kg 25:44, is an abbreviation of Phaltiel, 2 Kg 3:15. There is no probability in the suggestion that the name has its origin in 3:1; and that there was no firm tradition among the Jews concerning Esdras' authorship is shown by the attribution of the book to Mardochai in the Babylonian Talmud, Megillah 15a.

c Date of the Book—All are agreed that Malachias flourished after the Exile, and was the last of the prophets whose writings are preserved in the OT. The name of pehah given to the governor of Judea, 1:8, agrees with the usage of the Persian period, but the word occurs earlier, Jer 51:28. The similarity, and in part, the identity of the abuses which Malachias on the one hand and Esdras and Nehemias on the other strove to correct point to the prophet having laboured about the same period as they. But there is considerable divergence of opinion among writers who attempt to fix the time of his activity more exactly.

According to the traditional and more common opinion Esdras returned to Jerusalem in the 7th year of Artaxerxes I, 459-458 B.C., and continued his labours until the arrival of Nehemias in the 20th year of the same Persian king in 446-445 B.C., Neh 3:1; 8:2. In the 32nd year of Artaxerxes I, Nehemias returned to court, Neh 13:6, and later again came back to Jerusalem, Neh 13:7. If we start from the return of the exiles under Cyrus, 537-536 B.C., it is possible to exclude certain periods for the activity of Malachias. In his time the Temple had been rebuilt, 1:10, but this rebuilding was not completed until the 6th year of Darius I, 516-515 B.C., Esd 6:15. Moreover the neglect of divine worship and the contempt of the altar rebuked by Malachias, 1:7, would not have been possible for a number of years after the dedication of the Temple, which had been celebrated with enthusiasm, Esd 6:16.

The period immediately following the reform of Esdras may also be excluded, as he caused the people to put away their foreign wives, Esd 10, and the reform must have had some lasting effect. However, Nehemias, during his first stay at Jerusalem, found the same abuse in existence, Neh 6:18, and after his second return took strong action in the matter, Neh 13:23-30. Malachias' denunciation of such marriages, 2:11, could therefore fall only either before Esdras' reform or sometime thereafter. Moreover the expenses of the Temple were met out of the royal exchequer in the time of Darius I, Esd 6:1, 9, 13, as they were in the reign of Artaxerxes I after the return of Esdras from Babylon, Esd 7:15-17, 20-23. If the order of Darius was faithfully carried out till the close of his reign in 486 B.C., Malachias' prophecy, if written before the reform of Esdras, would date from some time after this year, as the offering of cheap defective victims, Mal 1:8, indicates that the expenses of the Temple worship fell on the Jews themselves. But it is by no means certain that the royal provision was adhered to for so long. The decree of Artaxerxes had ceased to be of effect by the time of Nehemias' first sojourn at Jerusalem, as he found it necessary to institute an annual tribute of a third of a shekel for the maintenance of the Temple services, Neh 10:32 f. The period of Nehemias' governorship from the 20th to the 32nd year of Artaxerxes may also be excluded as, on the one hand, Nehemias expressly says that for all that time he had refused to be a charge to the people by eating 'the yearly allowance that was due to the governors', Neh 5:14 f., and on the other hand, it is clear that Malachias wrote while the payment of such dues was in force, Mal 1:8. The evidence is not adequate to enable us to fix the date of Malachias with certainty, but the more probable period is that preceding the reforming activity of Esdras.

I omit a discussion of the question on the basis of the reconstruction of the history proposed by Van Hoonacker according to which the reforming activity of Esdras followed that of Nehemias, as there appears to be no adequate ground for departing from the chronological order indicated in the Bible. (See § 289i-g.)

Theme and Analysis of the Book—The theme of the book is briefly that God loves Israel, though Israel questions the existence of this love. The sins of the priests and the people are such that they prevent God showing his favour. If they will repent, they shall again feel the effects of the divine benevolence. The Jews even dare to question God's justice. This leads to the prediction of God's coming as a fire both consuming the wicked and refining the good. The book may be analysed more in detail as follows.

The Jews are dissatisfied with God. They question the existence of his love for them, which, however, is manifest by the favour shown to them in comparison with the hard lot of the descendants of Esau, the brother of their own progenitor Jacob, 1:2-5. But God is prevented from showering his favours on the Jews, for they do not render the honour and reverence that are his due. The priests despise his name by offering polluted sacrifices. It were better for the Temple to be closed and an end put to these useless offerings, for in the whole Gentile world a pure offering is made to his name which is honoured throughout the world, 1:6-14. If the priests do not amend their ways, they will bring a curse upon themselves and the deepest shame, 2:1-4. Of old the priestly caste was true to God's covenant with them and merited the prosperity attached to its faithful observance. The present generation of priests, on the contrary, has itself offended and has occasioned the sin of others, 2:5-9. Among the iniquities of the people are marriages with pagans, 2:10-12, and the divorce of their legitimate wives, 2:13-16.

The accusation has even been made that God favours the wicked, and the existence of a just providence ruling the world has been questioned: 'Where is the God of justice?' 2:17. The answer is quickly given. After his messenger God will come himself to his temple. Who then will be able to stand before him? He will come as a refining fire. When he has purified the priesthood, they will again offer a worthy sacrifice. He will come for judgement against sorcerers, adulterers, perjurers, and oppressors of the weak, 3:1-5. God has not changed and hates evil always, whereas the Jews are contumacious in their iniquity. None the less, if they will repent, God will again turn to them. They must pay their dues of tithes and offerings, 3:6-10. Due observance will bring its reward from God in renewed prosperity, 3:11 f. Again are mentioned the accusations against God's just government of the world, 3:15. True worshippers are written in a book of remembrance before Yahweh; they shall be his special possession on the great day that is to come. God will spare them. Then will men again recognize the different lot of those who do, and of those who do not, worship God, 3:16-18. The day that is to come will consume the evil-doers like stubble, but the sun of justice will shine on the good, who will triumph over the wicked, 4:1-3.

An exhortation to remember the law of Moses is followed by the prophecy that Elias will be sent before the great and terrible day of the Lord to work harmony of spirit between the fathers and the sons lest God at his coming strike the land with an anathema.

Doctrinal Content—There is no systematic exposition of doctrine, and the points touched on were indicated by the needs of the time. The Jews were in a relatively miserable condition. They were under foreign rule; had no prosperity; crops for some time had been poor owing to lack of rain and the devastations of locusts, 3:10 f. As a consequence they tended to lose faith in God. It had always been the faith of Israel that God is the just ruler of the world who rewards good and punishes evil. In their sad estate many put the blame on God instead of on their own sinful conduct.

It is this frame of mind that explains the prophet's insistence in his teaching about God on the old truth that 'Yahweh is magnified beyond the borders of Israel', 1:5, and in part its repetition 1:11, 14. The same applies to the emphasis with which it is taught that God does reward virtue, 2:5; 3:10-12; 4:2 f., and punish wickedness, 2:3; 4:1. It must be remembered that the doctrine of retribution after death had not yet been revealed, and the mystery of God's government was correspondingly more obscure. God is just; yet, though he never punishes more than sin deserves, he sometimes treats sinners with love that they do not deserve. Thus God visited Edom with severe chastisement for theirs were 'borders of wickedness', 1:3 f., yet Israel was not visited with signs of equally severe divine displeasure, though Malachias has many denunciations of Jewish iniquity, and though Edom and Israel were both descended from Jacob, 1:2. God has a special love and care of those who serve him and treats them as a father with mercy, 3:17.

Turning to the teaching about man, we may note first that all men have equal rights before God, though in the context this is said of the Jews only, 2:10. Men are under an obligation to honour and reverence God, 1:6, by the due observance of the prescribed ritual, 1:7 f., and by the payment of tithes and offerings imposed by law, 3:8, 10. At the same time to be pleasing to God man must avoid evil, sorcery, adultery, perjury, oppression of the weak, 3:5. Divorce is hateful to God, 2:14-16, where see note. The hardness of heart of the Israelites had led Moses to tolerate divorce in certain conditions and under certain safeguards, probably to avoid the worse evil of murder, Deut 24:1-4, but even there strong language is used of the divorced wife who has remarried. In Malachias' time these divorces seem often to have been occasioned by another great evil, namely, marriage with pagan wives, to whom it was desired to give the place of honour in the home, 2:11 with note. Such divorces were not sanctioned by the law of Deuteronomy.

Priests have a mission from God, for they are his messengers or angels, 2:7. They should carry out their ritual and sacrificial duties with exactness and reverence, 1:7, etc., should teach the law of God with fidelity, 2:6, 8, and be the means of helping men to live good lives, 2:6.

The day of the Lord is the subject of important prophecies, 3:1-5, 4:1-3. It is essential here to remember that the full truth was not always revealed to the prophets even on subjects concerning which they had profound truths to teach. So it was in this instance. Malachias foretells that the Lord is to come, but he does not distinguish between his first and his second coming, between his coming to save the world and his coming in the clouds of heaven for judgement. This is connected with the fact already mentioned that the truth about rewards and punishments had not yet been revealed nor consequently that judgement is to follow the end of each one's life on this earth. Consequently Malachias foretells the destruction of the wicked and the blessedness of the just on the great and terrible day of the Lord, but he does not make it plain to his readers that this day is to be far removed in time from the day on which the Lord will come to his temple. Similarly he does not make it plain that the prophet whom God is to send before the great and terrible day of the Lord, 4:5, is not he who is to be sent to prepare the way of the first coming, 3:1. Now after the revelation of the New Testament we know that this first messenger was John the Baptist, who came in the spirit of Elias. This is an example of 'compensation', by which two events separated in time are fused into one picture just as in old paintings objects separated in space are represented without regard to perspective.

Even more striking and arresting than these prophecies of the coming of the Lord is that in which is foretold the offering of a pure sacrifice throughout the gentile world, the sacrifice of the New Covenant. The Jewish priests of the day were offering polluted and defective sacrifices; the animals they offered to God were such as they would not have dared to offer to the Persian governor for the maintenance of his household, 1:7 f. It were better if the gates of the Temple were closed and the fire not kindled upon the altar to no purpose. God rejects the Jewish sacrifices: 'I have no pleasure in you, saith the Lord of hosts, and I will not receive a gift of your hand', 1:10. The honour and reverence that God had a right to expect above all from his chosen people is withheld by them, but from the rising of the sun to the going down thereof his name is great among the Gentiles, and in every place a pure oblation is offered to his name, 1:11 with note. The Jewish sacrifices are rejected, and in their place God accepts a pure oblation made throughout the Gentile world and therefore by the Gentiles themselves. In the light of history there is only one sacrifice that corresponds to this prediction, and that is the sacrifice instituted by the Angel, or Messenger, of the New Covenant, 3:1 and Jer 31:31. This is a pure oblation, for the victim is none other than the Son of God made man, who is mystically immolated upon the Christian altar by the sword of the word, and it is offered throughout the Gentile world by priests of the non-Israelite order of Melchisedech.

This interpretation, which is that of the Council of 555k Trent, Sess. 22 cap. 1, and of the earliest Christian tradition as evidenced by St Justin, Dial. cum Tryphone 117, is only confirmed by the various attempts to give the passage some other application. It has been held that Malachias is referring to the worship paid by the nations each to its own supreme divinity, as by the Romans to Jupiter, the Greeks to Zeus, and the Persians to Ahura Mazda, and that inasmuch as they worshipped a supreme god they were in reality adoring Yahweh, the one true God. Apart from other passages of the Bible this idea runs counter to Malachias' own teaching. His condemnation of marriage with 'the daughter of a strange god', 2:11, that is with a pagan woman, is clearly also a rejection of all pagan cult. Another view maintains that the reference is to sacrifices offered by Jews scattered throughout the pagan world. This again is quite untenable. We know of only two such Jewish temples—at Elephantine and at Heliopolis. Had there been many, we should certainly have record of others. And had the Jews considered such temples legitimate in spite of Deut 12:1-14, the destruction of the Temple at Jerusalem would not have put an end to all Jewish sacrifices, but from the year A.D. 70 the Jews have abstained from all sacrifice. Moreover the cult of Elephantine would certainly not have been called pure by Malachias as the degenerate Jews there worshipped Ashim-Bethel and Anath-Bethel as well as Yaho (Yahweh); cf. A. Vincent, La Religion des Juifs d'Éléphantine (1937) 562, 622 ff., 654 ff. Yet a third attempt has been made to interpret the prophecy of the sacrifices of praise, that is the prayers and hymns, offered to God by the pious Jews of the Diaspora. For one thing it is gratuitous to suppose that the Jews who had remained abroad were more pleasing to God than those who had remained in or returned to the Promised Land, and secondly, it is illegitimate to understand terms normally used of material sacrifices in a metaphorical manner where there is no indication in the text, as there is not in our passage, that the terms are being used in any other than their ordinary sense. It is thus clear that Malachias' words do not refer to any sacrifices of his own time, whether sacrifices of the Gentiles, or sacrifices, material or metaphorical, of the Jews. He speaks of the future Messianic age.

1 Text and Style—The text of Malachias is on the whole well preserved though textual corruptions are not lacking as well as divergences between the Hebrew text and the early versions. These, of which the more important are noted in the commentary, as well as the poetic diction employed, render it impossible at times to be certain of the prophet's exact meaning. His style is that of poetic prose, not that of poetry. The attempt to fit his words into the mould of metre can be successful only by the aid of a violent and arbitrary handling of the text, though it is not denied that certain parts have the parallelism and metre proper to poetry. Specially characteristic of Malachias is his use of dialogue.

555a I The Title—The oracle of the word of the Lord' occurs besides only Zach 9:1; 12:1. The name of Israel, which had been used of the Northern Kingdom, is now used of the Jewish community as a whole. God deals with men through men, as here through one of his prophets.

b 2-5 God's Special Love of Israel—Throughout the longer part of their history the Hebrews expected the good to be rewarded by temporal prosperity. Consequently their present plight led them to question God's love for their nation. But God's love was shown by the far greater severity with which he had justly punished the iniquity of Edom and the comparative leniency shown to Israel, though the two were brother nations descended from Jacob and Esau, the two sons of Isaac. 8. Probably it was by recent incursions of the Nabateans that Esau's mountain home had been made a wilderness and 'his inheritance a desert pasture'. 4. Neither is God prepared to show to Edom in the future the clemency extended to Israel. 5. If the Jews had foolishly thought that the arm of God was shortened, they would see that 'the Lord is magnified beyond the border of Israel'.

6-9 Israel's Sinful Sacrifices—6-7. 'A son honours his father and a servant reverences his master'. Yet Israel treats God with neither honour nor respect 'saith the Lord of hosts to you, O priests, who despise my name. Yet you say: Wherein have we despised thy name? You offer polluted food upon my altar, yet you say. . . .'. Israel was in fact no more worthy of the favour of God than sinful Edom. Contempt of God's name is contempt of God himself for whose person the 'name' often stands practically as a synonym. 8. 'If you offer the blind for sacrifice, there is no harm!'. The statement is either ironical or repeats the thought of the negligent priests. By law nothing blemished was to be offered in sacrifice, Deut 15:21. They would not dare to offer a defective animal in fulfilment of civil obligations. 'Offer it to the Governor! Will he be pleased with it or show thee favour?' 9 is not an exhortation to repentance, but is ironical. While you continue to act thus, if you try to propitiate God 'will he show favour to you?' Clearly not!

10 f. Jewish Sacrifices replaced by a Universal and Pure Oblation—'O that one among you would shut the gates and that you would not kindle the fire upon my altar to no purpose'. God rejects the Jewish sacrifices. 11. The word 'for' shows that the universal and pure oblation is to replace the existing Jewish sacrifices, a fact which of itself shows that Malachias is not thinking of any other existing sacrifices but of the future Messianic Age; see § 555j. 'From the rising of the sun even to the going down thereof' is a geographical expression signifying universality. The MT reads: 'and in every place muqtar muggas to my name and a pure oblation'. In essentials this agrees with the Vg in spite of the different position of the conjunction and the possibility of varying opinions about the grammatical form and meaning of muqtar. The LXX translates, probably correctly: 'In every place incense is offered to my name and a pure oblation'. It is certainly worthy of remark that whenever the Sacrifice of the New Testament is offered with full ritual, the use of incense is an integral part of the sacred function.

12-14 Further on Sinful Sacrifices—12. It was the priests who defiled the altar or table of the Lord by their unworthy sacrifices, but, as men are apt to do, they seek the cause of the evil results of their own actions elsewhere. The DV of 12b is a free rendering of a doubtful Hebrew text, but gives substantially the sense intended. 13. 'And you say: "Look! What a trouble! and you have been sniffing at it and bringing what was robbed both lame and sickly"'. The verbs denote repeated action in the past and continued into the present. The robbery might be that of legal injustice committed to the knowledge of the priests by the persons presenting the victims. The suggestion that the Hebrew word for 'robbed' has here the sense of 'mutilated' offers a sense that suits the passage but lacks adequate linguistic confirmation. 14. Worse still than the irreverence of offering defective victims is the conjunction therewith of perjury: 'Cursed is the deceitful man who has in his flock a male which he vows, and offers to the Lord in sacrifice a defective female'. Victims for peace-offerings were allowed to be of the female sex, Lev 3:1, but males were considered to be the more honourable sacrifices, Lev 1:3 (where only males are allowed for a holocaust). And if a male were vowed, it was obviously sinful to offer a female. The antithesis seems to demand that vocalization of the HT which signifies a defective female. The alternative vocalization, which signifies a blemished male, renders the previous emphatic mention of the sex quite pointless.

II 1-3 Commination against the Priests—1. The commandment to the priests is probably that implicit in the passage, namely, to amend their ways and give 557a honour to God by the due performance of their duties. 2. If they will not listen, God says 'I will send a curse upon you', which St Jerome understands to refer to poverty in contrast to the 'blessings' they had hitherto enjoyed. The alternative explanation that God will curse what the priests bless is very improbable, as God would not curse the pious folk who sought the priests' blessing in virtue of their office. 3. What follows clearly threatens the priests with the most ignominious treatment as merited by their very irreverent conduct towards God, but the detail has been understood in different ways, with different vocalizations of the noun and different consonantal readings of the verb. St Jerome took it that the shoulder of the victim which belonged to the priests by right, Deut 18:3, was to be cast at them ignominiously together with the dung of the sacrificial victims. Other suggestions are that God threatens to hew off the arm raised in blessing, or to cut off seed and posterity or to restrain the seed in the soil from giving its crop. No interpretation is convincing.

b 4-9 The Ideal of the Priesthood now Debased—4. God gives this commandment either that his covenant may abide with Levi (as in the DV and RV; for this use of the verb cf. Lev 22:26; 1 Kg 6:1, etc.) or because his covenant was with Levi. In any case the latter sense implies the former as its consequence. On the covenant with Levi, i.e. the priestly caste, cf. Num 25:12 f. 5. 'My covenant was with him of life and peace, and I gave them to him, of reverence and he revered me'. Both parties to the covenant, both God and Levi, were faithful to their undertaking. 6. On the duty of the priests to teach, cf. Lev 10:11, Deut 31:10-13. 7. The priest is 'the angel of the Lord of hosts', a phrase that occurs nowhere else. It is possible that in denouncing the wickedness of the priests Malachias was denouncing his own order, and that here he explains the function of the priest in a phrase borrowed from his own name. The priests were, 9, unjust 'respecters of persons in the law', i.e. in its administration. On the judicial function of the priestly office cf. Deut 17:8-11, 2 Par 19:8.

c 10-12 Marriages with Pagans—10. God was the common father of all Israelites; 'Israel is my son, my firstborn', Ex 4:22. He was 'the Creator of Israel', Is 43:15. This was a grave reason why each should not 'deal treacherously with his brother', as all Israelites were brothers. The internal dissensions connected with the mixed marriages here condemned are illustrated by Neh 6:17-19. The covenant of the fathers refers to that entered into between Yahweh and the nation, Ex 19:5 f.; 24:8. This bound them into one social unit with mutual obligations. 11. The daughters of strange gods are pagan women, and marriages with them profaned the sanctuary of the Lord, i.e. the people of Israel, Ps 113 (114) 2, which was to be 'a holy nation', Ex 19:6. Marriage with the pagan inhabitants of the Promised Land was forbidden on account of the danger of perversion to idolatry, Ex 34:11-16; Deut 7:1-4. Such marriages were a grave menace after the exile, Esd 9:1 ff.; Neh 6:18; 10:30; 13:23 ff. 12. The phrase translated 'both the master and the scholar' signifies totality by the combination of opposites. In the HT it is literally 'awaker and answerer', which has an interesting parallel in Arabic, 'In the city there is neither caller nor answerer', viz. no one at all. Three times in his commentary St Jerome calls this last verse a curse, and he must have written in agreement with HT 'Disperdat', i.e. 'May the Lord cut off the man that hath done this'.

d 13-16 The Evil of Divorce—13. St Jerome with the ancient Rabbis rightly explained the covering of the altar 'with tears, with weeping, and with groaning' as caused by the harsh treatment of husbands divorcing their legitimate Jewish wives. The expression is, of course, metaphorical, as women did not have access to the altar. And this injustice is a further reason why God tells the Jews that he no more regards sacrifice nor accepts 'it with favour at your hands'. The marriage covenant or contract was sacred and God was a witness how it was kept, as he tells the sinful husband, 'between thee and the wife of thy youth, against whom thou hast acted faithlessly'. 15. This verse is obscure and has been variously interpreted. The meaning intended by St Jerome and the DV is this: Did not one and the same God who made man (Adam) make also woman (Eve), and did he not breathe into the first woman of the same breath that he breathed into Adam, Gen 2:7? And what was God's purpose in uniting the sexes except that they should raise up children to God? As so much of Malachias is in dialogue form, and in particular in the form of objections raised by the Jews, and as moreover a Jew could not fail in this connexion to recall the dismissal of Agar by Abraham, it is probable that the prophet's meaning is: Did not one do this, who yet was not lacking in the spirit of God? (It is perhaps not accidental that Abraham is twice spoken of as 'one', Is 51:2; Ez 33:24.) Then the answer is given: 'But what was that one's purpose but the seed of God?' Abraham acted with divine permission in the interest of Isaac, the child of promise, Gen 21:10-12. This agrees better with the following exhortation: 'Look then to your spirit and deal not faithlessly with the wife of thy youth'. 16. The interpretation of this verse also is difficult. The DV follows that of St Jerome according to which an objection is raised from Deut 24:1 with the answer implying that if God there tolerated divorce it was because of the hardness of men's hearts. Translate: 'When a man dismisses (his wife) out of hatred . . . he covers his garment with injustice'. Therefore 'take care of your spirit and act not faithlessly'.

II 17-III 7 The Coming of the God of Justice and of His Messenger—17. Filled with the idea that virtue is rewarded with temporal welfare during life and falsely priding themselves on their innocence, the Jews called in question the very justice of God when they compared their low estate with the prosperity of unbelieving nations such as their rulers the Persians. At least, they ask, if God is just, where is he? We see no sign of his presence. III:1. God answers that he will come, but they are not fit to receive his coming. 'Behold I send my messenger and he shall prepare the way before me', cf. Is 40:3. This was John the Baptist, as our Lord explained, Mt 11:10. 'And suddenly the Lord whom you seek (cf. 2:17) shall come to his temple, and the messenger of the covenant, whom you desire, behold! he cometh!' The suddenness of the Lord's coming shows that the majority will not allow the forerunner really to prepare the way in their hearts. The Lord and the messenger of the covenant are one. Christ himself instituted the New Testament, Mt 26:28. So there is here a striking witness to the divinity of our Lord. 2. But the people are unworthy: 'Who shall be able to endure the day of his coming? And who shall stand when he appears?' 3. Malachias speaks of the priesthood of the new covenant in terms of the old; cf. Is 2:2-4, and Gal 3:29 where all Christians are 'the seed of Abraham'. God says that he will come in judgement, 5, where there appears to be compensation of the first and second comings of Christ; cf. however what the Baptist said of Christ, Mt 3:10. 6-7. The God of justice does not change: 'For I the Lord have not changed, but you, sons of Jacob, have not made an end [reading the pi'el]; from the days of your fathers you have departed from my ordinances'. How could God treat them with special favour? Yet he is always willing to receive back the repentant sinner. The Jews however will not even recognize the existence of their sin: 'In what matter shall we return?'

III 8-12 Tithes and Retribution—8 The DV 'afflict' is due to St Jerome's having introduced here a far-fetched Messianic allusion, his words 'afflict' and 'configitis' being intended as an allusion to the Crucifixion; cf. his commentary. 'Shall a man rob

- 558b God?' for withholding the Temple dues was equivalent to depriving God of his rights. They were robbing God 'in tithes and in oblations'. 9. 'With a curse you are cursed, for it is I whom you rob'. The curse was precisely that of want, as the sequel shows. The punishment fell on that in which they sinned. Their undue attachment to property led to God's withholding temporal prosperity. 10. If they are faithful to their duty, God will give in abundance the fertilizing rain essential for the crops of Palestine. 'The flood-gates of heaven', here probably a poetic phrase, signified originally, Gen 7:11, the apertures in the firmament the opening of which allowed the upper waters to descend on the earth in the form of rain—the simple scientific hypothesis of a primitive age. 11-12. Not only will the soil be fruitful, but its produce will be protected from 'the devourer', the locusts or other destructive agencies. Obviously these blessings will not be bestowed if the duty of tithes and oblations is fulfilled, but other obligations already stressed are neglected. The passage is a good example of the usage by which biblical writers at times stress the point in hand as if it were the only one and prescind from all other aspects of a question—a characteristic important to bear in mind to avoid serious misinterpretations. Nehemias also complained of the non-payment of tithes and of its disastrous effect on the Temple worship, Neh 13:10-12. Storehouses for the tithes and oblations were prepared in the reign of Ezechias, 2 Par 31:8-12.
- 13-15 Complaints against the Providence of God—
13. The prophet returns at greater length to the blasphemous sayings mentioned in 2:17. In spite of their sins many claimed to be obeying God's law and complained that they did not receive the anticipated temporal reward. 14. They claimed also to have been walking sorrowful before the Lord, perhaps, that is, to have been observing fasts, cf. Ps 34 (35)13; Mt 6:16. As St Jerome pointed out long ago, these are not the words of those 'that feared the Lord' of 3:16, for 'if they feared the Lord, they would not say those things'.
- 16-18 The Virtuous are God's Special Possession—
16. It is surprising that the contrary conversation of the virtuous is not reported in detail, but its substance can be readily understood from the context. It is also to be remarked that the word 'then' is vague and unsatisfactory, and probably covers an ancient and deep-seated corruption of the text. The LXX emendation, if such it was, is not happy for by substituting 'these things' it puts the previous blasphemies into mouths that could never have uttered them. St Jerome suggests that this LXX reading must be under-

558d stood ironically of those who falsely boasted their worship of God, but against this is the fact that the same phrase is used of the really virtuous later in the same verse. It seems clear that what the Lord heard the pious say was judged by him worthy of remembrance for the purpose of reward. 17. In Ex 19:5 God had promised that the whole people would be his peculiar possession if they would obey his voice. But the condition had not been fulfilled and here the same promise is restricted to the good. That even the good require the clemency of God shows that none are entirely without sin. 18. On the day that God manifests this special favour for the just, he says to all, 'You shall again see the difference between the just and the wicked'.

IV 1-3 The Day of the Lord—In the HT the remaining verses of Malachias are numbered consecutively with the verses of ch 3. 1. The punishment that is to come on the wicked is spoken of in strong metaphorical language which, if taken literally, would suggest their annihilation. 'It shall not leave them root nor branch'—another phrase implying universality by the mention of opposites. 2. The sun of justice is the sun that brings the reward of justice; cf. Ps 23 (24)5, where the Vg has translated the same word by 'mercy'. There is 'healing in his wings', which are the sun's spreading rays; cf. the winged sun-disk of Egypt. The just shall gambol for joy 'like calves of the stall', i.e. well-fed and freed from their confinement.

4 Exhortation to obey the Law—That this monition comes rather unexpectedly does not prove it to be a later gloss. If an editor could judge the place not unsuitable for its insertion, so could the original author.

5f. The Coming of Elias—Elias had been carried up in a fiery chariot by a whirlwind to heaven, 4 Kg 2:11. He is to come again to restore religious harmony and unity among all. As already explained, the doctrine of future retribution had not been revealed in the time of Malachias, who consequently merges in one picture both the first and the second comings of Christ, first to save and secondly to judge the world. It is in accordance with this that the disciples with the Scribes took this passage to refer to the coming of the Messiah. When the Transfiguration had brought vividly to their minds that the Messiah was already with them, they asked: 'Why then do the Scribes say that Elias must come first?' Our Lord answered: 'Elias indeed shall come and restore all things; but I say to you that Elias is already come'. Then they understood that Christ spoke to them of the Baptist, Mt 17:10-13. In this way our Lord manifested the truth that there are two precursors as there are two comings.

b General Introduction—In many ways the Books of Maccabees are amongst the most easily intelligible of the OT. The story they have to tell—the account of the successful resistance of the Jewish people to a foreign tyranny—is one which is characteristic of human history in all ages, with this important difference that in Mac great stress is laid upon the religious nature of the uprising and upon the assistance received by the Jews from God. There are few difficulties of interpretation, and very few passages of great theological importance. Such difficulties as occur are mostly of minor historical detail, though there are a number of perplexities raised by the fact that the two books often treat of the same incidents from slightly different points of view. But, since the Church has appointed readings from these books to provide the Scripture readings for the First Nocturn during the whole month of October, the commentary will have no small practical value.

The title Machabaeus, strictly appropriated to Judas, the third son of Mathathias, is thought to be derived from the Heb. maqābāh, meaning a 'hammer'. It was afterwards used of the whole family of Mathathias, and eventually came to be applied by the Fathers to the seven sons and the mother whose story is told in 2 Mac 7.

c Historical Background—The general situation has been described elsewhere (§ 68b-h), but a somewhat more detailed account of contemporary history is necessary 559c for an adequate understanding of the Books. After the death of Alexander the Great in 323 B.C., his vast empire split up. The wars of his successors, lasting for some forty years, eventually resulted in that pattern of Eastern Mediterranean states which was to endure until Rome absorbed them all. Apart from Macedonia, mistress of most of the Greek mainland, the two great powers in the Middle East were Syria, with its capital at Antioch, ruled by the Seleucid dynasty (so called from its founder Seleucus), and Egypt, with its capital at Alexandria, ruled by the Ptolemies. Between these two lay Palestine, at first belonging to Egypt, but shortly after 200 B.C. falling to Syria, as the result of the vigorous policy of Antiochus III, who, no less than his successor Seleucus IV, respected the Jewish religion. But Antiochus IV (Epiphanes = the Illustrious) began a policy designed to secure political unity by the imposition on his heterogeneous kingdom of religious and social uniformity. This involved requiring of the Jews certain practices which were an abomination to the devout. Unfortunately, within the Jewish people there were always to be found many who were prepared to sacrifice the Law of God for their own ambitious ends, and a 'Hellenizing party', prepared to admit the requirements of Antiochus, sprang up and split the unity of the nation.

The theme of the Books of Maccabees is the history d of how a single family, rallying the forces of resistance, managed to prevail over the 'collaborationists', backed by the might of Syria. This success was due to several factors: first and foremost was the genuine religious fervour of the faithful party; second, the leadership and military skill of Judas and his brothers; and third, the chronic civil strife within the kingdom of Syria itself. It is necessary to give some account of this if we are to follow the story of the Books at all clearly.

The table below will make it clear that when Antiochus IV ascended the throne he was usurping the power that should have descended to his nephew. This nephew subsequently challenged the claim of the son of Antiochus IV and became Demetrius I. This was the beginning of a series of dynastic quarrels which considerably helped the Jewish revolt and eventually led to the downfall of the power of Syria. A further factor that must be noted is the enmity between Syria and Egypt. The latter country was never reconciled to the loss of Palestine and open war broke out on more than one occasion.

559f Meanwhile, in the background, the threat of Rome was a constant reality. Although not yet prepared to assume direct responsibility for any Asiatic territories, the Roman Senate was concerned to secure her interests in the Levant by playing off one power against another. Thus, when Syria seemed likely to prevail against Egypt, it was Rome's envoy, Popilius Laenas, who stayed her advance. The defeat of Antiochus the Great at Magnesia in 190 B.C. had been so absolute that it secured the prestige of Rome in the East for nearly a century. Incidentally, too, it saddled the Syrian kingdom with a debt which seriously hampered the warlike preparations of the Seleucids. We may well believe that Rome would welcome any rapprochement with the Jews, so long as it did not involve active intervention in the revolt.

g A few words may be added concerning the politico-religious situation in Judaea itself. After the annexation of the country by Antiochus the Great, there remained a fairly strong pro-Egyptian party, represented amongst others by the high-priest and the 'traditionalists' generally. Against these stood the 'progressive' Hellenizing party, with the wealthy Tobiad family at its head. It seems to have been the policy of Antiochus III and Seleucus IV to try to conciliate the former by showing deference to the religious susceptibilities of the Jews and by financial support of the temple. This policy was reversed by Antiochus IV, possibly owing very largely to the intrigues and suggestions of the Tobiad family and their supporters.

560a Chronology—The problem of Maccabaeon chronology has been discussed by different scholars, with different results. The Seleucid era is taken as the basis of dating in both books, but there is some uncertainty about the precise determination of this era. The most probable conclusion seems to be that the author of 1 Mac reckons his years from Nisan to Nisan, and that the first year of the Seleucid era (sc. the era dating from the reign of Seleucus I) runs from Nisan 312–Nisan 311 B.C., whilst for the author of 2 Mac the reckoning is from Tishri to Tishri (Nisan = March/April; Tishri = Sept./Oct.). Thus any event falling between Nisan 1 and Tishri 1 in any given Julian year would be attributed to different years by the different books. This will account for a number of apparent discrepancies as that in 2 Mac 13:1 and 14:4 events appear to be dated a year earlier than in the corresponding passages of 1 Mac. (Knabenbauer has a good short discussion, with references to the standard authorities; Bévenot is slightly fuller but comes to the same conclusion.)

c The Figures found in Maccabees—Non-Catholic critics often treat the figures given by the authors of Mac as entirely unreliable. But allowing for the possibility of occasional textual corruption and even conceding, with Bévenot, that the recurrence of multiples of 10,000 in the figures given for the Syrian armies suggests that, sometimes at any rate, there has been a misunderstanding of the Heb. r'babāh (= like the Gk μύριος, sometimes 10,000, sometimes merely a very large number), it is desirable to point out that it is unsafe to reject the existing numbers merely on a priori grounds. Despite the cynic, God is not always 'on the side of the big battalions', as has been proved time and again in history, from the days of Marathon down to the 20th cent. On the contrary, given a resolute command and a people convinced of the righteousness of their cause, there have been any number of well-attested examples of a relatively small force securing a resounding victory over what might have seemed impossible odds. Remembering then that the Jews were fighting on a terrain well-known to them, often in hill-country suited to a guerilla type of warfare and favouring the defence, that they were inspired by an intense patriotism coupled with an even more intense religious fervour, we should expect to find them succeeding against larger Syrian armies, presumably composed as a rule of mercenary troops, and those not necessarily the best at the king's disposal (since he had so many other commitments). 560e

Occasional apparent discrepancies between 1 Mac and 2 Mac have been treated in the commentary. For a fuller discussion of the problem cf. Bévenot, 34 ff., Cornely-Merk, Introd. Compendium, Parisii, 1927.

Doctrinal Content—The Books of Maccabees, being primarily the story of men of action, refer only incidentally to points of doctrine. But there are passages which give glimpses into the beliefs of the devout Jews of the time. The chief contribution is made by 2 Mac 7, the well-known account of the 'seven Maccabees'. From this it is certain that the Jews possessed a clear conviction not merely of survival after death, but of eternal life (7:36), in contradistinction to the punishment (by implication eternal) which awaits the wicked. Thus, in 36, Antiochus is warned that he will receive 'just punishment', whilst in 14 he is told that he will 'have no resurrection unto life'. Moreover, the 'resurrection of eternal life' (9) will include the restoration of bodily existence. Thus the third son says: 'I hope to receive them [tongue and hands] again from him' (11), whilst the mother assures her children that God will restore to them 'both breath and life' (23).

The passage in 2 Mac 12:43–46, which describes how Judas sent money to Jerusalem 'for sacrifices to be offered for the sins of the dead', is so well known as to call for little comment, for nothing short of complete scepticism can explain away the clear doctrine there expressed that, of those who have 'fallen asleep with godliness', some will need prayer 'that they may be loosed from sins'—the most definite expression of a belief in Purgatory. It is obvious then from ch 7 and 12:43 ff. that there existed in the mind of Judaism in the 2nd cent. B.C. a profound conviction of immortality, of eternal punishment for sin, of the resurrection of the body and of an intermediate state of purification after death. Even Razias who misguidedly committed suicide rather than fall into the hands of his enemies hoped for such immortality, 14:46.

Two other passages call for comment. The first is 7:28, a clear statement of the doctrine of creation ex nihilo. Whether we read with Rahlfs οὐκ ἐξ ὄντων ἐποίησε or prefer the reading ἐξ οὐκ ὄντων which is to be found in a number of Gk MSS, supported by Vg, the meaning is substantially the same. And it is mere pedantry to see in the passage a Philonian re-statement of the Platonic μὴ ὂν and not a natural conviction based on Gen 1:1.

The remaining passage is 1 Mac 2:51 ff., with its anticipations of St Paul, especially Heb 11:1 ff., whilst both 1 Mac 2:52 and Rom 4:3 repeat Gen 15:6. The passage in Mac seems to be of importance for the whole subject of faith and works, and has perhaps not received sufficient attention from the theologians. g

THE FIRST BOOK OF MACCABEES

Composition—The original language was almost certainly Hebrew, as is inferred from the number of Hebraisms in the existing Greek version. A few of these are indicated in the commentary. The author, clearly a devout and believing Jew, with a first-hand knowledge of Palestine, seeks to tell in a straightforward manner the story of his people's deliverance from the danger of perversion. Whilst entirely alive to the providential nature of that deliverance, he nowhere emphasizes or exaggerates the preternatural element in the story, but is content to show the operation of natural causes—the tenacity and skill of Judas and his brethren, the dissipation of the Syrian forces, the moral support of Rome—whilst at the same time stressing the importance of the religious spirit with which the Jewish leaders imbued their followers. 561a

The date of composition cannot be determined with b

561b any preciseness, but there is no need to suppose that it was much later than the reign of John Hyrcanus, who died in 103 B.C. The Book must certainly have been completed before Rome became hostile to the Jews, in view of the attitude of the writer to the Romans, which would have been unthinkable after Pompey's entry into the temple in 63 B.C.

c Contents—After a brief introduction (1:1-10) giving the broad historical setting of the events to be narrated, the author first describes the causes leading up to the revolt headed by Mathathias, with a brief account of his achievements and death (1:11-2:70). He then (3:1-9:22) narrates in some detail the activities of Judas, first of all under Antiochus Epiphanes (3:1-6:17) and then under Antiochus Eupator and Demetrius I, concluding with an account of the death of Judas. The next section is devoted to the deeds of Jonathan (9:23-12:54), and the last section is concerned with the work of Simon, closing with his death and the succession of John (13:1-16:24).

562a I 1-10 Prologue: Alexander's Empire divided at his Death—The account of the rise of the Syrian kingdom naturally begins with the pivotal fact of Alexander's conquests. These started in 332 when he began his march from Greece ('the land of Kittim', used in the OT of the Greek-speaking lands; cf. 8:5, Gen 10:4, Jer 2:10), and included the whole of SW. Asia as far as the Punjab, as well as Egypt. They are impressively indicated in 2-4. The phrase in 1 'who first reigned in Greece' cloaks an obscurity in the Gk, but the meaning is probably that he was the first ruler of the 'kingdom of the Greeks' (11 and cf. 'Greece' in 6:2), i.e. of that Hellenistic kingdom which was constituted by his conquests, and of which Syria seems to have been regarded as the legatee. The evidence that Alexander formally divided his empire before his death is not convincing, and 6 must be understood to refer to the arrangements which he made in his lifetime for the administration of the different satrapies; the actual division into the constituent kingdoms of Macedonia, Syria and Egypt was the result of the wars of the Diadochi, Alexander's generals and their successors, which began soon after his death and produced misery and devastation for forty years (10).

b 11-16 Antiochus Epiphanes: Attempted Hellenization of Palestine—Antiochus the Illustrious (Epiphanes) seized the throne of Syria in 175 B.C., and a party in Judaea lent themselves to his design to Hellenize the Jews. The internal situation amongst the latter is more fully developed in 2 Mac; cf. § 559c-g. The desire of the Hellenizing party to co-operate with Antiochus doubtless represents an attempt to curry favour, but must also be understood as the latest manifestation of the chronic tendency amongst the Jews to assimilate themselves as much as possible to the religious and social conditions of their neighbours. The institution of the (characteristically Greek) gymnasium led to a desire to conceal the traces of circumcision, a desire with obvious religious implications (15 f.). The practices hinted at in the words 'sold themselves to do evil' (sc. were prostituted) remind us of one of the great moral dangers of the new tendencies. The Greeks were notoriously given to unnatural vice.

c 17-42 Antiochus invades Egypt: he pillages the Temple and Jerusalem is sacked—This attempt of Antiochus to aggrandize himself at the expense of the young king of Egypt was checked by Rome, 168 B.C. 2 Mac 5:5 makes it clear that it was the behaviour of some of the Jews during his absence which provoked the king's anger. 23. For the 'golden altar' and other objects cf. 3 Kg 7:48, 50. They had been removed by Nabuchodonosor (2 Par 36:7) and restored by Cyrus (Esd 1:7; 5:14).

26-29, 38-42 afford a very good example of the way in which the author of 1 Mac rises from the plain prose of his narrative passages to a style which is reminiscent of the more poetical portions of the OT. 562c It is interesting to compare Ps 78, which may have been composed at this time.

The 'chief collector of his tributes' (30) is apparently the Apollonius of 2 Mac 5:24, where he is styled Μυσάρχης; cf. ad loc. It seems probable that we should read captain of the Mysians here too, the presumed original Heb. šar hammussim having been misread as šar hammissim.

In 35 is described the fortification known as the castle or citadel (ἀκρά). It is referred to frequently in accounts of the later campaigns. Its precise situation is uncertain, but the more common opinion is that it was situated close to the temple (cf. 4:41), near its southern or possibly south-western end. (The 'city of David' is often identified with the region of Mount Sion, but 7:32 f. suggests that the author distinguished them.) 38. 'An evil devil': a source of annoyance, a constant threat.

43-67 Hellenization enforced by Antiochus—The policy indicated here (and more fully described in 2 Mac 6 and 7) was meant to produce a uniform religious and social system as an important factor in the unification of the very heterogeneous Syrian kingdom; cf. Roman Emperor-worship propaganda. In making their heroic stand the Jewish victims of the persecution anticipate the later Christian martyrs and all Confessors who maintain the rights of God as against those of Caesar. 45. Many 'consented to his service', sc. to the form of worship prescribed by the king, possibly though not necessarily including worship of himself as a manifestation of Zeus. According to Josephus (Ant. 12, 5, 5) the Samaritans actually addressed Antiochus as θεός ἐπιφανής 'God made manifest'. 47-51 describe the attack made upon all forms of Jewish worship of the true God, and the legal observances which were its safeguard. Circumcision, the sign of the individual's belonging to Yahweh, was naturally a practice ruthlessly forbidden by the Syrian authorities. 51. The Vg reading justificationes Dei is represented in the Gk by δικαιώματα = prescriptions, ordinances (of the Law). This is one of a number of passages in which the name of God is found in Vg though not in LXX. The author of 1 Mac seems to have been most scrupulous in his avoidance of the sacred Name.

57. Note the way in which the date of this infamous act is perpetuated. The equivalent date is between 10 and 17 Dec., 167 B.C. The 'abominable idol of desolation' was, according to Josephus, an idol-altar actually built upon the altar of sacrifice in the temple. 2 Mac 6:2 would suggest that the altar was consecrated to Zeus Olympios. The Gk says simply βδέλυγμα ἐρημώσεως = abomination of desolation, and it is not clear why Vg renders abominandum idolum desolationis. For the expression abomination of desolation cf. Dan 9:27; 11:31; 12:11; Mt 24:15, etc. 62 bears out Josephus—'the altar which was upon the altar of sacrifice' (LXX τὸν βωμὸν, ὃς ἦν ἐπὶ τοῦ θυσιαστηρίου). In addition to the altar in the temple, the Syrians set up statues (Hermæ?) and shrines in the streets of Jerusalem and other cities of Judaea (57-58; cf. Josephus, Ant. 12, 5, 4). The reading in 64 is a little doubtful, but it seems probable that we should emend 'houses' to servants (οἰκίους not οἴκους), so that not only were the mothers put to death but also those in any way connected with the rite of circumcision. According to Josephus they were crucified.

II 1-14 Mathathias and his Sons—So far we have been told of the cruelties of the Syrians, and the emphasis has been laid on the defection of the Hellenizers rather than on the resistance of the faithful. 1. Now we come to the account of active opposition, initiated by one family from Modin, some 15 m. NW. of Jerusalem. Doubtless there were many such centres of resistance, but it is the incident described in 23-25 which marks the beginning of organized rebellion, resulting in the liberation of Judaea. Joarib, from whom Mathathias was descended, is mentioned in 1 Par 24:7 as receiving g 15-26 Modlin: the Incident of the Apostate Jew—As a member of the priestly family, Mathathias was naturally invited to set an example to the rest by offering sacrifice at the bidding of the king. His refusal is in marked contrast to the conduct of Menelaus, the high-priest, (2 Mac 5:15). 24. 'His wrath was kindled in accordance with the requirements of the law.' Phinees, cf. Num 25:7, 11.

h 27-48 Beginnings of Revolt—'The mountains' (28) and 'the desert' (29) are probably to be located E. and S. of Hebron, in a general direction SW. from Jerusalem. The incident recorded in 32-38, the slaughter of the Jews who refused to resist on the Sabbath, stamps the movement as essentially religious, and reminds us that we are here dealing with a holy war and with no mere nationalistic uprising. 38. 'So they gave them battle on the Sabbath' = the Syrians attacked the unresisting Jews. 40. After that gesture it was no contradiction that the Jews should come to see that the service of God demanded that they should be prepared to fight even on the Sabbath.

42. The 'congregation of the Hasidaeans' (Hāsīdīm = the Pious) who now join Mathathias are the forerunners of the later Pharisees. (A Lapidé suggests that they were a sort of Military Order, like the medieval Knights Templar, but there is no need to suppose that they were more than a sect of specially devout Jews who, in this moment of national peril, rallied to the cause of God; cf. Lagrange, 56, 272). The 'sinners' and 'wicked men' of 44 are the Hellenizing Jews, whilst the 'sons of pride' (i.e. the proud—by a common Hebraism) of 48 are the Syrians and others who arrogantly oppose God's law. Another Hebraism 'yielded not the horn to the sinner', which may mean either that they did not give way to the wicked or that they did not allow the wicked to triumph, is one of the numerous indications of an underlying Hebrew original.

i 49-70 Death of Mathathias—The moving exhortation of the dying Mathathias is worthy to rank with many noble passages in the Bible. The OT examples referred to in 52-60 are recorded in Gen 22:2; 41:40; Num 25:13; Jos 1:2; Num 14:16; 2 Kg 2:11; Dan 3:50; 6:22. 52 is of particular interest with reference to Gen 15:6 and Rom 4:3.

563a III 1-26 Judas Machabaeus succeeds his Father: his Early Successes—The eulogy of Judas in 1-9 has been reconstructed in Hebrew by C. F. Burney to produce an acrostic poem with the initial letters JHUDH HMKBY (JTS [1919-20] 319 ff.). The reconstruction involves some manipulation of the existing text.

10. It was Apollonius who was responsible for the sack of Jerusalem (1:29; 2 Mac 5:24). According to Josephus (Ant. 12, 7, 1) he was governor of Samaria. But this may be a mere inference from the present passage. 13. Seron (= Hiram) is described by Josephus as governor of Coele-Syria. The mention of Bethhoron (16) suggests that he came by the regular route from the coastal plain to Jerusalem. The town itself, consisting of an upper and a lower half, lies some 10 or 12 m. NW. of Jerusalem. It was on the line of Josue's famous pursuit of the Amorites (Jos 10:10), and by it the Philistines marched against Saul (1 Kg 9:17). The weakness of the army of Judas and the fact that Jerusalem itself was strongly garrisoned by the Syrians (1:35) suggest that the march was no more than a surprise raid, which succeeded because of its very boldness. The time for regular campaigns of reconquest had not yet come.

In 18 'the God of heaven' (Vg 'Dei caeli') and in 22 'the Lord' ('Dominus') are not found in the Gk, which has simply heaven and himself, in accordance with the practice mentioned in § 562d of avoiding the use of the Name.

27-41 Counter-measures of the Syrians—Lysias, commissioned by Antiochus to take the necessary steps, sends into Judaea an army under Ptolemy, Gorgias and Nicanor. Hitherto, against the scattered resistance of isolated bodies of Jews, Antiochus had been able to enforce his will without any great military power. The realization that a more organized form of resistance, under a leader of obvious capacity, had to be broken, leads to more elaborate measures. The parallel passage (2 Mac 8:8 ff.) informs us that Ptolemy was governor of Coele-Syria, having presumably replaced Seron after his failure. If the number 40,000 is authentic, this large force must have been divided between Nicanor and Gorgias (cf. 2 Mac 8:9), the latter of whom was in command of the Syrian fortresses in Idumaea (2 Mac 10:14; 12:32) at least in the following reign, and he may well have received this command from Lysias at this time.

The Persian expedition referred to in 31, 37 ('the higher countries' = the inland regions) was intended not merely to recoup the king, whose exchequer had been drained by the large indemnity imposed on Syria by the Romans after Magnesia (190 B.C.), but also to repress the rising power of Mithridates I, who had succeeded to the Parthian throne in 171 B.C. and was becoming too powerful for a mere vassal of the Seleucid kingdom. 'It is probable that to Antiochus the Jewish trouble seemed a small enough affair compared with the Parthian menace in the East. Some modern scholars speak sarcastically of the Jewish books which represent the events in Judaea as the things of central importance in the world and pretend that Antiochus' chief preoccupation was the ill-success of the local government forces in dealing with the Jewish bands. No doubt from the point of view of Antiochus the Jewish books greatly exaggerate the importance of events in Judaea, just as from the point of view of the Persian king, we may believe, the Greek books greatly exaggerated the importance of the battle of Marathon. In regard to the influence destined to be exerted on the subsequent history of mankind, the Greek books and the Jewish books were right. Of all that was happening in the kingdom of Antiochus, the events in Judaea were by far the most important in their consequences for the mind of man in the ages to come' (CAH 8:513 f.).

In 41 'servants' represents παῖδας of the Gk, but the Syriac reading suggests that the original text had πέδας 'fetters' which suits the context better. For 'Syria' read Edom, the error being due to the confusion of resh and daleth in the Hebrew original. The Edomites were traditional enemies of Israel; and for Edomite activity in the slave-trade see § 526e. 'Strangers' are the Philistines, thus regularly referred to in LXX; cf. 4:22, 30; 5:66.

42-60 The Mustering of the Jews—In face of the threat from the NW. (Emmaus, 40, the site of the Syrian camp, is some 15 m. WNW. of Jerusalem, according to the identification with the modern 'Amwas; others would place it at El-Qubeibe, some 8 m. NW. of the capital, which would agree with the 60 furlongs of Lk 24:13) Judas drew out his forces as far as Mizpah (Maspha), a sacred site associated with Samuel (1 Kg 7:5 f.) and probably to be identified with Nebi Samwil, some 6 m. NW. of Jerusalem. There they besought the help of God. There is some difficulty in 48. The accepted Gk reading is καὶ ἐξέπετασαν τὸ βιβλίον τοῦ νόμου περὶ ὧν ἐξηρένουν τὰ ἔθνη τὰ δοιῶματα τῶν εἰδώλων αὐτῶν, which is adequately rendered by Vg: 'et expanderunt libros legis de quibus scrutabantur gentes similitudinem simulacrorum suorum', sc. 'they laid open the books of the law concerning those things about which the Gentiles were accustomed to consult 563e their idol-images. The meaning of this is not certain, but Wellhausen, followed by Bévenot, suggests that the Jews opened their sacred books in order to find some reassuring message, even as the Gentiles were accustomed to consult oracles. (2 Mac 8:23 would bear out this interpretation.) This gives a reasonable sense and it is hardly necessary to emend. DV mistranslates.

In 40 'stirred up' = summoned. The exemptions in 56 are in accordance with the prescriptions of Deut 20:5 ff. 59 reminds us that it is at once a right and a duty to resist to the death where the enemy is bent on religious and political oppression. 60. Gk simply says: 'as it shall be the will in heaven'.

564a IV 1-25 Defeat of Gorgias (and Nicanor) at Emmaus—The parallel passage (2 Mac 8:24 ff.) makes it clear that Gorgias was here acting in concert with Nicanor, and that Judas scored a double victory, apparently over the force led by Nicanor, at Emmaus, and then over the force led by Gorgias, which had attacked the Jewish camp, S. of Emmaus; cf. 57. If Gorgias had already been appointed to the command in Idumaea, the attack would be from the S. concerted with Nicanor's advance from the N. But it is possible that Nicanor and Gorgias advanced together from the coast as far as Emmaus, and that Gorgias there attempted a turning movement. In any case Judas scored a brilliant victory in compelling the Syrian army, greatly superior in numbers, to withdraw from Judaea. 7-16 describe the victory over Nicanor's force, which is pursued as far as Gezer (Gezeron: Tell Jezer), a distance of 5 m. The plain of Idumaea is used apparently of the region W. of Judaea; Idumaea normally refers to the district to the S. of Judaea, but cf. 1 Mac 5:59 where Gorgias, 'commander of the strongholds in Idumaea', is found in command in the neighbourhood of Jamnia. For the attack on Nicanor Judas apparently divided his force, taking with him 3,000 lightly armed men (8) out of the 6,000 he had in all (2 Mac 8:15 LXX, where Vg and DV have 7,000). The remainder were doubtless left to protect his rear against the attack by Gorgias, which did not develop, when Gorgias realized that Nicanor was in flight. ('His men' in 20 is not in the Gk, which says simply: 'when he saw that they [sc. Nicanor's men] were in flight'.) Gorgias fled and Judas plundered his camp at leisure. In 24 the Gk says: 'they blessed heaven'.

b 26-35 Defeat of Lysias at Bethsura—Lysias with a still larger army now advances from the region SW. of Jerusalem. In 29 the MSS favour the reading Idumaea as against the Judaea of Vg and DV: Bethoron is presumably a corruption of Bethsura, i.e. Beit Sur, N. of Hebron and some 22 m. SSW. of Jerusalem (cf. 2 Mac 11:1-15), though the fortress for the possession of which this battle was presumably fought seems to have been situated a little farther to the west.

e 36-59 Entry into Jerusalem: Purification of the Temple: Encaenia—Stationing a force to prevent interference on the part of the garrison in the citadel (41; cf. 1:35), Judas carefully purifies the temple. He destroys the idol-altar ('the stones that had been defiled'), dismantles the altar of sacrifice, and stores away the constituent stones until the time when some prophet should arise who could be consulted as to their further disposal. A new altar is built and everything renewed for the temple-worship. The Feast of Dedication is celebrated on 25 Casleu, three years to the day since the setting up of the abomination of desolation (1:62). This encaenia—the renewal of the altar—became an annual feast; cf. Jn 10:22. Josephus (Ant. 12, 7, 7) calls it the Feast of Lights. For the parallel passage cf. 2 Mac 10:1-8.

d 60-V 8 Fortification of Sion and Bethsura: Campaigns against Idumaeans, etc.—The temple mount is fortified against the citadel-garrison; Bethsura (cf. 4:29) is occupied and strengthened, presumably as a preliminary to the campaign described at the beginning of ch. 6. There seems to be a slight textual error in 564d 61. A phrase has been repeated in the Gk text which has given rise in Vg to the reading muniuit eum ad custodiendam Bethsuram. What was meant is simply: muniuit Bethsuram—'he fortified Bethsura'.

Having secured the Holy City, Judas now proceeds to extend the area of his conquests. He is encouraged to do this by the persecution of the Jews settled amongst the heathen peoples of Idumaea and elsewhere: the sons of Esau, sc. the Edomites living in Acrabatane, a ridge SW. of the Dead Sea; the sons of Beon (cf. Num 32:3; Vg Beon, LXX Baian), living in Baal Meon, E. of the Dead Sea; the sons of Ammon, NE. of the Dead Sea, led by Timotheus. This campaign against the Ammonites is more fully described in 2 Mac 10:16-38. (Bévenot does not accept the identification of Gazer [Jazer] here with Gazara in 2 Mac 10:32, but it seems simpler to do so. In Num 32:3 it occurs in close connexion with Hesebon and Beon [Baian], and is probably situated some 23 m. ENE. of Jericho.)

V 9-54 Campaigns in Galilee and Galaad—Dividing 565a his forces into three parts, Judas plans campaigns to deliver the faithful Jews in Galilee and in Galaad, the district E. of Jordan. Simon is given the task of rescuing those in Galilee, and this he successfully achieves (21-23); Joseph is left with a garrison to protect the base in Judaea, but with strict orders not to undertake any offensive action—his disobedience in this respect being punished (56-62); Judas himself marches into the regions E. and NE. of Jordan and wages a highly successful campaign.

The details of the campaign are difficult to follow. b In 9 we are apparently informed that all the Jews who had escaped massacre had taken refuge in Dathema. In 26, 27 we learn that many of them were shut up in Barasa . . . 'and in the rest of the cities of Galaad'. Wellhausen suggests cutting the knot by emendation, reading were gathered together from in place of 'were shut up in' (26, 27), whilst in 27 he would read this city or stronghold (viz. Dathema) for 'these cities'. The latter suggestion is probably necessary; but there does not seem to be any need for the other changes suggested. The situation seems to be as follows. Many Jews had been massacred; but the earliest reports (13) were exaggerated. It appeared later that, in addition to those besieged in Dathema, there were others imprisoned in different cities in Galaad, doubtless awaiting execution (26). Judas set out first of all to relieve Dathema; but on receiving news from the Nabataeans (25): the famous nomad tribe, later to become predominant in Transjordan: cf. 2 Cor 11:32, he turned aside to attack Bosor first. Since Judas took Bosor (28) it is clear that it must have been in possession of the people of Galaad, and therefore there must be some corruption in 27 which suggests that they were attacking their own cities. Therefore it seems necessary to accept some emendation of that verse on the lines of Wellhausen's suggestion, or at least to understand 'cities' in 27b (Gk has τὰ οχυράματα) of Dathema alone. 'Them' refers not to cities but to the Jews—πάντας τούτους not πάντα ταύτα.

e As to the location of the places mentioned, the following seem to be the most acceptable suggestions. Dathema = ? Characa, sc. El-Kerak, some 45 m. E. of the Sea of Galilee; cf. 2 Mac 12:17. Bosora (Barasa = Bosor in 28), presumably the most southerly of the places referred to, since Judas, coming up from the S. attacked it first, may be identified with Bostra (Busra eski-Sham), some 50 m. ESE. of the Sea of Galilee and about 12 m. from Dathema (= El-Kerak), the 'fortress' of 29, a night's march away. Carnaim is probably Sheikh Sa'ad, some 23 m. E. of the Sea of Galilee, whilst Raphon (37) seems to be El-Rafe, some 17 m. NE. of Carnaim. Ephron (46) which Judas attacked on his return march, seems to be situated a few miles E. of the upper Jordan, since Bethshan (52), the modern Beisan, is the same as the 585e ancient Scythopolis, and is apparently not far from Ephron. The other places mentioned have not yet been satisfactorily identified.

13. The land of Tubin (cf. Tubianites 2 Mac 12:17) was apparently the region immediately to the E. of the Sea of Galilee.

Of Simon's brilliant campaign in Galilee, we are given tantalizingly little information. Even the locality of Arbatis (23) is uncertain; but presumably it lay somewhere in N. Samaria. Possibly it is Nabata, 10 m. NE. of Caesarea.

d 55-68 Joseph suffers Defeat: Judas restores the Situation—On his return to Jerusalem Judas found it necessary to undertake a campaign in the coastal plain to restore the situation which had been weakened by the defeat suffered by Joseph in consequence of his rash and disobedient sortie against Jamnia. According to 2 Mac 12:8, Judas had undertaken an expedition against Jamnia not long before his march into Galaad, and possibly Joseph and his associate thought that it would be an easy matter to imitate that sortie. But not only were they not of the Hasmonaeon house, they were acting contrary to orders, and their attempt met with disaster. Judas marched S., took Hebron (Chebron), some 20 m. S. of Jerusalem, and then turned W. towards Maresa (cf. 2 Mac 12:35), which should be read for 'Samaria' in 66. Having displayed his power as far as the coast at Azotus, he returned to Jerusalem. 'The aliens' (66) and 'strangers' (68) are the Philistines.

e VI 1-17 Death of Antiochus Epiphanes—In 2 Mac this event is recorded before the purification of the temple, but there is no doubt that it actually occurred after it. (For the reconciliation cf. 2 Mac 9:1 ff.) Correct Vg and DV (1) in accordance with a few Gk MSS (so Bévenot): 'he heard that there was in Elymais [= Elam] in Persia, a city greatly renowned for its wealth of silver and gold'. It seems probable that this attempt on the temple of the goddess took place early in the king's absence, since one of his motives for going to 'Persia' was to raise money (3:31), so the reports of the disaster to Lysias (6; cf. 4:26 ff.) and of the purification of the temple (7; cf. 4:36 ff.) and of the capture of Bethsura (ibid.; cf. 4:61) are rightly described as having reached him later. It is probable, then, that some considerable interval elapsed between the attack on the Persian temple and the king's death, though it is interesting to note that, in his account of the death of Antiochus, Polybius (31:11) speaks of him as having been 'driven mad, as some say, by certain manifestations of divine anger. . .'

The circumstances of the usurpation of the Seleucid throne by Antiochus Epiphanes made it necessary for him to take steps to secure the succession to his son, since the lawful heir, Demetrius, was now of an age to claim his rights, as he subsequently did (ch 7). Antiochus had left his son, of the same name, in the care of Lysias (3:33). Now, for some reason, he entrusts his affairs to Philip (14). This was to give rise to a struggle between Lysias and Philip, from which the Jews were to benefit (63).

586a 18-47 Eupator in person invades Judaea—Judas, having fortified the temple mount (4:60), now proceeds to reduce the citadel, held by a Syrian garrison and a number of apostate Jews. On an appeal from the garrison, the king, who has just succeeded to the throne, raises an exceptionally large army and marches to its relief. Once again the line of march is from the S., and the key-fortress of Bethsura (cf. 4:61) is invested. Its actual surrender is not mentioned until 49, but the fact that the battle between Judas and the king's forces was fought at Bethzacharias (32 ff.), which is N. of Bethsura, shows that the position must have been at least neutralized. Notice the fascination exercised upon the mind of the writer by the elephants, stimulated to battle by the sight of 'blood', even if it is only the juice of grapes and mulberries. The presence of 32 men (37) on each beast is a manifest impossibility and the reading is best explained as a corruption of '2 or 3' men. Fairweather suggests that in the original HT 'two chosen men' was read, and the same consonants would give the existing reading: a similar confusion is indicated in 1 Par 11:11; 2 Kg 23:8. 40. 'was distinguished by' = 'marched separately along'. 43. Eleazar, son of Saura, is, according to the Gk reading, ὁ Ἀβάρων, the Eleazar Abaron (2:5) or Avaran, meaning probably 'beast-sticker', a name presumably given to him posthumously because of this exploit. He was therefore the brother of Judas.

48-63 Siege of Jerusalem: Peace—After the reduction of Bethsura and the victory of Bethzacharias, the king made his way without difficulty to the Holy City. Fortunately for the Jews the siege he began had to be broken off because of the approach of Philip (cf. 14), who resolved to enforce his claim to the title of regent conferred upon him by the late king, against Lysias, the acting regent. The possibility of an attempt by Demetrius to claim the throne (7:1) was an added reason for coming to some arrangement with the Jews. After concluding an armistice the king treacherously orders the destruction of the fortifications of the temple mount. 51. 'pieces' = pieces of artillery (σκορπίδια).

VII 1-25 Demetrius: Intrigues of Alcimus, etc.—Demetrius' landing at Tripolis (so 2 Mac 14:1) 'with a few men' (Polybius says there were 16 in all) is made the occasion of a difficulty, since 2 Mac 14:1 speaks of 'a great power and a navy'. But this is an artificial objection. Presumably Demetrius would have an army waiting for him. Marching upon Antioch (2: 'the house of the kingdom of his fathers'; cf. Dan 4:30, where a similar expression in Gk is used of the capital Babylon), he is welcomed by the army who put to death Antiochus Eupator and Lysias. Approached by a deputation from the Hellenizing party of the Jews, headed by the high-priest Alcimus, he appoints Bacchides, governor of Coele-Syria (the land beyond the river Euphrates, sc. from the point of view of Persia), to undertake the task of suppressing Judas. By treachery, Alcimus and Bacchides at first prevail, especially persuading the Hasidaeans not to resist (13: 'the Hasidaeans were pre-eminent amongst the [faithful] Israelites', cf. 2:42; the implication is that their example would be followed by others). But the ensuing massacre causes a revulsion of feeling, and though Bacchides leaves Alcimus the support of an army (20), presumably to suppress Judas and his party, the latter manages to restore the situation.

19. Crampon suggests that 'from' is a mistake for to Jerusalem. According to him the Hebrew min, used here (as in Gen 11:12; 13:11; Is 22:3, etc.) of motion towards has been mistranslated as meaning away from. The correction will enable us to understand Bethzecha as a suburb of Jerusalem (cf. Josephus, Ant. 12, 10, 2—Berzetho, perhaps the same as the later Bezetha: Josephus, B^J 5, 4, 2). 24. 'coasts': 'regions' (Vg 'fines'). 'They ceased to go forth any more into the country', sc. to vex the faithful; or possibly, by means of some exemplary punishment, he prevailed on those who were seeking to desert from his army to stay and fight.

28-50 Defeat and Death of Nicanor: 'Nicanor's Day'—In response to a further appeal from Alcimus, Demetrius sends a fresh force under Nicanor. According to 2 Mac 14:19 ff., Nicanor is at first friendly and only resorts to violence under pressure from the king. (This Nicanor is apparently to be distinguished from the Nicanor of 3:38, etc., since the latter was fighting in Judaea at a time when, according to Josephus, the other was with Demetrius in Rome.) It is not known where Capharsalama (31) was, but some identify it with the Khirbet Deir Sellam, some 5 m. N. of Jerusalem. We do not know in what direction Judas had withdrawn on the dismantling of the temple fortifications by Eupator (6:62). After this first defeat, and in spite of the assurances of the priests of their loyalty to the king, shown by their offering sacrifices for him

566e (33 : cf. Esd 6:10), Nicanor seeks to suppress the Jews by force. In a final battle at Bethhoron (cf. 3:16) or Adasa (Adarsa) [40 : according to Josephus, Ant. 12, 10, 5, this is some 4 m. from Bethhoron], Nicanor is killed, 'first in the battle'. This need not mean that Nicanor was the first casualty in the whole engagement, especially as Josephus says that he fell 'at length', but merely that, in the closing stages of the fight, as soon as Nicanor fell, the rest fled. It is possible that the Gk text means Nicanor the general was slain. The pursuit to Gazara (45 ; cf. 4:15) covered a distance of some 20 m. Then they sounded the solemn trumpets (cf. 4:40 ; Num 31:6). 46. 'they pushed them with the horns' (Vg 'ventilabant cornibus') is a misunderstanding of ὑπερεκέναν, sc. 'they outflanked them'.

This great victory over Nicanor was celebrated with a special thanksgiving service, which became an annual festival, held on the anniversary (13 Adar) even in the time of Josephus (Ant. 12, 10, 5). It lapsed later possibly because of the immediate proximity of Purim (14 Adar).

567a VIII 1-32 Alliance with Rome—It was entirely in accordance with Rome's foreign policy in the eastern Mediterranean at this time that she should have encouraged the Jews in their revolt against the Syrian power. Whilst reluctant to assume any responsibilities which would require warlike action on her part, she was glad to foster any tendencies which would weaken the stronger powers. The treaty negotiated between Judas and the Senate is precisely what we might have expected. 'Doubts have been thrown on its existence on the ground that to recognize the Jewish state as an independent power would have been a casus belli between Rome and Demetrius, and that, as a matter of fact, the Romans let the Hasmonaeans down before Demetrius without giving them any help. These objections have no force in view of the fact that Rome behaved in just the same way with regard to the rebel Timarchus. . . . The Senate had indeed no intention of intervening by armed force in Syria ; it desired only to embarrass Demetrius by giving countenance to his enemies' (CAH 8:519).

b The general impression of Rome's power, prestige and moral qualities recorded in 1-16 is not vouched for by the sacred writer as necessarily accurate in all its details, but simply as what Judas heard (1), as he doubtless did. Any inaccuracy in detail therefore in no way relates to the inerrancy of Scripture. 2. 'Galatia' may, as Mommsen held, refer to the subjugation of Cisalpine Gaul by Rome in 190 B.C., but there seems no reason to refuse the more natural identification with Galatia in Asia Minor, which would be of greater interest to the Jews. We know of a campaign in that district conducted by Manlius Volso in 189 B.C. 'Large sums, sometimes amounting to 200 talents, were extorted from numerous cities' (CAH 8:228 f.). 3. Spain was annexed in 201 B.C., but only partially pacified at the time. 4. 'had conquered places that were very far off from them'. So Vg ; LXX says : 'the place [Spain] was very far off from them'. 'The kings from the ends of the earth' are presumably the Carthaginian leaders, Hannibal and Hasdrubal, coming from Spain. 5. 'The king of the Chittim (Ceteans = Greeks in general ; here Macedonians : cf. 1:19) refers first to Philip V defeated at Cynoscephalae in 197 B.C. and then to Perseus defeated at Pydna in 167 B.C. 7. Antiochus the Great was defeated at Magnesia in 190 B.C., but was not actually taken alive. 'that which was agreed upon' (Vg 'constitutum' is in Gk διασπολή) apparently = a division of the land. 8. 'Indians and Medes' must be corrupt. Risberg suggests Pisidians and Milyans ; Crampon, with greater probability, Ionians and Mysians. 9-10 refer to the Aetolian War of 191-188, the general being M. Fulvius Nobilior. The details of 15-16 are not entirely accurate. The Senate did not meet daily, and there were of course two consuls. But in the absence of his colleague, either of them might be described, as in effect he would appear to the eyes of a visiting foreigner, as supreme head of the state. 567b

17. Eupolemus may be the Palestinian Jew who wrote on OT subjects at this time (cf. Schürer, 3:474-477 ; 2 Mac 4:11). Jacob (LXX Akkos or Akkhos) : a name in a priestly family. If Eleazar is the hero of 6:43 ff., this Jason will be a nephew of Judas. Meyer suggests the martyr of 2 Mac 6.

For the treaty, cf. Bévenot ad loc., who gives an interesting comparison with a treaty concluded between Rome and Astypalaea in 105 B.C. (Text in Hicks : Man. Gk. Hist. Inscr., 347-9). The text of 26 and 28 presents some difficulty. A clearer parallel seems to be required than is given by the existing text. Thus Romans in 26 seems to require Jeus in 28, whilst 'they shall observe their orders without deceit' (28) is the counterpart of the obscure phrase in 26 : 'they shall obey their orders without taking anything from them'. But there is no clear explanation of the origin of the corruption. Knabenbauer is perhaps right in seeing in these passages indications that there was no strict equality envisaged. In both cases, it was Rome who would decide the nature of the obligations incumbent both upon herself and on her partner ; nor were the Jews to hope for any return for their assistance.

IX 1-22 Death of Judas—It seems not unlikely that the speed with which Demetrius acted after the disaster to the army of Nicanor caught Judas unawares. Nicanor had fallen on 13 Adar and in the first month of the following year, sc. Nisan, a fresh Syrian army was already in Jerusalem (8). Even allowing for an intercalary month, this gives only a few weeks for the news of the defeat to reach Antioch, for the raising of a new army and for the march S. through Galilee. 2. 'Galgai' is most probably a corruption of Galilee (cf. Josephus, Ant. 12, 11, 1 ; in Jos 12:33, the reverse corruption has occurred, Galgal in the Heb. having become Galilee in LXX). Arbela (Arabella) is the modern Khirbet Irbid or Arbed, not far from the W. shore of the Sea of Galilee and near the Horns of Hattin, site of the great Christian defeat by Saladin in A.D. 1187. Masaloth (Heb. m'sillôt) is the steep descent from the caves in this region ; cf. Josephus, B7 1, 16. 4. Berea, perhaps El-Birch, 10 m. N of Jerusalem, is not far from (5) Laisa (El-'Ashshy). 15. 'The mount Azotus' of DV is an attempt to smooth out the difficulty of Gk and Vg 'the mountain of Azotus', that city lying in the maritime plain. The error probably arose in the Heb. original, 'as'dōd (Azotus) being confused with 'as'dōt 'he pursued them even to the mountain-slopes'.

It seems clear that Judah had some premonition that this was to be his last battle. There is a lack of his customary confidence in the words he addresses to his few followers, and though there is no lack of courage in his day-long resistance, it is surprising to find him deceived by the old trap of the retreating right wing and the encircling left. For the sepulchre at Modin, cf. 13:25 ff.

23-31 Election of Jonathan—The death of Judas was a great blow to the cause. 'The wicked' and 'the workers of iniquity' (the Hellenizing Jews) took heart, and the prevailing scarcity (24) was apparently used by Bacchides as an opportunity to bribe those in need to come over to his side ; cf. Josephus, Ant. 13, 1, 1. There seems to be a striking personification in 24 : 'the very land itself went over to the side of Bacchides' (cf. Os 9:2 vinum mentietur eis ; Hab 3:17 mentietur opus olivae, etc.). 25 suggests the appointment of quislings as local officials. The reference to the absence of a prophet (27) recalls 8:46 and the anticipations, not necessarily of the Messiah, but at least of some spiritual leader. The sad plight of the Jews was made more obvious by the lack of any leader. Hence the election of Jonathan (30), who took upon him the leadership. It seems strange that there was no automatic succession.

568b 32-57 Jonathan Leader : Bacchides and Alcimus again in Judaea : Death of Alcimus : Bacchides withdraws

—Jonathan seems to have succeeded to the leadership of Judaea in circumstances not unlike those which prevailed when Judas was chosen. It is true that the temple was freed from its pollution, but the Jewish army was forced to take to the desert (33 : Tekoa is some 5 m. S. of Bethlehem, Asphar 3 m. further S.), whilst Jonathan sent his brother John with a caravan, including, as Bévenot suggests, their wives and children, as well as their treasures, to seek safety with the Nabataeans, who had shown themselves friendly on a previous occasion ; cf. 5:26. However, one tribe or party amongst them, the sons of Jambri (the name Ya'amru is conjectured on a Nabataean inscription), sallied out of their stronghold at Madaba, some 12 m. E. of the N. end of the Dead Sea, and captured the whole party. Jonathan undertook a punitive expedition against them (38 ff.), and on his return was intercepted by Bacchides who had crossed the Jordan (43 : 34 has apparently crept into the text by an erroneous copying of 43 : it has no connexion with what has preceded). Bacchides contrived to force the Jews into a position between his army and the marshy lands on the E. bank of the Jordan near its mouth. In the ensuing engagement Jonathan personally attacked Bacchides. After the Syrian force had been driven back some distance, the Jews succeeded in crossing the Jordan back to their own country. But Bacchides proceeded to hold the whole region down by a series of forts (50, 52), stretching from Dok, the fortress of Jericho, and including Emmaus (cf. 3:40), Bethhoron (3:16), Bethel (which is Beitin, some 10 m. N. of Jerusalem, watching the old road from Jericho), Timnath (Tell Tibneh, some 12 m. NW. of Bethel) and Phara (the Pharathon of Jg 12:15 ; being the modern Far'ata, W. of Sichem) ; Thopo (LXX Tephon) is unidentified. For Bethsura and Gazara (cf. 4:29 ; 4:15 ; 'the castle' is the citadel of Jerusalem (1:35, etc.).

c The action of Alcimus referred to in 54 is thought to be the destruction of the Soreg, the low wall separating the Court of the Gentiles from the inner Court to which the Jews alone were allowed access. Such an action would symbolize his desire to Hellenize the temple, and, though not as drastic as the setting up of the altar to Zeus by Antiochus Epiphanes, would be most repugnant to devout Jews. His paralysis and death put an end to the project. The departure of Bacchides is not explained, but presumably he felt that the military occupation of the land had been adequately secured, whilst the death of the high-priest may have relieved him of any necessity to persevere with a religious policy for which he had no inclination. At any rate Judaea was untroubled for two years (57).

d 58-73 Return of Bacchides : Treaty—However, the intrigues of the Hellenizers against Jonathan went on and eventually they prevailed upon Bacchides to return with an army. Again Jonathan was forced to take refuge in the desert, after eluding an attempt to capture him. In 61 for 'he apprehended' Gk reads συνέλαβον 'they apprehended', which may refer either to the party of Bacchides—as Josephus interprets it—or, more probably, to the faithful Jews, the 'authors of the mischief' being the Hellenizers. Bethbessen (62) is Khirbet Beit Bassa, some 3 m. ESE. of Bethlehem. Bacchides besieged the Jews here, being apparently supplied by the local Bedouin. Jonathan divided his forces, leaving Simon to hold the fortress whilst he himself attacked the allies of Bacchides, under their leader Odares (LXX Odomera), and thus cut off the supplies on which the Syrians depended. The success of this attack, coupled with a victorious sortie by Simon, forced Bacchides to raise the siege. 69 rather implies that Bacchides had entered upon the expedition with some reluctance (cf. 57, 59), and Jonathan found little difficulty in arranging a favourable peace. With his final withdrawal, Jonathan was able to establish a semi-independent principality with its military centre at Michmash (Mukhmas, about 7½ m. SE. of Bethel), and to set about reducing the power of the Hellenizers. But the citadel of Jerusalem was still held for Demetrius, and 10:6, 7 implies that Jonathan was not authorized to raise troops and was required to give hostages for good conduct.

X 1-47 Demetrius and Alexander Balas bid for the Support of Jonathan—Demetrius, already surrounded by hostile powers in Pergamum, Cappadocia and Egypt, now finds himself threatened with civil rebellion, when a young man, claiming to be the son of Antiochus Epiphanes and backed by the king of Pergamum, makes a bid for the Seleucid throne. Deciding to conciliate Jonathan, he formally recognizes what was a fait accompli, the independence of Jonathan, by withdrawing the garrisons from Judaea, with the exception of Bethsur and the citadel, and the Jewish leader soon establishes himself in the Holy City, rebuilding the fortifications of the temple mount. Alexander, on his side, goes even further, appointing Jonathan to the high-priesthood, which has apparently been vacant since the death of Alcimus, and giving him the title of king's friend, presumably with something of the status of a client-king of the Roman Empire. Demetrius goes further still by remitting the tribute due to him. The crowns (29) were sent as tokens of submission, the charge being generally commuted to a money-payment. The three cities (regions) of Samaria-and-Galilee (30) are named in 11:34—Ephraim, Lydda and Ramathaim. We get a clue in 36 to this astonishing liberality on the part of Demetrius—shortage of man-power. Ptolemais (39) was hardly in the king's gift, being then occupied by the supporters of Balas (1), and it seems likely that the king was thus hoping to embroil the Jews with his rival. The sums mentioned in 40 and 42 (£3,200 and £1,067 respectively) together with the different amounts of tribute referred to in 29 and 30 give some indication of the material value to the king of the Judaeian dependency.

48-66 Jonathan's Relations with Alexander and Ptolemy—Jonathan's decision to support Alexander may have been dictated not merely by doubts as to the sincerity of Demetrius (46), but also by the realization that, with the support of Egypt, the former was more likely to prevail, as indeed happened. But in spite of his victory over Demetrius (48-50), 'it was a sign of the subordination to Egypt which marked the new state of things in Syria that Alexander seems to have resided more in Ptolemais than in Antioch' (CAH 8:324). The scene described in 59-62 indicates that Alexander still felt the need to cultivate the friendship of Jonathan, possibly foreseeing the coming breach with Ptolemy. In addition to other marks of honour, Jonathan receives the titles of First Friend, General and Ethnarch (65), sc. he receives formal confirmation of his position as leader of the military forces in Judaea and as civil governor in that area.

67-89 Jonathan defeats Apollonius, General of Demetrius II—With the attempt of Demetrius II to regain his father's throne, the position of Jonathan is once more threatened. Apollonius, governor of Coele-Syria tries to suppress the Jewish high-priest, but not only does the latter with the help of his brother Simon force Apollonius out of Joppe, but he also succeeds in reducing several Philistine towns. 'As one that was making a journey' (78) is obscure and no satisfactory explanation can be suggested. It may mean that Apollonius travelled to Azotus with a small escort, like a simple traveller, though when he got there he did not stay but joined his large force of cavalry in the plain outside the city. The purpose of this is not clear. Josephus helps us to understand what happened next (Ant. 13, 4, 4). Apollonius posted 1,000 of his cavalry in a wady ('privately' 79). Jonathan drew up his army in a hollow square, with orders to remain on the defensive (80, 81), until the enemy cavalry were exhausted and much of the ammunition used up. Then he attacked the infantry, unprotected by the cavalry, and routed them. As a result of this

d XI 1-19 Alexander and Ptolemy at War : Death of Both—It is not certain what precise policy Ptolemy had formulated when he invaded Syria. According to Diodorus and Josephus he originally intended to help his son-in-law Alexander against Demetrius. Probably he was merely hoping to turn the situation to his own advantage, and to that end was prepared, if it should prove more profitable, to sacrifice his son-in-law. Jonathan prudently supported the invader, escorting him as far as the river Eleutherus, the boundary between Phoenicia and Syria proper (7). Having got possession of Antioch and formed a league with Demetrius, Ptolemy joined battle with Alexander, who was defeated and fled into Arabia (? in the neighbourhood of Palmyra; there is a Palmyrene inscription bearing the name Zabdai; 17), where he met his end. However, Ptolemy himself died a few days later, of wounds received in the engagement, and the way was clear for Demetrius to assume the crown. The Egyptian garrisons in the coast-towns (3, 18: 'they that were in the camp' ἐν τοῖς ὀχυρώμασι) are the inhabitants of these cities.

e 20-37 Jonathan is reconciled to Demetrius II—Apparently Demetrius did not feel himself strong enough to break with Jonathan, who played his cards skilfully and persuaded the king to renew the concessions made by his father, numbering him amongst his chief friends (27), and remitting the tribute from Judaea and the three Samaritan districts (10:30; 11:34) on payment of 300 talents (approx. £97,500). The king ratified his decision in letters addressed to Jonathan himself and to Lasthenes (the Cretan who had been responsible for the operations leading to his restoration), who is styled, after the oriental fashion kinsman (31) and father (32). The districts mentioned in 34 are Apherema (Ephraim: 2 Kg 13:23; 2 Par 13:19; Jn 11:54), some 6 or 7 m. N. of Bethel, Lydda (Ludd) N.E. of Jamnia and Accaron, and Ramatha (probably the Arimathaea of Mk 15:43, etc. = Beit-Rima, between Lydda and Shechem, or possibly Rentis, a little further W.). 'Instead of' is not clear, but the meaning probably is that the Jews were to receive the produce from these places instead of having to pay tribute themselves.

f 38-53 Jonathan supports Demetrius against Tryphon—The Cretan mercenaries who had put Demetrius on the throne became a source of odium to the Syrians, especially to the army (38), who felt themselves disgraced by their presence; Diodotus 'the Rake' (Tryphon), who had been a governor at Antioch under Alexander, took this opportunity to set up a rival to Demetrius. He concerted a plot with an Arabian Emalchuel (conceivably an associate of the Zabdai with whom Alexander had taken refuge, possibly having his son with him), to proclaim Alexander's son king as Antiochus VI. Jonathan at first continued his support of Demetrius, but later changed his allegiance, perhaps because the latter, who had undertaken to withdraw his garrisons from the strongholds of Judaea (41, 42: cf. 10:12) and from the citadel of Jerusalem, failed to implement his promise. Moreover Antiochus showed a readiness to confirm and to extend the privileges enjoyed by the surviving Hasmonaeans (55 ff.).

g 54-74 Jonathan supports Antiochus VI against Demetrius : Victory in Galilee against the latter's Generals—Antiochus conferred a marked honour upon the Jews by appointing Simon governor of the whole coastal region from below Tyre to the frontiers of Egypt. In connexion with this appointment Jonathan marched through Coele-Syria ('the land beyond the river'; cf. 7:8) to Philistia. Ascalon opened its gates to him, and when Gaza resisted he compelled it to surrender hostages; after this he marched, presumably on reconnaissance, as far N. as Damascus. Meanwhile Simon regained control of Bethsura (cf. 4:29, etc.). 569g These operations were directed against Demetrius and his partisans, ostensibly on behalf of Antiochus, though of course the Jews would benefit directly from this extension of the power of their arms.

Meanwhile the generals of Demetrius invaded Galilee h and Jonathan marched against them, to the region of Cades, some 15 m. N. of Genesar (87—the first mention in Scripture of the Lake of Gennesareth). Hazor (Asor) is some 3 m. SW. of Cades. At first, taken in the rear as well as meeting opposition from in front, the Jews began to run away; Jonathan and two of his fellow-officers stood their ground and by their example restored the situation, and apparent defeat was turned into victory. Absalom (70) is perhaps the man referred to in 2 Mac 11:17. Calphi = Alphaeus (Mt 10:3).

XII 1-23 Embassy to Rome and Sparta—Jonathan 570a decided to make the most of the favourable turn of events ('the time served him', or as we should say, fortune was on his side: 1) by strengthening the bonds with Rome and also by forming other alliances. The ambassadors chosen were to go to Rome first and to Sparta on their return journey, which was performed under a safe-conduct given by the Romans (4). The letters were sent in the name of Jonathan the high-priest and 'the ancients of the people'—the gerousia mentioned by Josephus (Ant. 12, 3, 3: ? cf. 2 Par 19:8), later the Sanhedrin, a name which is first found in Josephus (Ant. 14, 9, 4) under Hyrcanus II—the priests and the people as a whole. The Onias of 7 is Onias I, a contemporary of Arius I of Sparta (309-265). Josephus (Ant. 12, 4, 10) misplaces this document hopelessly. In 9 the Jews make it plain that the kinship alleged by the Spartans to exist between the two nations does not alter the fact that they themselves possess the revelation of God, which is their chief hope and comfort, though they are not unwilling to accept the friendship of Sparta. The statement that the Jews had prayed for the Spartans is an interesting and valuable sidelight on the spirit of genuine Jewish piety, which was by no means so exclusive as is sometimes suggested by its more Pharisaical aspects; cf. Bar 1:11. 15 is a more explicit expression of the confidence the Jews had in the aid of God, as being of incomparably greater value than any human alliance. At the same time, they do not reject any natural assistance that is compatible with their supreme allegiance. The statement in the letter of Arius to Onias (21) that the Spartans were descended from Abraham need not be taken too seriously. It is little more than a conventional opening, like the term kinsman (11:31); the passage often referred to in Josephus (Ant. 14, 10, 22), in which the Pergamenes speak of friendship existing between their ancestors and the Jews in the days of Abraham is another such empty compliment.

24-38 New Campaign against the Generals of Demetrius b—The fact that Jonathan was able to intercept the invading army in the land of Hamath (26), sc. on the middle Orontes, is a striking indication of the reality of Jewish might at this time. True, the Syrian army made its escape by means of a stratagem (by leaving fires burning in their camp to create the impression that they were still there even after they had retreated), but the general effect was a real victory for the Jews. The success of Jonathan against the Zabadaeans, somewhere to the NW. of Damascus, is also a measure of his power.

39-54 Simon's Successes in the South and in Judaea : Jonathan is betrayed to Tryphon—Simon (11:59) had been made governor of the coastal regions S. from Tyre, and in this capacity he prevents an incipient defection of Joppe to the party of Demetrius. He then proceeds to blockade the citadel in Jerusalem and to strengthen the fortifications of the city. The brook (37) is Cedron. Caphetetha (37) is obscure, and no certain interpretation can be given. One suggestion is that it means hunger-wall and may have 570e formed a part of the blockading works. Adiada is 3 m. E. of Lydda, dominating the Shephelah or low hills between the coastal plain and the central range of Judaea. Vespasian had a fortified camp here during the siege of Jerusalem (Josephus, BJ 4, 11, 1).

Tryphon, who had put Antiochus VI on the throne, now plans to make himself king. As a first step he decides to remove the support which Jonathan was likely to give to the young king, and to that end he invades Palestine. He gets as far as Bethshan (= Scythopolis; 5:52) before he is checked. Realizing that Jonathan is too strong to be overcome by force, he tricks him into dismissing his army and then entraps him at Ptolemais. In spite of the first report (50) Jonathan is not killed immediately (cf. 13:23).

571a XIII 1-11 Simon succeeds Jonathan—After being chosen to succeed his brother as leader (? and high-priest, cf. 13:36; 14:35), Simon first completes the fortification of Jerusalem and then garrisons Joppe with fresh troops, possibly because the former garrison was likely to support Tryphon. 11. Absalom: cf. 11:70.

b 12-30 Tryphon invades Judaea, puts Jonathan to death and usurps the Kingdom of Syria—Simon, hearing that Tryphon was preparing an expedition against him, occupied the position fortified by his brother on a previous occasion (Addus, 13 = Adiada 12:38), and after Tryphon's treacherous offer to release Jonathan in exchange for a ransom and on surrender of hostages, convicted him of deceit. When the invasion took place by the road from the coast (Ador = Dura, 5 m. WSW. of Hebron), Simon, moving on interior lines, managed to keep between Tryphon and the capital (20), to prevent the relief of the citadel-garrison. Eventually Tryphon was compelled to withdraw beyond the Jordan. (22 in Vg is corrupt: 'non venit in Galaaditim' apparently by haplography for something like non venit [propter nivem sed solvit et venit] in Galaaditim: sc. he failed to reach Jerusalem because of the snow but departed and reached Galaad.) There he killed Jonathan, and having buried him at Bascama (= ? Tell-Bazuk, NE. of the Sea of Galilee) returned to Antioch. Vg and DV say that he also slew the sons of Jonathan; this is not in LXX, but is probable.

Jonathan's remains were rescued by Simon and buried at Modin, his native place (2:1), in a sepulchre which, according to Josephus (Ant. 13, 6, 6), still stood in his day. Traces of it are to be found in modern times (DBV IV 1186 f.). The monument carried trophies to symbolize Jonathan's might by land and sea.

c 31-53 Simon seeks the Favour of Demetrius II: his Successes—The usurpation of the Syrian crown by Tryphon led Simon to restore his support to Demetrius. The latter granted complete autonomy to the Jews—'the yoke of the Gentiles was taken from Israel' (41)—and the event was noted by being taken as the starting point for a new chronological era, as is testified by some extant copper coins of Simon. All that remained was to expel the garrison from the citadel and from Gazara (4:15). 'Gaza' of 43 must be a mistake, as that town was not occupied until 96 B.C.—nearly 50 years after this date; Josephus (Ant. 13, 6, 7; BJ 1, 2, 2) reads Gazara = Tell Jezer, some 6 m. S. of Lydda and virtually the key of Judaea. Macalister (The Excavation of Gezer, I, 209) discovered there the remains of a Maccabean palace, bearing a Greek inscription, calling down fire 'upon the palace of Simon'. The seal was set on the work of the Hasmonaeans by the final reduction of the citadel at Jerusalem (50), for so long a thorn in the side of the faithful Jews (1:35, etc.). The feast which was instituted on this occasion is no longer kept. Simon then proceeded to fortify the mount opposite the citadel (53). (According to Josephus the people actually levelled the mount of the citadel; but this was probably done later.) John, famous in history as John Hyrcanus, succeeded his father as governor of the coastal district and commander-in-chief of the Jewish army. 571e

XIV 1-15 Judaea under Simon—The defeat of Demetrius by the Parthian king, Mithridates I (Arsaces (2) being a name assumed by all the Parthian kings, after the founder of the dynasty) still further strengthens the position of Simon. The occupation of Joppe (5) gives a valuable outlet to the sea, a fact presumably underlying the nautical features of the family sepulchre at Modin (13:29). The possession of Gazara, Bethsur and the citadel (7) gives him the keys of Judaea. The different strongholds are provisioned and fortified (he provided them with all the gear necessary for their fortification 10), and although the language of 4 is to be explained as rhetorical exaggeration, since the peace was broken towards the end of his reign (15:39), this time is undoubtedly one of great peace and prosperity. Above all, of course, it is a time when the Law is carefully observed and offenders destroyed (14).

16-24a Renewal of Alliances with Rome and Sparta e—It seems desirable, as Bévenot suggests, to read 24a before 16. As we shall see, 24b is certainly corrupt, and there is no evidence to suggest that Simon sent two embassies at this time, whereas 16 follows naturally on 24a. The order of events then is: Embassy to Rome; renewal of Roman alliance (24a, 16-19a); on their return the ambassadors visit Sparta (21), and the Spartans send a letter renewing the pact made with Jonathan (12:23). Apparently the same ambassadors were employed as on the previous occasion (22; 12:16).

24b-49 Inscription in Honour of Simon—The people of Rome' (Vg 'Populus Romanus') is a copyist's error. The Gk says simply the people, and the context demands that the Jewish people be understood. 48 bears this out.

There are a number of perplexities in the passage, due to some extent to the fact that the inscription may have been a Hebrew translation of a Greek original, and the Hebrew finds some difficulty in expressing the long sustained syntax of the proclamation; there are also several slips on the part of copyists, either of the Gk or of Vg. The general sense is however clear enough. The document gives a brief summary of the services rendered by the Hasmonaean family in general (29-31) and of Simon in particular (32-35); it then describes the honours already conferred upon him (35), his further services (36-37), and the confirmation of his office by Demetrius II (38). 'And he heard' (40) is based on the authority of the better Gk MSS, which read ἤκουσε, but there can be little doubt that the other reading ἠκούσθη (= it has been heard by the Jews) is correct since (a) Demetrius was a prisoner in Parthia at this time (3), and even if he had heard of the embassy to Rome, he could have done nothing about it; (b) he had already confirmed the appointment of Simon as high-priest (13:36). (Bévenot suggests that Spartans should be read in 40 in place of 'Romans', since the latter had not called the Jews 'brethren'. Perhaps Romans and Spartans should be read.) It will be necessary to modify the syntax of 41, omitting 'that' and reading: 'So the Jews and their priests have consented that he should be their prince and high-priest from generation to generation', sc. the high-priesthood and kingship of Simon are made hereditary; cf. 25 'What thanks shall we give to Simon and his sons?'

27. 'At Asamarel' (Vg in Asamarel, LXX ἐν ἀσαραμὲλ) g seems to imply an original Heb. form šar 'am 'ēl = 'Leader of the people of God', as a title conferred on Simon. Read therefore, 'Simon the high-priest and leader of the people of God'. This will, it is true, introduce into 1 Mac the only explicit mention of the Name of God, but in such a case as this it is probably no more difficult than, say, in the parallel Israel. 28. It has been proposed to omit the first 'and' reading 'in a great assembly of the priests of the people', thus giving a better balance to the 571g sentence. 84. Gazara is actually some 17 m. from Azotus, but their territories may have been adjacent.

In 48, by a happy mistranslation, DV restores the original sense, obscured by Vg 'in loco celebri': the Gk ἐν τόπῳ ἐπισήμῳ must mean 'in a conspicuous place'. A copy was to be placed in the Temple Treasury—the very word of the Gk is preserved in Jn 8:20 'in gazophylacio'—which presumably included archives as well as actual treasures. It was put in safe keeping, as the possession of Simon and his descendants.

572a XV 1-14 Antiochus VII seeks the Support of Simon against Tryphon—Antiochus, brother of the captive Demetrius, was a man of energy for all his extreme youth (he was only 20 at the beginning of his reign), and soon took in hand the defence of his kingdom against the usurping Tryphon. His letter to Simon before his landing is an explicit and formal recognition of all existing privileges (including one not previously mentioned, that of coining money; though we know that Simon had been striking coins at least a year before this). Landing in Syria he drove Tryphon before him as far as Dora (Tanturah, 9 m. N. of Caesarea), where he blockaded him (10-14).

b 15-24 Various Letters from Rome in Support of the Jews—The authenticity of the first letter (16-21) is upheld by a curious mistake of Josephus, who puts a similar document, bearing the names of Lucius Valerius as consul, and of Numenius and Alexander as ambassadors, into the reign of Hyrcanus II (Ant. 14, 8, 5). The Lucius of 16 is presumably L. Calpurnius Piso, consul in 139 B.C. Ptolemy is Euergetes II, king of Egypt 145-116. For the allusions in 17, 18, cf. 14:24. Demetrius was, of course, by now a prisoner, but the news of his capture could not have reached Rome before the embassy left. Attalus II, king of Pergamum, 160/159-139/138 B.C.; Ariarathes V of Cappadocia, 163-c. 130 B.C.; Arsaces (cf. 14:2) = Mithridates I king of Parthia, 171-138; Lampsacus, a Mysian town on the Hellespont; but more probably we should read with LXX Sampsame, a town on the Black Sea coast, E. of Sinope: Delos, Samos and Cos are islands in the Aegean, Rhodes the chief island of the Dodecanese group; Sicyon, neighbour of Corinth, had naturally become much more important since the destruction of the latter place in 146 B.C.; Myndos, Cnidus and Halicarnassus are all situated in (the last-named being the capital of) Caria, in the SW. corner of Asia Minor; Phaselis is a seaport in Lycia, E. of Caria; E. of Lycia is Pamphylia, with Side an important harbour; Aradus is an island, containing a town of the same name, off the Phoenician coast; Gortyna is in the island of Crete; Cyrene is the capital of Libya in N. Africa. As will be seen the names are arranged in no recognizable order, and it would be interesting to know what were the relationships existing between Rome and these scattered communities, most of them outside the limits of the Roman Empire, though well within her sphere of influence.

c 25-XVI 10 Antiochus VII breaks with Simon: his General, Cendebeus, is defeated by the Sons of the High-Priest—Once Antiochus had pinned Tryphon down (15:14), he apparently felt strong enough to demand reparations for the extra-Judaean annexations (28: cf. 12:33; 13:43) and even for the citadel of Jerusalem, which he claimed as part of his kingdom. Simon's answer is entirely justified, though we have no means of judging how far 100 talents (£32,500) would provide an adequate compensation for the loss of Gazara and Joppe. The seaport at any rate represented a serious loss to the Syrian king, but the Jews were entitled to recoup themselves for the extensive damage that had been inflicted on their country under the Syrian domination. The issue could be decided only by force, and whilst Antiochus pursued Tryphon (who first escaped to Orthosias, N. of Tripolis, but was captured and compelled to commit suicide; cf. Strabo 14:668), he left the management of the Jewish affair to Cendebeus, whom he made supreme 572e commander (ἐπιστράτηγος) of the coastal plain, presumably the position which Simon, with a slightly different title (στρατηγός) had formerly held (11:59). Having occupied Jamnia, he proceeded to construct a strong base at Gedor (= Kedron, 7½ m. NE. of Azotus) to command the route into Judaea. John, who had been appointed commander-in-chief of the Jewish forces, with his headquarters at Gazara (cf. 13:14), then came to consult his father, Simon, who left the conduct of military affairs in the hands of his two sons, Judas and John. For the first time we hear of cavalry employed by the Jews (4, 7). The victory, which occurred in the plain between Modin and Kedron (Gedor of 15:39), was followed by pursuit as far as Azotus. The towers into which some of the Syrian army fled are similar to those mentioned in 4 Kg 17:9; 18:8. Vg and DV say that John burnt the towers; LXX says the city (αὐτήν).

XVI 11-24 Death of Simon: John succeeds—Ptolemy, d the son of Abobus, was possibly an Idumaeen (Bévenot), but the treachery of this attack on Simon is a melancholy conclusion to the noble story of the efforts of the Maccabees on behalf of their country. Fortunately the attempt of Ptolemy to betray his people into the hands of Antiochus as the price of his own elevation to the high-priesthood was foiled by the energy of John, who established himself in Jerusalem in succession to his father. It is true that Antiochus was able to impose tribute on the Jews for a time, in return for their continued occupation of the disputed strongholds of Joppe, Gazara and the rest (cf. 15:30), but the strength of Syria was waning and John's reign marks the beginning of a period of independence which was not finally ended until the coming of Rome; cf. §§ 69 ff.

15. Doch (Dok) is a fortress on a height a little to the NW. of Jericho. 19. Ptolemy apparently sought to bribe some of the officers in John's army to desert. 24. Nothing is known of 'the book of the days of his priesthood', which was presumably some sort of official journal.

THE SECOND BOOK OF MACCABEES

Introduction—The author of the Second Book explicitly states that he is merely summarizing the five books of Jason of Cyrene, and there is no reason to doubt that these would be composed in Greek, so that the original language of the epitome would almost certainly be Greek. This is borne out by certain expressions almost of the nature of puns: e.g. ἀγειν ἀγῶνα, 4:18; εὐημερίαν δυσημερίαν, 5:6; κρεμάσαντες ἐκρήμνισαν, 6:10, etc. The author's aim is quite clearly to glorify Judas Machabaeus as the instrument of Divine Providence, the other members of his family receiving scarcely a mention. The story closes at the period of Judas's triumph.

The tone of the book is different from that of the First. b Where the author of the First Book is content to tell a straightforward story—though this does not imply that there are not passages of real elevation in his work—the author of the Second is far more sententious and much more prone to stress the supernatural or preternatural elements in the events narrated. His style is more florid and even turgid; where the former writer is careful to use reverential paraphrase for the Name of God, the latter uses the term freely; where the former acknowledges frankly the need for Sabbath warfare, the latter adopts a more conservative attitude. In sum, the difference might be expressed by saying that the author of the Second Book is bent on 'edification', whereas the author of the First prefers to let the facts speak for themselves, though he is nonetheless deeply conscious of the divinity shaping the ends of man.

573c Contents—Prefixed to the actual narrative portion are two or three letters (1:1-2:19), and a brief foreword by the epitomist (2:20-33). In 3:1-7:42 he outlines the events leading up to the outbreak of the revolt. The rest of the book is taken up with the account of the exploits of Judas Machabaeus, the first part (8:1-10:8) dealing with events in the reign of Antiochus Epiphanes, the second (10:9-15:37) with those under Eupator and Demetrius I. (Though cf. on 9:1, where it is shown that the events of part at least of ch 10 relate to the previous reign.) The last three verses of the Book form the epitomist's own epilogue (15:38-40).

d Date of Composition—The evidence for the date of composition is inconclusive, but, in spite of Willrich's theory which would make Jason a contemporary of Philo, it is most natural to suppose that the Book (or at least Jason's history) was composed whilst the effects of the Maccabean liberation were still felt and before the conquest by Rome. It is possible that the author of the 'five books' is the Jason of 1 Mac 8:17 (? nephew of Judas), who was sent on the embassy to Rome. Some even suggest that the work was composed by Jason on that occasion to support the case of the Jews at Rome (cf. Cornely, Introductio II i n. 155). This, of course, is a speculation without proof or possibility of refutation, but it is at least as well based as any other. If we press the words in 15:38—'from that time the city being possessed by the Hebrews'—it will be necessary to conclude that the history was written before the death of Judas and the ensuing 'great tribulation in Israel' (1 Mac 9:27).

To the epitome of Jason's work are prefixed certain letters (1:1-2:19) of a later date (see the commentary). The date of the latest of them (possibly 125 B.C.: cf. on 1:10) naturally makes the date of composition of the Book as we have it at least as late as that. But it is not necessary to suppose that the Second Book is any later than, if indeed it is as late as, the First.

574a I 1-II 19 Introductory Letters—It is not clear whether there are two or three letters prefixed to this Second Book, but the best division seems to be that of Meyer and others: (i) 1-7a: a greeting from the Jews of Jerusalem to those at Alexandria. This letter concludes: (Given) 'when Demetrius reigned, in the year 169'.

(ii) 7b-10a: 'We Jews wrote to you. . . .' This is a letter urging the Alexandrian Jews to observe the Feast of Dedication, 25 Casleu (cf. 1 Mac 4:59), to celebrate the purification of the temple by Judas. The letter concludes (10a): 'In the year 188.' (So almost all the MSS: many modern scholars would emend to 148, as in two inferior MSS; this would mean that the letter was written about the time of the actual purification of the temple (cf. 1 Mac 4:52), which would give more point to the letter. We do not know why such a letter should have been written forty years later.)

(iii) 10b-2:19: an account of the death of Antiochus and a record of the Nehemias fire-miracle.

The second letter marks the defection of Jason (cf. 4:7 ff.) as the occasion of the beginning of the trouble. 8a is a summary statement of the sufferings of the Jews: 'they burnt the gate' (1 Mac 4:38; 2 Mac 8:33) and 'shed innocent blood' (1 Mac 1:39) and in general of the persecution. There is no mention of the battles fought by Judas. The whole emphasis is on the answer to prayer. 8b obviously refers to the purification of the temple (cf. 1 Mac 4:50-1).

The third letter is undated and the only chronological indication (apart from the events narrated in 12-17) is the address to Aristobulus (10), who is known (from Clem. Alex., Strom. I 22, PG 8,893; Euseb. Præp. Evang. 9, 6; etc.) to have been a Peripatetic philosopher and to have dedicated an allegorical interpretation of the Pentateuch to Ptolemy Philometor (180-146 B.C.), which would seem to imply a date for the letter earlier than the year 146 B.C.

Who is 'the king' (11), 'Antiochus' (14)? The obvious answer is Epiphanes, since he was certainly the chief oppressor of the Jews. The only difficulty is that the account of his death (15-16) does not seem to agree with that given in 9:1-16. For this reason some would find here an account of the death of Antiochus the Great; but all the evidence goes to show that he treated the Jews well. Moreover, a reading of this passage and of 9:2 strongly suggests that the same incident is being referred to in both places. Bévenot suggests that, for motives of prudence, the writer of the letter thought it unwise to refer to recent incidents, and elected to repeat the well-known facts about the death of Antiochus the Great, leaving it to the recipients of the letter to read between the lines, seeing in the death of the former king a premonitory example of the way in which God punishes all impiety. This seems more satisfactory than to say, with Knabenbauer, that in the letter we have an account, based on an early and exaggerated report, of what had happened to Epiphanes in Elam—a view which is difficult to reconcile with the writer's inerrancy; or to cut the knot by arguing, as does Emmanuel Sa, that this letter is not necessarily inspired, any more than are the letters quoted elsewhere from the Romans, Spartans, etc.

There are a number of textual difficulties in the letter. 10. Bévenot follows Torrey in suggesting that the original reading was 'the Senate of the Jews' (not 'the Senate and Judas'), as in some Syriac MSS (11, 12). The Gk means: 'Having been rescued by God from great dangers, we give him great thanks as though we were set against the king; for he himself has expelled those who were set against (us) in the holy city'. (Vg and DV are, as will be seen, strangely at fault in 12, in which the Gk has no mention of Persia.) The word παρὰ-σήμενοι 'set against' is suspicious in 11, being obscure in the context and coming so close to παρὰ-ζαήμενοι of 12. The simplest change would be to read παρὰ-σούμενοι in 11 ('as though he [God] were set against the king'); but some deeper corruption seems probable.

The second part of the letter (1:18-2:19) deals with two main themes—the 'fire-miracle' of Nehemias and the concern of Jeremias for the safety of the Ark of the Covenant. The relevance of these incidents (not elsewhere recorded in OT) is obvious; they must have been the theme of much speculation at the time of the dedication of the temple, so similar in many ways to the dedication which had taken place on the return from the Babylonian Captivity. For the general circumstances of this return cf. Esd and Neh. This particular incident is presumably derived from the (lost) memoirs and commentaries of Nehemias (2:13). 20. 'As they told us' would more naturally be 'as they told Nehemias'; the corruption of δυσσάφηναν into δυσάφηναν ἡμῖν. There can be little doubt that the 'thick water' (21) is to be explained in conjunction with the name 'Nephthar' (36) as being some kind of inflammable substance akin to naphtha, which is found in Persia. The continuity between the temple fire and the new fire kindled at the time of the return is to be understood as meaning that the materials which had produced the former fire had been preserved and served for this first kindling of the sacrificial flame. The actual kindling, it is implied, was miraculous (cf. 3 Kg 18:38). The author apparently connects the name 'Nephthar' with the root πρ, meaning 'to separate'.

23. Jonathan is apparently the Johanan of Neh 12:22. The Jonathan mentioned in Neh 12:11 belongs to a later generation.

There is nothing in the extant writings attributed to Jeremias to bear out the statements in 2:1-12 except for the Epistle of Jeremias in Bar 6. The connexion of 1-7 with what precedes and what follows is presumably that the story of Jeremias' hiding the Ark, etc. leads up to the passage in 7, which is appropriate to the circumstances of the letter, as are the references

f II 20-33 Author's Prologue—With 20 we come to the actual words of the epitomist. The central theme of the letters quoted has been the purification and dedication of the temple, and the author now proceeds to show how this is the climax of the life-work of Judas, related at great length in the five books of Jason of Cyrene, and here summarized for the benefit of those who might not have either the time or the inclination for a reading of such a lengthy history. For Jason, cf. § 573d. Here it will suffice to add a word on Inspiration. Since Jason's original work is not to be regarded as having been inspired, the epitome of it which constitutes the greater part of 2 Mac must be understood to be inspired in the sense that the necessary guidance is afforded to the editor to ensure that only such things appear as are in accordance with the mind and intention of the Holy Spirit, the Supreme Author of the Holy Scriptures.

575a III 1-40 Peace under Onias III and Seleucus IV broken : Frustration of the Attempt to rob the Temple—The politico-religious situation here implied was roughly as follows. After the annexation of Judaea by Antiochus III (c 200 B.C.), both he and his immediate successor Seleucus IV sought to conciliate the traditionalist pro-Egyptian party, headed by the family of Onias, the high-priest, whilst the Tobiad family, representing the 'progressive' Hellenistic idea, was making its way to power by a close rapprochement with the Syrian authorities. This involved, as we shall see, the betrayal of the religious faith and traditions of the Jews. Thus Simon (4), whether he was or was not of the Tobiad family, was certainly of that party, and set out to ingratiate himself with the governor of Coele-Syria, Apollonius of Tarsus (5 : Apollonius is apparently the same as the Apollonius son of Menestheus [4:21] and a change from of Tarsus to of Thraseas may easily have occurred), by informing him of the wealth of the temple. (The Syrian kings were acutely embarrassed financially as a result of the indemnity imposed on them by the Romans in 188 B.C.; cf. 1 Mac 3:29; 8:7; 2 Mac 8:10.) The king, informed by Apollonius, entrusts the affair to Heliodorus, who is mentioned in inscriptions as the king's vizier. The amount of money in the temple was equivalent to something like £855,000 of our money (£130,000 + 725,000), part of it forming a sort of benevolent fund, whilst the rest had been deposited there, presumably for safety, by a member of the Tobiad family. This suggests that Simon was prepared to betray his associates as well as the deserving poor. Hyrcanus is mentioned in Jos., Ant. 12, 4, 2-11. 'Son of' may mean no more than descended from.

b The vivid description of Heliodorus's sacrilegious attempt and its frustration is a characteristic passage (14-29). The 'cloistered virgins' (19) came to the gate-towers, etc. Onias (Vg and DV) is a curious slip; the Gk has τοὺς πωλῶνας. In any case, Onias was presumably with the priests before the altar (15) and inaccessible to women. Heliodorus (23) 'began to execute' (imperfect). There is nothing in the Greek corresponding to sacrifice 'of health' (Vg 'hostiam salutarem'); it says simply θυοίαν (32).

c IV 1-22 Onias denounces Simon : Jason usurps the High-Priesthood: Introduction of Hellenizing Practices—4. 'Apollonius was outrageous' (Vg 'insanire') is a rendering of most of the Gk MSS μαίνεσθαι, now universally given up in favour of μενεσθῆναι (son of Menestheus; cf. 21); 'which increased' (Vg 'ad augendam') is a mistranslation. Read: 'considering that Apollonius son of Menestheus was seconding the wicked designs of Simon'.

d The death of Seleucus was, as we know, brought about by this Heliodorus, who sought to make himself king (Appian, Syr. 45). But (7) Antiochus IV, with the help of neighbouring kings, succeeded in expelling him and ascended the throne. Jason (a Greek name 575d adopted by him, presumably as resembling his original name Joshua) shows his Hellenizing tendencies. The attempt to obtain the high-priesthood held by his own brother and his attempt to bribe the king by means of the temple funds show the depths to which the official leaders of the Jews had sunk, and set in an even stronger light the fidelity and self-sacrifice of the Maccabees. 8. 360 talents = £117,000; 80 talents = £26,000—this sum apparently to be paid annually: 150 talents = £49,000. 9. The distinction between 'a place for exercise' and 'a place for youth' appears to be that the former was for adults, the latter for youths of 14-18. 'Antiochians', either because enjoying certain special privileges associated with their Syrian citizenship or as a mere empty title. 11 supports the statement of 3:2 about the exemptions allowed to the Jews by previous Seleucid kings; cf. Jos. Ant. 12, 3, 3 f. We know nothing of John, but the reference to Eupolemus is interesting as being connected with an incident, the embassy to Rome (1 Mac 8:17 ff.), which is later than the victory over Nicanor with which 2 Mac concludes. If Jason of Cyrene were the Jason of that embassy he would have personal acquaintance with this Eupolemus.

12. 'Brothel houses' repeats the insinuation of 1 Mac 1:16, but there is no very good reason for accepting this translation here. The Gk is ὕπὸ πέρασον ('in a πέρασον') and the πέρασον, the characteristic Greek hat, is probably to be understood as a symbol of Greek ways in general. Bévenot suspects that ὕπὸ πέρασον has come in by dittography from the preceding ὑποπόσιον. 'The castle' is not the Syrian-occupied ἀκρά of 1 Mac 1:35, etc., but probably the site of the later Antonia. 14. The Gk has: 'hastened to be partakers of the unlawful exercises in the arena, after the proclamation of the discus-contest'. 15 means that they ceased to care for their traditional glories and thought only of winning a name for excellence in Greek pursuits. 16. 'they got into a dangerous situation, finding enemies and oppressors in those whose mode of life they envied and whom they sought to imitate in all things'. 19. Vg and DV mistranslate: Gk = 'The accursed Jason sent representatives [spectatores, which has become peccatores in Vg], Antiochians [cf. 9] as though from Jerusalem [i.e. representing Jerusalem], taking 300 didrachmas for the sacrifice to Hercules' (= the Tyrian Melkart). 20. Since 300 didrachmas = £16, 'making of galleys' must be understood rather as contributing to the equipping of them. 21. 'to treat with the nobles', etc.: rather, 'for the enthronization of Ptolemy Philometer'—πρωτοκλήσια—which occurred in 172 B.C. What Antiochus understood (from Apollonius) was that Ptolemy was 'hostile to his [Antiochus's] interests (ἄλλότριον τῶν αὐτοῦ γεγονέναι πραγμάτων)'.

23-50 Jason is replaced as High-Priest by Menelaus—f Menelaus: Josephus says he was also called Onias and was a brother of Jason: this is clearly a confusion. Jason had replaced his brother Onias (cf. 4:7, 10). Menelaus is thought to be a member of the Tobiad family, which is borne out by the fact that when he flees, he goes to the 'country of the Ammonites' (26), where the Tobiads are known to have had a stronghold. 27. Sostratus was the Syrian governor of Jerusalem. 29. The Gk means: 'Menelaus left his brother Lysimachus as his deputy and Sostratus left Crates (governor of the Cyprians) as his'. 'Governor of the Cyprians' may mean that he was in command of a body of Cyprian mercenaries. 30. Tarsus and Mallos are both in Cilicia. Onias had gone to Antioch some time before (4). 33. Daphne is a suburb of Antioch, with a sacred precinct, some 5 m. SW. of the capital.

The pillaging of the temple by Menelaus (32) and Lysimachus (39) enrages the people and goads them to an outburst against their leaders. Some threw ashes (41) 'upon the supporters of Lysimachus'. According to LXX, Ptolemy (45) is the son of Dorymenes; cf. 1 Mac 3:38.

V 1-27 Beginnings of Persecution—The preceding chapter gives a very good idea of the disorders caused 576a 576a by the unscrupulous conduct of the Hellenizers at Jerusalem, and it is hardly surprising that Antiochus should have decided to intervene in person, on his return from his Egyptian expedition. The invasion referred to in 1 is the second only in the sense that the contemplated expedition, mentioned in 4:21 ff., counts as the first; cf. 1 Mac 1:20; Dan 11:28. For the portents of 2, 3 cf.

Fierce fiery warriors fight upon the clouds
In ranks and squadrons and right form of war. . .
The noise of battle hurtled in the air,
Horses did neigh and dying men did groan.

(Shakespeare: Julius Caesar, II 2)

5. Jason had fled into the country of the Ammonites (4:26) when Menelaus had been awarded the high-priesthood by Antiochus. Now, hearing that the latter was dead, he attempts to regain his position, but unsuccessfully. 8. Aretas, king of the Arabians; cf. 1 Mac 5:25. 9. 'Kindred sake'—an allusion to the letter of 1 Mac 12:21, in which the Spartans claimed kinship with the Jews.

b Antiochus not unnaturally interprets the revolt of Jason against Menelaus as an attack upon his own authority, and after his reverse in Egypt he is in no mind to brook insubordination in Palestine. This first persecution therefore had as much a political as a religious motive, though the two were closely connected. He also desired to get into his possession the treasures he had heard of (3:7), some of which he had been promised, but had not received (4:8 ff., 27). For the attempt of Heliodorus, cf. 3:14 ff. 21. 1,800 talents = £585,000. 22. Philip, who now replaces Sostratus (or Crates, 4:29) as governor of Jerusalem, is mentioned as persecuting the Jews savagely (6:11). 23. The Samaritans, too, are oppressed. Gazarim = Garizim; cf. Jn 4:20. 24. Finally, Antiochus sends Apollonius (two years later; cf. 1 Mac 1:30) to stamp out all opposition to the new religious policy. 'That hateful prince' is a mistranslation of Μισάρχη, i.e. commander of the Mysians; cf. on 1 Mac 1:30. We know from Polybius that there was a corps of Mysians in the Seleucid army (Polybius 31:3, where he describes a procession at Antioch, which took place a few years after these events, in which 5,000 Mysians took part).

27. Judas Machabaeus now appears, with a small group of nine companions (presumably including his father and brothers; cf. 1 Mac 2:1). 'The pollution' referred to is of course the contamination of heathen practices; cf. 14:3.

c VI 1-31 Measures by Antiochus to introduce Hellenism : Martyrdom of Eleazar—The general features of the situation have been discussed in 1 Mac 1:43 ff.; cf. in particular 1 Mac 1:57 for the 'abomination of desolation', the altar to Jupiter Olympius (2). 4. LXX: 'The temple was full of debauchery and revelling by the Gentiles, who dallied there with harlots and would lie with women in the sacred precincts, bringing in objects that were unbecoming'. 5. Diodorus (34:1) describes how a sow was slain on the altar and the Jews forced to partake of it. 6. LXX: 'neither could any man', etc. 7. The king's birthday was celebrated every month (LXX). The feast of Bacchus was the Dionysia, probably kept in the autumn. 8. 'by the suggestion of Ptolemy' (4:45), who appears to have been in charge of religious propaganda. 10 apparently refers to the incident described at greater length in 1 Mac 1:63 ff. 11. 'They made a conscience': 'they scrupled to defend themselves by reason of the religious observance of the day'.

d The martyrdom of Eleazar, familiar to all Catholics and particularly to those who recite the Divine Office, being the subject of the first lessons read on the Monday in the fifth week of October, calls for little general comment. 19. The 'torture' is more strictly 'the instrument of torture' (τύμνον), either a rack, perhaps cruciform (Wilcken), or a bastinado; cf. 30. The verb formed from the Gk word (ἐτυμναιοῦσθαι) is used in Heb 11:35, which seems to be a reminiscence of this passage. 20. 'Considering' (Vg 'intuens') seems to be intended to represent ὑπονοῶντας 'spitting out' (the swine's flesh). The division of 19-20 is misleading. 'He went voluntarily to the torture, spitting out the flesh: showing [some word seems to have dropped out] in what way [or, in the way in which] those ought to go who are resolved to refuse whatever it is not lawful to eat, in spite of one's love of life'. 21. 'The bystanders' are, according to the Greek, 'those commissioned to' require this eating of unlawful meats. 23. Vg and DV do not adequately render a difficult original, which may be corrupt, but as it stands seems to mean: 'forming a noble conclusion, worthy of his age and his advanced years, and of the added distinction of his grey hairs'. 28. According to LXX he was not 'carried' but 'went unflinchingly to the rack'.

VII 1-42 The Seven Brothers—In the Breviary this passage is closely linked with the story of Eleazar, and the same spirit breathes through both. Comment is again almost superfluous. The faith and constancy of the brothers and of their mother speak for themselves, as also does their certainty of immortality. The only points requiring some elucidation seem to be the following. 1. The presence of the king has been regarded by some as casting doubt upon the historicity of the whole incident. But, whilst it is true that the king had left Jerusalem after the plundering of the temple more than two years before (5:21), we do not know that he may not have revisited it on some later occasion. Alternatively the incident may have taken place at Antioch, as the Roman Martyrology for 1st August assumes.

The barbarous nature of the punishment need hardly surprise us: for roasting, cf. Jer 29:22; for scalping, cf. Herodotus 4:64; for cutting off of hands, feet, etc., cf. Xen. Anab. 1:9:13. Antiochus III had thus treated his own cousin Polybius 8:23.

11 is, of course, most important as evidence for Jewish faith in the resurrection of the body; whilst 14 does not imply that there would be no resurrection for the wicked, but only that there would be no resurrection to the life of happiness but to eternal death. 28. 'made them out of nothing' is represented in most of the Gk MSS by οὐκ ἐξ ὄντων ἐποίησεν sc. 'did not make them out of existing matter', but some MSS, as well as the Syriac, have the form implied in Vg: in any case it seems reasonable to suppose that the same idea underlies either form of expression. 36. 'haze drunk of eternal life, under God's covenant' (reading πενώκατον for πενώκασιν), which gives good sense and makes the Gk smoother.

VIII 1-7 Early Successes of Judas—What has preceded 577a is largely introductory to the main purpose of the book, which is to recite the achievements of Judas Machabaeus. The latter at first necessarily confines himself to local action against isolated positions. This would involve some splitting of his forces, and may explain why, although 6,000 is given as the number of men raised (1), in 1 Mac 4:6 Judas has only 3,000 men in a later engagement against Gorgias; cf. ad loc. 6. 'commodious': the most important strategically. 8-23 Measures and Counter-measures of Apollonius and Judas—8. Philip: the governor of Jerusalem (5:22; 6:11), apparently appointed to bring about the religious changes desired by Antiochus. For Ptolemy, cf. 1 Mac 3:38; 2 Mac 4:45; 6:8. 9. Nicanor and Gorgias, 1 Mac 3:38, etc. For the whole passage, cf. 1 Mac 3:27-60. 10. The tribute: cf. 1 Mac 8:7; 2 Mac 3:7. According to Polybius 21:17, the period of payment was 12 years (from 188 B.C., the date of the treaty of Apamea), but we know from Livy (42:6) that in 173 B.C. Apollonius was at Rome apologizing for the delay in paying, and although the report of his speech on that occasion seems to imply that he was bringing the final instalment ('omne adexisse'), it may be that the Romans had granted a moratorium and that he was bringing the payments up to date. 11. One motive for this expedition against the Jews is then to raise money by taking and selling 577b slaves. For the slave-dealers accompanying the expedition, cf. 1 Mac 3:41. 18. Not all the Jews who left the forces of Judas were cowards or deserters; cf. 1 Mac 3:56. 16. 7,000: 6,000 in Gk; cf. 1. 19. Sennacherib: cf. 4 Kg 19:35. 20. Of the battle against the Galatians we have no other mention, but presumably it occurred during a campaign fought by Antiochus III in Media against a rebel satrap, Molon, in 220 B.C. Molon is known to have had a force of Galatians in his army (Polybius 5:40-43). The Jews would presumably constitute a part of the mercenary army under Antiochus; there is much evidence to show that the Jews often served as mercenaries under the Hellenistic kings.

e There is some corruption at the beginning of 23. LXX says: Eleazar also, which looks like a clumsy attempt to introduce a fourth captain (22) to make up the total of 6,000 men; but it may be authentic. The verse goes on: 'having read the holy book and given the watchword "The Help of God", himself commanding the first company [sc. he is the 'fourth' captain], he attacked Nicanor'. 22. 'Joseph' should almost certainly be John. Judas had no brother Joseph; cf. 1 Mac 2:2.

d 24-29 Victory over Nicanor (and Gorgias)—This victory is described at greater length in 1 Mac 4:1-25. The two accounts are derived from different sources, since 1 Mac says practically nothing about Nicanor, whilst Gorgias and Lysias, not mentioned in 2 Mac, there play a more prominent role; cf. 1 Mac 3:38, etc.

e 30-36 Defeat of Timotheus and Baechides—30-33 appear to be wrongly inserted here. 34-36 clearly refer to the events immediately following on the defeat of Nicanor. Moreover, the reference to Jerusalem, etc. in 31-33 should be connected with ch 10. In 1 Mac 5:6-8 there is a reference to a campaign against the Ammonites, under Timotheus, apparently shortly after the temple purification, and this may be part of the same campaign.

f IX 1-29 Death of Antiochus Epiphanes—The insertion here of the account of the death of Epiphanes should not be taken to imply that the author regarded it as preceding the temple purification; cf. 10:9. It certainly did not do so, as is clear from 1 Mac 6:1-17. Possibly Jason, or his epitomist, did not wish to break the story of the successes of Judas, and therefore anticipated the interpolation of the fortunes of Antiochus. Moreover, there is evidence to suggest that Jason was not very careful about chronological sequence; and in any case he may have inserted here a complete account of the adventures of Antiochus in the East, which had begun some time before and would naturally close with the account of his death, which the epitomist has extracted.

g 2. Since the city where the temple was said to have been in Elam (Elymais 1 Mac 6:1; cf. Polybius 31:11), the name Persepolis must be understood to mean not the well-known capital of Persia, but simply a Persian city, i.e. a city of the Persian Empire (= Persia). 3. According to Polybius, Antiochus died at Tabae (? = Gabae, near Aspadana, which ought perhaps to be read here for 'Ecbatana'). If, as suggested § 577f, the campaign against Timotheus took place after the temple purification, then Antiochus must have heard the news of this too, but the author suppresses this fact since he has not yet dealt with the incident.

h In spite of the somewhat rhetorical nature of the description of the king's sufferings and remorse (8-17: as we have said, such treatment is characteristic of 2 Mac), it is an excess of sophistication to doubt its veracity. Nor need there be any difficulty in accepting the authenticity of the letter addressed to the Jews (19-27). The general nature of the terms in which it is couched suggest that it was intended as an appeal to the different countries composing the king's realm, and we may well believe that where 'Jews' stands in this version (19), other copies would insert Syrians, Phoenicians, and the like. 'Subjects' (Vg 'civibus') should be replaced by some such term as fellow-citizens. Antiochus at times condescended to a style of conduct which seemed to express a desire to show his 'democratic' spirit; cf. Polybius 31:4. 29 has caused some perplexity. According to 1 Mac 6:14, 55-56, 63, Philip was made regent and succeeded in occupying Antioch, but was driven out again by Lysias. According to Josephus (Ant. 12, 9, 7) he was captured and killed by Antiochus V (Eupator). Possibly he went to Egypt before his attempt to seize power, with the object of concerting measures with Ptolemy.

X 1-8 (9) Purification of the Temple: Encasenia—1 For the events of this passage cf. 1 Mac 4:36-59, where they are treated at greater length. The 'two years' of 8 is not to be taken literally, since the actual interval was three years precisely; cf. our own expression 'a couple of years'. 9 bears out what was said in § 577f-g about the death of Antiochus following the temple purification.

10-23 Victories over the Idumaeans, etc. — 11. 578a

The 'appointment' of Lysias was merely the formal ratification of an existing situation, though it is significant as reversing the decision of Antiochus Epiphanes (1 Mac 6:14) to replace Lysias by Philip. It was of course Lysias who took the initiative in all this (1 Mac 6:17). 12. Ptolemy is governor of Coele-Syria (cf. 8:8), but is probably not Ptolemy son of Dorymenes (1 Mac 3:38, etc.). 14. Gorgias is now governor of Idumaea; cf. § 563b. The 'strangers' are the Philistines. 15. For 'Jews' read, with LXX, 'Idumaeans, occupying the most advantageous strongholds, harried the Jews, and, receiving the Hellenizing refugees from Jerusalem, tried to keep up their activities'. 16-19. For Judas's exploits cf. 1 Mac 5:3-5.

The incident of 19-22 is in keeping with the general purpose of 2 Mac, the contrast between the virtue and wisdom of Judas and the weakness and corruption of those about him. Doubtless there were such traitors; but it would be wrong to suppose that Simon was one of them. Certainly he was not put to death with the traitors (22), and the part he plays in 1 Mac is sufficient testimony to his uprightness and general worth. 19. 'Joseph and Zacchaeus' may be a corruption of Joseph son of Zacharias; cf. 1 Mac 5:56, where he is concerned in a dangerous act of insubordination. 20. The 70,000 drachmas possibly represent the ransom of 700 men at the normal rate of a mina a head. The total is something less than £4,000.

24-38 Defeat and Death of Timotheus, Leader of the Ammonites—It was suggested in § 577e that the account of the campaign there mentioned against Timotheus had been displaced, and should occur after the purification of the temple (sc. after the early verses of this chapter), possibly forming part of this campaign. (It ought to be stated that not all interpreters accept the identification of the Timotheus of 8:30 with the Timotheus of this chapter.) At any rate, the capture of Gazer (1 Mac 5:8 = Gezer) seems to be the incident described in 32-37. 'In a certain place' (37: Vg 'in quodam loco'; LXX ἐν τινὶ τόκῳ): 'in a pit'.

XI 1-38 Defeat of Lysias: Treaty—It seems probable that this campaign of Lysias is the one described in 1 Mac 4:26-35, sc. before the death of Antiochus Epiphanes and the purification of the temple. (Its dislocation is another example of the confusion of the source employed by the epitomist [cf. 8:30; 9:1-29], although of course there is no error expressed or indeed implied. The writer is giving the story of what happened, but is not particularly concerned with problems of chronology.) It seems clear that Lysias is here acting, not in conjunction with the king, who is not mentioned, but on his own responsibility. (In ch 13 the young king is mentioned, although there Lysias must still have been largely responsible for the operations.) Moreover, Bethsura (5) is almost certainly the place mentioned in 1 Mac 4:29. Further, the first of the letters (16-21) reads as though it were sent off in the absence of the king; cf. 18 'whatsoever 578d things could be reported to the king' implies some difficulty of communication, whilst there is some MS authority for reading 'I have granted as much', etc. The date of this letter (21) is towards the end of a month Dioscorus, which is thought to be a novel form of (or a mistake for) Dystros (= Adar). The second letter (22-28) must have been written shortly after the receipt of the news of the death of Antiochus Epiphanes, since it reads like a proclamation at the beginning of a new reign. Eupator and still more Lysias would be aware of the danger threatening from Egypt and from Philip (9:1-29) and would be anxious to conciliate the Jews. This second letter is addressed to Lysias, but obviously with the intention that it should be communicated to the Jews, as a sort of covering letter for the following one. The letter (27-33) to the Jews from the king, dated 15 Xanthikos (= Nisan) is intended to provide a safe-conduct for those Jews desiring to travel between Jerusalem and Antioch, presumably on their return from the Passover celebrations. Menelaus will be the high-priest of 4:23; 5:5, etc.

e The last letter (33-38) from the Roman ambassadors bears the same date, possibly by a mere coincidence, though it may be an error in copying. Quintus Memmius is otherwise unknown. Titus Manilius is probably T. Manlius Torquatus, known to have been an ambassador in Egypt about 164 B.C.; he may have received some commission in connexion with Syrian affairs.

579a XII 1-31 Fresh Outbreaks : Punishment of Jamnia and Joppo : Defeat of Timotheus—This is a very confused chapter and bears all the signs of being a mere collection of disconnected material concerning campaigns with no sort of interrelation. The events of 10-31 are certainly those recorded in 1 Mac 5:24-53, whilst the events of 3-9, which have no connexion with the generals mentioned in 2 and, as we shall see, do not lead naturally to 10, are entirely without a firm chronological reference. Further, the mention of Timotheus, mysterious as are his appearances and disappearances (2, 10, 18, 24), strongly suggests that this passage should be read before 10:24-37, a passage which ends with an account of his death. Some would cut the knot by supposing that this is a different Timotheus, which is possible, but (a) the fact that he is operating in the same vicinity and (b) the statement in 10:24 that he had already been overcome by the Jews are reasonable grounds for maintaining the identification. (However cf. Bévenot, Introduction, § 9.)

b Of the generals mentioned in 2, nothing more is heard of any except Timotheus. Nicanor is probably different from the Nicanor of ch 14. The hostility of the coast towns to the Jews was of course nothing new, but there is no evidence as to what occasioned this fresh outburst. But in that world of intrigue (Egypt-Syria, Philip-Lysias, Antiochus-Demetrius) there would be many occasions for minor party incidents.

c The outline of events dealt with in 10-31 is more clearly indicated in 1 Mac 5:24-53 and it will suffice here to resolve one or two minor problems. 9. '240 furlongs' seems corrupt for 340. 10. The nine furlongs cannot, of course, be reckoned from Jamnia or even from Jerusalem (8, 9), as the fighting next described occurred in Transjordan. Something has clearly been omitted, either by the epitomist or by a copyist; cf. 17. 13. Casphin is probably the Casphor of 1 Mac 5:26, which may be the modern Khisfin, some 10 m. E. of the Sea of Galilee. 17. The 750 furlongs can hardly be reckoned from Khisfin, and it seems likely that 17 should come between 9 and 10, so that the 750 furlongs will be reckoned from the neighbourhood of Jerusalem, which would bring them within striking distance of the Tubianites; cf. Tubin 1 Mac 5:13. Characa is probably El-Kerak = Dathema of 1 Mac 5:9, etc. 20. For 120,000 the Old Latin reads 12,000, almost certainly correct. 21. Carnion = Carnaim (1 Mac 5:9). 27. Ephron, cf. 1 Mac 5:46. 29. Scythopolis is called Bethshan in 1 Mac 5:46. 31. The Feast of Weeks 579c = Pentecost (32).

32-46 Defeat of Gorgias—This is apparently paralleled by 1 Mac 5:65 ff., although Gorgias is not there mentioned (but cf. 1 Mac 5:59). We know that he was in command in Idumaea ('the land towards the South', 1 Mac 5:65), whilst Maresa (35) is some 12 m. ENE. of Hebron (Chebron, 1 Mac 5:65). Again in 1 Mac 5:66 it is thought that for Samaria, Maresa should be read. Esdrin (38) is probably another form of the name Azarias (cf. 1 Mac 5:60), whilst the incident of the idol-amulets (40 'donaries': Vg 'donaria': LXX ἱερήματα) seems to be connected with the reproof of 1 Mac 5:62.

43-46 is of course one of the best-known passages in Mac. Its dogmatic importance is considerable, testifying as it does to a clear-cut and confident belief in personal immortality and in the value of Intercessory prayer for the dead. The force of the words is strengthened rather than weakened by the objection that 'such an idea is unparalleled in Jewish literature'. Here is no vague echo of a conventional platitude but a definite statement of the writer's personal conviction, the witness of one consciously taking sides in a debate about the fact of survival. As is well known the Sadducees rejected the doctrine of the resurrection of the body (Mt 22:23), and it may well be that it was during this period of struggle between the orthodox party, represented especially by the Hasidaeans (1 Mac 2:42), later to become the Pharisees, and the Hellenizing party within the priesthood, constituted by the sceptical Sadducees, that the doctrine of personal immortality began to assume a sharper definition. To that definition such a passage as the present may well have contributed. The gesture of Judas would of course become widely known, and would serve to deepen and strengthen the faith that it yet presupposed.

The number 12,000 drachmas, which would represent between £600 and £700 is suspect. Most of the Gk MSS. read 2,000. Even this figure it is interesting to contrast with the 300 drachmas which was all that could be raised for the Tyrian festival (2 Mac 4:19).

For Pharisees and Sadducees cf. Lagrange, 56, 304 ff., 353 ff.

In 45 f. Vg is a little tendentious. The Gk means: 'So, looking at the splendid reward [Χαριστηρίον = reward as an act of gratitude] laid up for them that had fallen asleep in godliness [those who, although sinful, had given their lives for the defence of the truth]—a holy and godly thought—he made an offering of propitiation to the end that they might be loosed from their sin'.

XIII 1-26 Eupator in Person falls : Peace—According to the parallel passage (1 Mac 6:18 ff.), the occasion of this expedition was an appeal from the garrison in the citadel at Jerusalem, which Judas was attempting to reduce. The presence of Menelaus with the army (comparable to that of Alcimus with Bacchides, 1 Mac 7:9, 12) suggests that he knew that he could not hope to hold the position of high-priest by any personal merit and that the Hellenizing party in Jerusalem was not strong enough to support him: he could come only as the nominee of a foreign power. The deceitfulness (εἰρωνείας, 3) consisted in the fact that he pretended to be inspired with patriotic motives but was a mere self-seeker. He was put to death at Beroca (Aleppo)—the name has dropped out of the Vg text—but probably, as the account in Josephus implies, at the end of the campaign, when (23) Antiochus was seeking to conciliate the Jews; Ant. 12, 9, 7; cf. 1 Mac 6:59. The account of the death of Menelaus is not clear, but suggests that he was killed by being buried alive in (? smouldering) ashes.

It has to be admitted that in 22, 23 Jason, or his epitomist, glosses over what would have been a serious reverse for the Jews but for the rebellion of Philip. But it is true that this fact, coupled with the prolonged resistance of Bethsura and the military skill of Judas, prevented the king from reaping the fruits of his victory

c Was Judas appointed governor of the coastal districts, as Simon was afterwards (1 Mac 11:59)? There is no mention of it in 1 Mac, and the Gk text says that Antiochus appointed Hegemonides governor. Some emend Hegemonides to ἡγεμόνα, which was presumably read (? by error) in the version underlying the Vg rendering. On the whole, it seems safer to conclude against the view that he was actually appointed. 25. 'He' is apparently Antiochus. 'The men of Ptolemais were much displeased with the treaty, for they were angry about certain points which they desired to have abrogated'. The reading of the latter part is not certain but the above seems to be the sense.

d XIV 1-14 Intrigues of Alcimus—For Demetrius cf. 1 Mac 7:1 and § 559c; for Alcimus (8) cf. 1 Mac 7:5. 'In the time of mingling' is incorrect; the Gk is ἐν τοῖς τῆς ἀμειψίας χρόνοις, sc. in the early days of the persecution when the Jews who desired to remain faithful shunned all dealings with the heathen; cf. 38; 1 Mac 1:53; 2:33; 2 Mac 5:27. 4. 'boughs which were customarily used in the temple'.

There were apparently three attempts to restore Alcimus, two by Bacchides (1 Mac 7:8 ff.; 9:32 ff.) and this attempt by Nicanor (after the failure of the first attempt by Bacchides (1 Mac 7:25 ff.), but before his second attempt, which was successful).

e 15-36 Relations between Judas and Nicanor—The account here given of the attitude of Nicanor to Judas is much fuller than that in 1 Mac 7:26 ff. The preliminary skirmishing round Lessau (an unknown locality: does the reading Lessau, found in some MSS, suggest the truth, sc. Laisa, near Bethhoron: cf. 1 Mac 9:5?) is not mentioned in 1 Mac, which also suggests that Nicanor was hostile to Judas from the beginning and that his friendship (24; cf. 1 Mac 7:27) was hypocritical. But 1 Mac has compressed, omitting the earlier phases. Thus 1 Mac 7:26b ff. will correspond with 30 here. 26. A word in the Gk has been overlooked in Vg: 'seeing the love they had to one another and taking the agreements they had made'.

'assented to the foreign interest' means was hostile to his interests (the phrase used of Ptolemy in 4:21). 'Successor': more probably deputy; cf. 4:29.

37-46 Death of Razias—This passage has perplexed the moralists, and has been cited by heretics either as a defence of suicide (so the Donatists: cf. Augustine, Contra Gaudentium 1:26-31) or as proving that 2 Mac is not inspired. But whilst we must condemn the act of Razias as objectively wrong, we may with the author praise the determination to die rather than to risk apostasy. That he was in good faith is clear from 46. The words in 44, 'upon the midst of the neck' should be 'on the midst of his flank' (or possibly 'into a hollow place', sc. the empty space formed by the parting of the crowd).

38. Vg has misled the translators of DV. The Gk g means: 'Formerly, at the time when the Jews were not consorting with the heathen (cf. 3), he had made the choice of Judaism' (κρίνω ἐλεγχόμενος τοῦ Ἰουδαϊσμοῦ); RV: 'had been accused of cleaving to the Jews' religion'; Bévenot: 'he had aimed at maintaining the purity of the Jewish religion'.

XVI 1-37 Defeat and Death of Nicanor—Judas, who had withdrawn from Jerusalem in a NW. direction towards Samaria (κατὰ Σαμάρειαν, 1), had taken up a position at Adarsa (1 Mac 7:40), due N. of Jerusalem, having eluded Nicanor's army at Bethhoron. The parallel passage (7:26 ff.) deals more at length with the military operations, 2 Mac as usual being interested in the more 'edifying' details—Judas's dream and prayer (11-16; 21-24). In 28 (apparently): they recognized Nicanor lying in his full armour. 37. 'The 13th day of the 12th month (called in Syrian Adar), the day before Mardocheus's day'; cf. 1 Mac 7:49. 38. The Jews did not retain possession of Jerusalem for long (1 Mac 9:23 ff.), but there was no return to the former desecration of the temple precincts and in comparison with that the mere military occupation of the capital was a relatively tolerable matter. (If we press the meaning we must suppose that the Book was completed before the death of Judas.)

38-40 form a delightful and entirely characteristic Epilogue: cf. the epitomist's Prologue (2:20-33).

THE TEXTUAL CRITICISM OF THE NEW TESTAMENT

By J. M. T. BARTON

581a Bibliography—M.-J. Lagrange, O.P., Introduction à l'étude du Nouveau Testament. Deuxième partie: Critique textuelle, II. La critique rationnelle, EB, 1935; H. J. Vogels, Handbuch der neutestamentlichen Textkritik (1923); L. Vaganay, An Introduction to the Textual Criticism of the New Testament (E.T., 1937); *F. Kenyon, The Text of the Greek Bible (1937); *K. Lake and S. New, The Text of the New Testament (6th ed., 1928).

b Meaning of the Term—Textual criticism, also called lower criticism, is that which deals with the establishment of the best available text of a work that has (at least in many instances) been handed down in manuscript form and copied by many hands. (Higher criticism studies the literary contents of the text established by lower criticism.) It has, as its secondary purpose, to account for the variant readings that are to be detected on comparing one copy with another, and, so far as may be, to trace these readings to their respective archetypes.

Necessity—In a work such as the collection of New Testament books, textual criticism is made necessary by the disappearance, probably for all time, of the original autographs of the Apostles and other NT writers. These autographs, and their first copies, have perished, in ways that would include (a) destruction by Christians in time of persecution to prevent the manuscripts from falling into the hands of heathens, (b) destruction by the persecutors themselves, and, doubtless in great measure, (c) ordinary wear-and-tear, by the daily use made of the precious writings in the Christian communities to which they were addressed. The copies that have come down to us are always, in some degree, imperfect copies, since 'owing to the frailties of the human hand and eye and brain, it is impossible to copy large quantities of matter without making mistakes', Kenyon, 9. Among various causes that have led to erroneous copying one may mention confusion between letters (e.g. the Greek capitals Θ and Ο), dittography (i.e. accidental repetition of one or more letters), transposition of letters, and homoeoteleuton (i.e. the omission of a line owing to the use of several words or clauses successively with repetitions or similar endings). There are also many cases where deliberate alterations have been made by the copyist in the interests, real or supposed, of accuracy, elegance, sound doctrine, and so forth; cf. Lagrange, 32-40; also RB 41 (1933) 481-98.

c External Form of the Greek Codices—Throughout the first two Christian centuries the NT writings were, doubtless, circulated on rolls or sheets of papyrus. Sheets, rather than rolls, seem to be the normal form even as early as the second century. The pith of the plant's stem was cut into long strips. These, laid first vertically and then horizontally, were gummed together into a single sheet, which, after drying and rubbing down with ivory or a shell, was ready for use. The horizontal strips were mostly used for writing, as the lines were better marked and the sheet could more easily be rolled inward on that side (known as the recto, the back being named the verso). The ordinary size of a sheet was 9-11 inches by 5-5½. Thus a short letter (e.g. 2 Jn) could be written on a single sheet, or, where more space was needed, two or more sheets could be fastened together to make a roll. The following lengths in feet have been calculated for NT documents: Rom 11½; Mk 19; Jn 23½; Mt 30; Lk and Ac 31-2. By way of comparison, a book of Thucydides would occupy a roll of 30-5; a book of Plato's Republic little more than half of this.

The custom of using a scribe to take down letters at dictation was widespread. For some evidence of St Paul's habits, cf. 2 Thess 3:17; 1 Cor 16:21; Col 4:18. Gal 6:11 may indicate that he wrote this epistle with his own hand.

From the second cent. onwards the codex form (i.e. sheets of papyrus arranged in quires and pages) came gradually to replace the roll; by the end of the period of the persecutions vellum or parchment began to be used for the better type of book; in the eighth cent. charta bombacina or paper was brought in from the East. The ink (atramentum, Gr. melan, melanion, graphikon melan) was applied with a reed (kalamos), later by a quill.

The principal division of the codices, according to the manner of their writing, is into uncials (lit. 'inch-long' letters) or majuscules, in which the script employed is made up of separated capitals, very elegantly inscribed, and into minuscules, also called cursives, which are written in a running hand, with ligaturing of the letters. It would be a mistake to regard MSS in uncials as invariably older than those in cursive script. In fact, cursive writing existed already at an early date, but was mostly employed for private letters rather than for literary composition. In the ninth cent., Theodore the Studite (759-826; cf. DTC 15 [1946], 287-98) or some other worker in the Studium monastery at Constantinople, invented an especially beautiful cursive hand that became dominant in the Byzantine empire. Unfortunately it was all so much alike that it is often difficult to tell one MS from another on the ground of writing only. It is not to be inferred that an uncial is necessarily more important than a cursive, since it has been frequently established that many uncials are witnesses to a late text, whereas many cursives have derived from a very early one. Among NT cursives of special importance may be mentioned 33 (9th-10th cent., considered by Eichhorn and Hort as the best in this script), and those of the family 1 (associated with the name of Kirsopp Lake) and family 13 or Ferrar group. 'In short,' writes Professor Lake, 'it is neither the date nor the script of a MS which determines its value for the critic, but the textual history of its ancestors' (op. cit., 12).

It may be added that the minuscules vastly outnumber the uncials. Gregory's list, published in 1908, claims that there are some 4,000 NT codices comprising 161 uncials, more than 2,000 minuscules, 1,556 lectionaries (i.e. service books containing a large amount of Scripture, though not continuously or always in the order found in NT documents), and 14 papyri. These figures have been greatly increased during the intervening forty years, as a result of more recent discoveries and assignments, so that, for example, the latest list includes 2,429 minuscules and 1,678 lectionaries. Cf. Kenyon, Our Bible and the Ancient Manuscripts, 1939 ed., 106; F. M. Braun, O.P., La Sainte Bible, 10 (1946), 485-7.

The Division of the NT Text—Ancient divisions into stichoi or 'sense lines' and per cola et commata (that is, 561e respectively, by clauses in a sentence and minor divisions) may here be ignored. Only two methods of division are genuinely important for our purpose, i.e. those into chapters and verses. The chapter division is attributable to Stephen Langton, archbishop of Canterbury (d. 1228). It was first made in the Latin Vulgate, but later passed into use in the Hebrew and Greek texts. The Complutensian or Alcalá polyglot (published 1522) has chapter divisions. The verse divisions were first attempted by Santes Pagnini, O.P. (d. 1541), in a new rendering of the Bible published at Lyons in 1527. Later the Parisian printer, Robert Estienne, whose name so frequently occurs in its Latinized form of Robertus Stephanus, published in 1551 a Greek NT printed at Geneva, in which the division into verses was the work of Stephanus himself. In 1555 he published a complete Latin Bible, in which he used Pagnini's verse division for OT proto-canonical books, while employing a modified form of this for the NT and the OT deutero-canonicals. It is generally admitted that these chapter and verse divisions are critically valueless, frequently spoil the sense, and would, in many cases, be better away. They are, however, invaluable for reference purposes.

f The MS Codices of the NT—In the absence of the original MSS and the first copies of the NT writings we are thrown back upon MS codices of a later date that give a more or less faithful copy of the text. Some of these are of early date (the most ancient more or less complete ones, being of the 4th cent.), whereas, as is well known, the MS codices of the Latin and Greek classics are of much later date. Few NT codices include the whole of NT; most of them contain only a part, e.g. the Gospels, or the Acts and Catholic epistles or the Pauline writings or the Apocalypse. Many are no more than lectionaries that contain such parts of the Gospels and apostolic writings as were customarily read in the liturgy.

Codices are divided according to their contents into pure and mixed. Pure codices give only the original Greek, whereas mixed codices, in addition to the original text, give commentaries or scholia or versions (these last including bilingual codices such as Greek and Latin or Greek and Syriac). There are also codices known as palimpsests (from the Greek palin = 'again' and psalō = 'to scrape'), or rescripts, i.e. documents in which original MS has been rubbed out and new writing superimposed. Perhaps the best known example of a palimpsest is the famous Codex C (Codex Ephraemi rescriptus), a fifth cent. MS of the whole Bible which in the twelfth cent. was used again as writing material for some works of St Ephraem the Syrian Doctor (d. A.D. 373). Fortunately it has been found possible to recover the older (that is, usually, the more valuable) text by means of chemicals or ultra-violet ray photography.

g Some of the codices have names pointing to their past or present place of storage (e.g. Vaticanus, Alexandrinus, Sinaiticus, Claromontanus) or their former owners, e.g. Coislinianus (from Coislin, a former bishop of Metz), and Laudianus (after Archbishop Laud of Canterbury).

The manner of referring to the various codices has varied, and there are, at the present time, several methods of reference. Since the time of Dr John Mill (d. 1707) and, in particular, since Wetstein's great edition of 1752 ff., it has been customary to use letters of the Latin alphabet to designate uncials and Arabic numerals for cursives. The system was improved by Tischendorf and Scrivener, who added the Greek letters from Gamma to Omega and the Hebrew letters from Aleph to Daleth. So A = Codex Alexandrinus, B = Codex Vaticanus, C = Codex Ephraemi rescriptus, D = Codex Bezae or Cantabrigiensis (presented to the Cambridge University library in 1581 by Theodore Beza, the Reformation scholar), and Aleph = Codex Sinaiticus.

(Leipzig, 1908), retains the old capitals (Aleph, A-Z, 562a Gamma-Omega) for the 45 oldest uncials, or uses numbers 01-045; for the remaining uncials he used the numbers 046-0161. Minuscules are designated by the numbers 1-2292, with the addition of the letters e (= evangelium), a (= apostolicum) or p (= paulinum) to indicate the part of NT contained in a particular codex. Lectionaries are shown by Arabic numerals preceded by l. Papyri are noted by the letter P followed by Arabic numerals from 1-14.

More recently still, Freiherr Hermann von Soden (1852-1914) distinguished three classes of codices by the Greek letters δ (= dialektē) for the whole NT, ε (euangelion) and α (apostolos). He also designed an ingenious but highly complicated system for showing at a glance the absolute or relative dating of a codex. Thus numbers 1-49 stand for codices dating from the fourth to the ninth cent.; 50-99 are tenth-cent. codices. In later codices the first number shows the century. So δ1 = Codex Vaticanus of the fourth cent.; δ2 = Codex Sinaiticus, also of the fourth; δ3 = Codex Ephraemi of the 5th cent.; δ121 = an 11th-cent. codex.

For ordinary use the oldest method is perhaps the b most important, but either of the two later systems has something to recommend it. On the whole the balance of approval among textual critics inclines towards Gregory's relatively simple and easily memorized system.

For a list of the chief MS codices reference may be made to the work of Sir Frederic Kenyon on The Text of the Greek Bible, which has in ch 3 a sufficiently full account of the 'Manuscripts of the New Testament'. For a short list of Gospel MSS, cf. F. M. Braun, op. cit., 486, in which the MSS are divided into four groups, after the manner of Lagrange's Projet de critique textuelle rationnelle du N.T., RB 41 (1933) 481-98. These are (1) The B group (a moderate and generally faithful revision of the now unavailable originals) = les bons (i.e. codices B, Aleph, C, T, Z, L and Daleth (for Mk)). (2) The A group (a thoroughgoing revision in the interests of stylistic excellence; the prototypes of the famous textus receptus of the Renaissance humanists) = les antiochiens (i.e. A, E^o, Omega, Daleth [non-Marcian] H^o, V, G^o). (3) The D group (a thorough revision with an eye to harmonization and simplified readings) = divers (i.e. D^o and W [Mk 1-5:30]). (4) The C group (occupying a position intermediate between B and D) = desarten (i.e. W. N. Theta, Pi, K^o). These groups will be more fully explained in the following section on the families of Gk codices.

It may be added that the highly important Codex e Aleph or Sinaiticus, acquired by the British Museum from the Soviet authorities in 1934, is well described in the pamphlet The Mount Sinai Manuscript of the Bible. The most sensational discovery of recent times is that of the Chester Beatty papyrus, first publicly announced in The Times (19 Nov. 1931), and fully discussed in Kenyon's Recent Developments in the Textual Criticism of the Greek Bible (1933). This discovery is valuable in three ways. It carries the date of the Greek Bible back for some decades and provides a substantial portion of 3rd-cent. NT MSS; it shows a text free from all suspicion of Byzantine revision and not manifesting the prominent Western variants; and it confirms the early use of the codex form of book by the Christian community.

The Families of Greek Codices—It is common know- d ledge that there is a considerable variety of readings between the numerous NT codices, but it was not until the time of Albert Bengel (1687-1752) that the problem was simplified by dividing the different codices into families. The term is clearly explained by Kenyon, Text of Greek Bible, 11: 'If in a given manuscript of any work some words are wrongly transcribed, or a passage omitted, every manuscript copied from it, or from copies of it, will have the same mistake or the same omission; and if among the extant manuscripts we find that several have the same important mistake or

TEXTUAL CRITICISM OF THE NEW TESTAMENT

582d omission, it is legitimate to argue that they are all descended from the manuscript in which that mistake or omission was first made'. That is, we may assign the various MSS to different families or groups with characteristic types of readings, much as Shakespearean scholars distinguish the text of Hamlet in the pirated First Quarto of 1603 from that of the Second Quarto of 1604, and both of these from the readings of the First Folio of 1623. Bengel divided the codices known to him into Asiatic and African, a grouping that roughly corresponds to Westcott and Hort's later divisions into Syrian and Alexandrian. J. J. Griesbach (1745-1812) developed the 'family' hypothesis on lines still recognized as essentially sound. He classified three groups of MSS, i.e. (1) the Alexandrian or Origenian, so called because the type occurs principally in Origen's quotations, in codices A, B, C and L, and in the Egyptian (Bohairic and Sahidic) versions; (2) the Western, so styled because its characteristic readings are found in the Latin Fathers and in Codex D; (3) the Constantinopolitan, the text of the great majority of Greek MSS. He judged the last to be less valuable than the other two, but his principle was that, in default of any exclusion on grounds of internal criticism, a majority verdict of two to one among the groups was to be accepted. K. Lachmann (1793-1851) made further progress by excluding a great mass of the extant MSS as containing a text that was palpably late. So, for practical purposes he divided the MSS between two great families, the Eastern (A, B, C, etc., and Origen) and the Western (D, D¹, D², the Old Latin, Vulgate, etc.). The editions of Tregelles and Tischendorf (1815-74) depend for their principles mainly upon Lachmann.

f The Cambridge scholars, Brook Foss Westcott (1825-1901) and Fenton John Anthony Hort (1829-91), were responsible for the most important edition of modern times. The edition was first projected in 1853, but was not made public until 1881. It was accompanied by a long introduction by Hort on the critical principles guiding the selection of MSS. Neither scholar was, however, a specialist in palaeography or comparative philology. They did, in the event, succeed in arranging and explaining the quantity of codices amassed by Tischendorf.

By applying a variety of tests (such as the evidence of conflation in the Patristic use of the NT, and of internal criticism) they were able to distinguish four types of text. These were, first, the Syrian (not to be confused with Syriac), which is that of the vast majority of MSS, and which, in their view, was an eclectic text, following now one earlier text, now another, and frequently combining two texts into one by conflation (i.e. the fusing together of readings). An example of this is Lk 24:53, where one set of early authorities (Aleph, B, C, L, with the Coptic versions and the Sinaitic and Palestinian Syriac) have 'blessing God', Codex D and the Old Latin versions have 'praising God', and the majority of MSS (i.e. the Syrian group, including Codex A, twelve other uncials, all the cursives, Vg and other versions) have 'praising and blessing God'. Westcott and Hort further distinguish three pre-Syrian texts, i.e. the Alexandrian, the Western and the Neutral. Of these the first is the least important, since the changes made in it are very slight and it almost certainly depends upon the Neutral tradition. The other two, however, are very early, and go back as far as we have knowledge of distinctive texts. On Westcott and Hort's showing there was a time, earlier than the fourth and probably earlier than the middle third cent., when the NT text was transmitted in two great traditions—the Western and the Neutral. Then a group of copyists or editors, probably in Syria and possibly at Antioch, produced an eclectic text that sometimes follows the Western, sometimes the Neutral, and sometimes, as in the examples they give, combines the two by conflation.

g Of the two earliest and most important types of text, they regard the Western as a very early and very corrupt source, a product of free interpolation and paraphrase at a time when the need for scrupulous preservation of the original text was still imperfectly appreciated. For them the Neutral text (as found in the great uncials Aleph and B and some other MSS) is the most reliable text. One exception, however, they make, for they lay stress upon the Western text's omissions or 'non-interpolations', on the ground that a text that is so prone to interpolate and expand would never omit except for some critically excellent reason. In the interval since 1881 their methods and results have been so often attacked that it is important to realize that, in certain vital respects, their work remains unshaken, though all but seventy years have passed since the definitive issue of their introduction and text.

In the first place, it is not open to doubt that the vast majority of extant MSS represent a later text. Kenyon (Text of the Greek Bible, 203) prefers to style it the Byzantine recension, since this title 'makes no assertion as to its origin, but merely records the unquestioned fact that it is the text which dominated the whole Church of the Byzantine Empire'. Secondly, it is all but equally certain that the Neutral tradition represents an exceedingly pure and early stage of the text, and that it has in its favour the oldest vellum MSS of any size, i.e. Codices Aleph and B. Later criticism, however, tends to regard their contention regarding the quasi-innate superiority of the Neutral family not as altogether unfounded but as insufficiently proved.

The Neutral text is, indeed, one that comes as regards its main representative, from only one corner of the Christian world, and is thoroughly attested by only one version, i.e. the Memphitic or Northern Egyptian version, for the earlier Egyptian version (i.e. the Sahidic) does not give it such definite support. The three chief Fathers who bear witness to it (Clement, Origen and St Cyril of Alexandria) are all Alexandrians, and of these Clement has been shown, since Westcott and Hort's time, to have an unexpectedly large Western element in his text. So far as can be ascertained all the MSS giving this type of text were written or copied at Alexandria. In spite of Hort's surmise that 'B and Aleph were both written in the West, probably at Rome' (op. cit. 267), it can hardly be doubted that B was written at Alexandria, and that, though Aleph was probably written at Caesarea, it is based upon an Alexandrian text, brought to Caesarea by Origen when he left Alexandria in A.D. 231.

There is, in fact, ample evidence for the view that the Neutral family may represent the revised, as contrasted with the unrevised text. True, as Kenyon writes: 'If it is the result of editorial handling, the editor was one who was seeking an original text. It is not harmonistic, it does not cultivate smoothness of phrase, it does not seek additions. It may be described as an austere text'. (Recent Developments in the Textual Criticism of the Greek Bible, 85.) In any case, it is a local, not a universal text, and is to be controlled with the help of other texts. Of these the most notable is the large Western group, principally found in the Greek uncials D (Gospels and Acts), E¹ (Acts) and D² (Pauline epistles) with a number of Old Latin MSS, and, as regards a large number of their readings, the Old Syriac versions (Sinaitic and Curetonian). Of these the Old Latin and Old Syriac are by no means in complete agreement; many of the readings of the oldest Syriac version are aligned with B rather than with the Latin group. Yet the evidence of the versions supporting it does at least go to show that the Western text, in one form or another, has a greater claim to be heard than Hort ever suspected, and this not only in its omissions but in its additions. At times, in fact, it seems to give a purer and less revised reading than the so-called Neutral family.

In recent years, as a result of work by Kirsopp Lake, Blake, Streeter and others, a new group has been identified—the Caesarean family, made up of the so-called Koridethi MS (Theta), the Washington 583c codex (W), two groups of minuscules known as families 1 and 19, certain other minuscules (e.g. 28, 566 and 700), and the Chester Beatty papyrus 45. Textually this group hold a position intermediate between the Neutral and Western families, though in its major variants it usually sides with B. It derives its importance from its association with Origen, Eusebius and the school of Caesarea. But the examination of this text and the determination of its type are still incomplete.

It does not follow from these data that the NT text is an uncertain one. It is far better attested than any other work of ancient literature and the difficulties arise rather from an excess than from a defect of evidence. Most of the variants are quite trivial in character, so that, in Hort's phrase, the amount of substantial variation 'can hardly form more than a thousandth part of the entire text'. (The New Testament in the Original Greek, Introduction, 2.) d On the whole, the conclusion must be, in the present state of our knowledge, that, whereas the Byzantine and Western texts show abundant traces of free editorial revision, this is less evident in the Neutral and Caesarean families. Their revision was the work of scholarly editors, who desired an authentic text rather than an easy one. These texts have neither the substantial additions of the Western, nor the harmonizing and stylistic alterations of the Byzantine. We can regard them as the best available for the recovery of the authentic (or earliest obtainable) text of the NT, while relying, as opportunity offers, on such sporadic readings of other MSS as can be shown to be of early date.

In this work of reconstructing the text, we rely not only on texts and versions, but on patristic quotations. So Irenaeus quotes the NT about 1,800 times, Clement of Alexandria 2,400 times, Origen some 18,000 times. The shorter quotations are sometimes an unreliable guide to the text, since the Fathers frequently quote from memory. But the longer quotations, when there is agreement among witnesses of an early date, are a most valuable guide to the primitive text as it first came forth from its inspired authors.

e Printed Editions of the Greek NT—The editio princeps of the Greek NT is vol. V of the Complutensian (Alcala) Polyglot, finished 1514, published in 1522, and later re-edited in the Antwerp Polyglot of 1571 and by Gratz at Tübingen in 1821.

Almost simultaneously (1516) Erasmus produced a Greek text with a Latin version and notes. His claim to have used the oldest and best codices is unsubstantiated, and the last six verses of the Apoc (wanting in his MS) were supplied by translating the Vulgate into Greek! The famous 'Three Witnesses' text (1 Jn 5:7-8) was inserted in the third (1522) edition on the authority of a solitary Greek MS, the Codex Montfortianus or Britannicus (61; 15th or 16th cent.). A little later, the Aldine edition (Feb. 1518/1519) was published by Aldus Manutius at Venice, and the Paris edition (1534) by Simon Colinaeus.

Robertus Stephanus printed four editions. The third (1550) is the editio regia, dedicated to King Henry II, and in the fourth (1551) the division into verses first occurs. For the text he used mostly Erasmus revised according to the Complutensian Polyglot. Theodore Beza (d. 1605) produced many editions of NT (e.g. 1565, 1582, 1588, 1598) based mostly on Stephanus, though with some use of MSS and Fathers.

f In 1623 Bonaventura and Abraham Elzevir printed at Leyden a mixed text based on Stephanus and Beza. In the preface to the second (1633) edition occur the words: 'Textum ergo habes nunc ab omnibus receptum: in quo nihil immutatum aut corruptum damus'. This textus receptus was, until comparatively recent times, much esteemed and frequently reprinted.

The first really critical edition seems to have been that of John Mill (1645-1707), who in the year of his death issued the third (regia) edition of Stephanus with an apparatus including some 30,000 variants, drawn from 78 MSS. The great Richard Bentley (1662-1742) never carried out his project for a critical edition. The work was later undertaken with varying degrees of success by Wettstein (who first established the system of reference to MSS by letters and numbers), Bengel and Lachmann. The last set aside the evidence of the printed texts, in particular that of the textus receptus, and sought to recover the text in existence in the 4th cent. His first edition came out in 1831; his second, with notes on the readings added by the great philologist Philip Buttmann, of Lexilogus fame, appeared in 1842 (vol. I) and 1850 (vol. II).

g Of later editors one must specially mention Tischendorf, whose eighth edition (1864-72) has yet to be superseded by the new Oxford text, of which the first volume (Mark) and the second (Matthew) appeared respectively in 1935 and 1939. It has met with severe criticism, and it seems unlikely that such a task can be continued by a single editor. Cf. T. W. Manson JTS 43 (1942) 83-92.

Westcott and Hort's text is excellent, but there is no full apparatus criticus. The notes on selected readings are a poor substitute for a complete justification of the text adopted by these scholars.

Of recent non-Catholic texts one need only mention the late Eberhard Nestle's 'resultant' text, based on majority verdicts of the three editions of Tischendorf, Westcott and Hort, and Bernhard Weiss. It was first issued in 1906, and the sixteenth (1936) edition contains a reasonably full apparatus.

Up to the year 1834 Catholics had taken little part in these labours. In that year appeared the Greek NT of Scholz (d. 1852), a Catholic critic who examined and partially collated nearly 1,000 MSS. Authorities differ regarding his care and competence as a collator; Gregory says that his collations are very good. (Canon and Text of the New Testament, 1907, 452.)

h Among recent editors mention should be made, though only as an awful warning, of Fr Brandscheid's Novum Testamentum graece (editio altera, emendatio), Freiburg i/B, 1901, in which the Greek is corrected according to the Latin, surely a critical monstrosity! The two latest and best editions by Catholics are those of the celebrated Bonn professor, Dr H. J. Vogels, published at Düsseldorf (1920 ff.), and that of P. Augustin Merk, S.J., Novum Testamentum Graece et Latine, published at Rome in 1933 (sixth edition, 1948). Neither of these editions is wholly satisfactory, and it is to be hoped that some other Catholic scholar of repute may, sooner or later, attempt the production of a text with an apparatus fuller than that of Vogels and less complicated than that of P. Merk. In the article mentioned above Professor Manson has argued forcibly for the use, as a medium of collation, of the textus receptus, which fulfils the twofold criterion of being old enough to be in no danger of becoming out of date, and of making fairly certain that such variants as appear in the apparatus will be really significant.

THE JEWISH WORLD IN NEW TESTAMENT TIMES

b Introduction—At the beginning of the Christian era Jerusalem and Judaea were the centre of the Jewish world. Outside of Palestine, Jewish settlements were found in most of the large cities of the eastern Roman Empire, and in Babylonia. The largest and most influential communities were in Babylonia and Egypt. While the Jews living abroad were somewhat assimilated to the Gentile population of the cities in which they dwelt, the powerful influence of Palestinian Jewry imposed on Jews everywhere a unity of religious belief and practice which gave Judaism a distinctive character, and prevented its absorption by Greco-Roman culture.

c Sources—The principal contemporary sources for the history of Judaism are:

A. Flavius Josephus (b. A.D. 38), the Jewish historian; fought in the rebellion of A.D. 66–70; was taken and pardoned by the Romans, and became a client of the Flavian house. In the Jewish Antiquities and the Jewish War Josephus has preserved much information about pre-Christian Judaism not found elsewhere; but he is uncritical in his use of sources.

B. Rabbinical Writings: (a) The Mishnah, a collection of the oral traditions of the Rabbis by which the Law was interpreted, amplified, and applied to particular situations. These traditions are Halakhic (legal) or Haggadic (doctrinal). Since the collection was not made until the close of the second cent. A.D., it must be employed with caution to determine Jewish ideas of the NT period. (b) Midrashim, or interpretations of the Scriptures.

C. Apocalyptic Literature. A great number of works appeared during the period 200 B.C.–A.D. 100 which, under the pseudonym of ancient figures (such as Enoch or Esdras), pretended to be predictions of the downfall of the great heathen powers and the establishment of the Jewish kingdom of God. It is uncertain how far these works represent the prevailing sentiments of Judaism of the time.

D. The New Testament, especially the Gospels.

E. Profane historians. Tacitus (Historiae V) gives a brief sketch of Judaism. Other Roman historians (Suetonius), and satirists (Horace, Juvenal) allude to Jewish beliefs and practices. These works, which exhibit a profound anti-Jewish prejudice, are biased and inaccurate; but they indicate a common attitude towards Judaism among the Gentiles.

d Palestinian Judaism—Up to the fall of the monarchy in 586 B.C., the Hebrew religion and the Hebrew nation had been identified. The restoration of the Jewish commonwealth under the Persians in 538 B.C. did not restore the original conditions. In NT times many more Jews lived dispersed in Gentile lands than in Palestine itself. The language of Palestinian Jews was no longer Hebrew, but Aramaic (another Semitic language closely akin to Hebrew) which was spoken 584d throughout most of the Near East. Palestine was now, instead of an independent state, a province of a world empire, with a much smaller area than that ruled by the Hebrew monarchies. The territory in which Jews formed a majority of the population was limited to Judaea, Galilee and Peraea. This territory was an island in a sea of Gentile populations which surrounded it on north, east and south. Most of the Palestinian Jewish population belonged to the humbler peasant and tradesmen's classes. The loss of political independence meant that Judaism became a religion; the kingdom of God, the theocracy, existed only as an ideal to be realized in some distant future. But the consciousness of the identity of religion and nation survived in Judaism to express itself in two different directions: the political nationalism of the Hasmonean period (165–163 B.C.) and of the Zealots who rebelled against Rome in A.D. 66, and the religious nationalism of the Pharisees.

It was in these four centuries, and in Palestine, that Judaism developed those distinctive traits which made it unique in the ancient world. Several factors contributed to this: the successful effort of the Jews in Babylon to resist assimilation; the feud with the Samaritans, in which the Jewish community closed itself against any foreign admixture; the promulgation of the Law by Esdras, by which Jewish life was based upon the strict observance of the Law; and the Maccabean wars, in which the threat of Hellenization was successfully resisted by violence, and a short-lived Jewish state was established.

The effort of the Jews to retain their distinct identity and to preserve themselves against foreign influence resulted in a characteristic exclusivism. Palestinian Judaism refused any contact with Gentiles beyond that of bare necessity—a theory which was never abandoned, although it was impossible to reduce it to practice. The Jew was required by law to do business with his own, to marry his own, to enjoy social relations with his own. Any contact with a Gentile caused ritual impurity. Gentiles defiled land, houses and food. The obligations of justice and charity were not as strict towards Gentiles as they were between Jews. Just those features of Jewish law and ritual which emphasized the separation of the Jew from the Gentile were most insisted upon. The Gentiles usually, and not always without reason, thought the Jews were haughty.

Social and Economic Conditions in Palestine—The social and economic conditions of Palestine in NT times were generally similar to those which were found throughout the eastern Roman Empire, especially to those of the neighbouring regions of Syria and Egypt. It is the opinion of some writers that Palestine was one of the most prosperous countries of the empire; but it is difficult to be certain about this. Palestine was an agricultural country. Its principal crops were wheat and barley, of which there was normally an annual surplus for export. Besides the grains, Palestine produced fruit in abundance: olives, figs, grapes, dates. In NT times the forests of Palestine had not yet been destroyed; and, while it is a question how rich this resource of Palestine was, we can be certain that timber was abundant in comparison with modern 584 times. The pasturing of sheep and goats, mentioned so frequently in the OT, was still carried on, but it no longer had the economic importance which it possessed under the Hebrew monarchy. Palestinian Jews in NT times were not engaged in trade and commerce on a large scale. Outside of Jerusalem, there was no Jewish city of any importance; and Jerusalem itself was not a great market. Trade and commerce were centred in the cities of the coast and in the Decapolis, which were the ports of entry for foreign goods and the agents of export for Palestinian products. These cities were entirely or predominantly Greek. The cities on the shore of the Lake of Galilee were also important trading centres for the region; but here again there was a large Greek population. In Jerusalem itself there were a few wealthy Jewish merchants and bankers; but they were a small minority. Their economic importance, of course, was out of all proportion to their numbers.

g Palestine at the time of Jesus had probably reached the peak of its population in ancient times. Exact figures are not available; two million (including Transjordan) would be a conservative estimate. The country had enjoyed peace since the Roman conquest by Pompey in 63 B.C., and had not yet suffered the horrors of the revolt of A.D. 66-70, which left the country ravaged and depopulated. In spite of the emigration of Jews to foreign countries, conditions were favourable to a rapid growth of population.

The population of Palestine was not racially homogeneous; indeed, it had never been. Of the three divisions of the country, Judaea, Samaria and Galilee, Judaea was the most Jewish both in population and in ideas and practice. Samaria was regarded by the Jews themselves as an alien enclave—a judgement which was hardly accurate; the mixed origins of the Samaritans were more Hebrew than anything else, and the religion of the Samaritans was a schismatic Judaism. Galilee was so mixed as to be cosmopolitan. Its cities were mostly Greek, its rural areas mostly Jewish; but there was a free interchange between city and country. This was reflected in the language of the three regions; it is probable that Judaea spoke mostly Aramaic, while Greek was probably as important in Galilee as Aramaic. Some scholars think Jesus and his Apostles, like most of the Galileans, were bilingual. Among themselves, however, Jews employed Aramaic.

b The prosperity of the three regions was proportionate to their Gentile population. Galilee, blessed with a more fertile soil and with better communications to the outside world, was the richest part of the country. The great trade route which connected Egypt with Damascus, Syria and Mesopotamia passed up the coast without touching Judaea and Samaria directly; it then turned north-east and went through the heart of Galilee. The route from Damascus to Arabia was easily reached from Galilee, while the route from Arabia to Gaza ignored Judaea altogether. Hence Judaea retained its Jewish insularity, and looked with some suspicion on the Galileans as half heathen.

i There was a certain tension between Jerusalem and the Judaeian countryside, and still more between Judaea and Galilee. Jerusalem was the residence of the priestly aristocracy and the wealthy merchants and landlords, whose wealth was built upon the labourers and the peasants. It was also the centre of Jewish learning, where the most distinguished rabbis were found. Their legal decisions were binding on the poor workers, for whom the Pharisaic interpretation of the Law was often impossible. Jerusalem had the typical urban contempt of the countryman. In one feature Galilee excelled Jerusalem, and that was Jewish nationalism. It was in Galilee that the revolt broke out in A.D. 66. The ruling classes of Jerusalem, whose position depended on political and economic stability, were of necessity linked with the government, whether it was the government of Herod or of a Roman procurator. The Gospels contrast the enthusiasm of the Galileans for the Messianic kingdom with the coldness of the men of Jerusalem. 584

It is difficult to speak of social classes among Palestinian Jews; for even in NT times the Jews had begun to manifest that social solidarity which has been so characteristic of them throughout their subsequent history. Theoretically, the Jews were a democratic society; at the time of Jesus the Hasmonaean aristocracy was practically extinct, and the Herodian aristocracy was never accepted by the Jews. The Jewish aristocracy was composed of a few priestly families, who were also the wealthy families. This does not mean that all the priestly families were wealthy; they were not. Pride in Jewish blood was so great that any Jew who could vindicate his ancestry regarded himself as socially the equal of any other. Practically, of course, things did not work out this way. The Jewish aristocracy was an aristocracy of wealth rather than of blood. At the same time there was the aristocracy of the masters of the Law, which was not coterminous with the aristocracy of wealth. Jewish social classes were fluid and hard to define; but there were divisions and a certain social unrest beneath the superficial unity of Palestinian Judaism.

k It was quite otherwise with the economic classes, which had reached a fixed stratification in NT times. There were no middle classes between the wealthy and the poor; and both wealth and poverty were extreme. Wealth came from commerce and ownership of land; since these remained in the same families, fortunes grew through successive generations. Dives of the parable, Lk 11:19 ff., was an extreme example, but the wealthy could recognize themselves in his portrait. Whether they were, as a class, as insensitive to the needs of the poor as Dives of the parable is open to question. Almsgiving was much recommended by the rabbis; but we can be certain that whatever almsgiving was practised did nothing to remove the horrible social blight of poverty.

The employments of the poor were agriculture, the crafts, and unskilled labour. The Lake of Galilee gave employment to a large number of fishermen, whose product was consumed throughout Palestine; this class is of interest to the reader of the Gospels because the first disciples of Jesus were chosen from it. Jesus himself was a craftsman, and not on the lowest rung of the economic ladder; the craftsmen were better off than others. In a village like Nazareth Jesus may have been the only man to practise his trade; in Jerusalem he would have had his shop in one of the bazaars in which it was customary for merchants of the same wares and workers of the same craft to congregate. Some writers speak of whole villages devoted to a single craft.

l Beneath the craftsmen we find the peasant. The peasant tilled the soil of a wealthy landowner who probably resided in Jerusalem. The peasant himself resided in a village with other peasants, each of whom had his strip of land in the neighbourhood. The yield, of course, was not to be compared with that of modern agriculture. The peasant had to meet the rent, the taxes and the tithes. We do not know what the rent may have been; the taxes paid to Rome were 25 per cent of the yield. The tithes for the Temple came to 22 per cent of the remainder. The peasant was expected to pay a second tithe for the poor; it is thought that this was rarely paid. Nor is it likely that the full Temple tithe was always paid. If the rents corresponded to these obligations—as they probably did—it is not hard to calculate how much was left for the peasant.

Rents, taxes and tithes were paid in kind. Taxes were not collected by the Roman officials themselves. The estimated revenue was based on a census; we read of such a census in the year of the birth of Jesus. The taxes were then farmed out to speculators, the 'publicans' of the Gospel, and the contract was awarded to the highest bidder. The tax-farmer was then free to collect as much revenue as he could; m Beneath the peasant was the unskilled labourer, the 'hireling' of the Gospel. Slavery in Palestine was comparatively rare; Jewish sentiment was opposed to the enslavement of one Jew by another, and the country was not wealthy enough to import large numbers of slaves from abroad. But the very existence of slavery depressed the unskilled labourers. They hired themselves out for whatever work was available, usually by the day. There was always a large number of unemployed; and competition depressed the income of the labourer still more. But it is not likely that the difference between this proletariat and the skilled worker was really great. The poverty of the mass of the population of Palestine probably did not differ much from that of the average population of the Empire, but it was appalling. On the other hand, we must not judge the attitude of these people towards their poverty by our modern ideas. They were born to it, and economic stratification prevented any higher ambitions. A drought, a war, an insect plague inevitably meant slavery or starvation; but the poor were accustomed to face such dangers as a normal part of life.

Furthermore, the dignity of manual labour was much praised by the rabbis. The fact that a man earned his living by manual labour was not a social stigma. Not only Jesus and St Paul, but many of the great rabbis practised a trade; and they were accepted in the homes of the great because of their knowledge of the Law. The poor, if we may judge from some Gospel passages, had very free access to the homes of the rich.

n Below the unskilled labourers were the social outcasts. Like the Samaritans, a Jew of mixed origin, or a Jew who took on Greek ways, was an object of disdain. A tax-farmer like Matthew or Zacheus was a moral leper. The sick, the crippled, the aged and the orphans who had no families to support them were at the mercy of an unfeeling world. Beggars were common. There were always men who were discontented with Roman rule, or who had fallen under the suspicion of the authorities, who fled to the desert and a life of banditry, preying impartially on Jew and Gentile alike. There was often a strong bond of sympathy between such bandits and the poor and the extreme nationalists.

Debt was an additional curse on the poor. Since their margin was so small, any emergency threw them into the hands of the moneylenders; and we have no reason to believe that the Scribes could not circumvent the law prohibiting interest between Jews. The interest rates were probably exorbitant, although we cannot give exact figures; we know that the honourable Brutus charged 50 per cent in Rome. While this did not always result in personal enslavement, it did mean economic enthrallment for the peasant, who lived at subsistence level, or less, when he fell into debt. There is no historical evidence that the law of jubilee, with its universal remission of debt, was ever observed.

One effect of the general poverty was (surprisingly) that early marriages were the rule. A boy or girl of twelve years was regarded as grown enough to leave the home; the family wished to be rid of them as soon as possible. If the boy could not find a trade from his father or his relatives, he was cast into the great reservoir of the unemployed. Early marriage and childbirth were followed in the natural course by premature senescence, which meant that more helpless persons were thrown upon society.

o The food of the poor was very simple. Only the few wealthy could afford the luxury articles of diet imported from abroad. The staples of the poor were wheat or barley bread and dried fish. Meat was a rare treat. Vegetables—leeks, lentils, beans—and dried fruit were Palestinian products. Wine was produced in Palestine and was in common use, although the best wine was exported. The poor man would scarcely have more than one set of garments: 584 the tunic, which was his ordinary dress, and a cloak for inclement weather and for sleeping. The houses of the poor were of stone, one or two storeys, usually shared by several families; the very poor might share a room among several families. The houses, even in the villages, were built very close together; only narrow alleys were left for passage and for the disposal of refuse. The site of the village was determined by the availability of water; it would be an unusually favoured site if there were more than one well. The water supply was supplemented by cisterns.

It is important to understand this background of the Gospels and the early expansion of Christianity. Christianity was the only movement of any kind in ancient times which arose in the masses. Jesus himself, like his first followers, belonged to the poor, and he spoke to them in the first place. They listened to him, because he was one of themselves. When Christianity spread into the great cities of the Roman Empire its appeal was to the poor; and it reached the upper classes from below.

The Temple and the Priesthood—The Temple of 585a Jerusalem, as the one place where sacrifice could be legitimately offered, was the official centre of Jewish worship. It was the desire of every pious Jew, whether in Palestine or abroad, to visit the Temple at one of the great annual feasts; and we are told that many travelled long distances to gratify this desire. The second Temple, dedicated in 516 B.C., stood until the erection of the Temple of Herod at the beginning of the Christian era. This great structure, planned on a truly magnificent scale, was completed shortly before it was razed to the ground by the Romans in A.D. 70 (but cf. comm. on Jn 2:20 infra).

The priesthood enjoyed a position of great importance, certainly greater than it had under the monarchy. The priesthood was a distinct hereditary order. Priests might marry women of non-priestly families; but they must be undefiled virgins or widows of pure Israelite extraction. The high-priest might marry only an undefiled Israelite virgin. Contact with death was prohibited, since this caused ritual uncleanness. The priests had to be free of any physical defect which marred their appearance or disqualified them to perform priestly functions. They were inducted into the sacerdotal office by a rite of consecration called 'filling of the hands', in which they received in their hands portions of the sacred flesh of the sacrificial victim. Since the number of priests was far in excess of that necessary for the Temple service, they were divided into twenty-four courses, each of which served in turn. Within the courses there were further divisions into specialized offices, which involved a difference in rank. The Levites, like the priests, were a hereditary order. They were entrusted with subordinate duties (singers, janitors, servants of the priests).

The priests and the Temple services were maintained by revenues from the people. To the priests belonged first-fruits and the first-born of animals, and the money paid for the redemption of first-born sons; portions of sacrificial victims; tithes on all produce or profits; voluntary and votive offerings; and a half-shekel annual tax on every male Israelite over twenty years of age. The Jerusalem Temple, like many pagan temples, was used as a place of safe deposit for money and valuables. The Temple had its own police force, the jurisdiction of which was not limited to the Temple.

The power of the high-priest was much increased 6 during the post-exilic period. Under the imperial governments of Persia, Syria and Rome the high-priest was the supreme native magistrate under the provincial authorities. The Maccabees were a priestly family; and in Simon (140 B.C.) the offices of high-priest and head of the independent Jewish state were united. This double dignity was retained by the succeeding members of the Hasmonaean dynasty (except Alexandra) until its fall before Pompey (63 B.C.).

585e This overweening power of the high-priest met with an actively hostile reaction from the Pharisees, and it created a deep cleft between the sacerdotal aristocracy and the mass of the people. This cleft was widened by the Hellenistic inclinations of priestly families, both before and after the Maccabean wars. After the Roman conquest the high-priests were appointed by the Roman authorities. By political manoeuvring the members of a few priestly families kept the appointment for themselves. The influence of high-priests after their term of office (such as Annas) was very great.

d The worship of the Temple was conducted in a sumptuous manner, and the contributions of the people to its support were heavy. The chief daily services of the Temple were the burnt-offering on behalf of the people each morning and evening, and the offering of incense daily at the same time. The Levites accompanied these offerings with vocal and instrumental music. There was always a large attendance of the public at these daily services. On the Sabbath and the major festivals more numerous victims were offered. It is characteristic of post-exilic Judaism that the expiatory and propitiatory purpose of sacrifice was emphasized rather than the joyous and grateful sentiment of many pre-exilic offerings. The attitude of the pious Jew towards the ritual of the Temple is expressed in Ecclesiastes 50:1 ff.

e The Scriptures—It is impossible to determine exactly when the first collection of sacred books was made. The Jews, under the leadership of Esdras, bound themselves to the observance of the Torah, or Law of Moses, Neh 8-10. The date of this event is uncertain (cf. §§ 289i-g, 297a-d). It is clear from the prologue of Ecclesiastes that a collection which included 'the Law, the Prophets and the Writings' was in existence in 130 B.C. We do not know by what authority it was determined which books should be included in the collection. The sacred books should have been in the custody of the priesthood, and it is to them that the first collection should in all probability be attributed. But we find that the Scribes subsequently asserted their authority to exclude books from the collection. The vagueness of this determination is seen in the existence of two canons: the Palestinian canon, represented by the OT in Hebrew, and the Alexandrine canon represented by the OT in Greek, which contained books not admitted into the Palestinian collection.

f The influence of the sacred books on Judaism cannot be overestimated. The Law was the entire basis of Jewish life and piety. Both the Law and the Prophets formed the material of the synagogue lessons. The use of the Psalms in the Temple liturgy and in the worship of the synagogue coloured the language and the attitude of Jewish prayer. The ordinary Jew was familiar with the text of the sacred books. Mohammed called Judaism 'the religion of the book'. To the Jew his books comprised all wisdom and learning, and a complete code of right conduct.

g The Law—The five books of Moses, called the Tôrâh, were the most highly venerated of the sacred books. Tôrâh actually means 'instruction' or 'doctrine' rather than 'law'; and a large portion of the books of Moses is narrative. From the narrative portions as well as from the legal portions were deduced conclusions about God, his Providence, and human conduct. 'Law', however, expresses accurately the attitude of Judaism towards these books. The basis of legal observance was faith in the covenant of God with Israel and in divine retribution. The minute regulations of the Law extended to almost every detail of life; and what the Law did not explicitly touch was covered by applications, sometimes quite far-fetched, of general precepts. As a matter of fact, the laws of the Mosaic code were never intended to be such a universal and detailed guide of conduct. The extension of legal obligation into every detail of private and public life could not but result in an externalizing of religion to some degree. By some Jews mere external observances were esteemed as grave as duties of piety, justice and charity. From the fact that the greater number of precepts is prohibitive it follows that there was a certain negative character about Jewish observance.

Special emphasis was placed on those observances h which were distinctive of Judaism: circumcision, the Sabbath, and legal cleanliness. Circumcision was not, in its origins, a peculiarly Jewish practice; but in pre-Christian centuries it had become such a mark of Judaism that Jews who wished to adopt the Greek way of life and Greek manners resorted to a painful surgical operation in order to rid themselves of the sign of their religion. The Sabbath observance was understood to mean a complete rest from all activity. Even food should be prepared on the preceding day. The distance which one might walk was restricted to 2,000 cubits (about 3,000 feet); by leaving a bundle of food, however, one was considered to establish a temporary domicile which enlarged the scope of travel. A whole block of houses, or a quarter of a city, might be considered as a single residence. There were 39 kinds of work classified as violations of the Sabbath rest. The weight which one could lift without violating the Sabbath was determined. It is not surprising that the Roman authorities found it simpler to exempt the Jews from military service than to adjust military discipline to the Jewish Sabbath.

The obligation of legal cleanliness was, if observed 586a strictly, an almost impossible burden. The obligation of cleanliness was originally intended for the priests actually officiating in the sanctuary. Its extension to all Jews of any state or occupation meant either constant ablutions or constant uncleanness, which rendered one unfit for religious exercises. There were various degrees of uncleanness according to the nature of the object touched, and six kinds of water were distinguished for purification from these various degrees. Contact with Gentiles, or with the dead, or with certain diseases, or with a person who had contracted uncleanness, or any sexual process were all defilements. Food had to be protected against uncleanness, in addition to the dietary regulations, which meant in practice that it could not be handled by Gentiles. Generally, the laws of cleanliness were simply not observed, especially where Jews and Gentiles dwelt together.

From the Law was deduced the obligation of wearing b šišit, fringes at the corners of the outer garment; t'pillin (phylacteries in the NT), boxes containing small scrolls on which were written Ex 13:1-10, 11-16; Deut 6:4-9, 11:13-21, attached to the head and the arm by straps; and of placing at the door-post m'zûzôl, small boxes containing scrolls on which were written Deut 6:4-9, 11:13-21. The devout Jew was obliged to recite the Shema, Deut 6:4-9, 11:13-21; Num 15:37-41, the Jewish profession of faith, each morning and evening. Fasting was characteristic of Jewish legal piety as a token of repentance and as an expression of petition in difficult times. Some annual fasts were of general obligation, but most fasting was done out of private devotion. The Law imposed the celebration of the three annual 'pilgrimage-fasts' (at which pilgrimages were made to the Temple): Passover, in remembrance of the Exodus of the Hebrews from Egypt; Pentecost, in remembrance of the giving of the Law; and Tabernacles, in remembrance of the sojourn of the Hebrews in the desert. The original agricultural character of these feasts disappeared completely. Besides these there were the New Year, and what became the greatest Jewish feast, the Day of Atonement (Yôm Kippûr), when expiation was made for the sins of the whole people.

The Law, however, was more than a series of minute c regulations of external conduct. It was possible for Hillel to sum it up in the rule, 'Do not to another what you would not have him do to you', and for the Saviour to point out as its greatest and first commandment, 'Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with thy 586e whole heart', and as the second, 'Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself'. But the vast number of precepts—they were reckoned at 613—certainly helped to create a characteristic feature of Judaism, a deep sense of sin and guilt. This sense of sin undoubtedly can be traced back to the Exile itself, and to the teaching of Jeremias and Ezechiel, who insisted on the truth that the national disaster was due to the sins of the people. The prayers of Judaism are filled with confessions of sin and cries of repentance. Contrary to pre-exilic practice, sacrifice was viewed chiefly as an atonement for sin. The Law furnished a definite measuring-rod of righteousness. Hence, if the prescriptions of the Law were observed, it was possible for the Jew to develop a feeling of self-righteousness; and we find this sentiment marching side by side with the sense of sin.

d The Scribes—The study and interpretation of the Law was in the hands of those who are called in the Gospels Scribes and doctors of the law. Originally the interpretation of the Torah was the function of the priests; but the Scribes as such were not priests, although priests were included in their number. Once the Law was accepted as the basis of Jewish life, it was necessary to determine its meaning, and to apply it, as far as possible, to any situation that might arise. Hence came the Scribes. The name is first given to Esdras, 'a ready scribe in the law of Moses'. The Scribes had no official position; and their opinions had no authority except that of personal influence and public opinion. But this authority was enough. They were legislators, teachers and judges. They sat 'in the chair of Moses', and were addressed by the title of Rabbi (master). The study of the Law was, in the eyes of the devout Jew, the highest occupation of man (cf. Eccles 39:1-11). It was not remunerative; many of the Scribes, who did not enjoy an independent income, were quite poor and supported themselves by a trade. Their function was 'to build a fence around the Law': to protect the perfect observance of the Law by additional regulations. These regulations were formed by deducing them from the text of the written Law. There were two kinds of interpretation: the Halakhah, an interpretation, application, or extension of the precepts of the Law into a rule of conduct; and the Haggadah, an amplification of the narrative and doctrinal portions of the Law by the addition of legend, speculation or sheer imagination. The Haggadah was especially concerned with the future and the heavenly world, about which it pretended to give much information. The Halakhah was always based, at least in appearance, on an inference or a deduction from the written Law, however far-fetched these conclusions might be. Thus conclusions were formulated from single words or letters, or even from punctuation or the order of the words. By adding the numerical values of the single letters, and by redividing the sum, new words or sentences could be formed (gematria), from which a precept could be deduced. The same end could be reached by inverting the letters according to the alphabetical order in reverse, and forming new words. The regulations thus formulated grew into a second legal system, the oral law, which was proposed as of equal authority with the Law of Moses; indeed, the beginning of oral tradition was attributed to Moses himself.

f The oral law was the object of tradition. A distinguished scribe would gather around himself a group of disciples who preserved his teaching, and in their own generation amplified it. Until after the beginning of the Christian era there was no written basis for the teaching of the Scribes. Memory was all-important. The schools of the Scribes were by no means uniform in their interpretation of the Law. Difference of opinion was a constant cause of quarrels; a quarrel between the schools of Hillel and Shammai is said to have issued in fatal violence on one occasion. These two schools were, according to the Jewish sources, the principal schools of the last century B.C. The school of Hillel was mild in its interpretations; that of Shammai was inexorably rigorous. These two tendencies were active, whether these two men were their creators or not.

g Much of the casuistry of the Scribes is judged unfavourably by moderns. There are many allusions in the Gospels to the over-emphasis they placed on external observances (tithing mint, anise and cummin, and neglecting mercy, justice and faith), the devices by which they evaded obligations of the Law (e.g. the evasion of the obligation of supporting one's parents by consecrating one's goods to the sanctuary), and the hypocrisy which masked their refusal to live by their own precepts (binding intolerable burdens on men, while refusing to lift a finger). They treated those who were ignorant of the Law, or who did not observe it, with a lofty contempt. But among their number were found some who were 'not far from the Kingdom of God'. It is thought that the first Jewish Christians must have included a not inconsiderable number of men who, like St Paul, had devoted their lives to the earnest study of the Word of God, and who attempted to live by this Word as they understood it.

The Sanhedrin—The Aramaic word sanhedrin is identical with the Gk synedion, assembly or council. When this institution arose cannot be definitely determined. From earliest times local government had been conducted by a council of the elders, men whose age, rank and wealth gave weight to their decisions. It was probably not before the Greek period (after 330 B.C.) that the Jerusalem council, called the Sanhedrin, came to wield legislative and judicial authority for all Judaea, and to claim the same authority not only for Palestinian Judaism, but also, so far as the dispersed Jews consented, for Judaism of the Diaspora as well. The presidency of the Sanhedrin was vested in the high-priest, who was the supreme native magistrate under the imperial governments. The original composition of the Sanhedrin was exclusively aristocratic: members of the high-priestly families, and the 'elders' of the lay aristocracy. It was probably during the Hasmonaean period that scribes also were admitted. These classes are the 'chief priests, elders and scribes' of the Gospels. In NT times the party of the Pharisees was in the ascendancy in the Sanhedrin. The number of its members was seventy-one. Members were admitted either by co-option or by appointment of the imperial government; the method is not certainly known. The competence of the Sanhedrin was originally very broad, including all religious questions, and all civil and criminal cases which the imperial government did not reserve to its own officers. Before the Roman period (63 B.C.) these reservations were very few; and the Romans limited the civil authority of the Sanhedrin to Judaea proper. But even the Hasmonaean rulers quarrelled with the Sanhedrin, and these quarrels, on occasion, broke out into armed strife; and Herod and the Roman government restricted the jurisdiction of the Sanhedrin very considerably. Capital crimes (except trespassing in the Temple area) were removed from its competence. It was the supreme authority in determining the interpretation of the Law, both oral and written; these decisions were valid for the Diaspora. It had its own police force.

The procedure of the Sanhedrin favoured the accused. In capital cases, the arguments of the defence were heard first, and favourable testimony was irreversible. Unfavourable testimony could be reversed. A delay of one day should intervene between the trial and a sentence of condemnation. A majority of one sufficed for acquittal; a majority of two was required for condemnation.

The Hasidim—In the Maccabean period there appears a party among the Jews known as the Assideans (Heb. hasid, 'pious'). They were a group devoted to the 567e perfect observance of the Law ; and, while they took active part in the Maccabean revolt, they refused to fight on the Sabbath, even in self-defence. Under the Hasmonaean rulers they appear again as hostile to the pretensions of the priestly rulers. They represent the sentiments of the lower classes as opposed to the aristocracy. It was from this group that there evolved the far more famous Jewish sect, the Pharisees.

d The Pharisees—The name (Aramaic ḥrūšīm, 'separated') was probably given to the sect by their enemies as a term of opprobrium. It became, however, the accepted designation of the group. They were called 'separate' because of their exact observance of all the prescriptions of the Law, which set them apart not only from the Gentiles, but also from less observant Jews.

Distinctive Pharisaic tenets are reported by the ancient sources as follows. Firstly, the acceptance of the oral law, 'the traditions of the ancients', as of equal validity with the written law. This meant in practice that most of the Scribes were Pharisees. Pharisaic interpretation was generally more rigorous and imposed all the precepts of the Law as equally grave. Secondly, belief in human freedom under the control of divine Providence. This problem was attacked by the Pharisees, if we may trust Josephus, by affirming both terms of the antinomy : human freedom, and effective control by divine Providence. Thirdly, belief in the resurrection of the body. Fourthly, belief in the existence of the angels. It is doubtful whether these last two points should be called peculiarly Pharisaic doctrine.

e Pharisaism was a religious, not a political, movement. But the struggles of the Pharisees with the Hasmonaean dynasty made them prefer a friendly and liberal foreign government to an enlargement of sacerdotal power ; and they lived peaceably under Herod and the Romans as long as the imperial government did not interfere with perfect observance. The kingdom of God, they believed, would be established by divine intervention, not by human efforts. Government by foreign powers was divine punishment for the sins of the nation, and as such should be accepted submissively ; but, on the other hand, it was a profanation of the Holy Land and of the Chosen People, and an obstacle to the establishment of the kingdom of God. As such, it should be overturned by rebellion. Since there was no such thing as a Pharisaic political policy, Pharisees were active in all the wars and rebellions of the Jews from the Maccabees to the insurrection of Bar Kochba in A.D. 135.

f It was Pharisaism which imposed its permanent stamp upon Judaism. The great catastrophe of A.D. 70, in which the city and the Temple were destroyed by the Romans, wiped out all other parties in Palestinian Judaism. But even before that date the Pharisees dominated Judaism. Their perfect observance of the Law won them the admiration, if not the affection, of the mass of the people ; and their opposition to the sacerdotal aristocracy, which was often dishonest and rapacious, put them on the side of the common people. Their emphasis on the study and the observance of the Law, and on exercises of piety which were independent of the Temple, made it possible for Judaism to survive as a religion after the disappearance of the priesthood and the Temple liturgy. They were not democratic, and did not intend to be ; but their aristocracy was spiritual, as they understood it. Unfortunately their spiritual aristocracy too often degenerated into mere pride. The haughtiness of the Jew towards the Gentile was found sevenfold in the Pharisee. Their withdrawal from profane contact meant, in practice, withdrawal from the human race. The Gospels show them in an unfavourable light. The Pharisees, nevertheless, represent what had once been the highest and purest form of Judaism.

568a The Sadducees—The origin and meaning of the name are uncertain. The Sadducees were the party of the priestly aristocracy, which claimed descent from 568a Zadok. The party seems to have arisen from community of interests. The wealth of the priestly families made common cause for them with other wealthy and conservative circles. They were concerned with preserving the high state of the priesthood. The Pharisees were not anti-sacerdotal nor anti-ritual ; their strict interpretation of the Law allotted ample revenues to the priests. But they opposed the political activity of the priesthood, and set up a standard of legal observance which the priests were unwilling to follow. Hence the Sadducees rejected the oral tradition, and admitted only the written law as valid ; they had, however, their own traditions, and included Scribes in their party. The difference was not in the theory of interpretation, but in the binding force of tradition. In penal laws and in some Levitical laws the Sadducees were more rigorous than the Pharisees. Their religious beliefs were more conservative, clinging to older forms of Jewish doctrine. This was not based on any theological principle ; it was a consequence of their worldliness, and of their lack of any real interest in religious questions. Of all parties and classes of Judaism, the Sadducees were the most favourable to Hellenistic culture. According to Mt 22:23, Ac 23:8, and Josephus, the Sadducees denied divine Providence, the resurrection of the body and the existence of angels.

Like the Pharisees, the Sadducees had no political policy ; priests appear both in rebellion against the imperial government and working in collusion with it. But they were politically active ; their politics, however, had no principle except the advancement of their party and the preservation of sacerdotal wealth and power.

The Sadducees had little influence on the common people, nor, apparently, did they seek it ; they were more concerned with dealing dexterously with the imperial government. They had no lasting influence on Judaism ; with the destruction of the Temple in 70 A.D. the priestly party disappeared altogether from history.

The Essenes—The existence of this sect is affirmed by Josephus. According to his testimony they were a group of men who withdrew from ordinary life to dwell in communal groups in the wilderness. They practised celibacy. Their life was abstemious, spent in labour and the study of the sacred books. They practised numerous ablutions. They took no part in the sacrificial worship of the Temple, although they contributed to its maintenance. Candidates were submitted to three years' probation. They practised perfect community-ownership of goods. They took no oaths, abstained from the common practice of anointing, and wore white garments. At daybreak they invoked the sun, which they must have addressed as a visible symbol of the Deity ; but we cannot ascertain the meaning of this remarkable ceremony. We know nothing of any special doctrines ; Josephus says that they took a vow of secrecy. They would appear to be an extreme wing of the Pharisaic movement. They are not mentioned in the NT ; and they had no influence on Christianity.

The People of the Land—This designation was originally applied to the inhabitants of the rural districts of Palestine, often of mixed Jewish and Gentile extraction, who were affected only slightly, or not at all, by the religious reforms of Esdras, and still less by the Pharisaic movement and the oral law of the Scribes. In NT times the designation was extended, in a contemptuous sense, to all of any class or position who were ignorant of the Law or careless of its perfect observance. To the Pharisees, 'this multitude that knows not the Law is accursed'. The people of the land were the 'publicans and sinners' with whom the Saviour mingled freely, unlike the Pharisees ; they were the 'little ones' to whom the Father revealed what he had hidden from the wise. The mass of the people, sustaining itself in poverty by hard labour, was unable to listen to the instruction of the Scribes, 588d or to execute the precepts of the Law. The people of the land were habitually unclean. It was in them, nevertheless, that the essence of Judaism was found: life according to the moral principles of the Law, the simple piety of daily prayer, Sabbath observance, synagogue worship, and occasional visits to the Temple, and the hope in the kingdom of God to come. It was to such that Jesus addressed himself, and by whom he was at first so cordially received. Unlike the Pharisees, he associated freely with them and taught them; it was a feature of his ministry worth notice that 'the poor had the Gospel preached to them'. For he was himself a member of their class, and from them came his apostles.

o Judaism of the Diaspora—The name Diaspora (Gk 'dispersion') was given to those Jewish communities which were settled outside Palestine. The dispersion of the Hebrews abroad began with the deportations of the conquered by the Assyrian and Babylonian rulers in the eighth, seventh and sixth cent. B.C. Many of the early exiles lost their identity as Hebrews, and were absorbed by the population of the area where they dwelt. The Babylonian exiles, however, in large measure retained their distinctive character, adhered to Jewish religious beliefs and practices, married their own and dwelt in Jewish communities. During the Greek period there was a great migration of Jews to foreign countries for trade. By the last century B.C. large Jewish communities had been established in Syria, Egypt, Asia Minor, Mesopotamia, Babylonia, Persia, Greece and Italy. The number of Jews of the Diaspora is estimated in millions. Their language was Greek; it is thought that most of them were ignorant of Hebrew or Aramaic. The largest communities were found in the great cities, such as Antioch, Alexandria and Rome. The most important Jewish centre outside of Palestine was in Alexandria; it was notable not only for its numbers and wealth, but also for its intellectual activity.

f Most of the Jews of the Diaspora were engaged in trade. They dwelt in separate quarters of the large cities, and were granted privileges of self-government under their own ethnarch by imperial and municipal authorities. This was an extension of the policy of the Hellenistic states and the Roman Empire of granting freedom to private religious associations. The Jews were really separate independent municipalities, and had the power of arrest for offences against the Law. While they did not always possess citizenship, their importance in commerce brought them so many privileges that they were often in a better position than the citizens themselves. Under Julius Caesar (d. 44 B.C.) the Romans initiated the policy of conferring Roman citizenship throughout the empire; and many Jews, like St Paul, possessed this right in addition to their Jewish privileges. This world-wide network of Jewish communities, most of which were wealthy and influential, looked to Palestine for religious leadership, and to Jerusalem as its spiritual capital. Without the contributions of the Diaspora to the support of the Temple the priesthood could scarcely have maintained itself.

g The privileges of the Jews and their commercial success were not without accompanying troubles. They aroused the envy of the native population, which was further inflamed by Jewish exclusivism. In more than one instance this ill-feeling erupted into rioting, as at Antioch, Alexandria and Caesarea, and in charges laid against the Jews before municipal and imperial authorities. At Alexandria there was an almost perpetual feud between Jews and Gentiles; the great Jewish philosopher Philo once led a delegation to appeal to the Emperor Caligula (A.D. 37-41). The Jews were expelled from Rome more than once, and elsewhere had their privileges revoked. Up to A.D. 70, however, these troubles were only temporary; and the Jews always regained what they had lost.

589a The Synagogue—This characteristically Jewish institution (Gk synagoge, meeting-place) was the centre of religious life in the Jewish communities of the Diaspora. Synagogues existed in Palestine also; every village of any size had its synagogue, and larger cities and towns had more than one. When and where the synagogue arose is not known; it may have been in the time of Esdras (the 5th or 4th cent. B.C.), and it probably had its roots in the meetings for prayer and discourse conducted by the Jews in Babylonia during the Exile. The purpose of the synagogue was reading and instruction in the Law; it presupposed that those present were unable to attend the worship in the Temple. Elementary schools for children seem to have been a normal complement of the synagogue; the Law was the only subject of study. The meetings were held on the Sabbath and on feast days; in later Judaism week-day meetings were added. The synagogue was governed by the elders of the synagogue; in strictly or predominantly Jewish communities these may have been identical with the civil authorities. The management of the synagogue and the maintenance of order in the services was in charge of the ruler of the synagogue (Gk archisynagogos). None of the officials were priests; the synagogue was a lay organization. There were no officers appointed to conduct the synagogue services; members of the congregation were called upon to read the Law, to explain it, to lead the prayers. Originally the services were conducted in private dwellings; in NT times communities of any size possessed a synagogue building. Many of these were large and built in a grand style. The principal articles of furniture were: the ark or chest in which the scrolls of the Law were kept, the tribune on which speakers and readers stood, lamps, horns and trumpets for ceremonial purposes. Men and women sat in separate groups. The service began with the Shema, the Jewish profession of faith. There followed a prayer, the reading of the Torah in Hebrew, a translation or paraphrase of the passage in the vernacular, and an explanatory discourse. If a priest were present he concluded the service by giving the sacerdotal blessing. The Law was so divided that the whole was read in the course of three years.

It is impossible to overestimate the part of the synagogue in maintaining Jewish unity of faith and nation. The synagogue was a regular place of meeting for Jews everywhere. Visitors from elsewhere were invited to read or to deliver the discourse, especially if they came from Palestine. Hardly any other single factor is equally responsible for the resistance of Judaism to the assimilative force of Greco-Roman culture.

o The Septuagint—The name (Lat. 'seventy') is given to the translation of the OT into Greek made probably during the 3rd and 2nd cent. B.C., and is based on an unfounded legend that the translation was the work of seventy-two men. This was the most important contribution of the Diaspora to Judaism, from which it passed to Christianity. Most of the Jews of the Diaspora had no facility in reading Hebrew. There was, besides, a desire among many Jews to present their own sacred books to the cultivated world of the time. This monumental work made it possible for Jews abroad and for Gentiles to consult the Scriptures. The LXX enjoyed great authority among the Jews of the Diaspora, equal to that of the original text; and its translators were believed to have done their work under divine inspiration. The LXX is quoted frequently in the NT, and the indirect influence of its language has, in the words of Swete, 'left its mark on every part of the NT'. The Christian Church adopted the LXX as its own Bible with so much enthusiasm that its use was abandoned by the Jews after the 1st cent. A.D.

d Jews and Gentiles—The exclusivism of the Jews and their resistance to Gentile culture was not and could not have been entirely successful. That Judaism was affected by ideas from foreign sources is certain; the extent of this influence cannot be determined exactly.

Hellenistic culture is the name given to the diffusion

589d of the Greek language, learning, arts and customs throughout the East and the Mediterranean littoral following the conquests of Alexander (d. 323 B.C.). The culture of Greece, thus presented to a world-wide audience and adopted by it, shook off its peculiarly Greek traits and became universal. The kingdoms of Syria and Egypt, one or the other of which ruled Palestine from the death of Alexander to the Maccabean wars, were both Hellenistic.

e The impact of Hellenistic culture on the Jews had different effects in Palestine and in the Diaspora. Palestinian Judaism, which had erected itself into a tightly homogeneous community, was better able to resist it than the Jewish communities which supported themselves by commerce in the large Hellenistic cities. Again, we must distinguish between the externals of Hellenistic culture and the religious and philosophical ideas of Hellenism. Judaism both at home and abroad was at first swamped under the externals of Hellenistic culture. The common articles of trade and of daily use, food, clothing, furniture were Greek in name and in style. A great number of Greek personal names appear among the Jews in the Hellenistic period (Andrew, Philip, Alexander), many of them altered from a Hebrew name of similar sound (Joshua and Jason). Even such definitely Jewish buildings as synagogues were erected in the Hellenistic architectural style. Because of the severe restrictions of the Law on the use of images, the Jews seem to have been touched very lightly by the plastic arts of Greece; but there was much study of Greek literature and philosophy, even in Palestine. Civil government in Jewish communities adopted many features of Hellenistic cities. Even in Palestine many Jews enthusiastically adopted Greek costume and such Greek practices as athletic contests, baths and theatres. The members of the sacerdotal aristocracy were the leaders in this movement of Hellenization; it was they, also, who abetted Antiochus Epiphanes in his efforts to impose Hellenistic worship, which led to the Maccabean rebellion. As a result of the wars of the Maccabees, Palestinian Judaism cast off many of the externals of Hellenism; the Pharisees professed to reject it entirely, the Sadducees were still sympathetic, and the people of the land were more or less Hellenized according to their environment. But Palestinian Judaism admitted no real infiltration of Hellenistic thought, and very little even of Hellenistic literary forms. The Scribes and Pharisees refused to learn anything from the Greeks.

g The same cannot be said of Judaism of the Diaspora. The principal literary works of the Diaspora which have survived are the Book of Wisdom (written 150–50 B.C.) and the writings of Philo of Alexandria (b. about 30 B.C.). For the question of Greek influence on Wisdom cf. §§ 388–9. That Philo was a student of Greek philosophy, and that he looked on it with favour, is evident from his works. His aim was to show that the Law, the sum of all wisdom for the Hebrew, was a philosophy like Platonism or Stoicism. In details his thought shows the effects of Greek philosophy. If Philo is a true example of Alexandrine Judaism, then the assimilation of Greek thought had gone far. But Philo remains a Jew; and the amazing conglomeration of peculiarly Hebrew and Greek ideas in his works issues in strange confusions—which may aptly illustrate the confusion of many a Jew in the presence of the wisdom of the Greeks.

h Other foreign influences on Judaism are less certain. From Babylonia the Jews acquired a number of ancient superstitious practices, some of which have survived into modern times; but it cannot be said that Babylonia contributed anything to Jewish religious beliefs. The influence of Persia has been seriously discussed. These resemblances have been noted between Judaism and the religion of Zarathushtra: belief in a world destiny, a final conflagration, an evil spirit, a final judgement of good and wicked, the ultimate triumph of good over evil, and the resurrection. A closer study of these resemblances shows that many of them are specious; that no connexion can be found through which Persia could have influenced Judaism; and that the roots of these doctrines are found in the Scriptures and the traditions of Judaism. The whole question is fully treated by Lagrange, Judaïsme, 388–409.

590a Proselytism—Judaism of the NT period was moved by two opposing tendencies: the nationalist, particularist, exclusivist tendency by which Judaism formed a tight front against the Hellenistic world, and the intrinsic universalism of the doctrines of Judaism. The Jews had only to read their sacred books to realize that their God was the one true God of all mankind, and that all men should know him, all races and tongues should serve him; from Zion proceeded revelation for the whole world. At the beginning of the Christian era particularism, represented by the Pharisees, had triumphed; there was no sect or movement within Judaism which stood for universalism. But the inherent tendency towards universalism could not be suppressed; and it found an outlet in proselytism, the admission of Gentiles to the practice of the Jewish religion.

There were several obstacles to proselytism. Besides b the particularist spirit of official Judaism, there was the obstacle of anti-Jewish prejudice. Jewish exclusivism was the one force which opposed the Hellenistic amalgamation of many nations, cultures, languages and religions into one universal, supranational culture; Gentiles recognized this, and resented it. Even before the Christian era, and more frequently afterwards, Greek and Latin literature show not only numerous anti-Jewish allusions, but formally anti-Jewish compositions, which the Jews felt themselves obliged to answer. There is a striking similarity between the anti-Jewish prejudice of the ancient world and modern anti-Semitism, which is not an effect, nor even a by-product of Christianity. But there were also favourable factors. Gentile prejudice moved many of the Jews of the Diaspora to present Judaism in the manner best calculated to attract Gentiles, by suppressing any emphasis on Jewish external practices, such as circumcision and the Sabbath, and expounding the real essence of Jewish doctrine: the pure concept of the one supreme God, and lofty standards of Jewish morality. Such a presentation was sympathetically received by many Gentiles. Among educated Hellenistic circles the old Greek polytheism had been done to death by the criticisms of the philosophers; Platonism and Aristotelianism conceived of God in an abstract and impersonal fashion, but freed of the debasing traits of the ancient gods of the Greeks; and Greek philosophers, from Socrates to the Stoics, had worked out a system of morality which was not unworthy of comparison with Jewish morality. But philosophy alone left a religious hunger; and the Hellenistic world was very receptive to oriental religious cults, even to such fantastic rites as those of Mithra or of the Great Mother. Furthermore, the breakdown of nationalism in the Hellenistic world separated religion from the nation. All religions appealed to a wider audience, and there was a tendency to identify all gods. Judaism, then, came before the Gentiles with the aura of mysticism which the Greeks attributed to the Orientals.

There were two classes of proselytes: 'fearers of God', d and true proselytes. The fearers of God accepted the Jewish doctrine of God and the Scriptures, attended the synagogue, and observed the Sabbath and the dietary laws; but they were not required to submit to circumcision nor to undertake the complete observance of the Law. These were probably far more numerous than the true proselytes. The true proselytes, by adopting Judaism in its entirety, actually became Jews; they included one oriental royal family.

Proselytism was not limited to the Diaspora; in spite of Pharisaism there were proselytes in Palestinian Judaism as well. Here Pharisaism was somewhat inconsistent with itself; the Gospels credit it with proselytizing zeal, in spite of its narrow religious nationalism. No more striking example of proselytism

Proselytism did not solve the tension between universalism and particularism. Judaism did not assimilate the Gentiles. The true proselyte, by becoming a Jew, not only adopted Jewish beliefs and practices, but had to abandon his Hellenism and enter the Jewish community. Judaism was still a nation as well as a religion, and one could accept it on no other terms. Once the missionary activity of Christianity reached the Greco-Roman world, and especially after the Jewish rebellion of A.D. 66-70, we hear little of proselytism among the Jews.

- e Apocalyptic Literature—During the last two centuries B.C. there arose among the Jews a form of literature called apocalyptic (Gk apokalypsis, 'revelation'). While most of this literature is of Palestinian origin, it cannot be identified with any of the sects or schools of Palestinian Judaism. But it represents a school of thought, of undetermined diffusion and influence, whose religious outlook extended far beyond the Law. Apocalyptic literature is a development of a type of literature which first appears in the canonical books of the prophets, Is 24-27, Jl, Zach 9-14, Dan, and is found also in the NT Apocalypse of St John. In form, apocalyptic literature is always proposed as a secret revelation made in the distant past and just now discovered. Hence it is studiously mysterious, cloaking contemporary events under obscure names and figures. These can usually be identified. The occasion of these writings was the national troubles of the Jews during these centuries, and they are written to bolster the hope of the nation that the hand of God would rescue it from its tribulations. The apocalyptic writings promise a great divine intervention in world history, by which heathen nations will be destroyed, sinners will be punished, and the faithful rewarded with life everlasting in the Jewish kingdom of God. This is a development of the Messianic hope in the prophetic books of the OT (cf. § 102h-o), and, when this literature follows the lines of legitimate development, it exhibits religious traits of remarkable power and beauty; but in its ferocity towards the Gentiles and its hope of a kingdom of God filled with material pleasures, sometimes of a gross type, it cannot be regarded as a legitimate development. In addition, the apocalyptic writings are a mine of speculation, in the form of prediction or occult revelation, on the mysteries of nature, the early history of the human race and the Jewish people, and the problem of sin and divine justice. The outlook of the apocalyptic writers is entirely national; divine justice finds its fulfilment in the supremacy of the Jewish nation as the kingdom of God. The best known of these works are the Books of Enoch, the Assumption of Moses, the Apocalypses of Baruch and Esdras, and the Testament of the Twelve Patriarchs.

591a Beliefs of Judaism—It is impossible within the limits of this sketch to present a complete summary of the doctrines of Judaism, as they are complicated by wide variations between different periods and different centres. The doctrines discussed below are characteristic of the NT period. They are treated under four heads: God, angels and demons, Messianism, and eschatology.

A. God—The Jewish conception of God is based, first and foremost, on the OT; and the OT is filled with an overpowering sense of the divine presence and the divine activity in the world. God is the supreme lord of nature and of history. He is personal, with a personal interest in his creatures which the OT often describes in language which is altogether human. He is the supreme reality, as real to the ancient Hebrew as himself. But in the NT period the simple faith of the ancient Hebrew had been somewhat modified; and the influences which operated upon Jewish belief in God are not always easy to trace.

- b The existence of God was not, for the Hebrews, a speculative question. In all Hebrew literature there is no effort to demonstrate the existence of God. Herein Judaism was a true child of the ancient faith of the Hebrews, with its sense of the divine reality; and it was unacquainted with the curiosity of Greek philosophy, which, once it had destroyed the gods of the ancient polytheism, was under the necessity of constructing a supreme being from its own intellectual processes. When the fool said, 'There is no God', Ps 13:1, he denied not the existence of God, but his effective government of the world. The author of the Wisdom of Solomon, who was certainly acquainted with Greek philosophy, calls 'ignorance of God' folly, Wis 13:1; but he means ignorance of the true nature of God, not of his existence.

The Divine Names—The proper personal name of the God of the Hebrews was Yahweh; cf. § 165a, b. In NT times this name was never uttered except by the priests in a few liturgical functions. It is uncertain when its use was abandoned; it seems to have occurred between the 5th and 3rd cent. B.C. Nor is it easy to assign a reason for this avoidance of the traditional name. The opinion that it was due to an exaggerated fear or reverence is not accepted by many modern scholars. Some believe it was to protect the name from profanation by use in magical formulae; others, that it was abandoned from a monotheistic scruple. The deities of heathendom were distinguished from one another by their personal names (Zeus, Apollo, Aphrodite, etc.); in order that the God of the Hebrews might not be esteemed one of many, his distinctive personal name was suppressed for the more universal 'God' or 'Lord'. Yet even these designations were used with restrictions. 'God' (elohim) is not used outside the Bible. 'Lord' (adonai, Gk kyrios) is used only in the Bible and in prayer. In extra-biblical Jewish literature and, we may suppose, in Jewish conversation, God was usually designated by circumlocution: the Name, the Place, the Shekinah (dwelling), the Power, the Heavens, the Most High, the Holy One (this last usually followed by the doxology 'Blessed be He'). Such modes of speaking certainly suggest a great advance in reverence, not to say timorousness, over the bold addresses of many of the Psalms (which, however, were used liturgically during this period), and an increasing reserve in converse with God. They suggest also a more remote sense of the divine personality and presence.

Monotheism—The belief in one only God as the basis of religion distinguished Judaism both from Gentile religions and from Greek philosophy. There was no ancient religion which did not admit and worship a plurality of gods. Many schools of Greek philosophy professed belief in the existence of one supreme being. This conviction, however, was the fruit of philosophical speculation; Judaism based its belief on the revelation of the one God whom it worshipped. This fundamental doctrine is expressed in the Shema (Deut 6:4), which the devout Jew recited twice daily: 'Hear, O Israel, the Lord our God is one Lord'.

As the Jews came more closely into contact with the great Gentile cultures of the ancient world, their rigorous monotheism responded to these cultures, which, from every point of view except that of religion and morality, were superior to their own, by a vigorous polemic against polytheism. The Jews thus protected themselves against the powerful attraction which these cultures exercised, and asserted their own superiority. Examples of such polemic already appear in the OT, and are found with more frequency in the extra-biblical Jewish literature of the last centuries B.C. Nor does it seem unfounded to see in monotheism the basis of the harsh judgement which Judaism passed against heathendom, and of the Jewish tendency to condemn Gentile culture root and branch as essentially sinful. Certainly the religious beliefs and the moral principles of Judaism were far superior to the religion and morality of the other ancient nations; but the Jews were austere intolerant of Gentile culture as a whole, and blind to any elements of good which it

f The Divine Attributes—Extra-biblical Jewish literature lays particular emphasis on three divine attributes: majesty, spirituality and holiness. The OT speaks with sublime eloquence of the majesty of God; extra-biblical Jewish literature echoes the OT, but with a difference. In the OT Yahweh, while majestic, is not remote; transcending the world, he is not an abstraction. The God of Judaism is more remote from human affairs, less personal and more abstract. This does not mean that Judaism made no effort to penetrate the majesty of God; a favourite subject of Haggadic speculation was the heavens and the divine glory, which are more than once described in some detail. There were seven levels of the heavens; the seventh was the abode of God himself. These speculations were regarded as the most difficult and advanced, to which the student must not be admitted until he has been well prepared.

g It is difficult to analyse the Jewish conception of the spirituality of God. The OT, like the Hebrews who were its authors, is material-minded; it exhibits no concept of purely intellectual activity such as was developed by Greek philosophers. Yet the OT and Judaism were always aware that God is a spirit, no matter how often they may speak of God's eye, or ear, or hand, or mouth. But we find that Judaism hesitates to employ such metaphors of God. Many of the vivid anthropomorphisms of the OT are suppressed by abstraction and circumlocution in LXX. What was lacking in Judaism was a positive concept of spiritual reality. The Hebrew concept of life was animal; they had no philosophy by which they might formulate an idea of rational or intellectual life. Hence the denial of material composition in God left only an abstraction; and this was another step towards making the divine reality more remote and less personal.

h The holiness of God is a peculiarly Hebrew idea, for which English has no adequate word. Holiness is not so much a divine attribute as divinity itself; it is everything which distinguishes God as such from his creatures. In modern language, it is the divine transcendence. It is more than moral goodness, although this element is not excluded; it is the physical and moral superiority of God over his creatures. In Judaism the moral aspect of holiness received greater emphasis. One of the titles of God used most frequently in the rabbinical literature is 'the Holy One'.

502a The doctrine of Providence in Judaism was, in many ways, well developed. No truth is proposed in the OT with more emphasis, both by discourse and by narrative, than the truth of the intervention of God in human affairs. The dominant thought of Jewish belief in Providence was that whatever happens is the work of God. This doctrine, however, was applied principally to events on a national or world-wide scale: the history of the Jews, in particular, and of the great world-empires of ancient times. The idea of the action of God on the individual soul was much less well developed. In this, as in other doctrinal questions, the Jewish mind was more interested in the external. The question of the relation of the doctrine of Providence to human liberty and responsibility was not solved in Judaism, or, rather, not raised. Josephus says that the Pharisees occupied a middle position between the Essenes, who denied human liberty, and the Sadducees, who denied Providence; but most scholars think that Josephus has over-simplified the teachings of these parties. In Judaism, as we know it from the extant literature, human liberty and responsibility are asserted together with the truth that all that happens is the work of God; the apparent antinomy is ignored. A consequence of Jewish faith in divine intervention was a ready belief in stories of the marvellous and miraculous. Exaggerated credulity appears on almost every page of rabbinical and apocalyptic literature, which abound in anecdotes of

b The doctrine of Providence implies divine omniscience and foreknowledge of human events, and this Judaism affirms; and from the doctrine of the divine foreknowledge flows the doctrine of predestination. Here Judaism advanced far beyond the doctrinal basis of the OT, especially the apocalyptic literature, which reveals future events as antecedently decreed and determined. The election of Israel as the Chosen People implied the reprobation of the Gentiles, who are, consequently, regarded as hopelessly beyond the pale of salvation.

A counterweight to the depersonalization of God is found in the emphasis laid by Judaism on the divine goodness and mercy. Jewish prayer is full of expressions of thanksgiving for the divine benefits. And while Judaism is highly conscious of sin, it also has deep faith in divine mercy to the repentant sinner. But the divine mercy was not thought to reach all sinners. Judaism divided all mankind into two classes: the good, whose occasional falls were quickly repented and easily forgiven, and the wicked, who were impenitent and obdurate. For these God neither had nor could have any mercy. Among the obdurate sinners were included all Gentiles and the Hellenizing Jews; for the Pharisees, all who did not observe the Law were accursed. These harsh views of the official circles of Judaism had little or no effect on the piety of the ordinary Jew.

e Another effect of the abstract and transcendental concept of God was the personification of certain divine attributes. This has a basis in the OT: the spirit of God brooded over the surface of the waters (Gen 1:2), the Lord sends forth his word to do his work, Is 55:11, the wisdom of God is his helper in the work of creation, Prov 8:22 ff.; and many other texts could be cited. In the OT these personifications are not really distinct from God himself; they are poetic and imaginative locutions about the divine attributes as manifested in creation. In Judaism such personifications are used very frequently, especially the spirit, the word (Memra), the wisdom, the Shekinah (dwelling, i.e. presence). The spirit is the creative force; by the Shekinah God is present everywhere. With one exception there is, in the thought of Judaism, no real difference between these personifications and God himself. They are used as substitutes for the divine name, and they permitted the Jews to speak of the external works of God without attributing these to him directly. The exception is Philo of Alexandria, who seems to have treated the personified attributes as beings intermediate between God and the angels, with a distinct reality of their own.

d B. Angels and Demons—Angels are mentioned frequently in all the books of the OT, both early and late. They appear as bearers of the divine revelation, as executioners of the divine judgements, and as the heavenly retinue of God. Judaism expanded the doctrine of the angels far beyond the basis of the OT. The angels were conceived as spiritual beings, at least in the sense that they were not composed of gross terrestrial matter; but here again the Jews lacked a positive concept of spirituality, and did not elaborate the idea beyond that of the mere negation of body. The speculations of the Haggadah abound in descriptions of the material form of angels, which was certainly thought to be invisible to the mortal eye; they are described as gigantic winged human forms. In the rabbinical writings the angels are given a fiery nature, based on a misunderstanding of Ps 103:4. The theory of angelic choirs already appears in the Books of Enoch; seven choirs are mentioned in 1 Enoch, nine in 2 Enoch. The names of seven archangels are given: Uriel, Raphael, Raguel, Michael, Sarakiel, Gabriel and Jeremiel. Michael is the guardian spirit of Israel (cf. Dan 10:21).

The interest of Judaism in the angels corresponds to e

592a its feeling that God was remote. In the OT, where the sense of God's present reality is so pervasive, the angels play a relatively small part. In Judaism there was a need to multiply intermediaries. Many operations which the OT ascribes to God directly are attributed to angels in Judaism. This appears in LXX, where the angel of the Lord sometimes replaces the divine name of the original Hebrew, and in some uncertain passages of the MT, where the divine name and the angel of the Lord have become inextricably confused. In the speculations of the Haggadah the functions of the angels have been notably expanded beyond the doctrine of the OT. Judaism also describes them as the divine retinue; but the imaginative expansion of detailed description lacks nothing for fullness. The angels preside over the elements of the material universe, and over the celestial bodies—a quaint view which survived into the Middle Ages, when, fused with the Aristotelian theory of separate intelligences, it resulted in the theory that the movements of the celestial spheres were governed by angels. They presided over nations, each of which has its guardian spirit—a deduction from Dan 10:20 f. They intervene actively in history and are the agents of the miraculous. But their most important function was that of intermediaries of the divine revelation. In the older prophetic books the prophet speaks the word of the Lord which he himself has heard. In the books of Zacharias and Daniel, however, an 'interpreting angel' appears, who communicates the word of the Lord, or explains the meaning of the visions of the seer. In the apocalyptic literature the interpreting angel is the usual medium by which the seer is informed of heavenly things.

592a It may almost be said that the OT contains no demonology, so rare and so obscure are the allusions to a world of evil spirits. The demonology of Judaism was more indebted to foreign sources than to the OT. Here again the Haggadic speculations supplied what was missing in authentic sources. Like the angels, the demons were known by name; the chief of the evil spirits was Satan (mentioned in Job 1 and 2, and Zach 3, but not certainly as an evil spirit); the Heb. word means 'adversary', 'accuser'. Satan appears to be identical with the Mastema mentioned occasionally in extra-biblical Jewish literature. Another evil spirit frequently mentioned is Beliar or Belial. The Heb. word b'liya'al probably means 'useless'; in the OT a 'son of belial' is a good-for-nothing, i.e. wicked person. The origin of the evil spirits was a subject of great interest in the Haggadah. Obviously they could not have been created evil, so their wickedness was attributed to some sin. The most commonly accepted belief was that they were the 'sons of God' of Gen 6:1-4, who sinned with the 'daughters of men'.

Ordinary Jewish belief was disfigured by a great deal of superstition, which was probably of Babylonian origin. Babylonian demonology was very highly developed. Almost every conceivable evil, mishap, or inconvenience was attributed to demonic malevolence; and the innumerable demons which threatened human welfare could be warded off only by incantations and magical rites. Such incantations and magic were practised among the Jews; the wearing of amulets against demons was very common.

b C. Messianism—The Messianic conception of the Jews may be defined with Bonsirven as 'the conviction that the chosen people of God cannot disappear, that it will attain its peak and reach the fullness of the ideal predestined for it by God only in a future more or less remote, at "the end of days"' (Judaisme I, 341). The stream of the Messianic hope runs all through the OT. Its fullest development in extra-biblical literature is found in the apocalyptic books. There are many allusions in the NT to the Messianic expectation; and it is clear from these allusions that the form which it took in NT times was material, temporal and national, rather than spiritual, eternal and universal. This conception we may trace in the literature, especially in the apocalyptic writings.

The Messianic future was called the 'days of the Messiah', or 'the end of days', although two different conceptions lay beneath these two designations. The days of the Messiah looked principally to the national restoration of the Jews; the end of days looked rather to the universal consummation of the world. In both of these the accomplishment of the Messianic future was the effect of a direct divine intervention, a cosmic manifestation of God in his majesty and power; this divine intervention, rather than the work of the Messiah himself, was the cause of salvation. The Messianic era was to be initiated by the precursor of the Messiah, who was Elias, the angel of the covenant (based on Mal 3:1, 4:5; cf. §§ 555-8; 670-1). The coming of the Messiah was preceded (or accompanied) by the Messianic tribulations. This was based on the apocalyptic predictions in the prophetic books of the OT (such as Is 24-27); this period was of indefinite duration, and was filled with temporal and spiritual calamities, convulsions of nature, the triumph of the wicked, etc. The coming of the Messiah coincided (in a general way) with the end of the world; and the belief that this was near seems to have been widely accepted in NT times. Jewish speculation was much interested in trying to determine when the consummation would come, and several calculations are found. The most popular seems to have been that which reckoned the duration of the world at seven periods of one thousand years each (after the seven days of creation); the last period, the millennium, was initiated by the coming of the Messiah, and the establishment of a kingdom of material and sensible joy on earth. After this period, the just were to be translated to 'the world to come'. This belief in a thousand years of earthly joy was accepted by some of the Fathers of the Church and by many Christians during the earlier centuries of our era.

The Messianic kingdom is, in every conception, identified with the kingdom of Israel restored to Palestine from the dispersion; but extra-biblical Jewish literature exhibits great confusion in its descriptions of the Messianic kingdom. With Bonsirven, these conceptions may be classified, although it is impossible to eliminate some overlapping (Judaisme I, 418 ff.).

Conceptions of the Messianic Kingdom—A. Messianism of two periods: 'the days of the Messiah', in which the kingdom of Israel is restored and the Gentile nations destroyed, occur on earth. 'The world to come' is realized in a supratemporal universe, where the just are rewarded with all joys.

B. Transcendental Messianism: in this conception there is no Messianic kingdom upon earth. The scene of salvation is heaven or paradise.

C. Eschatological Messianism: this is a contamination of A by B. In this form, which exhibits several variations, the resurrection and the judgement are transferred from 'the world to come' to the Messianic times upon earth; or, the days of the Messiah are prolonged into infinity, with no sharp division between the days of the Messiah and the world to come; or, the present world is transfigured into the transcendental world to come, with no change of scene from earth to heaven.

Eschatological Messianism was the most common belief among the Jews in NT times. The other conceptions are found in two of the most important apocalyptic works, besides other writings: Messianism of the two periods is found in the Apocalypse of Esdras, and the Books of Henoch (which are not a literary unity) contain both transcendental and eschatological Messianism. In the apocalyptic writings the fate of the heathen nations is treated with some uncertainty. At one time they are destroyed in the war which the Messiah (without any human aid or earthly power, but by the miraculous intervention of God) wages against them; at another, they are preserved through the Messianic times, during which they war against the Messiah and the kingdom of God upon earth, to meet final judgement and destruction in the world-

f The centre of the national hope was the Messianic kingdom, the 'kingdom of God'. In the OT Yahweh himself is king of Israel (cf. Ps 92; 94-99). The kingdom of God is identical with the Jewish kingdom, whether it be located on earth or in heaven. In Messianism of two periods and eschatological Messianism the kingdom of God on earth is established in Palestine. The centre of the Messianic kingdom is Jerusalem, expanded in size and rebuilt with becoming magnificence. The whole face of the country is to be transformed in the Messianic times. A semi-arid country, it will abound with streams of water and will be prodigiously fertile. Material felicity and the satisfaction of all sensible desires will prevail, and, with all the Gentile nations destroyed, universal peace will reign. But the kingdom is not exclusively of this material and national character. The establishment of the kingdom presupposes a moral renovation of the people; the wicked have no place in the kingdom. The worship of God will be carried out in the Temple with all solemnity, and the wealth of nations will be laid under contribution to serve his cult.

594a. The Messias—The Heb. word māšîḥ^a (Gk christos) means 'anointed one'. This title is not applied to the expected deliverer in the OT (some exegetes think the word is applied to him in Dan 9:25). In the OT it is used of kings and priests, the sacredness of whose office was indicated by a rite of consecration in which anointing was used. In the books of Enoch and Esdras the Messias is pre-existent in heaven before his appearance on earth; he is superhuman, occupying a position between God and man, but not identified with either; and he is endowed with transcendental properties. In the books of Enoch (where he is also called the Elect One) he appears suddenly and supernaturally in the glory of his triumph; but this view was not generally accepted in Judaism. The more traditional conception represented the Messias as coming to war against the enemies of Israel, and to establish the kingdom of God on earth. In the Psalms of Solomon, which belong to the 1st cent. B.C., he is represented as a human king, a great warrior, who reigns over the restored kingdom of Israel in Palestine. There is an element of vagueness in the conception of the Messias as king, in spite of the fact that the coming of the Messias king is characteristic of the Messianic hope in the OT, and is mentioned very often in the prayers of Judaism. He will reside in Jerusalem, govern his people, and give judgement in legal cases. But his work as an agent either of spiritual or of material blessings remains undefined. Bonsirven points out that he is not represented in extra-biblical Jewish literature as a miracle-worker. In rabbinical literature, unlike apocalyptic, the transcendental and superhuman qualities of the Messias are suppressed, and his pure humanity is emphasized.

b The idea of a suffering Messias escaped Judaism entirely. It is not found in apocalyptic literature, and only a few allusions appear in the rabbinical writings. It is quite probable that the idea was suppressed as much as possible after the preaching of Christianity. The few allusions which exist are based on Is 53. But the reconciliation of the suffering servant of the Lord there described with the Messianic king was too difficult; and so we find the sufferings attributed to another Messias, the son of Joseph. The Messianic king is the Messias, the son of David, although he is once said to be the son of Levi, hence a priestly king. This idea probably arose as a consequence of the union of royal and sacerdotal dignity in the Hasmonaeon dynasty.

This brief summary can do no more than indicate the wavering and uncertainty of Jewish ideas about the Messias, who was sometimes human, sometimes superhuman, sometimes earthly and national, sometimes transcendental and universal. This vagueness in the mind of Judaism itself shows why the Messianism of the Gospels was proposed with such caution and reserve.

D. Eschatology—Belief in retribution of divine justice for good and evil is basic in Jewish doctrine; and nothing did more to sustain the religion of Judaism through the centuries during which the national life was extinct and the Jews submitted to Gentile empires both at home and abroad. The concept of God exhibited in the OT and in Jewish belief was that of one who is not indifferent to right and wrong, but imposes his moral law on all men, who rewards its observance and punishes sin. But divine justice certainly is not manifest in this life; hence there must be a continuation of life beyond the grave, in which the good receive their reward and the wicked pay the penalty of their misdeeds. One of the most remarkable features of the OT is the almost complete absence of this doctrine in the pre-exilic books. Yet the few sketchy allusions to a future life which we find there do not permit us to conclude that the religion of the OT lacked any idea of eschatological retribution. When the doctrine reached a fuller development, it was based on that firm faith in divine justice which pervades the entire OT. It can be said with certainty that Judaism is not indebted to any foreign religion for its doctrine of retribution and the future life. Of all the ancient peoples, the conception of the after life was most completely developed by the Egyptians; but there is no trace in the OT, or in the literature of Judaism, of any Egyptian influence in this field of belief, although the Hebrews throughout their history were in contact with Egypt; cf. Sutcliffe, The OT and the Future Life, London, 1947^b.

It is difficult to disengage Jewish eschatological beliefs from the Messianic hope, since the establishment of the Messianic kingdom was the ultimate act of divine retributive justice; hence the present division is somewhat artificial. It may be justified, however, as a consideration of the individual destiny of the good and the wicked, while the Messianic faith is more concerned with the national destiny.

As indicated above, the 'days of the Messias' follow the establishment of the Messianic kingdom on earth; they are, therefore, a transition between 'this world' and 'the world to come'. It is in the world to come that the just receive their full reward; the Rabbis say of certain sinners that they have no part in the world to come. But just as there is confusion concerning the earthly and the heavenly kingdom of God, so likewise there is uncertainty whether the recompense of the righteous begins with death or the resurrection. Where the earthly Messianic kingdom is emphasized it is obvious that the resurrection must precede any reward of the just.

The Judgement—The retribution is preceded by a judgement of good and evil. The judgement on all mankind precedes the establishment of the Messianic kingdom. More generally God, and not the Messias, is the judge. This conception of a general judgement is based on the 'Day of the Lord' in the prophetic books of the OT (e.g. Am 5:18 ff.). It is the principal act in all the Messianic-apocalyptic schemes, by which God defeats his enemies and vindicates his people; but there is no agreement on its precise place in the end-process. While it is a universal judgement, the apocalyptic literature treats it as a judgement of the wicked alone. The record of the righteous deeds of the good is kept in the book of life. The judgement, as already indicated, deals with nations as well as individuals; hence there is a confusion of national and ethical elements in the idea of the judgement. Judaism never arrived at the idea that men were weighed in the judgement purely on their ethical merits.

Life after Death—The ancient Hebrew conception of the nature of life after death was extremely vague at best. Hence, when the question was asked concerning the state of the just between death and the resurrection, 505a which was to come at 'the end of days', it is not surprising that there was no certain answer. More generally, the just were thought to remain in a state of suspended animation. An exception to this is the Book of Wisdom (cf. Wis 3:1 ff.). Outside of this book the ancient concept of Sheol survived in Judaism, at least as far as the intermediate state was concerned. Sheol was the receptacle of all the dead; it was a place of neither joy nor pain, but simply the negation of human life as it is known by experience. For the just, it is true, Judaism conceived it as a state of quiet repose; but the wicked were not really punished in Sheol, since their pains were reserved for the period following the general judgement. In the Books of Enoch we find four compartments in Sheol: for the just who died as martyrs, for the other just, for the sinners who were not punished on earth for their sins, and for the sinners who were punished on earth for their sins; these last do not rise. The Fourth Book of Esdras describes seven joys of the just and seven tortures of the wicked until judgement. The doctrine of the rabbinical writings was the most refined. Here the judgement takes place at death, and the just are rewarded immediately in heaven, or in Eden, the location of which is undefined.

b The Resurrection of the Righteous—It is impossible to state when belief in the resurrection of the dead arose in Judaism. Not all the apocalyptic writings contain this belief; and even in the NT period it was not universally accepted. Judaism never arrived at a consistent position on the universality of the resurrection. The righteous arise to share in the joys of the intermediate terrestrial kingdom; the place of their ultimate reward is uncertain. It is located in heaven, or in a supraterrrestrial Paradise or Eden, or on the renovated earth, or in a terrestrial Eden. The eschatological Paradise is depicted after the manner of the primitive Paradise of Gen 2, with the tree of life and the waters of life. The reward of the just consists in eternal life, understood in the minimal sense: continuation of life in the body. This eternal life is free from pain; it is a life of quiet repose in the satisfaction of all sensible desires. According to some Rabbis, the bodies of the just will be endowed with colossal size in the resurrection. The risen just will be free from sin and perfect in all virtue. According to the Rabbis, their chief joy will be the study of the Law. A hint of higher things is seen in the belief that the ultimate happiness of the just lies in communion with God. Some Rabbis distinguished seven degrees of the just (accommodated to the seven heavens); only the seventh and highest degree 'see God'. This conception is not that of the beatific vision in Christian theology.

c Punishment of Sinners—There is equal or greater divergence about the punishment of the wicked. Judaism wavers between annihilation or eternal punishment after the judgement, or limits eternal punishment to notorious sinners, such as apostate Jews or Gentile persecutors; or the wicked are believed to remain in Sheol. For those whose wickedness is less than supreme, there may be temporary punishment, followed by release or annihilation. The place of the punishment of the wicked is Gehenna (or Tophet). The former name (Heb. Gē-hin-nōm) belonged originally to the ravine SW. of Jerusalem, which was regarded as accursed and defiled by the human sacrifice which had been offered there under the Hebrew monarchy. It was used, consequently, as a place to cast unclean refuse. There is much Haggadic speculation on the location and the dimensions of Gehenna. The chief torment of the wicked was fire; and Haggadic speculation never wearied of conceiving new tortures for the damned.

These details should not obscure the fact that there was in the ancient world no other belief which had the moral force of Jewish belief in divine retribution.

d Jewish Morality—Jewish morality was erected on the firm basis of faith in the moral character and the 506a retributive justice of God. There was no other religion of the ancient world which proposed a true religious basis for ethics. The religious motive of ethics in Judaism was based not only on reverential fear, but on the love of God, 'the first and greatest commandment of the Law'. The Law itself was the complete rule of conduct. The Law was imposed upon Israel as a part of the covenant; in return for the election of Israel as the people of God, the people undertook the obligations laid upon them in the Law. The emphasis which Judaism placed upon the Law as a rule of conduct induced a change in the conception of sin. In the prophetic literature sin is a personal offence against God, rebellion, adultery against the divine love; in Judaism sin is a legal transgression. These two conceptions are not mutually exclusive; it is a question of emphasis. The obstacle to right conduct was called in the rabbinical literature the yéser há rā', the 'evil inclination'. By the Law this inclination was brought under control, which was at best imperfect.

Here, as elsewhere, only some of the more characteristic features of Jewish morality can be noticed.

Social Relations—The Law commands the Jew to love his neighbour as himself. But the question of the scribe, Lk 10:29, 'Who is my neighbour?' was never answered by Judaism. Generally, the neighbour meant a fellow-Jew; Gentiles were not included in the obligations of justice and charity. Harsh as this statement may seem, it summarizes Jewish theory on social relations, as far as the theory was formulated; but the practice of Jews, especially in Gentile communities, did not correspond with the theory. To admit that Gentiles deserved the same consideration as Jews would have seemed to be a denial of the very covenant of election. Hence the rule of conduct was to abstain from social relations with Gentiles; friendships should be formed only within the Jewish community. The obligations of justice and charity were relaxed towards Gentiles, to a degree which was never determined exactly. One could take advantage of the error of a Gentile in a business transaction, or, according to some authorities, deceive him. Lost articles, or even stolen goods, need not be returned to their Gentile owners. Usury might be exacted from Gentiles. There was no obligation to protect them from death or injury, and no prohibition against taking vengeance upon them. No gift was to be made to them; and, in theory, salutations were not to be extended to them. The danger of 'profaning the name' (i.e. of bringing trouble against the Jewish community) was admitted as a reason for giving Gentiles equal treatment with Jews. These and similar determinations were largely—but not entirely—theoretical; in many instances Jews and Gentiles lived together in harmony.

An effect of the legal distinction between Jews and Gentiles was a solidarity within the Jewish community which, apart from its exclusiveness, is one of the most pleasing features of Jewish morality. The Jew in need could count on the help of his Jewish neighbour, even at the cost of great inconvenience. Almsgiving was a sacred duty, much inculcated in the oral Law, and it was regarded as a highly meritorious means of expiating sin. The Jew was supposed to share in the joys and sorrows of his neighbours: to attend their family festivals, to grieve with them in a disaster or a bereavement, to visit the sick, to assist the imprisoned.

The treatment of slaves, both according to the Law and in practice, was far more humane than in any Gentile code. Ancient slavery was pure chattel slavery, and the owner was responsible to no one for the life of his slave. While the Law made a distinction between Jewish and Gentile slaves, the Jewish owner did not enjoy, even over his Gentile slaves, the right of life and death. The owner was forbidden to inflict any permanent injury, and such an injury would give the slave the right of freedom; but no punishment was enjoined if a slave died, through oversight, from severe treatment.

596a Family Morality—To the Jew marriage was the fulfilment of the precept, 'Increase and multiply', Gen 1:28. Children, as many as possible, were God's blessing upon a marriage; and it was a duty to procreate a large family. Consanguinity, impotence and difference of religion were impediments which prohibited marriage. Polygamy was permitted under the Law; but it seems that it was practised rarely in NT times, for economic reasons, if for no other; only the wealthy could afford a harem. And there are indications that monogamy was regarded as a higher ideal.

b The position of the Jewish wife was, in general, higher than that of the wife in Greco-Roman culture. The misogyny of the Talmud is so profound as to be amusing; but it is an indirect testimony to the freedom of women. In theory the wife was, under Jewish law, the property of her husband; but the prevailing practice of monogamy was a protection of her position, although she was in every respect absolutely dependent upon her husband. In theory, also, Jewish law was ruled by the double standard; unlawful intercourse was not regarded as adultery unless the woman was married. Divorce was permissible under the Law; but the scribes were divided on the meaning of the 'shameful thing' which is assigned in Deut 24:1 as a reason for divorce. The school of Shammai permitted divorce for adultery only; the school of Hillel is credited with the opinion that divorce was permissible if a wife cooked badly, or if the husband found another woman who pleased him more. Divorce was a privilege of the husband alone.

c Children were bound very strictly to revere and obey their parents, and to support them in their old age. The power of the father was not unlimited, as in Roman law, which conferred on the father the dominion over life and death; but, according to the Law, rebellion or grave irreverence was a capital crime, to be decided by a court of law. Exposure of infants, especially female, which was so common in Hellenistic communities, did not occur among the Jews. The father controlled the marriage of his children through the law of the purchase of the bride.

Both in law and in practice Jewish family morality was immeasurably superior to the family morality of Hellenism. It kept the Jewish family together as a stable and tightly knit unit, in which the members supported one another, and the substantial obligations of parents and children were observed. The family was also a religious unit, in which common prayers were recited and the festivals celebrated. The family solidarity of the Jews must be reckoned among the reasons for the sturdy resistance of Judaism to assimilation.

d Individual Morality—Among the distinctive features of Jewish individual morality we may notice Jewish esteem of chastity, and Jewish esteem of wealth. It is fairly safe to say that chastity was nowhere esteemed in the Hellenistic world except among the Jews. With them an unmarried girl was supposed to be a virgin, and her seducer could be legally compelled to marry her or to pay the purchase price. A betrothed virgin or a wife was punished by death, according to the Law, for unchastity; and, while it is not certain that this penalty was usually inflicted, Judaism did esteem chastity as the crowning virtue of woman. The death penalty was laid upon the male accomplice also, if the woman were a betrothed virgin or a wife. A woman was either an unmarried virgin, and protected by the property rights of her father, or a wife, and subject to the property rights of her husband. Prostitution was strictly forbidden. The unnatural vice which so disfigured Hellenistic culture was forbidden by Jewish law. On the other side we have the esteem of wealth, which was regarded as a sign of God's blessing; poverty was a curse, and a probable sign of sin. In this connexion it is fair to notice that the average Palestinian Jew was extremely poor. In most employments he competed with slave labour; he had, as Canon Deane puts it, no margin, and was separated by not much more than one day's wages from destitution; a minor disaster could reduce him and his family to slavery. In such circumstances, it is easy to understand that Judaism was somewhat loose in its standards of honesty, especially where Gentiles were concerned, and why it tolerated almost any way to turn a penny which was less than actual theft. One will scarcely find in extra-biblical Jewish literature a forthright condemnation of avarice. The wealthy aristocracy lived in opulence, and were envied and hated at the same time. The poor man could console himself with dreams of the Messianic kingdom, in which every man would be rich.

In summary, Judaism did impose upon its followers a standard of morality which was far above anything in the world of its times. The average Jew was by all known standards a good man and a religious man.

Jewish Piety—The sources for the religion of Judaism do not offer us much information about the personal religion of the average Jew, 'the people of the land'. Yet the Law, the cult, and the doctrines of the rabbinical and apocalyptic writings do not tell the whole story. Jewish piety appears at its best in the prayers which have been preserved. From these it is evident that the Jew lived in close personal communion with God. God is addressed not only as creator and king, but also as father. He is solicitous for his creatures. Jewish prayer never omits the elements of adoration, praise, and thanksgiving for past mercies, and offers its petitions with full confidence that they will be heard. Judaism, as is evident from its Messianic aspect, is a religion of hope and confidence. Prayer occupied a very large part in the life of the Jew; the Shema and the Shemoneh 'Esré (the 'eighteen benedictions') were to be recited daily; prayer was offered at meals and at the beginning of important activities. The Jew was not ashamed to pray in public, although the Pharisees carried external devotion to the point of mere display. The consciousness of sin and professions of repentance are never lacking; and there is firm confidence in the goodness and mercy of God. There is a strong sentiment of resignation to the will of God; the evils which come upon the people are the just punishment for their sins, and repentance will hasten the coming of the Messianic kingdom. Judaism is a religion of external observance; but it also fostered a genuine interior piety unique in its time.

INTRODUCTION

b The Hellenization of the East—We must first recall some facts of history. Civilization appeared in the East some time before 3000 B.C., but it was not till after 1000 B.C. that the first whole nation of Europeans, the Greeks, became civilized. They had learnt much from the East, but they soon surpassed their teachers and made some important innovations (widespread education, democratic government, etc.) which the East had never known. Soon after 500 B.C. the Persians marshalled all the strength of the East to conquer Europe. The small Greek states, inspired by Athens, utterly defeated them. From that time onwards the eastern nations in deed though not always in words recognized the Greeks as the foremost nation in the world. Europe had overtaken and outstripped the East. In the next century the Greeks under Alexander the Great conquered the Persians and founded an empire stretching from Egypt to India. It soon broke up into several portions, but Greek kings maintained themselves in Egypt, Syria and Asia Minor, and proceeded to plant their European culture among the ancient nations of these lands. A Greek ruling class established itself all round the eastern Mediterranean. New Greek cities arose, and the Greek language, Greek manners and ideas, went on spreading for centuries till all the educated class was Greek in culture, though no longer, for the most part, of Greek blood.

c Roman Intervention—But the Greek states proved unequal to the task they had undertaken, the Europeanization of the Near East. They decayed and their work was in danger of perishing, when a stronger power came to the rescue. This was Rome. The Romans were the second nation in Europe to become civilized. It was to Greece, to Athens especially, that they owed their civilization. They adopted the Greek culture in all its fullness in the 2nd cent. B.C., and in the next century they undertook the direct government of the eastern Mediterranean lands. As soldiers, statesmen and lawyers they had valuable gifts denied to the Greeks, and under their patient supervision Greek civilization was at last solidly established in these lands. The process was more than half completed in the times of the NT. A similar process is at present taking place in these countries, but today the work is only beginning: in our Lord's time it was far advanced. These countries, including Palestine, were far more European then than they are now. Only the Jewish religion had not been submerged by the flood from the west.

The Strata of Society—There are therefore three things to be distinguished in these countries: first, the national characteristics of the native races (Phrygians, Syrians, Egyptians, etc.); secondly, the Greek culture and language which were being overlaid on these; thirdly, the Roman government which was using its influence to promote the Greek penetration. Society was therefore complicated and changing: the old and Asiatic was everywhere losing ground before the new and European. In country districts the lower classes—small farmers, labourers and slaves—lived much as their ancestors had lived a thousand years before, spoke the Egyptian or Lydian or other language, kept up many old customs and worship, and no doubt resented both Greek fashions and Roman rule. Their gentry and middle class had adopted Greek ways and the Greek language, and regarded themselves as Greeks. They were estranged from their own uneducated countrymen, whom they looked down upon as practically a different and inferior nation, and though they did not welcome Roman rule they felt nearer to the Romans than to the mass of their own backward countrymen. In all towns of any size Greek was the official language and all the townspeople had at least a smattering of it. At the top of the social scale stood the Romans—that is, the Italian or half-Italian officials, officers, merchants and visitors. Their status as members of the ruling race caused them to be treated with a special respect, and they themselves, though men of very varying merits and culture, were apt to assume an air of superiority over even the choicest spirits among the subject races.

The eastern Mediterranean world was therefore a complex world: a foundation of many races, some decadent and some backward, a civilization derived from Greece, and a Roman political framework into which all was being fitted.

GOVERNMENT

Roman National Tradition and Its Expansion—The national character of the Romans was narrower and duller than that of the Greeks, but surpassed it in some valuable qualities, the so-called civic virtues, the qualities that make a good citizen—industry, shrewdness and dexterity, thrift, everyday honesty, fidelity to promises, attachment to home and country and courage to defend them, obedience to law and authority, dislike of change and novelties, respect for the rights and possessions of others, and firmness in vindicating one's own. Such a character is not showy, but it wears well and can endure storms. The faults to which it is liable are narrowness, rigorism, arrogance, callousness, 597a avarice, coarseness and intemperance—faults which are all too common in Roman history. Yet this was the character which had made the Roman state the strongest that the world had yet seen.

f This national character or tradition did not spring from the blood but was hammered out slowly under the pressure of circumstances, or rather, of Providence. It was already formed by 300 B.C. within the small Roman state. It became in a century or two the character of an Italian nation, a compound of many races among which the Romans were only one. By the Christian era the descendants of the original Romans were degenerate, but the tradition was still vigorous and still expanding. Its chief representatives were now the people of the Italian country towns. In the 1st cent. A.D. it took hold of the leading men in the adjacent lands, especially France and Spain. Few of them had a drop of Roman or Italian blood, but henceforth when we speak of Romans we mean chiefly these men. They had a right to the name for they carried on the great tradition of civic virtues and public service.

g Autocracy and Emperor-worship—The Roman Empire, the mighty state established by the Romans, now encircled the Mediterranean and had lately been advanced northwards to the Rhine and Danube. Shortly before the birth of Christ, its government had become an autocracy. It was the form of government which both Greeks and Romans of an earlier age, when they lived in small democratic or aristocratic states, had hated with a fanatical hatred. But autocracy was considered the only practicable government for a large state—it was reserved for the English to solve that problem by means of representative assemblies. So first the Greeks, and now the Romans also, had to submit to despotism. Hatred of it continued long among the educated of both peoples, kept alive by their earlier literature, especially the oratory, which was the chief study of young men of the wealthier classes. To soothe them, the despots kept much of the language and forms of republican days: the Roman monarch was not called King but only First Citizen and Commander-in-chief. The mass of the population, however, both in Italy and elsewhere, felt little discontent. They were not sufficiently educated to make painful comparisons between the present and the past, and they enjoyed more material comfort than they had in republican times.

h The power of the Roman emperors (as we now call them) depended on their control of the armed forces, not on hereditary title or on election. The army alone could oppose or dethrone the emperor, and with its support he could defy the opinions and wishes of civilians. Over them his power remained absolute, and neither custom nor law ever placed any effective limit on it. The reigns of the bad emperors present a hideous picture of tyranny and servility. The ancient senate or council of nobles still remained. It was not hereditary, but consisted of those who had held the chief offices of state. To be a senator was the highest ambition of a public man, but the senate seldom dared to disagree with the emperor.

In the eastern provinces of the empire it had long been the custom to treat kings as gods, to offer sacrifices and incense to their statues, and to build temples to them. These eastern countries now paid the same honours to the emperors. The earlier emperors repudiated any claim to divinity and forbade such worship in the west (Suetonius, Aug. 52, Tac. Ann. 4, 37), but they tolerated it in the east, and in time it inevitably spread and came to be regarded as a political necessity. To refuse to worship the emperor was considered disrespectful, disloyal, and therefore treasonable. It became a capital crime.

i The Central Government and the Provinces—Italy and to a lesser degree Egypt (on which Italy depended for corn) came directly under the emperor's control, and so did a great deal of the finances and military supervision throughout the empire. These many calls 597i upon him led to the growth of an enormous bureaucracy. It consisted of men who owed everything to the emperor, his own slaves and freedmen (i.e. liberated slaves) or men of humble origin whom he had advanced and enriched. Under some weak or suspicious emperors freedmen became millionaires and in effect prime ministers of the empire. The empire, apart from Italy, was divided into thirty or forty provinces. Each province had its governor who was appointed by the emperor or through his influence, and usually held his post for a period of one to three years. The bigger provinces were governed by senators, the smaller ones, like Judaea, by men of the next highest class, the 'Roman knights'. In this way men who had lived in the servile atmosphere of Roman society and scarcely knew what freedom meant, found themselves for a short time raised to the position of despots. Not a few, as we should expect, succumbed to the temptations of power, and ruled as tyrants. While they were in office, there was no remedy except rebellion. After their departure their subjects could accuse them to the emperor. Under a just or a jealous emperor we may believe that provincial government was tolerable, but even under Augustus there were some scandalous cases (Velleius II, 117, Seneca, De Ira II, 5). The Mission of Rome and the Growth of Roman Law } —The establishment of Roman autocracy came after a miserable sixty years of misgovernment and civil war. Autocracy brought the blessings of peace, order, and security, blessings which hardly anybody then living had experienced before. We cannot wonder that many Romans were more inclined to welcome these blessings than to repine at the loss of the old constitutional government. They found consolation in the thought that Fate had given supreme power to Rome not for the sake of the Romans only, but also of the many nations that Rome now governed. This glorious destiny seemed both to justify and compensate for the sacrifice of liberty. Rome had been divinely chosen to give peace, unity, and order to the world. The truth of this belief is beyond any doubt and appears much more clearly to us than to the Romans of Christ's time: Rome was God's instrument first for the civilization of Europe, then for its Christianization, as the breaking down of frontiers all round the Mediterranean made the spread of the Gospel immensely easier. 'Thou hast given a single home and country to the separated nations of the earth. What was once a world, thou hast made into a city'. So a later poet described it. We must not on that account shut our eyes to Rome's faults: Assyria and Babylonia were also God's instruments, as we are expressly told by the very prophets who denounce their sins and foretell their punishment.

The deep desire of the world for peace and the lofty conviction of the mission of Rome were most finely expressed by the Roman poet Virgil who died about fifteen years before our Lord's birth. Other nations, he says, could outshine the Romans as artists and men of science, but Rome is divinely called and specially endowed to rule the world and to maintain peace and just government in it. It was a noble hope, a glorious ideal, only imperfectly realized, but the very proclamation of the ideal by Virgil and others no doubt inspired many a Roman and many a Roman-minded Spaniard or Greek to labour for its fulfilment.

The Roman mind was conservative yet progressive, i that type of mind which almost refuses to admit that anything could ever be changed, yet does in fact carry out revolutions which are the most radical and permanent, because they are the most gradual, careful, and detailed. Thus the Roman lawyers professed to remain faithful to their ancient code drawn up in the 5th cent. B.C., and declared their dislike of all abstract moral or political principles such as those of the Greek philosophers. But by a gradual process they embodied in their own law a more complete application of these very principles (especially those of the Stoic philosophy—see §601c) than any Greek state had ever 597 I done. It was the Roman who could grasp at once the broad principle and the mass of prosaic and tedious detail, and who combined an endless patience and willingness to compromise with a tenacity of purpose which persisted from century to century. However, it was not until A.D. 212 that Roman Law became the law applicable to all the free population of the empire, who then all became Roman citizens.

598a Distinction between Roman Citizens and Provincials—

—We know that the Roman citizens numbered about five millions in the time of Christ (Res Gestae D. Aug., 8) while the whole population of the empire may have been anything from fifty to a hundred millions or even more, about equally divided between slaves and free men. Throughout the provinces there was a sharp distinction drawn between citizens and non-citizens or 'provincials' as they are usually called. Roman citizens were privileged both by custom and by law. Firstly, whether they were Italians or not, they shared in the respect, influence and social importance which naturally go to members of a ruling class. Secondly, they alone were within the sphere of Roman civil law, while the provincials were allowed on the whole to keep the laws or customs which they had before the Roman conquest. But in their relations with the provincials the Roman governors still retained not a little of their original character of military commanders of conquered territory. They had a summary jurisdiction of such a wide kind over both their property and their lives as almost to justify us in saying that the provincials lived under perpetual martial law. Any action which was construed as being directed against the government could be punished with extreme penalties (crucifixion, enslavement, exile, confiscation, flogging, etc.) at the governor's discretion and without

b appeal. It was this power, the so-called coercitio, that was used in the case of many Christian martyrs. Every government must be armed with some such power in time of grave emergency, but its mere retention (even if infrequently used) through long periods of peace and security seems utterly contrary to the best traditions of European states, ancient or modern; and we have no proof that its use by Roman governors was very infrequent. From this dangerous power the Roman citizen was largely protected: he must be dealt with according to much more detailed and well-defined laws, and on a capital charge he could appeal to the emperor's court. The Roman franchise was rarely bestowed on whole districts, but it was often given to individuals for some public service or eminent merit, to the original citizens of the Coloniae (see § 598h) and to every soldier enrolled in the legions (i.e. heavy infantry).

c Roman Taxes—Various taxes were paid to the Roman government. Tributum was the general name for direct taxes, which were paid in one form or another by all provincials over the age of fourteen, but not by Roman citizens. In some cases it took the form of income-tax (about 10%), in others it was a property-tax (about 10% of the annual value), and in Egypt it was a poll-tax of apparently moderate amount. The chief indirect taxes, paid both by citizens and provincials, were: (1) Customs duties, usually from 2% to 5% of the value of goods, levied not only on the empire frontiers but also on the boundaries of the eight or nine large customs-areas into which the empire was divided. (2) An excise of 1% on goods sold by auction and of 4% on the sale of slaves. (3) A legacy duty of 5%, not paid by near relatives or on small legacies. (4) A tax of 5% on the value of a slave emancipated by his owner. For the purpose of assessing the tributum a census of all the provinces was taken every fourteen years.

d These taxes are light in comparison with those we pay. If they ever did become burdensome under the empire, as they had sometimes been under the republic, it was due to abuse of the method of collecting, or to some local causes. For the tributum each district was assessed at a certain sum, and the local authorities were left to collect this in their own way and by means of their own servants. The indirect taxes in each area were leased out to a firm or firms of (generally Italian) financiers, who undertook to pay a certain sum into the treasury and collected the taxes through their employees or slaves. These tax-farmers were the publicani in the proper sense, but the word came to be loosely applied to the actual collectors employed by them or by others. These indirect methods of collection no doubt saved trouble to the government, but they placed temptations in the way of both municipalities and tax-farmers. The central government probably kept a sharp eye on the intermediaries, for we hear little about rapacious taxation. We hear more complaints about the governor's right of requisition, i.e. compulsory purchase or hire of anything (including labour) needed for the administrative staff or the forces.

The Roman Army—The empire had a standing army of at least 250,000 men. About three-quarters of these were stationed on the most vital frontiers, the Rhine, the Danube, and Syria. The forces were everywhere divided about equally into legions and auxiliaries. A legion consisted of about 5,000 men, who were all Roman citizens. They were infantry carrying considerable armour (helmet, breastplate, greaves, and shield) and furnished with a short sword and two six-foot spears (pila), used mainly for throwing. They served for twenty years and were provided with a livelihood afterwards. The auxiliaries consisted of cavalry, archers, slingers, etc., divided into units of 500 or 1,000 men. They were not Roman citizens as a rule. Lastly, there were the emperor's guards, 10,000 or more in number, housed in barracks in the suburbs of Rome.

The Roman army had once been a citizen-army raised by general conscription. It was now a professional army, and the majority of its men were no longer of Italian blood. The power of conscription was always retained, but in ordinary times it was never enforced in Italy, and probably very seldom in the provinces, for enough volunteers seem to have been forthcoming to fill the ranks. No doubt most of the officers were still of Italian origin, and Roman discipline and training were maintained in all their sternness and efficiency. But the ordinary soldier's chief loyalty was not to Rome but to the person of the emperor, or to his own legion or commander. A short period of military service was still essential for every man who wished to hold high office at Rome, but the vast majority of men had no experience of it. Peace and security had made it possible for a great state to free the bulk of its population from military service—probably for the first time in the history of the world.

The Romans had now no maritime enemies but some naval squadrons were kept up, mainly as a protection against pirates. They were based on about six ports, including Alexandria, and Seleucia, the port of Antioch.

Municipal Government and Coloniae—Municipal government was a shadow of the bygone city-state. But owing to Roman influence the democratic elements in the city constitution had vanished, even in Greek lands. The civic officials were chosen not by popular vote but by the city council, of which they then became members for life. The officials were not only unpaid but were required and often compelled, by express promises in advance, to contribute substantially to various public expenses, the construction or repair of public buildings, the cost of festivals and amusements, etc. Half the money which nowadays would be raised by rates came out of the pockets of the city officials. Only the wealthy therefore could hold such offices, and each municipality was in fact a plutocracy. The poorer citizens took the comforts provided for them and were apparently contented, or at least resigned.

Scattered throughout the provinces were towns called coloniae—towns founded fairly recently by the Roman 506h government, many as homes for soldiers discharged after the wars of the century before Christ. In theory they were small fragments of Italy: the original settlers were all Roman citizens, only Roman law was valid, the official language was Latin, and the town was to some extent outside the sphere of the provincial governor. Later on we find the descendants of the first citizens forming a privileged class amidst a mixed population of non-citizens, and clinging proudly to Latin tradition or sentiment. St Paul visited several of these towns: Pisidian Antioch, Philippi and Corinth were among them.

1 Survey of the Eastern Countries about A.D. 50—There were sixteen provinces, six or seven dependent kingdoms, and many smaller principalities. These last two groups were in much the same position as the native states in India before 1947. The province of Egypt was thoroughly Greek in its towns, and the fine city of Alexandria was a leading centre of Greek culture and learning, and the second largest city in the empire. The province of Syria was especially important because of its army of about 50,000 men guarding the frontier on the Euphrates. It was rich and populous, and full of Greek cities. Antioch, its capital, was the most beautiful of the great cities of the empire, and the third in size—a city adorned with miles of marble colonnades and with garden suburbs, and set amidst magnificent scenery. Eastern Cilicia (St Paul's home) was now joined to the province of Syria. Beyond the Euphrates lay the large empire of the Parthians, stretching to India. It was a feudalized state, whose king seldom had sufficient power over his great vassals to become a serious danger to the Romans. Asia Minor contained five provinces and three good-sized kingdoms. The coastal districts were nearly all Greek, the inland parts were more backward. The west formed the large and prosperous province of Asia, full of Greek cities. The province of Galatia in the centre of the peninsula was rapidly becoming Greek, but Cappadocia to the east was still a wild and lawless country with hardly any towns. Cyprus formed a separate province, thoroughly Greek.

j In Europe the southern half of modern Greece made up the province of Achaia, thinly populated owing to centuries of emigration, but still the most cultured land in the world. Athens drew crowds of students, Romans and Greeks, and was full of masterpieces of art, but the new and rather upstart city of Corinth, a busy, commercial, and half-Italian place, was the capital of the province. The province of Macedonia stretched across the peninsula to the Adriatic and its eastern half was far more civilized than the other. North of the Aegean Sea the province of Thrace was still semi-barbarous except for the coast-line.

k Merits and Demerits of the Roman Empire—The Romans gave several centuries of unprecedented peace to all the countries round the Mediterranean; they found south-western Europe a semi-barbarous land and raised it to civilization; they were the first imperial race who made any attempt to consider the welfare of their subjects, and they ultimately raised these subjects to the same level as the rulers; they worked out an unsurpassed code of civilized law; and they unconsciously smoothed the way for the spread of Christianity. On the opposite side of the account we have to admit that there were five centuries of autocratic government, alien to the earlier traditions of civilized Europeans; that methods of government were brutal and inhuman as compared with the previous usages of both Romans and Greeks; that the evils of a plutocratic society were present—extreme contrasts of riches and poverty, and the steady vulgarization of the higher classes.

RELIGION

1 Ancient paganism was not one in teaching and organization as Catholicism is, nor was it made up of exclusive and independent sects as was earlier Protestantism. It was a great jumble of many worships and doctrines, base and noble, crude and refined, competing yet seldom persecuting, continually borrowing from one another yet distinguishable. Modern Hinduism is just such another jumble. We must first look at the chief ingredients which went into the mixture. There were six of these: the four chief national religions of the Mediterranean world (those of Egypt, Syria, Greece and Rome) together with certain influences which came into Greek religion from outside, and lastly Greek philosophy.

Egyptian Religion—The religion of Egypt was the most ancient of the pagan religions. At its highest level it had taught the immortality of the soul and a judgement after death, and it had exalted one supreme god (the sun-god Ra) so greatly as to approach to monotheism. But these wholesome elements were embedded in a mass of gross or trivial superstition—animal-worship, endless magical formulae, etc. Under Greek influence some attempt was made to detach them, and two divinities, Isis and Serapis, became well known as far west as Italy. Their worship encouraged the expectation of a future life and included some ascetical and perhaps moral preparation for that life.

Syrian Religion—The religion of the Syrians and Phoenicians, the paganism against which the Jewish prophets had fought, was the lowest of the great national religions. But it still survived in Syrian villages, and colonists had carried it to Cyprus, Tunisia and Sicily. It was a religion which exploited human fear, lust, and ferocity, and it is hard to discover any good side to it. In the past at least it had encouraged human sacrifices, and perhaps infants were still sometimes burnt in honour of Moloch. It still continued to promote and consecrate the foulest immorality, and its temples still had their sacred prostitutes.

The primitive religions of Asia Minor are little known to us. They seem to have resembled that of Syria in many respects. The chief divinity was a goddess worshipped under many names. In Egypt, Syria and Asia Minor the most famous temples had in the course of ages acquired immense riches—vast estates and thousands of slaves. Guarded by popular veneration, these great possessions had survived and even increased amidst all the political changes. By the time of Christ the head-priests who governed them had come to rank as great noblemen in Egypt and as semi-independent princes in Syria and Asia Minor.

Greek Religion—The Aryan tribes who conquered Greece and Italy in the Bronze Age introduced their ancestral religion into both countries and gave it the most honourable position there. It was a religion of many gods or spirits, who seem to have been associated with some natural object or with some portion of man's life (birth, marriage, harvest, war, etc.). Above them all was the supreme god, the sky-god Deus or Dius. This 'Aryan religion' had a very different history in the two countries. In Italy it was added to rather than changed, but in Greece changes came rapidly. Various gods and religious practices which the Greek invaders found in the country were accepted into the religion of the conquerors, and the result was complete polytheism: the sky-god, Zeus, still retained a nominal presidency, but seven or eight other divinities held a position almost of equality, and we may believe that for each district its own chief local god quite overshadowed Zeus. There was a general belief in a life after death, but it was imagined as a vague shadow of this life. There was a rough moral code, for the gods rewarded courage, honesty and hard work. But while the intellect and the moral sense had as yet made no progress among these early Greeks, their imagination was awake and soon reached an astonishing degree of poetical refinement. Countless stories were made up, in which the gods appear as essentially human figures, more powerful, dignified or graceful than the common run of men, but neither better nor wiser. Imagination often proved stronger than 588p reverence. This stage of Greek religion would very likely have been outgrown and forgotten in time if a supreme poet, Homer, had not embodied a multitude of these stories in his two great epic poems, some time between 950 and 750 B.C., and by so doing made them immortal. He had no idea of being a religious teacher, but in fact he became the most compelling religious teacher that the Greeks ever had. The fascination of his poetry bound them fast to his earth-born gods for a thousand years and frustrated all the efforts of religious reformers. The whole notion of the Divine was lowered, and the vital distinction between the Divine and the human, so easy even to the ignorant among us, remained blurred to the majority of Greeks.

q Homer often tells of gods disguised as men, and often of semi-divine beings ('heroes'), the offspring of a divine and a human parent. Many families claimed to have a god among their ancestors. There were many cases too in Greek history of distinguished men who after their death were worshipped as gods or demi-gods. Alexander the Great was persuaded by his courtiers that none but a god could have begotten him, and he claimed and received divine worship during his lifetime. It soon became the custom in Asia and Egypt to treat kings and even governors as gods. In consequence of all this, all kinds of ideas about a fusion or union of the divine and human, about incarnate gods and deified men, were trite and commonplace to the Greek mind. It was only to the Jew, with his much loftier and truer notion of the Divine, that such an idea was a startling novelty.

Later movements shook, though they could not overturn, the Homeric theology. There are two of these which need special description, the Mysteries and Greek philosophy.

599a. The Mysteries—This is the general name given to various religious rites which seem first to have become important in the 7th cent. B.C. Their special marks were these: (1) They were not public rites open to all the members of a community, but secret rites to which worshippers were only admitted after certain preparations, and on certain conditions, among which was an oath of secrecy. (2) They appealed much more to the emotions than did the ordinary observances, and in many cases there was a definite process for developing excitement or even hysteria. (3) They awakened a new interest in the future of the soul and several of them offered a clearer hope and a more definite teaching on this subject. Some of these rites may have had their root in the earliest Greek religion itself, some probably sprang from pre-Greek cults ignored by the 'Homeric religion' while others no doubt came from neighbouring countries (Thrace, Egypt, Asia Minor) or even from farther afield (Persia or India). Many of them were certainly connected with some divinity who was believed to be author of fruitfulness, Demeter the goddess of harvest, Dionysus the vine-god, etc., and the yearly cycle of the seasons was transformed into the story of a god or goddess who died and rose again to life. Such stories of death and resurrection are found in nearly all the religions of the Near East. Represented in solemn ceremonies or in some form of religious drama, they could easily be the occasion of strong emotion, and could suggest a hope that the worshipper too might somehow share in the god's victory over death.

c We can guess some of the reasons which led to this development. No doubt it was an attempt to meet some desires left unsatisfied by Homer. Apparently a need was felt for some sort of revelation about the unsolved problems of life, especially the problem of the soul's destiny, and for some sort of religious discipline, and again for some larger scope for religious feeling—in short a vague longing for a religion which could engage the whole personality, including intellect, will, and emotions, those sides of human nature to which little had been offered by the Homeric religion. That religion had indeed made a strong appeal to the senses

d and imagination, but no more. It is to the honour of the Mysteries that they provided some satisfaction for this wider longing, though a very imperfect one, as it seems to us. We can see how vague or false were the 'inner truths' which they taught, and how unhealthy and dangerous was the excitement which some of them stimulated. At their best they created a confident and cheerful faith in immortality, with the sobering idea that future happiness depended on present action, partly at least on moral action. Their first introduction met with some opposition, but eventually some such rites were established in most of the Greek states. For a time even the average man seems to have been stirred by them, but before long they became a part of religious routine, except for some of the more thoughtful spirits who continued to find an inspiration and comfort in them throughout the centuries down to the final extinction of paganism.

Greek Philosophy—In the 6th cent. B.C. a new kind of 'wisdom' was heard of among the Greeks, a genuine invention of their own, and a startling one. Certain Greeks of Asia Minor put forward theories which attempted to explain the origin of the world in terms of mere matter without reference to any divine power whatsoever. They were materialists and practically atheists. This was the unpromising beginning of Greek philosophy and this materialism continued for centuries as one of the strands in it. But other theories, idealistic and even mystical, soon appeared. Here we can only mention Pythagoras (about 530 B.C.). He was influenced by the Mysteries, but introduced some doctrines apparently new to Greece, especially the notion that the soul was destined to inhabit a succession of bodies, some human and some animal. This was bound up with the view (derived perhaps from India) that matter was essentially evil and that the union of soul and body was a calamity or punishment. Pythagoras organized his disciples into semi-monastic societies, which lasted for a century or two.

A new chapter begins about 430 B.C. with the appearance of Socrates the Athenian. He wrote nothing and some branches of his teaching are uncertain, but he was the greatest personality in the whole story of ancient philosophy. An unwearied searcher for truth and a devastating critic, deeply religious, immensely interested in the practical implications of philosophy, possessing at once the zeal of a lonely prophet and the exquisite sympathy, urbanity and humour of a perfect man of the world, he made an indelible impression on the ancient world both by his life and by his death—he was executed on the charge of impiety. He and his great pupil Plato were much impressed by the Mysteries and by the teaching of Pythagoras, and helped by these they reached a belief in one God and in a perfect spiritual world, and worked out a higher moral code than the Greek world had yet known. They did not reject the old Greek religion, but had hopes of purifying and reforming it. They failed: their arguments and their eloquence could not induce the masses to give up the Homeric theology. Few other thinkers even attempted such a reform. When we come to the next great philosopher, Aristotle, who lived during the middle of the 4th cent. B.C., we can see that philosophy and religion are parting company: he attempted, independently of religion, to erect a theology and morality on sound rational foundations, and produced the firmest system of pure philosophy which the ancient world knew, the system which the great Catholic thinkers of the Middle Ages were able to adapt to Christian truth. Two other philosophies arose which had the widest influence of all in Roman times—Stoicism and Epicureanism (see §601b, c).

Thenceforth philosophy and religion went their separate ways without an open quarrel. Men who desired an intellectual basis for their beliefs and a more enlightened morality lost interest in religion. They paid outward respect to it, they regarded it as good and necessary for the ignorant and unintellectual, but they themselves drew all their inspiration from some philosophy. In the 2nd cent. B.C. it seemed that 599h before long even the ignorant would cease to care for religion and that it would disappear altogether. Two or three generations however before the birth of Christ the tide began to turn. Educated society, especially in Italy, was frightened at the prospect of a godless populace and a general dissolution of all religious scruples. A revival of paganism, based more on policy than on conviction, had definitely begun when our Lord was born, and continued steadily for two or three centuries, gathering more and more sincerity as it went on. The Roman government did all in its power to promote it. But the cleavage between religion and morality still remained serious at the time of the Apostles.

1 Roman Religion—The 'Aryan religion' which the Italic race had brought into Italy (see § 598b) had received considerable additions at an early date from Etruscan sources and the mixture which resulted formed the early Roman religion—a polytheism like the Homeric religion, but the Italians had not the vivid imagination which created the Greek mythology. If there ever were any Italian stories about Jupiter, Juno or Vesta, they disappeared without leaving a trace. There was an elaborate ceremonial, and a special veneration for many very primitive divinities such as Saturnus the patron spirit of sowing, Ceres who presided over harvest, Vesta the protectress of the hearth, and for a multitude of others, and the ancient sky-god of the Aryans still remained at the head of the pantheon under the name of Jupiter. With a few additions from Greece and elsewhere, this religion remained the official religion of the Roman state, respected even by non-Romans for its close connexions with Roman public life, and with the mighty power of Rome.

] There was the same rough moral code that we find in early Greek religion. Long before Christ the Romans had identified each of the greater Greek gods with some Roman god and in this way had grafted on their own religion the whole Homeric mythology with all its imaginative appeal and also all its disadvantages. Its connexion with the state kept the Roman religion alive in Italy and gave it an honourable position in the Latin provinces of the west, but Greek, Egyptian and Asiatic cults were now competing with it in Italy and ultimately all gained a firm foothold there. For emperor-worship see § 597h.

600a. The Resulting Confusion. Moral Standards—Such were the chief materials which were joined together to form the patchwork of 'pagan religion'. Every conceivable mixture of them was to be found in the same family or even in the same mind. One member of a family might frequent the ancient temples of Jupiter or Poseidon, another might put all his hopes in one of the Mysteries, a third might care only for Isis, and a fourth might be a Stoic and look with tolerant superiority on all the rest. Or again the same person might successively, or even simultaneously, try to drink from all these fountains. There was no definite moral standard associated with religion in general or with any one religion. The most diverse moral levels could claim to be equally pious and devout. We find pagans who attain to a serene and refined piety which might almost remind us of a Victorian parsonage, and we find others who can still call themselves devout though sunk in superstition or lust. There is a similar contrast in Hinduism between the austere mystical Brahmin and his grosser co-religionists.

b There were other grave weaknesses: there was no controlling authority either in teaching or government, no organization, hardly what can be called a clergy, and no theology.

c Authority, Theology—In Egypt and in Rome some sort of central authority had once existed, but had long ceased to operate. The religious authority of the emperor as head of the Roman state-religion was exercised occasionally, but only to protect Italy from un-Roman devotions. As a rule every temple was independent and secure from all interference except when the civil power intervened to repress disorder.

600c No pagan denied the right of the state to interfere in religion, and the worship of the emperor also implied an acknowledgement of such a right. Yet if we call the emperor the head of the pagan religion, he was a head that rarely governed.

d In Egypt, Syria and Asia Minor we find a large body of professional clergy—priests whose priestly office was the main business of their lives. Even in Egypt they seem to have counted for little as a spiritual force, and elsewhere for even less. Among the Greeks and the Romans the majority of the priests were not professional: they had secular work to do, more urgent and exacting than their sacred duties. Their priesthood was a side-occupation, which might add dignity to a public career or provide a graceful occupation for old age. In such circumstances little special training or knowledge would be necessary or possible. With such a clergy and with the severance between religion and philosophy, it is natural that no body of pagan theology ever grew up. The appeal of religion was to the senses, imagination and emotions: it provided hardly anything to satisfy the intellect or win the heart of a thinking man, hardly any rational foundation for faith and devotion, or incentive to holiness. There was an intellectual and spiritual mediocrity about the pagan religion. In its whole history it did not produce one great spiritual book comparable to the best which Mohammedanism or Hinduism have to show. Those which come nearest (the works of Plato, Epictetus, Marcus Aurelius, Plotinus) are essentially philosophical works pathetically trying to catch the spirit of religion. We cannot therefore class ancient paganism among the great non-Christian religions of the world.

Let us glance at some of the externals of paganism: Temples—By far the commonest type throughout the empire was that evolved by the Greeks of the 5th cent. B.C.—the oblong building of white marble or light-coloured stone, with low-pitched roof supported on every side by pillars. Its wide prevalence even in alien lands far away from Greece is a remarkable proof of the power of Greek artistic tradition, for it embodied the most characteristic qualities of this tradition—an infinitely delicate sense of proportion and harmony, and an extraordinary self-restraint. Other peoples have perhaps had as deep a feeling for beauty, and have expressed it as finely in their architecture, but in this style the Greeks have had no equals. A Gothic cathedral would no doubt have shocked them as something florid and riotous. In the same way if we, nursed in our very different traditions, were to come upon a well-preserved temple in the midst of a Greek city (not a picturesque and famous ruin in the wilderness) our first feeling might well be that the building was tame and plain. Time and effort would be needed to appreciate its beauty.

f The temple was regarded as a house for the god, not for his worshippers, and therefore the interior (usually one chamber, the cella) was not on the same scale as that of our churches. One of the very largest interiors, that of the temple of Artemis at Ephesus, was 145 feet by 65. In the cella stood the chief statue of the god. It was frequently of a large or even colossal size—that of Athena in the Parthenon at Athens is said to have been forty feet high including its pedestal. In some of the bigger temples the cella seems to have been wholly or partly open to the sky—in other cases the light must have come mainly from the open door. The cella was often adorned with other sculpture, with votive offerings or with paintings. The altar stood in the open air before the entrance. It was on the open space before the temple, not inside it, that crowds gathered at festivals.

g Statues of the Gods—Greek tradition aimed at depicting the gods as beautiful or noble human figures, and the great sculptors had carved some of their masterpieces to be erected in temples. But some lewd or bestial forms remained even among the Greeks, and many nightmare shapes continued to inhabit the temples of Egypt and Asia. What degree of idolatry 600g was there—how far did the pagan believe that the statue was the god? We may be sure that hardly any educated man held such a belief. The making of divine images was carried on quite openly, and every god had many images. An educated man could not believe that Apollo, for example, was identical with some one statue, or that he somehow inhabited or animated a thousand statues. But no doubt some such beliefs did survive among the uneducated masses, especially in the more backward countries. Against these latter pagans the denunciations of the OT writers were still valid.

h Sacrifices—Sacrifice was a constant part of pagan worship. Animals of various kinds, cakes, meal, fruit, wine, milk, honey and flowers were among the things offered to the gods. Some gods did not receive animal sacrifices. Many of the things offered were either destroyed in the ceremony (the wine poured out, etc.) or became the property of the temple authorities and were consumed or sold by them. But an animal, after a portion had been burnt on the altar, was usually eaten by the worshipper and his friends at the temple or near it, and so a sacrifice would normally lead to a dinner. In the same way great public sacrifices often involved public dinners. These public sacrifices were often accompanied by elaborate ritual, with rich vestments, incense, chants and musical instruments. Greek sacred choral music had once reached a high artistic level, but it is doubtful whether these masterpieces were often heard now. Greek tradition scarcely regarded any religious festival as complete without a series of athletic contests, but this association of religion and athletics never became popular in the west. The Greeks also were very fond of religious processions which often walked surprising distances.

i Prophecy and Oracles—Some temples had a reputation for curing diseases, and drew many pilgrims on that account. But many more pilgrims travelled to the numerous shrines which claimed prophetic inspiration, i.e. an oracle of some sort. Oracles were found in abundance both in east and west. Delphi was the most celebrated in Greek lands; one of the most frequented in the west was the great temple of Fortuna at Praeneste close to Rome. Many methods were used: trance-talk, dreams, lots, interpretation of sounds animate or inanimate, etc. Some oracles seem to have regularly used fraud or equivocation, but as a rule there was nothing worse than ignorance and superstition.

j Prophecies and omens meet us everywhere in ancient paganism. Whenever an animal was sacrificed, its internal organs were examined for omens, and even the sober Roman religion used an elaborate system of divination from the flight of birds. The higher religions have generally tried to repress man's foolish belief that he can peer into the future. The blind guides of ancient paganism shared this belief, no doubt. They certainly encouraged and exploited it. (See Dill: Roman Society from Nero to Marcus Aurelius, 451-73.)

MORALITY

601a Moral Ideals in the Time of Christ—I have said that the highest moral ideals were founded on philosophy, not religion. The two noblest efforts of philosophy had been those of Plato and Aristotle (§ 599f, g), but at the time of Christ both these philosophies were in eclipse. Another system, that of the Stoics, had come to dominate the world. Next to Stoicism the widest appeal was probably made by the philosophy of Epicurus, who taught just before 300 B.C. He had given a new shape to the materialism and atheism which we noticed in early Greek thinking (§ 599e).

b Epicurus taught that atoms, falling aimlessly through space, had combined by pure accident to form this present world, which was bound in the course of ages to break up again by the separation of the atoms.

Man therefore must not labour to please any god or to prepare for any future for himself or for his race. He had only his own single earthly life to think of. The highest proper motive for his action was pleasure. In the catalogue of pleasures Epicurus gave the foremost place to those of the intellect and imagination, but such a philosophy would, even at its best, encourage a refined individualism, and at its worst might serve as excuse for almost any degree of sensuality. Its most eloquent exponent was a Roman, the poet Lucretius, who, fifty years before the birth of Christ, attacked all religion as the greatest curse of human society, and pleaded against it with a fervour worthy of an evangelist. In the century before Christ many eminent Romans had been Epicureans, but there were not so many in the following century.

Stoicism: Its Teaching and Influence—The Stoic philosophy had been built up by three men of whom none was a thinker of the first rank. The world, according to the Stoics, was a single living being, whose soul was God—indeed the world could rightly be called God. Every part of it, man included, was a part of him, and was in itself as incomplete and worthless as a finger severed from the body. Each man therefore existed purely for the sake of the world and had no claim to any individual happiness here or hereafter: the hope of immortality was foolish. Moreover, as man had no true individuality, there was no such thing as free will. All his actions were determined by the motion of the Whole to which he belonged. But once a man recognized his insignificance and heartily acquiesced in it, he came into his true greatness, for though a fragment, he was a fragment of God. Nothing could thwart him as long as he subordinated himself utterly to the Whole. By acknowledging himself to be nothing he became omnipotent. He had within himself all that he needed for a perfect life. He was not only invincible against temptation and suffering, he was insensible and inaccessible to them. Pleasure and pain, health and sickness, riches and poverty, were all alike to him. They were 'indifferent' to him. This doctrine of the self-sufficiency of the soul and the indifference of its environment was the core of Stoic morality. Thus the false idea that God is one with the world led to the two opposite results of unnatural self-effacement and unnatural self-exaltation. Moreover the Stoic outlook was limited to this present life almost as much as that of the Epicureans: perfect happiness must be found here and now if it is to be found at all.

This erroneous and sombre philosophy had gained immense influence among educated and half-educated pagans when our Lord was born, and it continued to dominate men's minds for another two centuries. It pervaded the atmosphere of the time and reached countless persons who were not formal adherents of any philosophy. A class of philosophical missionaries had come into existence, men who preached moral philosophy in popular language, not to students but to all who cared to listen. Their teaching, though somewhat mixed, was more Stoic than anything else, and through them the Stoic catchwords and the outlines of Stoic morality reached many of the uneducated. Thousands became half-Stoic without realizing it. Stoicism appealed to the Romans more strongly than any other form of Greek philosophy. Its stern maxims found an echo in their national character. In short no other moral code exercised such a wide influence in antiquity, and this influence was nearly at its height in the time of Christ.

With all its faults Stoicism must have done immense good. It overrode racial differences and taught a brotherhood of men. It encouraged justice, public spirit, courage and self-control. It supported society when ancient sanctions of morality were weakening. It must have saved many a prosperous man from sensuality or arrogance, and many an unfortunate one from servility or despair. But the ordinary man must always have been repelled by its uncompromising 601f doctrine of self-sufficiency and by its cheerless outlook on the future : it made such enormous demands on men and offered so little in return. It was more suited to strong self-centred characters than to the diffident and sociable, who are more numerous. For these or other reasons Stoicism failed to win the masses, and ultimately declined and disappeared.

I have described the outstanding moral ideal. Turning now from theory to practice, I will content myself with sketching a few aspects of pagan society which bring out the moral differences between it and ours.

g Comparison of Ancient and Modern Moral Conditions—In some details the Roman world compared favourably with ours. National rivalries and hatreds within the empire, though not dead, were hardly ever carried to the point of bloodshed. Religious persecution had hitherto been a rare thing. Drunkenness never seems to have become the curse which it has been in northern countries. Gambling was moderate compared to its present-day scale. Duelling, which has been till lately a serious evil, was almost unheard of among the civilized nations of antiquity.

On the other side there were evils which are unknown or less known among us :

h Despotism—To what I have said already (§ 597g) I need only add that the sight of irresponsible power wielded on a vast scale, when there was not in the world a single state governed constitutionally or democratically, must have been a corrupting influence, aggravated by the lapse of generations. The political ideals of Greek statesmen and thinkers (one of the most valuable things that Greece had given to the world) seemed lost for ever, and the loss was a great moral loss.

i Slavery—Slaves formed a large proportion, a third or even more, of the population of the more civilized provinces. There were slaves in every household except the poorest, and there were often hundreds working for a rich man. Great gangs of slaves tilled the large farms of Italy and Africa, and laboured in mills and factories, where they were often trained to a machine-like efficiency which would be impossible with free workmen. These industrial slaves seem in many cases to have been treated little better than animals, and naturally became brutalized and savage beings. Household slaves received a more humane treatment ; some were highly educated or trained in medicine or the arts. But even in this milder form slavery offered terrible temptations to cruelty and lust. Both law and custom had sought to limit the owner's power, but in practice such restrictions seem for some reason to have been of little use. At any rate we still find cases where slaves are brutally maltreated or killed with impunity. Slaves who had done good service were often liberated, and such freedmen were now accepted nearly everywhere as equals by free-born citizens. Some public offices however were closed to them. The supply of slaves had always to be maintained by importation. Barbarian chiefs outside the empire sold their captives or subjects to dealers who resold them at the great slave-markets. Rebels within the empire were sometimes reduced to slavery as a punishment.

j Infanticide—Pagans were still permitted by their laws to allow a newly born child to die if its father did not wish to bring it up. Several indisputable cases occur in or near the time of Christ, but it is impossible to say how common the horrible practice was. If we may judge by the indifferent tone in which it is referred to, it would seem to have been not rare.

k The Amphitheatre—The inhuman sports of the amphitheatre were one of the worst blots on the Roman world. It was the Etruscans who first amused themselves by making slaves or prisoners of war fight one another to the death. The practice was copied by the Romans and became one of their national sports. The Greeks in general looked upon it with aversion, and many cultured Romans came to loathe it, but they reluctantly gave the populace what it enjoyed. The amphitheatre was invented for the murderous pastime and numerous ruins justly perpetuate the memory of Roman brutality. The sport spread to all parts of the empire except Greece. Its victims were of several classes : slaves bought for the purpose, criminals who were not Roman citizens, subdued rebels, prisoners taken in wars with the frontier tribes, etc., and sometimes volunteers from among the free citizens. Some of the slaves (called 'gladiators') were carefully trained for the exhibition, but many of the performers received no special training. After every victory, whether over foreign tribes or rebels, it became the custom to set large numbers of prisoners to kill one another in the amphitheatres. There were also fights between men and animals and the slaughter of unarmed men by animals. High Roman officials were compelled by custom to provide such entertainments and to preside at them in person. In Italy and the western provinces not only men but women also, even the Vestal Virgins themselves, could and did witness these massacres. Great multitudes were enabled frequently, without personal risk, to gloat over the agonies of others : it was a perfect training in cruelty and cowardice, and a plentiful crop of both appeared in due time.

Relations of the Sexes—In the Asiatic provinces long ages of polygamy had inevitably robbed women of the honour and respect which are their natural right. European influence had now restored monogamy, but had not yet restored women to their rightful position. They were a depressed class even among the upper, or Greek, portion of society. They were unequal partners in their own homes, and counted for very little outside them. A wife had her own rooms in the house and did not meet her husband's guests or eat with them. Roman tradition however, which prevailed in the western provinces, gave much greater freedom and importance to women. Unmarried daughters could not indeed choose their husbands, but after marriage women lived on something like an equal footing with men. The influence of women in Roman history is considerable.

Roman law allowed either husband or wife to dissolve the marriage at will, by merely making a short statement before witnesses. In the eastern provinces the husband alone could use this easy method, while the wife could only obtain divorce by legal process. The richer classes both in East and West made extensive use of these powers, and marriages were freely made and unmade. Children usually remained in their father's care and endured, as best they could, a succession of stepmothers. There were laws imposing severe penalties on adultery in which a married woman was involved, but they seem to have been seldom enforced. With this exception, unchastity in a man, married or single, was regarded as a small fault or none. We should have expected the Stoics to teach a higher standard of male morality, but they did not : a great Stoic moralist like Epictetus contents himself with advising moderation in immorality. Greek opinion on the subject of certain incestuous unions and on homosexual vice had sunk into a state of disgraceful laxity, little better than that of the Asiatics. The Romans still looked on such things with a severer eye, but they never used their power to attempt any reform in the eastern provinces, and moreover their own standard was now declining. Finally there was the consecrated unchastity surrounding many temples in Syria and Asia Minor : the Romans did not interfere, but they successfully resisted any westward spread of these abominations.

HABITS AND CUSTOMS

Education—Schools throughout ancient times seem to have been practically always private schools, not those of the mediæval and modern type controlled by

- 602c some sort of corporation. Although we hear, especially in the eastern provinces, of municipal grants of money towards schools, the master seems to have depended largely on the fees of his pupils. The average slave seems to have received very little education, and for free men education was entirely voluntary. The proportion of illiterate persons seems to have been much bigger than in western Europe today. We know little about the education of women, but many Roman women of the richer class were certainly well-educated.
- d Education was in three stages as with us. After elementary education up to twelve, a boy spent about four years at a secondary school, where the chief study was the works of the poets, Greek poets in the East, and both Greek and Latin poets in the West, where the Greek language was a regular part of a liberal education. Other subjects (history, geography, mythology, astronomy, etc.) were included incidentally in the reading of the poets. Greek boys seldom learnt Latin, but received considerable training in athletics and music, subjects which the Roman schools neglected. The next stage, for those who wanted it, was a period devoted to the study of rhetoric—a survival from democratic days. The students wrote speeches for imaginary occasions and delivered them with the prescribed intonation and gestures. Bad models were often followed and sophistry or a florid style was the frequent result. The training explains why it was as natural for the average Greek or Roman to declaim or to quibble as it is for the average modern to sentimentalize or over-analyse. In Greek lands philosophy might be substituted for rhetoric. Endowed professorships of both subjects existed in various places, and some Greek cities, especially Athens, Alexandria, Tarsus and Marseilles, had a reputation for learning and drew crowds of students, though there was not the organization of a modern university.
- e Occupations—Both Greeks and Romans held manual work in greater contempt than we do (Aristotle, Politics 3, 5. Cicero, De Officiis 1, 42). The Romans indeed regarded all work done for a salary or a fee as somewhat dishonourable. They had less scruple about profits gained by trade, and it was the Roman middle class who carried industry and finance to a pitch of efficiency never reached before. They used many of the devices of modern finance—bills of exchange, banking, insurance, and joint-stock companies. Mines, factories and large-scale farming were conducted with skill and rigid economy. Slave-labour was employed, ruthlessly trained and disciplined. Its efficiency and cheapness enabled many articles to be produced almost as economically as in the modern world with all its machinery, and gave big industry much the same advantage over the small man. There is no doubt that the free workmen, especially the semi-skilled or unskilled, were in a bad position. Such men were seldom employed in large enterprises or as household servants. They worked singly or in small groups. They had therefore little chance of forming the associations by which modern workers have improved their condition, and moreover the government forbade all such association except for worship or mutual insurance. In special distress the workman had nowhere to turn except to private charity. Public hospitals and poor relief did not exist. Free corn and occasional free meals could be obtained in some large cities, but that was all.
- f Cities—The first century of the empire was one of the great building ages of the world. Many new cities were founded and old ones were adorned with modern buildings. The majority of the great new buildings were intended for utility, comfort or luxury. There were theatres, amphitheatres, baths, town-halls, law-courts, market-buildings, and in some cultured cities public libraries. Every town of any size had its public baths (with halls and shady walks often attached) for frequent bathing was now the fashion everywhere. Immense sums were spent on water-supply and drainage. But we do not find great schools or colleges or 602i hospitals. Except in frontier areas, city-walls and fortresses were non-existent or neglected. Antioch was a mighty stronghold, but Corinth was an open city. A modern visitor to the cities of this time would at once be struck by the number of colonnades or pillared walks. They formed some part or adjunct of most large buildings, and they lined the principal squares and streets, roofing in what we should call the pavement. Old cities like Rome and Jerusalem had many crooked narrow streets, but the newer ones (Antioch, Ephesus, Troas, Thessalonica, Philippi, Caesarea, etc.) were better planned, with straight and broader streets. Big cities had many pleasure-grounds, public and private, in their outskirts, with groves, grottoes, ornamental waters, and of course colonnades. Antioch is said to have been the only city with street-lighting and perhaps only Rome had a well-organized fire-service. Rome had over a million inhabitants, Antioch and Alexandria at least half a million each, Jerusalem perhaps a hundred and fifty thousand.

Houses—The sharp contrast between riches and poverty is very evident here. In the towns the poor lived in buildings of wood or sun-baked brick, and the villages in many parts of the empire were clusters of miserable huts, round or square. The houses of the wealthy were as big and as luxurious as those of eighteenth century Europe, but in an inferior style. Beauty and even grandeur were sacrificed to piecemeal display and tasteless comfort. There was a want of order and dignity. Every moderate-sized town-house was built round a small courtyard: the big houses enclosed several, and larger, courtyards. The best rooms were on the first floor, which was often the highest. The façade towards the street was plain. Country houses had even less unity, and were rambling collections of fine and luxurious parts. The Romans loved the country much more than the Greeks, and a wealthy Roman often had five or six houses in the country or by the sea. In big cities, especially Rome, the poorer middle class lived in huge tenement-houses of six or seven storeys. Everywhere the furniture would appear scanty to us, except in well-to-do dining-rooms where a number of huge couches, holding three reclining persons each, would fill most of the room.

Daily Routine, Meals, etc.—Very early rising was the rule, in order to have the coolest hours for work. This was compensated for by a sleep after lunch. There were usually three meals. Breakfast was a very light meal, there was a substantial lunch about noon, but the largest meal was eaten some time between four and seven o'clock, generally after a bath. It was eaten in a leisurely manner and then people seem usually to have retired for the night. Greek tradition favoured simplicity and moderation in food and drink, but the Romans were less abstemious and coarser in their taste. Both Greeks and Romans regularly mixed their wine with two or three times its volume of water, usually hot water. Beer was drunk in several countries, but distilled liquors were unknown. The custom of reclining at the evening meal was now universal among men, both rich and poor. The diner lay on his left side, his feet pointing away from the table, and handled his food with his right hand, using his fingers or a spoon. Couches were used in the richer houses, cushions or rugs in the poor ones. Women and children, if they were present, sat on the edge of couches or on some kind of low seat.

Dress—Dress throughout the empire, both male and female, consisted essentially of two garments: (1) A shirt-like garment, reaching to the knees for men, to the ankles for women (chiton, tunica), made usually of white or light-coloured cloth. Women wore a belt with it, men often did. (2) A large piece of woollen cloth, irregular oblong in shape and longer than a blanket (himation, pallium). This was wrapped round the body over the chiton, rather like a shawl but in one prescribed way. Women drew it over both shoulders, men over the left shoulder only, as a rule. It was

PAGAN WORLD IN NEW TESTAMENT TIMES

603a usually coloured, more brightly for women than for men, but Roman citizens on ceremonial occasions wore a voluminous white himation called a toga. Men engaged in active work wore the chiton only, so as to have the arms free. Women out-of-doors drew the himation over the head to form a sort of hood. Men went bare-headed or wore a cap or a flat broad-brimmed hat. Greek custom favoured sandals but shoes or boots were common in the west. Clean-shaving had been the fashion for centuries, and was still rigidly maintained by the Romans, but beards were no longer rare in the east. Short hair was the universal rule for men.

b Recreation—The Greeks had early acquired a passion for athletic sports (running, boxing, wrestling, etc.) and these had become an essential part of all liberal education in the eastern provinces. Athletic contests were included in all festive celebrations. Every city had its public gymnasium for training in these sports (not in our 'gymnastics'). It was nearly always the individual, of course, who competed: ball-games and other team-sports never became highly developed. Greek sports were copied in the west, but only one of them, chariot-racing, became popular there. Music, especially choral singing, had been intensely cultivated by the Greeks and was still kept up, though with less enthusiasm. The Romans cared much less for it. The plays of the great dramatists were still performed in Greek theatres but the Roman populace would no longer listen to such things. Little was seen on the Roman stage except dumb-show acting, ballet-dancing and buffoonery. In Greek cities large crowds would attend displays of skill by fashionable professors of rhetoric. Dancing was left to children and professional dancing-women: it was not a pastime for respectable adults. I have said enough elsewhere (§ 601*k*) about the amphitheatre.

Travelling—Roman roads, the first metalled roads ever made, but rough and narrow compared with ours, were spreading all over the empire. Harbours were being built or improved. Highwaymen and pirates were fast disappearing. Travel was becoming easier and safer, but even the Romans could not make land-travel nearly as fast as it was in our stage-coach days. Sea-travel was quicker and therefore cheaper. There were plenty of ships which carried both passengers and cargo. They were sailing-ships—only warships were propelled by oars. But navigation was still so backward that it was necessary to suspend all sailing between November and March. During that time Rome was almost cut off from the provinces. Yet travelling was easier than ever before. The removal of national frontiers helped towards the same result. More people travelled for pleasure, and among the richer Romans we now hear of a class whom we may call tourists; they travelled chiefly in Italy, Greece and western Asia Minor. In these areas comfortable hotels came into existence. Elsewhere only rough accommodation was to be found, and travellers endeavoured to stay in private houses whenever possible. The Romans had not the Greek passion for exploring. They never troubled to trace the European coast-line beyond Denmark, and though their armies often marched through the Alpine passes, no Roman attempted or desired, as far as we know, to scale the peaks.

THE GOSPELS AND NON-CATHOLIC HIGHER CRITICISM

By E. GUTWENGER, S.J.

604a Bible criticism is of various kinds; one kind is concerned with textual criticism; another with the exegetical explanation of the Bible text; and the third, higher criticism, with the origins of the biblical books. Higher criticism of the gospels, then, investigates the authorship of the gospels, the date of their composition, and the sources which account for the content and form of the gospels. It is on its sources that the historical reliability of a book is largely dependent.

It should be noticed that in the treatment of the gospels exegesis and higher criticism may easily overlap. In the rationalist Lives of Jesus, for instance, the authors undertake to explain the various events and discourses recorded in the gospels; such an undertaking might be classed as exegesis. However, they do not stop short there. Being rationalists, they ascribe the supernatural elements in the gospel stories to a human proclivity to invent myths and legends, and so must needs pass judgement about the historicity of certain passages or whole books. Such work is higher criticism. Considering the fame enjoyed by some of the Lives of Jesus, I have thought it better not to disregard them altogether in this article, especially as the development of higher criticism was deeply influenced by them.

b Of course, the problems of higher criticism are treated also by Catholic scholars. This paper, however, is concerned with the criticism that comes from the pens of non-Catholic authors. To avoid confusion it should be noted at once that our attention will be focussed on tendencies which are hostile to the views of tradition. There are, and have been, non-Catholic scholars whose opinions coincide more or less with ours—great names such as Bishop Lightfoot, Theodor Zahn, etc. To write an essay on non-Catholic higher criticism and in it to discuss only radical views is, therefore, a little unfair. As this paper is partly a criticism of the critics and the space allotted to it very limited, I must content myself with offering my apologies to the non-Catholic authors who defend the historical basis of Christianity, but to all appearances are here not distinguished from those who are more inclined to attack than defend. When in the following pages we speak of 'higher criticism' without further modification we mean to designate the radical views and opinions. It is, of course, impossible in a few pages to give a detailed description of all attacks delivered against the gospels in the course of two centuries. This will be only a very rough sketch. The number of authors encountered in the course of our exposition will be small. To mention all is impossible, for their name is legion.

c Higher criticism owes its beginnings and rise to two different problems, one of which was of a philosophical, the other of a literary nature. The first problem is that of the possibility of miracles. With the advent of rationalism a marked change had taken place in the attitude towards the supernatural. Mysteries were said to be against the autonomy of the human intellect and were relegated to an obscurantist limbo. Miracles in particular met with scorn. It was the English rationalists, the deists of the 18th cent. (John Toland, Thomas Woolston, etc.), who gave them special attention. Their opinion was that the physical laws of the universe had been once and for all imposed by God upon nature. Now he must respect them, so much so that any interference on his part is impossible. Some of them 604c asserted that a body of truth exists which shows the same inviolable necessity as pertains to mathematical propositions. Physical laws form a part of that body of truth. Hence it is impossible for God to deviate from them. Since miracles are events not in conformity with the physical laws of nature, it came to be regarded as a safe principle that miracles do not happen. But what about the miracles in the gospels? The deists set to work to make them look like natural events. The raising of the dead was said to have been a cure from lethargic slumber which had the appearance of death. The resurrection of Our Lord was done away with as a piece of fiction and his appearances were relegated to the realm of deceptive visions seen by highly imaginative dreamers. English deism exercised a considerable influence upon such French writers as Voltaire and the Encyclopaedists, who in their turn waxed sarcastic and violent as well. The result was that confidence in the gospels was undermined. Henceforth they were treated with great liberty, but little reverence. Although the rationalist foundation for the impossibility of miracles fell later into disrepute, each subsequent generation of higher critics repeated oracularly that miracles do not happen.

Side by side with the philosophical approach there was a new literary interest in the gospels. Three facts were calculated to stir the minds of scholars. Mention should first be made of the discrepancy of the evangelists in narrating certain facts. That here lay one of the reasons for discounting the gospels is borne out by Conyers Middleton's Reflections on the Variations which are found among the Four Evangelists in their different Accounts of the same Facts, 1752. Middleton shows himself no longer content with the exegetical rule advocated by St Augustine and St Jerome. The rule amounted to this. Whenever the evangelists are inconsistent in the report of a certain event, we should rather think of different events similar to each other, which occurred at different times and under different circumstances. Middleton is inclined to explain the discrepancies of certain narratives as caused by inaccuracy or faulty memory (cf. R. H. Lightfoot, History and Interpretation in the Gospels, 1935, p 4). In his pamphlet, The Age of Reason, 1796, Thomas Paine, the popularizer of Middleton's ideas, went to the extreme by affirming that the gospels could not have been written by eyewitnesses, and that they were wrongly attributed to Matthew, Mark, Luke and John.

Another point to which due attention was given has come to be known as the synoptic problem. When reading the first three gospels everyone will quickly perceive that to a large extent the same events and the same sayings of Our Lord are put down in each of them, that the synoptic writers follow largely the same order and, describing the same event, often use the same vocabulary. The obvious, though not necessarily right, explanation of this phenomenon seemed to be to admit the mutual dependence of the synoptic writers on one another. As a matter of course the question arose: Who is dependent on whom? As early as 1782, in his Marcus non epitomator Matthei J. Koppe defended the priority of Mark, a theory which later was to be accepted unanimously as a dogma of higher criticism. Still, before that came to pass, other combinations were to be tried. J. J. Griesbach, who by the way was the 604a first to use the term 'synoptic gospels', maintained in his Synopsis, 1797, that Luke was dependent on Matthew, and Mark on both Matthew and Luke. The important point to be noticed is the easy way in which the savants of the age separated themselves from the historical evidence provided by the documents of early Christian literature. On the whole it must be said that both in its origins and in its later development higher criticism has signally failed in respect for external historical evidence about the composition of the gospels. Right from the beginning it put its trust in its power of literary analysis rather than in the broader approach which includes analysis and historical tradition alike.

f The similarities between the first three gospels had led to the synoptic problem; so likewise the dissimilarity between the synoptic writers and St John led to the Johannine problem. It very early became an acute question who should be trusted more as a source of historical information, the synoptists or St John. In recording the sermons of Our Lord St John shows a propensity to abstractness which is foreign to the synoptists. Sometimes he indulges in theological speculation and uses the term 'logos' of which much was made by the Stoa, Philo, the Gnostics and Neo-Platonists. Moreover, certain points of doctrine, as the divinity of Christ, the supernatural life, etc., are more stressed by him than by the other evangelists. Can we assume that the fourth gospel was written by an eye-witness? One of the first to raise his voice against the fourth gospel's being a work of the Apostle John was the Anglican divine E. Evanson in his Dissonance of the four commonly received Gospels, 1792. He was not long alone. Soon German critics began fiercely to deny the Johannine origin of the fourth gospel. An important event in radical criticism was C. G. Bretschneider's Probabilia de Evangelii et Epistolarum Joannis Apostoli Indole et Origine, 1820. However, for a time the further progress of radical views was arrested by F. Schleiermacher who for philosophical reasons defended the authenticity of the fourth gospel. His contention was that Christianity would remain inexplicable if the portrait of Christ as painted by the synoptists were the only one to be admitted. He compared the first three gospels with Xenophon's account of Socrates, the fourth gospel with Plato's account, and drew the obvious conclusions. Some decades later the attack was reopened by Strauss and has never ceased since.

605a After showing the sources and initial attempt of what came to be known as higher criticism, we must give a brief sketch of its further development. The strongest impulse proceeded from the doctrine of rationalist philosophy, as will become increasingly obvious. A year of great importance was 1778. In this year G. E. Lessing finished the edition of the Wolfenbuettel fragments. As librarian in Wolfenbuettel he had discovered the MSS of Hermann Samuel Reimarus, late professor of oriental languages in Hamburg (d. 1768). Out of the bulky heap of notes left by Reimarus he chose and published four sections dealing with biblical matters, the last of which was entitled Vom Zwecke Jesu und seiner Jünger. It is not easy to exaggerate the sensation caused by it, for Reimarus had applied the rationalist principles without regard to the susceptibilities of the public.

b Jesus, so he tells us, must be stripped of all supernatural qualities. His mission needs to be interpreted by the Messianic ideas current among the Jewish populace at his time. Those ideas were political. Therefore Jesus must be regarded neither as the Son of God nor as a prophet, but as a Jewish Messiah bent upon establishing an earthly kingdom to deliver his people from the Roman yoke. Miracles he never worked. The miraculous events of the gospels were nothing but ordinary cures later magnified and heralded as supernatural occurrences, or were pure inventions. They served to let him appear as great as the prophets of old, to whom the power of performing miracles had 605b been ascribed by the Old Testament writers. That Jesus himself believed his political mission to have been a failure is shown by his words: 'My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?' It was his disciples who changed his idea of an earthly and political Messiahship into that of a spiritual one. To do it successfully they resorted to deception on a grand scale. They stole his body from the tomb and proclaimed that he had risen from the dead. And in order to remove all ignominy from his death, they made it a religious event by declaring that it had been the death of a suffering and spiritual redeemer. Of course, they are also the inventors of the miracles in the gospels. Therefore, not Jesus, but his disciples founded the Christian religion. As might be expected, the final judgement which Reimarus passes on the gospel is not friendly. According to him the entire gospel is nothing but a clever piece of fraud.

e The objections against Reimarus's interpretation of the gospel story are fairly obvious. Reimarus makes it the basis of his work that miracles are impossible. Yet, this is in flagrant opposition to any sound philosophy, which, in admitting the omnipotence of God, must likewise admit the possibility of miracles. Further, that Jesus necessarily adopted the current ideas of a political Messiah, is a postulate without any foundation. Reimarus approaches the question of the historical value of the gospels with definite prejudices, namely, that Jesus was not divine and that he cannot have had other ideas about the Messiahship than Reimarus permits. Such a method does not lead to explaining, but to explaining away. No wonder that Reimarus even fails to explain how the grandiose deception on the part of the disciples was possible.

Reimarus's attempts at depicting the historical Jesus set the general pattern in accordance with which many of the subsequent Lives of Jesus were written. We need not discuss here those authors who went so far as to assert that Jesus never existed. The evidence of the gospels, of St Paul, the Apostolic Fathers, the Talmud, Josephus Flavius, of Tacitus, Suetonius and Pliny are sufficient to dispel any doubt as regards the existence of Our Lord. No serious scholar and, for that matter, no sound-minded man will pay attention to books in which scepticism gets the better of an author's wits.

d Of little more interest nowadays are the critics of the early 19th cent. who were influenced by Kant's doctrine then gaining ground on all sides. In 1793 Kant had published his Religion within the bounds of mere reason, in which he set down the rule that we should not ask what the evangelists had actually written, but what they should have written in conformity with the demands of a purely natural religion. Such an approach, he said, even if it should do violence to the text, would be better than a literal interpretation (Ed. Cassirer, vol. 6, p 255). Kant, true to himself, repeats the axiom of Protagoras that man is the measure of all things, and lends his hand to mould God to the image and likeness of man. The result was a number of rationalist and naturalist Lives of Jesus, in which Christ was depicted as a simple, good-living citizen. This was in perfect accordance with Kant's ideas. For he had taught that secularist morality was identical with religion.

e A new event profoundly affecting the study of the gospels was Das Leben Jesu kritisch bearbeitet by David Friedrich Strauss, published in two volumes in 1835-1836. His method can briefly be summarized by stating that he reduces to myth whatever bears the hallmark of the extraordinary in the gospels. He is not the originator of the mythological method. There were others before him who employed it. But he certainly is its greatest exponent.

Strauss distinguishes two classes of the evangelical myth, the pure myth and the historical myth. The existence of the pure myth he assigns to two causes. One of them is the prophetic portrait of the Messiah in the books of the Old Testament. This portrait was minutely elaborated during the centuries between the Babylonian exile and the time of Jesus.

605e The decisive step that accounts for the existence of the gospels took place when the portrait of the Messiah was projected upon Jesus and he was increasingly identified with it. Then the second cause came into play, consisting in the impression made by the character, deeds and fate of Jesus, and modifying the Old Testament portrait of the Messiah in the minds of the people. In opposition to the pure myth, the historical myth is based on a historical fact embellished to mythical proportions by the use of elements taken from the messianic portrait of the Old Testament.

f In order to allow for the development of the gospel myth Strauss holds that the present gospels originated at a rather late date, i.e. in the middle of the 2nd cent. In this he follows his teacher, F. C. Baur, of whom we are going to speak presently. It must be kept in mind that the growth of myth and legend that surrounds many a historic person, requires a considerable amount of time. Supposing that the synoptic gospels were written within the three decades after the death of Christ, the mythical theory would have to be ruled out of court. This was perfectly understood by Strauss. Therefore he presumes a late date for the gospels.

Strauss maintains that in the name of history the myth of Jesus must be exposed, but he expressly affirms that he does not intend to do away with Christianity altogether. In the Concluding Dissertation of his Life of Jesus he endeavours to rebuild by philosophical speculation what, so it seems to him, he has destroyed by historical criticism. To achieve his purpose he uses Hegel's thought laid down in the latter's Phenomenology of the Mind and Philosophy of Religion. The religious idea taken in the Hegelian sense is independent of historical phenomena. The infinite spirit of God and the finite spirit of man are identical. The infinite spirit is true, but not real, whereas the finite spirit is real, but not true. The true and real existence of the spirit is obtained in the identity of the infinite and finite spirit, that is in God-man. God-man means the whole human race. But there remains an opposition between the finite and infinite that leads to conflict, suffering and death of the God-man. That the final unity may be achieved, a way must lead back from death. It does so, in resurrection and ascension. These difficult ideas need to be shown to the simple-minded in a historical figure to whom is attributed by way of myth what in the realm of philosophy is expressed in abstract ideas.

g It is clear that owing to an unsound philosophical tradition Strauss is under a bias as regards supernatural events. In accepting so late a date as 150 for the origin of the gospels he stands in downright opposition to facts, as will become clear in the course of this article. Between the death of Christ and the composition of the gospels there was actually no time for the development of myth. Moreover, on his own suppositions Strauss fails to give a satisfactory explanation why it was Jesus who was identified with the Messianic portrait of the Old Testament in the belief of the people. There have been other men who pretended to be Messiahs. At the time of the second Jewish war (132-5) there was Bar Kochba. He was proclaimed as Messias by R. Akiba, one of the most famous rabbis of all times, and enjoyed the full support of the Pharisees. But posterity did not crown him with the wreath of Messianic myths. Surely there must have been something supernatural in the character and life of Jesus to prompt people to identify him with the Messiah who had been foretold by the prophets of old.

606a We must call attention now to the teacher of D. F. Strauss, Ferdinand Christian Baur, the founder of the younger Protestant school of Tuebingen. Of the many books he wrote his Kritische Untersuchungen ueber die kanonischen Evangelien, 1847, must be mentioned here. Whereas Strauss had borrowed mainly from Hegel's philosophy of religion, Baur makes ample use of both Hegel's philosophy of religion and philosophy of history. According to the German idealist, historical developments proceed in the rhythm of thesis, antithesis and synthesis, that is to say, a historical fact, in which a certain tendency finds its embodiment (thesis) and calls its opposite (antithesis) into existence. The ensuing conflict between both leads finally to a higher unity (synthesis), wherein both are brought into harmony with each other. Baur applies this doctrine in his explanation of the development of Christianity. He tells us that there was a profound antagonism between the followers of St Peter, who were Judaizing particularists, and the followers of St Paul, who were anti-Judaizing universalists. At the time when the conflict reached its climax the Petrine faction produced the Apocalypse, the epistle of St James and the Aramaic gospel according to the Hebrews. Paul, the leader of the opposite faction, wrote four epistles (Gal, 1 & 2 Cor, Rom) which are his only authentic ones. The gospels in their present form no longer show the same marked opposition as the documents just mentioned. We have, therefore, to assume that they are of a later date. Baur assigns their origin to the years 130-70, when the opposite tendencies of the Petrine and Pauline faction fell into abeyance and a kind of compromise was being reached. According to Baur the chronological order of the gospels is Matthew, Luke, Mark, John. The reasons for the rearrangement of the traditional order are as follows. Matthew still shows a trace of the Judaizing tendency, while Luke bears the stamp of Paulinism. Mark is neutral and, therefore, must have been written after Matthew and Luke. The latest gospel is that called after St John, which is both neutral and more advanced in doctrine than Mark. The implication of so late a dating is, of course, that the gospels were written by unknown writers and not by those whose names they bear.

Baur was enormously successful. Although widely abandoned with the advent of the historico-critical school, his ideas were kept alive right into the 20th cent. by some Dutch critics.

Baur's historical method is too much influenced by Hegelian thought. To look everywhere for the verification of the dialectic process from thesis to antithesis and synthesis leads finally to the construction of situations which need not have existed at all. In fact, there is no documentary evidence for the violent opposition between a Petrine and Pauline faction as alleged by Baur. The gospels not only betray no trace of it, but as Harnack rightly pointed out show all the signs of primitive Christian tradition, a fact which had been overlooked by Baur. He makes also too little of the evidence provided by the early Christian writers. The evidence is quite clear and outspoken. Not only did the Apostolic Fathers allude to our canonical gospels, but Papias, c 120, reports the words of the Elder who almost certainly is identical with John the Apostle. We are told that Matthew wrote in Hebrew (= Aramaic) and that Mark, the interpreter of Peter, wrote down what Peter had preached in Rome about Jesus. For accurate information about Papias I must refer the reader to Dom Chapman's John the Presbyter and the Fourth Gospel, 1911. But our chief witness is St Irenaeus. For he knew the tradition of Asia Minor, where he came from, of Rome and Gaul. Besides, he was conversant with the writings of Papias, and as a youth had heard St Polycarp the disciple of the Apostle John. He again c 185 testifies to the authenticity of the gospels and to the order in which they were written. It is the traditional order. In all this he is supported by the tradition of Italy, Africa and Alexandria as represented by St Justin († c 165), the old Latin prologues, the Muratorian fragment (c 180), Tertullian († 220), Clement of Alexandria († c 215) and Origen († 253).

About the dates of the gospels Baur is absolutely mistaken. From the ending of the Acts of the Apostles we can deduce that they were written before St Paul was released from his long captivity in 63. In the introductory verses to Ac St Luke refers to his gospel as already written. Hence the year 60 is the approximate date of it. The second gospel was com-

606e posed when Peter preached at Rome, i.e. between 55 and 58. Before that time Matthew, the first evangelist, wrote. For John's gospel the year 90 indicates roughly the date of its origin (cf. §§ 678a, 725d, 744f, 777-9).

Baur's disciples saw the one-sidedness of their master's approach to the gospel problem, and slowly began to take stock of the evidence provided by the early Christian writers.

d Here is the place to insert a short account of the Vie de Jésus, 1863, by Ernest Renan, not indeed because Renan's scholarly merits are by any means outstanding, but rather because his Life of Jesus enjoyed an unrivalled popularity and is much read even today. Renan's was an artistic temperament. Viewed from a literary angle there are passages of great beauty in his book, though sometimes marred by a saccharine sweetness not infrequently met with in devout pictures imported from France.

Renan made use of a more advanced criticism. The gospels, he thinks, are on the whole authentic, at least the discourses in Mt came from St Matthew's pen and the anecdotes in Mk were written by St Mark himself. He does not doubt the authenticity of the third gospel. St John is blamed for having substituted obscure metaphysics for the simple words of Jesus.

In its general trend the Life of Jesus betrays the influence of Strauss as Renan himself candidly admits. But instead of Strauss' Messianic myth he introduces the pious legend to account for the supernatural in the gospel stories. 'That the gospels are in part legendary, is evident, since they are full of miracles and the supernatural.' The rationalist principle that miracles do not happen is of unquenchable vitality. Under Renan's hands Jesus is again pedantically deprived of all that belongs to the sphere of the supernatural and extraordinary, and is turned into 'l'homme idéal'.

e Of the greatest import for higher criticism was the advent of the so-called historico-critical school that originated in the circles of liberal Protestantism. It might be useful to sketch the philosophical background of that brand of Protestantism in order to enable the reader better to appreciate an attitude of mind which at times seems rather reckless. In the beginning of the 19th cent. Friedrich Schleiermacher had made the attempt to save religion in the philosophical revolution then taking place. He thought it imperative to arrive at a compromise with Kantian philosophy. Kant had banished religion from the sphere of theoretical knowledge. Schleiermacher accepted the verdict, identified religion with 'mysticism' and made it a function of sentiment. In England this doctrine was developed by S. T. Coleridge, F. D. Maurice and f Matthew Arnold. In Germany Albrecht Ritschl became the champion of religious sentiment. As he is the founder of liberal Protestantism he naturally influenced the theology of the historico-critical school. A central position in Ritschl's system is held by the 'judgements of value'. He maintains that religious judgements are independent judgements of value based exclusively on the feelings of approbation or disapprobation. These feelings are elicited by religious conceptions which are approved of or disapproved of according to whether the conceptions stand in relationship to the highest good, the kingdom of God, or not. Religious conceptions which arouse the feeling of approbation are of religious value and worthy of becoming objects of faith. The question whether they have objective reality is neither of import nor capable of solution. Considering the doctrinal basis of liberal Protestantism one understands the famous distinction between the Christ of history and the Christ of faith, a distinction which is voiced, wherever higher criticism has established itself. The implication in the distinction is this. If from the standpoint of historical research Christ must be reduced to insignificant proportions, his importance remains nevertheless untouched from the standpoint of religious value. No wonder that liberal Protestants treated the gospels and the Christ of history at times very recklessly. After all, in their opinion no harm could be done to religion, since it was not based on history. 606f

g Within the circles of liberal Protestantism the so-called historico-critical school came into prominence in the field of higher criticism. While hitherto the Lives of Jesus had kept pride of place in the literary activity of the critics, a noticeable change occurred now, as the interest was shifted to more literary problems. The greatest representative of the historico-critical school was Adolph von Harnack (†1930) whose reputation became international. The intensive study of the literary aspects began roughly about 1870. English scholars took a very active part and the names of many of them became known abroad. Nevertheless, with a few exceptions, it would be wrong to assign them to any definite school, such as the historico-critical school, since they either kept aloof from subscribing to any of the philosophical systems which formed the backbone of the current schools, or remained more independent and conservative in their criticism. It is worth mentioning that Harnack subjected the dates of the gospels to fresh investigation. He assigned Luke to the year 60 and Mark to the preceding decade. Matthew he inclined to place later than 70. His authority was such that his results were accepted by many. Nevertheless others objected on the ground that the prophecies of the destruction of Jerusalem in Mark and Luke made it imperative to assign those gospels to a time after the actual destruction. According to rationalist premises prophecies, too, do not happen. Harnack's opinion coincided with the rationalist slogan, but he thought it possible that at the time of the composition of Mark and Luke the destruction of Jerusalem no longer lay beyond the limits of a clever guess.

In what follows I propose to sketch the treatment by higher critics of certain literary questions in such a way that the reader may be introduced to the opinions which are now current. 607a

In connexion with the synoptic problem heated discussions had raged as to whose gospel was chronologically the first. As we saw in the beginning of this article, the priority of Mark had its defenders as far back as the 18th cent. It was, however, Christian Hermann Weisse in 1838, who tried to find a more solid basis for that hypothesis. His arguments were perfected by Heinrich J. Holtzmann in the latter's Die synoptischen Evangelien, 1863. Harnack and his school followed him. The acceptance of the priority of Mark by men like F. C. Burkitt, Sir John Hawkins, Dr W. Sanday and Canon B. H. Streeter made the hypothesis popular in England. Today the priority of Mark is considered as an established fact by the higher critics. I shall here set out the main arguments for the priority of Mark and shall suggest their weakness in each case.

First argument (considered by Holtzmann as the chief argument) : Nearly the whole matter reported in Mark can be read in Matthew, and half of the matter is included in Luke. That goes to show that both Matthew and Luke borrowed from Mark, which fact necessitates the priority of Mark. b

But Mark could equally well have borrowed from Matthew, since nearly the whole of Mark's matter is contained in Matthew. The more detailed description of certain events in Mark is accounted for by the information which Mark received from St Peter.

Second argument : The order of events in Mark is to a great extent the same as in Matthew and Luke. When Matthew differs from Mark, Mark is upheld by Luke, and vice versa, when Luke differs from Mark, Mark is upheld by Matthew. This again shows that Mark was used as a model by Matthew and Luke alike.

But Mark can have followed Matthew and can have made some changes in the order of events for reasons of his own. Luke on the other hand, instead of following Matthew, could have followed Mark where the latter differs from Matthew. Sometimes Luke follows neither Matthew nor Mark.

607e Third argument: Supposing the priority of Mark, one can nearly always explain why a certain event is not recorded either in Matthew or Luke. But if the priority of Mark is denied and Mark is supposed to have utilized Matthew, no satisfactory reason can be given for the omission of certain events in Mark.

No one will assume that St Mark, the interpreter of St Peter, wrote down in his gospel all the events of which he had knowledge. Therefore, even on the supposition of the priority of Mark there must be a reason why he omitted to record certain events. That reason remains a satisfactory reason for the omissions, even when the priority of Mark is denied.

Fourth argument: The style of Mark is rather uncouth, while that of Matthew and Luke is rather polished. There is a strong indication that Matthew and Luke have improved upon the style of Mark. Some Aramaic words are contained in Mark, whereas Matthew and Luke omit them nearly always. Further, Matthew and Luke show more urbanity of expression than Mark, when referring to Christ or the Apostles.

d These and similar details of style in Mark are satisfactorily explained by Mark's having been the interpreter of Peter. Mark could have used the gospel according to St Matthew and at the same time recorded certain events as he had heard them from St Peter. It is arbitrary to suppose that anyone who copies from another writer must necessarily improve upon the latter's style. The opposite may happen. But there is no evidence to show that our Greek translation of Matthew was already in existence. Perhaps Mark used the Aramaic original. Nothing, therefore, can be deduced from his uncouth Greek.

There are some other minor arguments for the priority of Mark. But it is fair to say that they run on the same lines as those just mentioned. With particular reference to the last argument based on Mark's style, Canon Streeter states that he is unable to comprehend how anyone can retain the slightest doubt of the original and primitive character of Mark. However, if Canon Streeter and, for that matter, the other higher critics had examined the synoptic gospels with a broader attitude of mind, they would have soon discovered the boomerang-quality of their proofs. There are clearly two different possibilities of explaining the facts which the higher critics try to turn to their advantage. The question which of the gospels is the oldest, is a historical question. The choice between the two possibilities should be guided by historical evidence which is amply provided in early Christian literature. But historical evidence is in favour of the priority of Matthew.

e The presumption of the higher critics is that one synoptist must have copied from the other; that in the first century people must have had their eyes glued on books, and that similarities can be exhaustively accounted for and must be accounted for by reference to extant written texts. However, it stands to reason that all three synoptic writers may have drawn from oral tradition transmitted in more or less rigid forms, or from lost documents which contained the primitive catechesis of the Church. There are not only similarities, but many dissimilarities in the parts that are common to all three synoptic gospels. And these dissimilarities cannot satisfactorily be explained if the solution be based exclusively on the mutual dependence of the evangelists. The higher critics are inclined to treat the synoptic gospels as a chemical compound which they divide up into the Markan matter, the collection of the sayings of the Lord (Logia, Q) to account for discourses found in Matthew and Luke, but not in Mark; and finally a special source for Matthew and another for Luke to explain those parts which are found only either in Matthew or Luke. Others are even content to derive Matthew's and Luke's material solely from Mark and Q, the latter being a hypothetical source. Such procedure may be in accordance with the requirements of Occam's razor. But when writing the gospels, did the evangelists themselves conform to Occam's razor as understood by the higher critics? To find the right answer in matters such as this a shred of external evidence is more valuable than all speculations built upon internal evidence alone, cf. §§ 610-5.

A few words must be added here about the Logia, a hypothetical document often designated simply as Q. The Logia are supposed to be a collection of the sayings of Jesus, and St Matthew is said to have been its compiler. In the first gospel, so many critics maintain, a substantial part of the Logia of Matthew is embedded. That is why the first gospel is called the gospel according to St Matthew, although, as it stands, it was not written by St Matthew, but by a person or persons unknown. The originator of the Logia-theory was Schleiermacher. He based his proof on the Papias fragment about Matthew: 'Matthew composed the Logia in the Hebrew dialect, and each translated them as he was able'. Schleiermacher maintained that Papias referred to a collection of sayings of Jesus. His theory gained many followers and up to recent times it was based on lexicographical grounds, that is to say, that 'sayings' was considered the right translation of the Greek term 'Logia'. But wrongly so. Fr John Donovan gives the result of his research into the meaning of Logia as follows: 'Hence the inevitable conclusion that Papias was making use of an expression in already fairly common use, and that he used it with that definite meaning, i.e. Christian revelation as couched in the Gospels' (The Logia in Ancient and Recent Literature, 1924, p 37). The Protestant scholar Gerhard Kittel in his Theologisches Woerterbuch zum Neuen Testament, 1938, refers on page 145 to the Logia-theories and states that the appeal to the fragment of Papias must be disallowed. Of course, even if the appeal to the fragment of Papias were given up, the old theory would enjoy a new lease of life through the acceptance of the modern solutions of the synoptic problem in which it is stated that Matthew and Luke are based upon Mark and Q. If apart from the priority of Mark, anyone likes to assume that there existed a collection of the sayings of Jesus before the gospels were written, he is entitled to do so. But if he maintains that St Matthew compiled only those sayings and not the gospel, he is contradicted by historical evidence.

However, in order to defend their theory, many g critics maintain that the present gospel according to St Matthew shows all the characteristics of Hellenistic origin, and therefore can never have existed as an Aramaic original. Such a contention does not square with the facts. Jewish traits are abundant in Matthew's gospel. In its plan, phraseology, use of the Old Testament and general background it clearly indicates that it was written for Jewish readers (cf. Rev. C. Lattey's Introduction to The Gospel according to St Matthew, WV, 1928). Hence, there is nothing to upset the traditional view that Matthew was originally written in Aramaic. On the contrary, it is supported by internal evidence.

In popular writings one can come across the statement that the Aramaic Matthew was identical with the apocryphal 'gospel according to the Hebrews'. The few fragments which have been preserved from this apocryphal book reveal a notable divergence from our Matthew. But it seems that there was sufficient resemblance between the two to make St Jerome think, at least for a time, that it was the original Matthew. Nowadays the 'gospel according to the Hebrews' is generally regarded as a secondary document which was used by a Jewish Christian sect who were known as Nazaraeans (cf. M. R. James, Apocryphal New Testament, 1926, p 1). Hence there is no support for the view that our Greek Matthew is the original work of an unknown writer, who made very free use of the Aramaic gospel according to the Hebrews.

As regards the Johannine question, contemporary h criticism is concerned not so much with the date of the origin of the fourth gospel as with the question of authorship and historicity. After all, the dating will follow automatically if the Johannine authorship is 607h established. In the estimation of higher criticism the Johannine question is still regarded as unsettled. The German radical critics delivered violent and repeated attacks against the Johannine authorship and the historicity of the fourth gospel, with Harnack in the van. That the attacks broke down, or in other words, that the negation of Johannine authorship and of the historicity of the fourth gospel was not commonly accepted by non-Catholic higher critics is due to a group of very able defenders in England: Bishop Lightfoot, Principal J. Drummond, Dr V. H. Stanton and Dr W. Sanday. It is still instructive to read the publications of both parties, and to observe on the one side neglect of all evidence which conflicts with the preconceived scheme, and overstatement of whatever is favourable to it, while on the other the discussion is carried on with a careful weighing of all the available evidence.

1 The radicals made much of the fact that Christian literature in the first half of the second century, and particularly St Justin, show only scanty allusions to the fourth gospel. Had the Apostle John been its author, they argued, it would have been alluded to with the same frequency as the other gospels. As it is, during the period referred to, it cannot have been regarded as of apostolic origin. Drummond provided a telling answer:

'But why then, it may be asked, has Justin not quoted the fourth gospel at least as often as the other three? I cannot tell, any more than I can tell why he has never named the supposed authors of his Memoirs (= gospels), or has mentioned only one of the parables, or made no reference to the Apostle Paul, or nowhere quoted the Apocalypse, though he believed it to be an apostolic and prophetic work. His silence may be due to a pure accident, or the book may have seemed less adapted to his apologetic purposes; but considering how many things there are about which he is silent, we cannot admit that the argumentum a silentio possesses in this case any validity' (Inquiry into the Character and Authorship of the Fourth Gospel, 1903, p 157).

2 From the period preceding St Justin there is St Ignatius of Antioch († c 110), whose thought and style are steeped in the gospel of St John. It is worth while mentioning that in 1935 a papyrus-fragment was published, which contains Jn 18:31-33, 37-38. It shows that St John's gospel was circulating in Middle Egypt in the first half of the second cent. (C. H. Roberts, An unpublished Fragment of the Fourth Gospel). The mere fact that the papyrus was found in that part of the world suggests that it must have been held in repute very early. Incidentally it also does away with theories which propose a late date for the fourth gospel. In this connexion mention should be made of Tatian and Irenaeus. Tatian, a disciple of St Justin, wrote about 170 a gospel harmony, the Diatesseron, in which he made ample use of the fourth gospel and thus testifies to its apostolic origin. St Irenaeus who had so great a knowledge of early Christian tradition clearly establishes the Johannine authorship of the fourth gospel. Unfortunately, he is often treated as if he had been born in the year in which he wrote, or as if the book by Papias and a brief intercourse in his early years with Polycarp had been his only sources. 'It is like Nero wishing that Rome had one neck, in order that it might be cut at a single stroke', writes Dr Sanday.

3 Against the authorship of St John the critics have cited the de Boor fragment (7th or 8th cent.), probably an extract from the chronicle of Philip of Side, who flourished in the 5th cent. The fragment runs as follows: 'Papias says in the second book that John the theologian and his brother James were killed by the Jews'. Georgius Hamartolus (9th cent.) repeats the story of the violent death of John, but lets it take place under the reign of Nerva, after John had written his gospel. The de Boor fragment does not say that James and John died at the same time. Papias may have been commenting on the words of Jesus to the sons of Zebedee that they would drink of the cup from which he himself was to drink. James died as a martyr. And St John had somehow to be turned into a martyr too. Perhaps Papias had only meant to say that his death was hastened by the persecution of the Jews. Whatever the explanation of the de Boor fragment may be, it is certain that St John did not die along with his brother James (in the year 42). The premature death of St John was unknown to Irenaeus, Victorinus and Eusebius who were familiar with the work of Papias, and is clearly contradicted by Ac 12:2, Gal 2:9 and Polycrates. The latter, bishop of Ephesus, wrote c 180 to Pope Victor and claimed John as one of the great lights of Asia who had died there, 'John who lay upon the breast of the Lord and became priest wearing the golden frontlet, and was witness and teacher'. The radical critics appeal also to a Syriac martyrology of the 5th cent., which has recorded under 27th December: 'The Apostles John and James at Jerusalem'. The Syriac martyrology, however, has been shown to be an abridgement of, and a careless translation from a Greek martyrology of the 4th cent. which says nothing to the same effect (V. H. Stanton, The Gospels as Historical Documents, vol. 3, pp 113-7, also John Donovan, S.J., The Authorship of St John's Gospel, 1936).

Of course, the radical critics also find arguments in 1 considerations of internal evidence. However, from the use of the Logos-idea nothing can be deduced that tells against Johannine authorship. Logos-speculation had its roots not only in Greek philosophy; rabbinic learning too, based on the books of wisdom, had developed its hypostasis of a Memra. It was an easy step for Philo to bring about a synthesis of Jewish and Greek thought on that matter. The Gnostics took up the Logos-idea and talked about the first emanation from the divine substance. In a word, the atmosphere was charged with Logos-speculation. No wonder that in the prologue to his gospel St John corrected these ideas, and set down a Christian Logos-doctrine.

Much has been said and written about the style of the fourth gospel, which seems fundamentally different from the simple accounts of the other evangelists. But we must not forget that the fourth gospel is the work of old age. For many years the author had been meditating on the words of Jesus, particularly on those dealing with his divinity and the supernatural life. From the discourses of Our Lord he chose those which served his purpose, to prove the divinity of his Master. And he related them in a manner which is intent more on the doctrinal structure of the discourses than on the actual words in which they were spoken.

However, the radical critics have made up their 2 minds that the fourth gospel is not the account of an eye-witness. Harnack, J. Moffat, B. W. Bacon, etc., bestow the honour of authorship on John the Elder, whom they declare to be different from John the Apostle. Others follow Alfred Loisy. Being a thorough-going allegorist Loisy denies that the fourth gospel gives any history at all. Not even the beloved disciple is a historical person, though the gospel proclaims him as its author. 'He is the young Church, to whom was entrusted the heritage of Judaism and Jewish Christianity'. According to Loisy the real author is unknown, but must be some one of the converts from Jewish Hellenism in Ephesus or Antioch. His theory is fantastic. But the most fantastic theory of all perhaps is given by Dr Robert Eisler in his The Enigma of the Fourth Gospel, 1938. He maintains that the author of the fourth gospel is identical with the Johanan, who in 37 was chosen to act as high-priest by the Roman governor Vitellius. During the revolution of 66 Johanan commanded one of the five Jewish armies occupying Gophnitis and Acrabatene. After the destruction of Jerusalem, however, he settled down in Ephesus, adopted some kind of Christianity and produced the fourth gospel, with Marcion (the Luther of the 2nd cent.) as his secretary. Dr Eisler's notes of triumph bring to mind nothing so much as the blaring fanfares of a travelling circus—so far removed 607m are they from the true notes of sound higher criticism.

It might be worth while mentioning that at the present time there seems to be a growing tendency to establish an Alexandrian provenance for the fourth gospel.

608a A short account must now be given of the Proto-Luke hypothesis, all the more as it has its origin in England. Canon B. H. Streeter was the first to state it in an article in the Hibbert Journal for October 1921. It was more fully expounded in his The Four Gospels: A Study of Origins, 1924, and in Dr Vincent Taylor's book, Behind the Third Gospel, 1926.

Canon Streeter points out that in Luke we find a number of sections which are independent of Mark and must, therefore, be derived from other sources; the sections are Lk 3:1-4:30; 6:20-8:3; 9:51-18:14; 19:1-27; and the accounts of the Last Supper, of the Passion, the Resurrection and the appearances. Now Streeter's contention is that all these sections taken together form a complete gospel, the Proto-Luke. He is inclined to regard St Luke as its author. 'The non-Markan sections represent a single document, and to Luke this was the framework into which he inserted, at convenient places, extracts from Mark'. Chapters 1 and 2 were taken from a special source. So far his hypothesis is a brilliant piece of work, although remaining in the realm of mere probabilities. In elaborating Streeter's theory Dr Taylor assigns Proto-Luke to the years 60-5. Mark he dates about the year 68. In this manner the final composition of St Luke's gospel would have to be placed in the eighth decade of the first cent. In fact, Canon Streeter assigns it to the year 80. Those dates are too late, as may be gathered from what we had to say about the dating of the gospels on a previous page.

b I must now take the reader back to the beginning of this century to recall certain important events which have not yet been mentioned. When the priority of Mark was accepted by the leading lights of higher criticism and by the rank and file as well, a new vista seemed to be opened to the writers of the Lives of Jesus. If Mark was the source of the other synoptic gospels, then, it was said, he must be nearest to historical truth, and consequently every future Life of Jesus must needs be based upon him. The older authors at once became antiquated from the critical point of view, because they had drawn from other gospels as well. But as events were to show, not even Mark escaped unscathed. In his Das Messias-Geheimnis in den Evangelien, 1901, W. Wrede criticized the rationalist method. For it had induced people to consider as historical in the narrative only what they could understand, and to explain away all that bore the stamp of the supernatural. But, so Wrede's contention ran, Mark himself did not make any such distinction. Hence, every passage would be controversial from the point of view of historical truth. Wrede does not deny that Mark had historical matter at his disposal. But at the time when Mark wrote, the portrait of Jesus had already been idealized and altered by the early Christian community. Mark then arranged and interpreted his material in accordance with his own theological ideas and the beliefs of the Christian community. Henceforth, in criticism, it would be necessary to distinguish carefully between the historical material that had been transformed by, and according to, the beliefs of the community, and the redaction of the evangelist which had been guided by theological ideas. The reader will notice how Strauss's evangelical myth begins to reappear in disguise.

c J. Wellhausen went a step further. His theory is as follows. Mark's gospel consists of little narratives which had been written independently of each other. The older a narrative is the less its historical content has suffered from transformation by the community and the nearer it is to historical truth. Mark collected the narratives and cemented them together by passages which are of his own invention. But this is not all.

His book was repeatedly revised; so that in our present gospel we no longer possess the Ur-Mark, the primitive Mark. It is, therefore, imperative to distinguish the following parts in the gospel: old layers and new layers of tradition, and the several layers of cement put in by subsequent editorial redactions. So far so good. But who was to disentangle truth from fiction, history from theology? The road which was meant to lead to historical certainty ended in bewilderment and scepticism. Of course, it is quite arbitrary to assert that in his gospel Mark only wrote about the ideas of the early Christian community, but not about the historical Christ; more arbitrary to presume that the early Christians had lost interest in the historical portrait of their Master. In fact, as has been seen, Mark wrote the recollections of St Peter, who had been an eye-witness, precisely to satisfy the historical interest of the Christians. Anyhow, Wrede and Wellhausen led up to a development which reached its height in the eschatological school (as represented by Albert Schweitzer) and in the school of form-criticism.

Along with the critical studies just sketched went research into the meaning of the kingdom of God. Ritschl's system had become very popular, and the idea of the kingdom of God held an important part in it. No wonder that during the last two decades of the 19th cent. a number of monographs had been published about the exegetical meaning of the kingdom of God. A number of scholars based their investigation on the supposition that in his Messianic ideas Christ cannot have been different from the rest of the Jewish people. Here a principle of Reimarus was taken up again. Further, they presumed that the Messianic ideas current at the time of Jesus must be looked for in the Jewish apocryphal writings. Accordingly, it was maintained that Jesus thought of the kingdom of God as a new era to be brought about by a cataclysm in which the present world would be destroyed. He never considered himself as the Messiah of an earthly, but of an eschatological kingdom.

In his book The Quest of the Historical Jesus, 1926² (first German ed. in 1906), Albert Schweitzer synthesized the eschatological interpretation and the advanced criticism of Wrede and Wellhausen. The message he has to give is a message of scepticism. There is no hope, he proclaims, that we shall ever discover the historical Christ in the contradictory passages of Mark. The only thing we know is that Jesus preached the eschatological kingdom of God which he at first thought would be realized during his life-time. Then the conviction dawned upon him that he must suffer for others, so that the kingdom might come. The ethics preached by Jesus were a provisional code for the short interval that separated the world from its destruction. Thus by a peculiar use of external evidence Schweitzer turns the kingdom of God into an eschatological dream. And by a peculiar neglect of external evidence he denies the historical truth in Mark. The way in which Schweitzer tries to accord Jesus a place in the religious life of man, belongs to the mysteries of a philosophy whose avowed purpose it is to do away with mysteries. Schweitzer concludes his book by saying: 'He (Jesus) commands. And to those who obey Him, whether they be wise or simple, He will reveal Himself in the toils, the conflicts, the sufferings which they shall pass through in His fellowship, and, as an ineffable mystery, they shall learn in their own experience Who He is'.

A straight line leads from Wellhausen's analytical experiments to form-criticism (Formgeschichte), the chief representatives of which are Martin Dibelius and Robert Bultmann. In England form-criticism has found a friend in Prof. Robert Henry Lightfoot (History and Interpretation in the Gospels, Bampton Lectures, 1934). The form-critics accept the thesis that not only Mark, but all the synoptic gospels, consist of independent units artificially linked together. The units themselves are considered to have been handed down by way of oral tradition until they were committed to paper. Just as the faith of the early Christians 'developed', so the 600a units underwent a transformation which kept pace with the growth of the ideas of the community. In fact, the student of these units does not directly deal with the historical Jesus, but with opinions which prevailed among the early Christians. The first task to be performed is to take the units out of the gospel-frame and to class them in different categories as their literary form may require. The following categories are of importance: the paradigm (Dibelius) or apophthegm (Bultmann), Novelle (Dibelius) or miracle-story (Bultmann), parenthesis and legend. The paradigm or apophthegm is a narrative leading up to a word of Jesus in such a manner that Christ's saying is clearly the chief feature, Mk 2:1-12; 3:1-6. The Novelle or miracle-story relates an act of power; the incident itself remains the main subject of the narrative, Mk 1:40-45; 4:35-41. The parenthesis is concerned with isolated words of Jesus spoken for the instruction of the people, as the Sermon on the Mount and the parables. Legends, of course, are of no historical significance whatsoever. They are met with in the stories of the infancy of Jesus, of the resurrection, etc. Now the supposition is that by studying the form of a narrative it is possible to discover its primitive content and to strip it of subsequent growths. For it is held as a principle that primitive literary expression is made in one of the categories just described. The form-critic, of course, must endeavour to establish the typical form of each category. By comparison he will recognize what elements in a narrative conform with its type and will consider them as parts of the original story, while he will remove such elements as are alien to the pure type. When this has been done, the form-critic looks for the 'Sitz im Leben' of the different categories. 'Sitz im Leben' is perhaps best translated as a permanent situation of the Christian community conditioned by special aims which are embodied in missionary and catechetical activity, worship of the religious hero, or in apologetic defence.

600b Dibelius allows that the sayings of Jesus were handed down by oral tradition, whereas Bultmann seems to maintain that in the beginning of the Christian community a collection of edifying sayings was made for teaching purposes, which only later were put into the mouth of Jesus. According to Dibelius the historicity of the paradigm depends on the knowledge and the intention of the preacher. But although the paradigm clearly belongs to the time of primitive preaching it does not therefore necessarily represent objective truth. After all, the preacher had to persuade his audience, a fact that forced him to adapt his stories to his aim and to exclude neutral objectivity. Bultmann derives his apophthegms mainly from the discussions of the Palestine Christian community. After analyzing the apophthegms he is convinced that many of them were originally isolated sayings subsequently put into a 600c fictitious setting. Only when the words cannot be understood without the scene we have to consider them as one complete conception. Writing about the Novellen Dibelius assigns their 'Sitz im Leben' to a tendency to show the superiority of Jesus in relation to pagan gods. For they too were believed to have performed miraculous healings. About the historicity of the Novellen he says only that they are further removed from historical truth than the paradigms. With this Bultmann agrees. He also thinks that the miracle-stories are of Hellenistic origin and must have later penetrated into Christian tradition.

d In the description of the literary form of the gospel units the form-critics have shown much shrewdness. But in their conclusions they are as arbitrary as possible. The whole theory of Dibelius and Bultmann is built on the supposition that the early Christians had no biographical interest in the life of Jesus and that a strange transformation of the portrait of Jesus occurred at a time when plenty of eye-witnesses were still alive. Sic volo, sic jubeo. External evidence is absolutely neglected by the form-critics. Instead we meet with a welter of unfounded hypotheses put down as facts with a breath-taking naivety (cf. Laurence J. McGinley, S.J., Form-Criticism of the Synoptic Healing Narratives, 1944).

e Here our hurried journey along the highways and byways of higher criticism is over. Literary criticism of the gospels is a useful study if carried out in the right spirit and guided by sound principles. For it allows us to see or, at least, to guess how the evangelists set to work when they produced the books which have been the inspiration and consolation of untold numbers of Christians. Such a study quite naturally carries its heavy weight of responsibility and should not be considered as the obvious ground on which to erect sensational, but unfounded theories. The radical brand of higher criticism has failed to be guided by sound principles of investigation. It draws its life from the obsolete speculations of a rationalist era, and clings desperately to its dogma of the impossibility of miracles. Proceeding from such a philosophical bias its historical method is of necessity vitiated. External evidence is often neglected altogether if it is seen to lead to conclusions that are contrary to the tenets of rationalism. Or, if some obscure and questionable evidence can be turned to the support of radical views, it is chosen in preference to the clear utterances of trustworthy and venerable writers. Higher criticism has suffered under its own arbitrary method. No lasting achievement can be gained in the historical field, if research is not guided by safe principles. That is why we perceive a continuous flow of divergent views in higher criticism. Higher criticism set out to destroy confidence in the gospels, but on a balanced view of the evidence, it has only succeeded in destroying confidence in itself.

THE SYNOPTIC PROBLEM

b The Synoptic Problem is posed for us by the similarities between the first three Gospels, leading us to ask whether any, and if so what, connexions, literary or oral, direct or indirect, between these Gospels or any two of them must be supposed to have given rise to some of these similarities. The facts may be stated in summary fashion as follows:

A Through a total of about 200 verses, mainly comprising discourse and scattered about in various parts of the Gospels, there runs a strong similarity or even virtual identity, between Mt and Lk, in content, presentation and language, but there are no parallels for most of these verses in Mk. They constitute what we shall here describe as the 'Q' material or the 'Q' passages.

c B (1) Mk contains 673 verses. The substance of over 600 of these is found also in Mt, and of about 350 of them in Lk.

(2) Where a section of Mk has parallels in both Mt and Lk, the majority of Mk's actual Greek words is usually found in both Mt and Lk, or at least in one of them. And where a section of Mk is paralleled in only one of the other two, there still remains a marked parallelism of wording and phraseology between Mk and the parallel Gospel. This parallelism of wording and content is combined with a similarity of approach to the incidents recorded that comes out most clearly if contrasted with Jn's highly individual approach.

(3) The order of Mk's sections or incidents is generally found also in Mt or Lk or in both.

(4) Where all three Gospels are parallel, there is frequent agreement of all three in wording, etc. There is also frequent agreement of Mt and Mk with disagreement of Lk, and of Mk and Lk with disagreement of Mt. But the agreements of Mt and Lk with disagreement of Mk are strikingly rare.

(For the above summary I am largely indebted to B. H. Streeter, The Four Gospels, a Study of Origins.)

d The full force of these data is only appreciated when the original Greek text of the three Gospels is carefully studied, set out if possible in parallel columns with Mk as the middle column. The extent of similarity is too great to be explained by identity of purpose and coincidence. Some hypothesis of connexion is necessary. And such connexion may be direct or indirect. Thus, if documents X and Y are connected, the reason may be either that the author of one used the other, or that X or Y was used in oral teaching by some unknown person, whose oral teaching then became the source of Y or X. And obviously the missing link might be not oral teaching but a document

Z, copied from X or Y and itself copied by Y or X. Or again, such oral teaching or document Z might be the common source of X and Y. 610d

It should be taken as a principle of scientific documentary criticism that non-extant conjectural sources are not to be supposed, if a hypothesis of direct connexions will satisfy the internal evidence without violence. Thus at one stage of synoptic study it was suggested that the cases, relatively few, where Mt and Lk, though parallel to Mk, yet show agreements against Mk, might be partially explained on the hypothesis of a lost second edition of Mk. But the difference between the two editions would have been slight and this is now a generally discarded hypothesis, though the agreements mentioned still require explanation or removal. On the other hand, the conjecture that the Q passages are to be explained by appeal to a conjectural lost document has found wide favour and is dealt with in the next section.

A purely oral theory can hardly do justice to the character and extent of the parallels and similarities; and it must suppose a Greek oral tradition more rigidly fixed than we have any right to assume. Moreover it is equivalent, critically speaking, to the hypothesis that all three Gospels are derived, in their Marcan sections, from an Ur-Evangelium, a conjectural lost original Gospel. Now it can be shown that such an Ur-Evangelium must turn out to be indistinguishable from either Mt or Mk or Lk:

For a careful consideration of the evidence referred to in B(4) above shows that Mt and Lk, though connected in the passages where both are parallel to Mk, are not directly connected with each other but indirectly by means of a document or oral teaching practically identical with Mk. Otherwise we cannot explain why the agreements of Mt and Lk against Mk are not nearly as frequent as those of each with Mk against the other—in fact the former set of agreements is relatively so small that reputable scholars have tried to remove or explain them all away. Indirect connexion by means of a document or oral teaching practically indistinguishable from Mk means either that both Mt and Lk used such a source or that such a document used either Mt or Lk (or something indistinguishable) and was itself used by the remaining Gospel of the three. Thus we should be driven to hold that the oral tradition used by all three Evangelists was practically indistinguishable from one of them; i.e. that one of the Evangelists succeeded in preserving the tradition exactly and each of the others only with considerable modification. Such a conjectural source is thus critically worthless and an unjustifiable hypothesis. Most students who will take the trouble to study the evidence in detail will further agree that it does not adequately deal with the facts available.

Alternative Solutions—We have seen that the similarities between the first three Gospels may be due either to a common oral catechesis or to written documents or to dependence of two of them on the third or to a mixture of all these factors. The main solutions are:

(1) The Traditional Solution, according to which Mark depends on Matthew in the main, and the 610g chronological order of writing was Matthew, Mark, Luke; cf. Aug. De Cons. Evang., 1, 2, 4 (PL 34, 1044). This is the solution vindicated in the course of the present article against its chief rival.

(2) The Two-Document Hypothesis, which is maintained in substance by almost all non-Catholic scholars at the present day (though with some doubts as to the unitary nature of 'Q'), and its elaboration in the Four-Document Hypothesis of Streeter (op. cit.) and V. Taylor; cf. also §§ 604e, 607a-g.

h (3) Other recent solutions (based on varying degrees of literary dependence and oral tradition), which deserve mention as having found favour with many Catholic scholars anxious to reconcile the priority of Mt (§ 679a-f) with the Two-Document Hypothesis, are:

(a) Mk and Lk depend on Aramaic Mt, Mk also on St Peter's catechetical teaching, Lk also on Mt (Vannutelli); (b) dependence of Mt, Mk and Lk on a more or less fixed oral catechesis (Lattey and others); (c) dependence of Aramaic Mt and of Mk on oral catechesis; of Mt on Mk; and of Lk on Mk and parts of Mt (Vosté and others); a partial dependence of Mk on Aramaic Mt is admitted as possible by Simon-Dorado and others, and a full dependence is thought possible by Merk and others). A history of the Synoptic Problem and a survey of proposed solutions will be found in Cornely-Merk, Compendium Introductionis; it should, however, be noticed that modern English non-Catholic scholarship looks back to Lachmann (1835) as the decisive figure in the history of the problem, which is not discussed by the Fathers, except for a statement of St Augustine (supra cit.) that Mk appears to be an abbreviation of Mt.

i It may be well to point out that, except the Two-Document Hypothesis with its descendants and the Traditional Solution as restated in this article (for which see also Jameson and Chapman, op. cit.), few of the proposed solutions take due note of the crucial fact of the relative non-agreement of Mt and Lk 'against Mk' in the main body of the material common to all three evangelists. It is this fact that makes it extremely difficult to deny dependence as between Mt and Mk. The errors of the Two-Document Hypothesis are due to the fact that, while misinterpreting this crucial datum, it does not push far enough the detailed comparison of Mt and Lk in the 'Q' passages and of Mt and Mk, and in consequence reaches conclusions that are inconsistent with the external evidence.

An initial difficulty in accepting the Traditional Solution arises from the hypothesis of the existence of Q. If Q does not exist or can be shown to be identical with Mt, then the way is clear to proving Mk's dependence on Mt. The topics will therefore be treated in this order.

I. The So-called Q Passages

611a Most modern scholars outside the Church adopt the Two-Document Hypothesis as the fundamental solution of the Synoptic Problem. This hypothesis explains the facts summarized in § 610c by supposing that Mk is the earliest of the extant Gospels and that it was copied independently by the authors of Mt and Lk. This supposition may be expressed diagrammatically thus:

As was pointed out above, the relative absence of agreements of Mt and Lk against Mk throughout the sections where all three Gospels run parallel drives us to accept either the connection expressed in the above diagram or one of the two following:

611a

In other words, Mk must be the connecting link between Mt and Lk in what we may call their Marcan sections. But the alternatives (a), (b) and (c) are all equally probable on the evidence as so far stated.

The Two-Document Hypothesis then proceeds to explain the Q material by supposing that Mt and Lk depend separately on a document, conjectured but not known to have existed and commonly called 'Q', which contained mainly sayings and discourses of our Lord. This must have been a Greek document, as the wording of the Q passages in Mt and Lk is often identical or so closely similar as to rule out the supposition of independent translation from a non-Greek original. Thus for the Q passages we should have the following diagram of relationship:

We have however already observed that a non-extant document ought not to be conjectured if the data can be satisfactorily explained without recourse to it. We therefore ask whether Mt and Lk may not be directly connected in the Q passages, and the following arguments tend to show that in fact Lk is directly dependent on Mt.

(1) If Q existed its subject-matter to some extent overlapped that of Mk. For there are five passages where all three Gospels are connected but where agreements between Mt and Lk against Mk are too numerous to be regarded as coincidences, so that connection through Mk will not satisfy the data: (a) Mk 4:30-32 cf. Mt 13:31-33 and Lk 13:18-21; (b) Mk 9:42 cf. Mt 18:6, 7 and Lk 17:16, 2; (c) Mk 3:23-30 cf. Mt 12:25-32 and Lk 11:17-23, 12:10; (d) Mk 6:8-11 cf. Mt 10:9-14 and Lk 10:4-11; (e) Mk 12:28-34 cf. Mt 22:34-40 and Lk 10:25-28.

The phenomena to be explained in these passages are: agreements between all three Gospels; agreements between Mt and Lk against Mk and between Mt and Mk against Lk; relative absence of agreements between Mk and Lk against Mt; and the fact that the passages in Lk are not in their Marcan context, whereas it is observed that where Mk and Lk are directly connected they nearly always follow the same order of incidents.

Now just as we saw that in the passages referred to (§ 610c) the relative absence of agreements between Mt and Lk against Mk compels us to suppose that in those passages Mt and Lk are connected not directly but by means of Mk or a source indistinguishable from Mk, so in dealing with these passages we shall naturally conclude that the relative absence of agreements between Mk and Lk against Mt, coupled with the difference of context in Lk as compared with Mk, is due to the fact that Mk and Lk are not here directly connected, but indirectly by means of a document indistinguishable from Mt. In other words, that in these passages either Lk is Mt's source or vice versa.

(B. H. Streeter, a Two-Documentarian, is driven to conclude that in such passages Mk and Q 'overlapped', i.e. told the same story each in his own words—Streeter does not believe that either copied the other 611e —and that Lk used Q for these passages while Mt 'conflated' Q and Mk. But on passage (a) he comments: The differences between the Mk and Q versions of the parable 'are entirely unimportant . . . no one antecedently would have expected that Matthew would take the trouble to combine the two versions'. And as regards passage (d) he points out 'the almost meticulous care with which Matthew conflates Mark and Q—the only real additions he has to make are the words "gold" and "Gomorrhah"'. In other words, the Q hypothesis here lands us into complications that are unnecessary and absurd.)

f (2) The sermon in Lk 6:20-49 is clearly the same sermon as the Sermon on the Mount (Mt 5-7). Each begins with Beatitudes and ends with the simile of the two houses; and there is hardly anything (the Woes and about three longish verses) in Lk's sermon that is not paralleled in Mt's. Mt's sermon is far longer than Lk's, and one effect of the absence from Lk's sermon of much that is found in Mt's is that Lk's is almost completely lacking in special Jewish setting and relevance and appears as a discourse of charity towards one's fellowmen. We have already seen in §611d that Mt and Lk are probably directly connected, and if we ask which is more likely to have copied this Sermon from the other, the answer is already clear. Either our Lord preached a sermon of universal, non-particular relevance which Mt has expanded in length but narrowed in scope, set back into a Jewish thought-world and made relevant to Palestinian controversies, thus transforming it into a quasi-original Christian manifesto against the Jews of our Lord's own time and place (and this despite the fact that the Gospel is written in good Greek); or Lk has transformed a sermon of the latter type into a shorter one on a more generalized theme. Closer inspection confirms the supposition that Lk is the borrower:

g Lk's language shows traces of Mt's (6:23 'reward'; 6:24 ἀμείβετε; 6:27 'to you I say who hear', cf. Mt 5:43, 44). Some passages found in Mt's sermon appear in other contexts in Lk 11:33; 16:18; 12:33 f.; 12:22-31, and these passages in Lk seem secondary when compared with the corresponding passages in Mt's sermon. Finally, at the end of his sermon Lk says 'When he had finished all these words', which corresponds with Mt 7:28. But this formula is one which Mt uses on four other occasions in his Gospel.

(3) A similar Mt formula (occurring 6 times in Mt) is found in Lk's parallel (13:28 f.) to Mt 8:11 f. Again Lk 9:57-10:24 appears to show Lucan editing of material borrowed from Mt 8:19-22; 11:21-23, 25-27; 13:16 f.

612a (4) Lk's divergences from Mt in his Q passages are nearly always towards typical Lucan style or otherwise apparently less primitive than their equivalents in Mt. The criterion of poetical form led *C. F. Burney (The Poetry of Our Lord, O.U.P., p 7) to conclude that in most Q cases ('though not in all') Mt preserves the more original form of our Lord's sayings.

On the whole, we may conclude that the hypothesis of Lk's direct dependence on Mt in the Q passages is one which not only explains but is required by the evidence, and the conjectural Q document is therefore an unnecessary and undesirable hypothesis. It is doubtful whether it would have had such a vogue in modern criticism if it had not been accepted as a corollary of the dependence of Mt and Lk on Mk. For if Mk is held to be original, Mt has many additions in Marcan passages which can be conveniently derived from Q; but if Mt does not depend on Mk there is no need to seek for a source for these 'additions' other than that from which the author (or translator) of Mt obtained the contexts in question.

II. Mk's Dependence on Mt

b Scholars who admit literary connexion between the first three Gospels are almost all agreed that Lk depends on Mk, not vice versa. Students who wish to test this dependence may note Lk 4:38 f., cf. Mk 1:29-31 (our Lord in Simon's house; Mk has already described Simon's call, but in Lk this call is not mentioned till the next chapter); Lk 4:23, where the people of Nazareth know of our Lord's ministry at Capharnaum, first described by Lk at 4:31 ff.; Lk 20:38-40, apparently telescoping Mk 12:28-34 (Lk 10:28 also seems to borrow from Mk 12:34). A more general argument is that where Lk is not running parallel to Mk, he lacks clear historical outline and the apostles lose their individuality and become lay-figures. We note that the Preface of Lk refers to other written accounts of Christian origins, and it is natural to suppose that Mk is one of these, and that the author of Lk had seen it.

Accepting Lk's dependence on Mt in the Q passages and on Mk where Mk and Lk are parallel, we now seek to discover whether, where Mt and Mk are parallel, Mt depends on Mk or vice versa. In this inquiry we have no third document to help us.

It is to be noted that whereas Mt has (after the first two chapters and apart from the last few verses of his Gospel) few incidents that are not found also in Mk, he has a great deal of teaching and discourse that is absent from, or very inadequately represented in, Mk. Mk has very little teaching and very few incidents that are not paralleled in Mt. An examination of the parallel passages and contexts in cases where Mt has a large section of discourse and Mk little or none gives decisive reasons for inferring that Mk depends on Mt.

(1) Mk 12:38-40 cf. Mt 23:1-36. That this is a genuine pair of parallels is shown by the identity of context and by the identical phrases 'greetings in the market-places', 'first-seats in the synagogues' and 'first-couches in banquets'. (Mt 23:14 [cf. Mk 12:40] is omitted by Huck. But it has strong support from Lk 20:47, Lk being dependent on Mt 23 in the context.) But Mt could not have invented 'they make broad their phylacteries and enlarge their fringes' out of Mk's 'who wish to walk about in robes'. The phylacteries and fringes are genuine Jewish 'local colour' and the rhythmical parallelism in Mt is Semitic. Mk, writing probably for non-Palestinian and largely non-Jewish Christians, substitutes the bizarre phrase 'walk about in robes'. Further, through his omission of Mt's 'love' he has awkwardly left 'wish' to govern first a prolate infinitive and then a series of nouns in the accusative case. Finally, as Mk is excerpting from a long discourse he introduces his brief extract by 'And in his teaching he said'; cf. a similar phenomenon at Mk 4:2, again due to the fact that the author is excerpting from Mt.

(2) Mk 13:33-37 cf. Mt 24:37-51. Identity of context again shows that parallelism is genuine. But nearly everything in these five verses of Mk is explicable by reference to the two parallel chapters of Mt, though the parallels are dispersed through 61 verses of Mt as follows: Mt 25:13, 14, 15; 24:45; 25:15 f.; 24:45 (the faithful servant set over the household, i.e. St Peter or his successors, par excellence, i.e. perhaps the door-keeper, or key-bearer of Mk 13:34b); 24:42, 43, 50; 25:5, 32. It is preposterous to suggest that Mt succeeded in expanding Mk's five verses into his own 61; it is a counsel of despair to question the fact of connexion between the Gospels at this point; but it is easy to see how Mk might telescope and abridge Mt's long discourse into his own five verses. This telescoping process has led to one incongruous result: in Mt we have the simile of a thief who comes at an unpredictable hour of the night, and the apostles are told that even so the Son of Man will come at an unexpected moment, and that therefore they must be ready for him whenever he comes—otherwise he may find the rulers of his church abusing their authority. Mt also gives us the simile of an absent master who returns (not at an unexpected hour of the night; there is no reason why a traveller must get home after nightfall, but) after much time. His arrival causes no surprise to his servants, with whom he goes through their accounts.

612f Now Mk, by rather rough-and-ready telescoping, has conflated these two disparate similes. He presents us with an absent master (whose absence was foreseen as a long one, hence he assigned special work to each of his servants) and an instruction to the doorkeeper to 'keep vigil', because he does not know 'at what hour of the night' his master will return; 'lest coming suddenly he finds you sleeping'. Is the doorkeeper to watch every night? But supposing the master chose to return by daylight? The conflation of thief and absent master is patent and not really to be doubted.

g (3) Mal 3:1 is quoted in Mk 1:2b in such a context as to suggest that it is from Is. It is also quoted (in the same non-LXX Greek version) in Mt 11:10, where it is integral to its context, a highly-wrought piece of our Lord's teaching. It is so obvious that Mk has taken it from Mt and misplaced it that Two-Documentarians are driven to suggest either that both evangelists got it from a conjectural written source (but this is the old evil practice of hypothesizing sources to escape the difficulties in which their theory has landed them) or that the half-verse is not authentic in Mk; but there is no MS authority for the excision and this is tantamount to a confession that the verse must be in its original setting in Mt and not in Mk, i.e. that in Mk it depends on Mt.

613a (4) Mk 4:21-25 is a collection of short sayings with parallels for the several items at different points in Mt (Mt 5:15; 10:26; 7:2, cf. 6:33; 25:29). Bishop Rawlinson thinks that the Mt contexts seem generally more appropriate than the Marcan. And note that whereas Mk 4:24a is parallel with Mt 7:2, Mk 4:24b (not very well placed in Mk) is found in Mt three or four verses earlier than 7:2 (6:33) in a context to which it convincingly belongs. This cannot be a coincidence and the conclusion in favour of Mt's priority is inevitable unless (with some MSS) we excise the phrase from Mk—but neither Rawlinson nor Huck nor Souter resorts to this surgical operation; the omission is probably due to homœoteleuton.

b (5) Mk 8:27-33, cf. Mt 16:13-23; St Peter's confession of faith. Mk omits our Lord's praise of St Peter and the 'Thou art Peter', etc. In so doing he destroys the antitheses of Mt ('Thou art the Christ . . . Thou art Peter'; 'Blessed art thou . . . Satan'; 'flesh and blood have not revealed it unto thee but my Father in heaven. . . . Thou savourest not the things of God but the things of man'; 'Thou art Peter and upon this rock I will build my Church . . . Thou art a stumbling-block to me'), although in each case he retains one member of the antithesis, usually the second. It is absurd to suggest that Mt took Mk's passage and from it elaborated his own highly symmetrical structure, Semitic in every detail, by adding the missing members of the antitheses, each usually before the Marcan word or phrase with which it is thrown in contrast.

c (6) Mk 13:9-13 cf. Mt 10:17-22; 24:9-14. The Marcan passage is in the same context as Mt 24:9-14; but its real parallel is Mt 10:17-22. Burney (pp 118-120) states that this section of Mk is distinguished from the rest of the chapter in which it occurs by its rhythm, and that though Mk 13 as a whole is eschatological this section is not, but coheres as to its content with the setting given to it in Mt 10. Burney is a Two-Documentarian and is reduced to suggesting, here and elsewhere, the dependence of Mk on Q. But obviously the evidence suggests that Mk has taken a passage of Mt and put it into a context for which neither its rhythm nor its subject-matter really fits it.

d (7) In view of the foregoing evidence, it is not surprising that Mk 4:1-34, a collection of three parables of which two are found in Mt 13:1-50 together with five other parables not given by Mk, shows at its beginning and at its end indications that it is an incomplete reproduction of a collection of parables: 'He taught them many things in parables, and in his teaching he said unto them . . . And with many such parables he spoke the word to them'.

Mt 13 contains seven parables, of which six fall into three groups of two, the Parable of the Sower having no partner. Mk 4 has the Parable of the Sower and that of the Mustard Seed (coupled in Mt with the Parable of the Leaven); Mk 4 also contains the Parable of the Seed growing secretly, which is absent from Mt. It seems probable that this is the missing partner of the Sower Parable, and we should thus have a collection of eight parables in four pairs. Mt gives all but one of the collection; perhaps this one was missed by the original recorder of this Sermon of our Lord, but was remembered in substance by an oral informant of Mk.

A small point in this section confirms the view that Mk here excerpts from Mt. Mk 4:13 and 21 appear to refer to the disciples as 'them'; but in 34a the same pronoun, though naturally it would be taken as referring to the same persons, must mean the crowds. This awkwardness is due to Mk's copying and omissions from Mt, where the ambiguity does not exist, since Mt mentions the crowds before referring to them as 'them' in 13:34, cf. Mk 4:34a.

g (8) Mk 11:20-25 cf. Mt 21:20-22. After the Withering of the Fig Tree both Gospels put into our Lord's mouth a short exhortation to faith. To it Mk appends v 25: 'And when you stand praying, forgive if you have anything against anyone, so that your Father, who is in the heavens, also may forgive you your trespasses'. To this the parallel in Mt is Mt 6:14 f., a comment on the Our Father (ibid. vv 9-13): 'For if you forgive men their trespasses, your heavenly Father will forgive you also; but if you do not forgive men, neither will your Father forgive your trespasses'. The verse has no relevance to its context in Mk, but is of course in perfect place in Mt. This is the only occasion on which Mk uses 'Your (or my) Father who is in the heavens' for God; Mt has it 13 times, and in seven other places has 'Your (or my) heavenly Father'; and it has been pointed out that this is a typically Jewish expression. The final proof of Mk's dependence on Mt here is in the following parallelisms of language:

h (a) 'When you stand praying . . . if you have anything against anyone' cf. Mt 6:5, 'When you pray . . . they love to pray standing in the synagogues' and especially Mt 5:23 'If you bring your gift to the altar and there remember that your brother has something against you . . .'. It may be observed that Mk's limitation of the injunction to forgiveness to occasions when one 'stands praying' is, to say the least, odd; Mt, loc. cit., envisages the situation of a man about to engage in a solemn religious act who happens to remember that he is at variance with another.

(b) Mk's 'Your father which is in the heavens' is not strictly parallel to Mt 6:14, from which the rest of the phrase comes, but to the opening words of the Lord's prayer ('Our Father who art in the heavens') a few verses earlier in Mt. All these phenomena are explained easily by the theory of Mk's dependence; on the opposite theory they cannot be adequately explained. (Bishop Rawlinson appears to think that Mk is here dependent on the Lord's Prayer as currently known among Christians; but this does not explain Mk's links with Mt 6:14, 5; 5:23. And we do not know that the Lord's Prayer was current at this time except in Mt.)

b (9) Mt is full of Aramaisms, both where he is parallel with Mk and where Mk has no parallel, and many of these Aramaisms are missing from the corresponding passages of Mk. E.g. 'heavens' is Hebrew-Aramaic, not Greek, and Mt has it 55 times—32 times in the formula 'Reign of the heavens', a formula completely eschewed by Mk; yet 11 of these cases in Mt are in passages where Mk is running parallel. Again Mt continually uses τότε ('then') 89 times, of which 51 are in passages to which Mk has a parallel, but of these 45 are eschewed by Mk. Now τότε is a regular LXX translation of the Aramaic 'edayin or bē dayin. It is hardly conceivable that Mt added 45 times this Greek translation of an Aramaism to a Greek text

- 614b copied from Mk. The most reasonable explanation of these Aramaisms in Mt is that they are due to the Aramaic (written or oral) source that he is translating.
- c The converging force of the above evidence is strong enough to compel us to admit the dependence of Mk on Mt. It remains to suggest an explanation of the conversational tone of Mk as compared with Mt's careful literary finish. It would seem as though there lies behind Mk an oral teacher, who based his lectures on the text of Mt, omitting material that lay outside the scope of an immediate eye-witness of our Lord's public ministry and private intercourse with his apostles, omitting also most of the discourses, as being matter that an individual could not trust to his memory to corroborate in detail, and adding a little from his own memory to what he found in Mt. It is remarkable that this oral teacher has omitted everything in Mt that could redound to the credit of St Peter, but has been careful to include whatever reflected discredit upon him. The scheme of dependence, taking into account both the A and the B evidence, is therefore as follows :

I should not, however, wish to exclude the possibility that the author of Mk revised his record of the oral teacher's discourses by direct reference to Mt.

Mt, the earliest of the Gospels, is naturally also the one most deeply rooted in the Palestinian situation contemporary with our Lord and with the earliest days of the Church in Judaea ; its Greek is also such that it can very probably be supposed to be translated from an Aramaic original. Both Mk and Lk tend to bleach out the Palestinian-Jewish colouring that would be unfamiliar and irrelevant to their Greek-speaking, largely Gentile, readers. Mk gives only the public ministry of our Lord, and mainly incidents not discourses, because such was the material that the oral teacher could confirm by his own memory. Lk makes Mk the backbone of his Gospel, perhaps out of respect for the oral teacher on whom he knew it to depend. He is able however to add a narrative of the birth of St John Baptist and our Lord, and of the childhood of our Lord, derived, it would seem, ultimately from our Lady ; and other material derived partly from the circle of Herod's court and partly from Palestinian sources that he may have tapped during St Paul's two-years detention in Caesarea. He also secured a copy of Mt and was thus enabled to add considerably to the teaching of our Lord that he had already derived from Mk and other sources. But he will not spoil his narrative of our Lord's birth by conflating with it the account in Mt, which appears to be derived ultimately from St Joseph. Lk is the most Hellenistic and at the same time the least 'three-dimensional' of the Synoptic Gospels.

Conclusion—The above investigation has been presented without recourse to external arguments (cf. §§677-8, 724, 744-5). It remains to point out that our solution gives us the traditional order of the Gospels. It throws open the possibility that Mt is, as tradition suggests, a translation of a Semitic original. It renders easier the traditional attribution of Mt's Semitic original to St Matthew the Apostle. It strengthens the traditional assertion that Mk contains a record of St Peter's teaching at Rome. It enables justice to be done to the evidence adduced for the dependence of Gal on Mt 16 (H. J. Chapman, R Bn, 1912) and of 1 and 2 Thess on Mt (J. B. Orchard, Bi, Jan. 1938). It thus helps very considerably over the question of the dates of composition of the first three Gospels. Mt will be earlier than Gal and 1 and 2 Thess, and its Aramaic original, if it had one, will be still earlier. A great many loose theories concerning a long period of oral transmission of the story of Christian origins will be undermined, and we can now watch the Christian Gospel story in its actual evolution from the Palestinian to the Hellenistic Church, an evolution seen to be not one of corruption by accretion, but of universalization by omission.

THE PERSON AND TEACHING OF OUR LORD JESUS CHRIST

- vi The Mystery of Jesus

I Method and Point of View—In what spirit are we to approach a study of the significance of our Lord Jesus Christ? Have we to make choice between, on the one hand, adopting an attitude of scientific detachment, self-consciously aware of, and not unwilling to parade, the latest results of contemporary scholarship, or, on the other, giving proof of our loyalty by confining ourselves to the merely devotional and edificatory aspects of the gospels? There is perhaps no need to pose so sharp a dilemma. It may be difficult, but surely not impossible, to combine a critical temper of mind with whole-hearted allegiance. Modern criticism often presents a picture of Jesus scarcely to be reconciled with Catholic orthodoxy; but this has little to do with the critical approach as such (by which we understand the attempt to attain objective truth in the light of evidence), to which the Church shows no hostility. Rather it is because the critics have all too often been imbued with, or have unconsciously accepted, a rationalistic philosophy which can find no place for divinely revealed mysteries and the supernatural order. The Hegelian idealism and Positivist scepticism (an aberration against which the scholar and savant, absorbed in the minutiae of research, has continually to be on his guard) which, until lately, have pervaded Protestant systematic theology, impose far more crippling limitations upon the mind intent on discovering the essential Christian message than the dogmas of the Church are supposed to do.

c A typical example of this limited approach is provided by a recently published 'exposition of the Gospels in the light of modern research' (*Major, Manson, Wright, The Mission and Message of Jesus—Macmillan, London, 1940). The authors tell us, with a suggestion of great impartiality, that they 'are not concerned to make the Gospels affirm the declarations of the traditional creeds nor to teach the traditional scheme of salvation'; and they appeal to the dictum of Archbishop Frederick Temple: 'If the conclusions be prescribed, the research is precluded'. This is well enough so far as it goes, but it is based on an assumption which appears to have escaped the notice of those who appeal so confidently to it. What seems to be taken for granted is that the inner essence of Christianity will yield itself to 'research', or at least modern research. In other words, those who study Christian origins in this spirit are guilty of a far more flagrant petitio principii than can be charged against the 'older orthodoxy'. The Catholic Church has never held that her teaching about Christ, as formulated in the Nicene Creed and the definition of the Council of Chalcedon, can be logically deduced from the written gospels in the same way as, for example, the character of Socrates may be inferred from the writings of Plato and Xenophon. The Church's faith in Christ, though truly if inadequately expressed in the verbum Dei scriptum vel traditum (Dz 1792), has for its object the inner recesses of his personality, far beyond the reach of human evidence and escaping rational analysis. Thus there is a sense in which it is true to say that the Gospels are the result, and not the cause, of Christian faith. This is a position by no means unassailable on philosophical grounds, as Catholic theologians are well aware, but it is not touched by those who imagine that they can reconstruct the 'historical Jesus' solely on the basis of modern scholarship. The researches of the past century, fruitful as they have been in many respects, have conspicuously failed, and must of their nature fail, to reach finality as to the significance of Jesus. The reaction towards the traditional theology of the Incarnation, embodied in such thinkers as Barth and Brunner, though raising a whole set of difficulties of a different order, is a striking evidence of the insufficiency of the Liberal Protestant attempts at discovering the heart of the Christian message.

The scholastic theologians evolved an axiom which, though of universal application, is especially relevant in our present context: cognitum est in cognoscente secundum modum cognoscentis; 'the object known is in the mind that knows it according to the measure of that mind'. So much depends upon the point of view, upon the temper in which we approach the object of our study. Learning, be it acknowledged at the outset, is an essential pre-condition; but it is not the only one. *Sanday, in his Outlines of the Life of Christ (p 240), well expresses this point: 'It should be needless to say that the Life of Christ can be written only by a believer. Renan had all the literary gifts—a curiosa felicitas of style, an aesthetic appreciation of his subject, and a saving common-sense which tempered his criticism; but even as literature his work is spoilt by self-consciousness and condescension, and his science was not of the best'. The same writer tells us that he knows of no Life which possesses 'such a balance and combination of qualities as to rise quite to the level of a classic'. And he adds significantly: 'What is wanted is a Newman, with science and adequate knowledge'.

Though the Church is committed to a certain view about the person and life-work of our Lord, she is in no way opposed to the scientific investigation of Christian origins. On the contrary, as the utterances of recent Popes go to show (e.g. Pius XII, Divino afflante Spiritu), she warmly encourages these researches,

THE PERSON AND TEACHING OF CHRIST

616f provided they be conducted with due regard to the exigencies of their object. Indeed her consistent rejection of any 'double standard' of truth—whether it be the 13th cent. contention that what is true for theology need not necessarily be true for philosophy, or the modernist opposition between the 'Christ of faith' and the 'Jesus of history'—implies a submission to historical evidence far more radical than can be claimed by those critics who, bringing to their study preconceived theories and a priori categories, arrange their findings accordingly.

g As the present writer has written elsewhere, 'The historic revelation of Christianity can be considered from two points of view. We may look at it from without, as a series of facts and truths of peculiar interest, but nevertheless as no more than particular events in the general story of our race. Or, having received the gift of faith, we can study them from within and see that they are realities of eternal significance' (Love of God, 78). The Catholic scholar is free, should he so choose, to adopt the first line of approach—the science of Apologetics is in fact chiefly concerned with it—whereby he prescinds from, without abandoning, the act of faith. Furthermore the Church's insistence on the unity of all truth, the principle that a fact of revelation cannot conflict with a fact of human history, precludes the manipulation of evidence to secure the desired conclusion. A strictly revealed dogma, so St Thomas teaches (ST II, 2, Q. i, Art. 5), can no more be demonstrated by purely rational argument than can a truth accessible to reason be said to form an object of faith.

h Thus though historical research and individual reflection may tell us much about Christ our Lord, may—and, as we hold, should—dispose the mind to the acceptance of the Church's faith concerning him, they cannot pronounce decisively either for or against the truth of the inner content of that faith. This is a revealed mystery of which the inherent possibility, let alone the fact, cannot be rationally established. Having spoken of the motives of credibility which lead up to belief in Christ, St Thomas adds these significant words: 'But when a man, led on by these motives, makes the act of faith, then can it still be said that not in virtue of any of them does he believe: neither on account of the evidence of reason, nor through the witness of the Law, nor as moved by what has come to him through preaching, but solely on account of the truth itself—propter ipsam veritatem tantum' (Comm. in Joan., cap. IV, lect. v, 2). Not only St Peter (cf. Mt 16:17), but each member of the faithful, confesses Christ to be the Son of the living God because the Father has revealed it to him.

i The Catholic belief concerning the person of our Lord received final formulation in A.D. 451 at the Council of Chalcedon (Dz 148). Here the doctrine of the two natures in one divine Person was defined, that Jesus Christ is 'consubstantial with the Father in respect of his deity, consubstantial with us in respect of his humanity . . . as the Lord himself taught and the symbol (Nicene) of the Fathers handed down to us'. Anyone who shares the convictions of the present writer must hold that a study of the NT evidence will always lead 'to a better appreciation of the Chalcedonian definition' (*Lowther Clarke, Divine Humanity, p v). But whether or not this be accepted, it has yet to be shown that such a standpoint involves any distortion of the scriptural accounts. The Fathers of the Council maintained in the 5th cent., as the Church maintains today, that they drew up an article of faith which did justice to the oral and written tradition about our Lord. They were concerned with nothing but this. Those who think them mistaken may profitably inquire whether they themselves are not pre-judging the issue, though from different premisses, by the same process with which they charge the orthodox theologians. To be prepossessed with the desire to accommodate Jesus to the grasp of the modern mind, or to rule out in advance the possibility of such a divine intervention into human affairs as the Catholic doctrine of the Incarnation implies, or to hold antecedently that miracles do not happen, or to think that antiquity means obscurantism and modernity enlightenment—all or any of these positions must, on the grounds of objectivity alone, have a gravely incapacitating effect upon a mind striving to understand the gospels.

617a Writing some forty years ago of the Christological work performed by the early Church Councils, Sanday remarks: 'The decisions in question were thus the outcome of a long evolution, every step in which was keenly debated by minds of great acumen and power, really far better equipped for such discussions than the average Anglo-American mind of today' (op. cit., 226). This judgement, which might also have included the average German mind, has lost nothing of its truth. But it must not be thought that on this account the Catholic student is left free to ignore the positive results of recent scholarship. On the contrary, he owes it to himself to assimilate them; for unless the Church's dogmatic teaching on the Incarnate Word is, as it were, filled in and illustrated by the NT narrative, considered in its literal and concrete meaning, he will be in danger of forming an abstract and quite unreal notion of the personality of our Lord. Thus, though the official Catholic doctrine has never failed to give full recognition to the complete humanity of Jesus, the same cannot be said of the conceptualizations and elaborations of that doctrine by individual theologians—and these have not been without influence on the minds of believers. The following criticism of Peter Lombard's Christology is interesting, not only for its own sake, but because it may suggest reflections of more general application: 'His view illustrates the general tendency of later Greek theology, which he generally follows, to assign an excessive predominance to the Deity in Christ; a tendency resulting from an a priori method of reasoning in regard to the Incarnation, drawing conclusions not from the picture in the Gospels, but from the probable conditions under which an incarnation of Deity may be supposed to have occurred' (*Ottley, The Doctrine of the Incarnation, 521).

The dogmatic formulas, precious though they are as affording an anchorage to the mind, do not exempt us from the task of re-thinking the gospels for ourselves under the guidance of the Church. We have, in our own intelligence and imagination, to avoid each of the opposing departures from the central truth into one or other of which men are bound to fall when they lose their balance on the knife-edge of orthodoxy. On the one hand, Docetism (of which Monophysitism is a form), which regards the Incarnation as a theophany, Christ's human nature a mere appearance, or at best a veil to the Divinity—for which in consequence Jesus is not truly man. On the other, Adoptionism (which lies at the root of Nestorianism), the prototype of humanitarian Christianity, which holds that the humanity was in some way divinized, taken up into union with the Deity—whence it follows that Jesus is not truly God. We shall be preserved from both these errors in turning to the evangelical witness and finding there disclosed to us the Jesus of history, who is also the Christ of faith.

II Outline of the Life of our Lord—According to 6 St Matthew (2:1) and St Luke (2:4) our Lord was born in Bethlehem, a town in Judaea some six miles south of Jerusalem. The date can only be calculated approximately. When in the 6th cent. Dionysius Exiguus equated the Roman year 754 with 1 A.D. he could not have been correct. Mt (2:1) tells us that the birth of Jesus took place 'in the days of King Herod', and we know from Josephus (Ant., 17, 8, 1) that Herod died in the spring of the year corresponding to 4 B.C. Time must be allowed for the infant days in Bethlehem prior to the massacre of the Innocents, followed by the flight to, and sojourn in, Egypt which 617e ended with Herod's death. Estimates of the interval which had elapsed between the Nativity and this latter event have varied from as much as three years to as little as a few weeks. (Fuller treatment of the point may be looked for in the art. Chronology of NT Times, §§ 674-6.) It is certain, however, that our Lord could not have been born later than the early months of the year 4 B.C.

d We learn from Lk, who wrote his account, 'having diligently attained to all things from the beginning' (1:3) of the coming of the shepherds to the new-born Babe and of the hymn of praise—'Glory to God in the highest'—sung by 'a multitude of the heavenly army' (2:13). On the eighth day (cf. Lev 12:2-4) the Child was circumcised and given the name of Jesus. After the prescribed forty days Jesus is brought by Mary his mother to the Temple at Jerusalem for her purification 'according to the law of Moses' (Lk 2:22; cf. Lev 12). At the same time she presents her Child to God (cf. Ex 13:2) and, not being able to afford the offering of a yearling lamb for a holocaust, she was allowed to substitute in its place two young pigeons (Lk 2:24; cf. Lev 12:8). The Purification, though combined with the Presentation by Lk, as it is in the Liturgical Feast (Feb. 2nd), had originally no connection with it.

The devout Simeon, a strict observer of the law and a man of deep personal piety, was watching in the Temple at this time, together with Anna 'a prophetess'. They were true representatives of that class who awaited in hope and holy fear the coming of 'the consolation of Israel' (Lk 2:25). Simeon, under divine inspiration, recognizes the Babe as the long expected Messiah; he saw in him not only the promised Saviour of his people, but one who would also bring the light of revelation to the Gentiles. In veiled language he foretells the future of the Child: his Messianic mission will be no popular triumph; not all will accept him, though all will be affected by him. Men's response to his message will be the test of the sincerity of their own inmost thoughts. He will meet with opposition and contempt, and a sword of anguish will pierce his mother's heart.

e St Matthew now takes up the story with material peculiar to himself. He tells us of the visit of the 'wise men from the east' (2:1), of their interview with Herod which was the prelude to the massacre of the Innocents, of their journey to Bethlehem guided by the star, and of the act of homage paid there to the new-born Child (2:11). The NT tells us no more about them, except that, avoiding Jerusalem and Herod, 'they went back another way into their country' (v 12). On their departure, Joseph, warned by an angel in sleep, takes the Child and his mother by night into Egypt, where they remain until Herod's death. It is after this event that the Holy Family make their way to Nazareth in Galilee, whence Mary and Joseph had journeyed to Bethlehem, and it is with this northern town that the name of Jesus is ever afterwards to be associated.

f St Luke alone lifts the veil, if but for a brief moment, from the years which shroud the 'hidden life'. He notices, like a good physician, that 'the child grew and waxed strong' (2:40), that he was 'full of wisdom', and that his mental and physical development won him favour with both God and man (v 52). In a word he passed through the normal stages of boyhood and youth in a way to delight all who came in contact with him. From Joseph he would learn the carpenter's trade, from Mary many of the domestic arts; but most of all would his heart be in his studies at the synagogue school at Nazareth. Since their return from the Babylonian exile and the growth of the synagogue system, every Jewish community of any size was provided with a school attached to its synagogue in which all male children were taught the Law. In consequence the level of popular education in the Judaism of our Lord's time was, within its limits, intellectually, morally and spiritually higher than that of any other contemporary civilization. Quite apart from the sources of knowledge later to be discussed, Jesus gained familiar acquaintance with the OT scriptures by the wholly human process of studying and learning them by heart. Judged by the standards of his own country and time, our Lord was well educated; he would express himself normally in Aramaic, the language in common use, but he no doubt also spoke, when occasion demanded, in Greek and Hebrew. The taunt that he had 'never learned' (Jn 7:15) was the unworthy gibe of defeated disputants wishing to discredit an opponent. It had little substance in fact.

One incident in our Lord's boyhood has been recorded by St Luke. A Jewish boy became responsible for the discharge of his religious duties, which as a circumcised Jew he was bound to perform, at the age of twelve years. It was then that he acquired the status of a 'Son of the Law'. So we find Jesus at the feast of Passover, at Jerusalem with Mary and Joseph. An oriental child at the age of twelve is well able to take care of himself; doubtless this knowledge, and perhaps some confusion in the arrangements of the home-going caravan, caused his parents to lose contact with him for a time. The rediscovery in the Temple presents a scene as significant as it is charming. Save as an infant in arms, this was possibly the first time our Lord had ever been within its walls, and he is reluctant to depart. He recognizes it as his Father's house (Lk 2:49); the consciousness of his unique sonship with God, as expressed in the first of his recorded words, is already upon him. We may note that his role 'in the midst of the doctors' (v 46) was not (the surely unattractive one) of the youthful teacher correcting and supplementing the ignorance of his elders. Rather does Jesus show himself, as befitted his age, as the seeker after knowledge. Absorbed as he was in thoughts of religion, he would—with boyish modesty, as we may well imagine—raise points with these experts in Jerusalem which possibly his teachers in the synagogue at home in Nazareth had been unable to settle. They in their turn would inquire his reasons for asking, good humouredly testing what he knew and weighing how much he deserved an answer. It is at his responses to these questions that we find him as the youthful doctor; they 'were astonished at his wisdom and his answers' (v 47). The curtain now descends and is not raised again for some eighteen years or more.

The Public Ministry—Possibly the autumn of A.D. 27 is the date indicated by Lk 3:1, when John, the son of Zachary and kinsman of Jesus, was found baptizing and preaching repentance on the banks of the Jordan not far from Jericho. Israel, which had lived these hundreds of years by the written law, without a prophet to kindle their hearts to fervour (Ps 73:9), once again heard the voice of prophecy. John had assumed the famous garment of camel's hair (Mk 1:6; Mt 3:4), the official garb of the prophet (Zach 13:4), which perhaps no one living had seen before. His mission, as can be gathered from Josephus as well as from the gospels, created an immense popular stir: so far as outward and immediate effects were concerned, it may well have been more impressive than that of Jesus himself. The burden of his message, preached with great personal asceticism and forebodings of an imminent revelation from God, was 'Repent . . . the kingdom of heaven is at hand' (Mt 3:2 KNT). He demanded uncompromisingly what the prophets before him had demanded, a change of heart, a more serious attention to what his hearers knew to be their religious duty; but his teaching did not seem to imply any radical criticism of the existing order, nor did it contain anything fundamentally new. John felt himself to be the precursor of the Messiah; but our Lord was in no real sense the continuer of his work. Jesus understood and appreciated John, while at the same time insisting on the superiority of his own mission in its inspiration and vital significance.

618b Yet 'Jesus came from Nazareth of Galilee and was baptized by John' (Mk 1:9). Sinless himself (Heb 4:15), he nevertheless wishes to be identified with a sinful people. John demurs, conscious at least of a holiness which made such a baptism incongruous; but Jesus insists, for he must, in Matthew's characteristic phrase, 'fulfil all due observance' (3:15 KNT). The voice of the Father and the coming of the Holy Spirit, which accompanied the baptism, were a manifestation that this was Israel's Messiah, and also perhaps, though not exclusively, a consoling and strengthening experience for Jesus himself (Mk 1:11; Mt 3:17; Lk 3:22). John the Baptist realized in some measure what was taking place (Jn 1:32 f.), though not, it would seem, in a way to exclude a later mood of impatience at the Messias' seeming tardiness in establishing his kingdom (Mt 11:3). There is no evidence that this theophany, striking as it was, made any impression on, or was intended to impress, the onlookers at the baptism. Before setting out on his Messianic mission, the consciousness of which had ever been before him, our Lord 'led by the Spirit' (Lk 4:1), undergoes temptation in the wilderness.

6 These temptations afford a moving testimony to Jesus's kinship with ourselves (Heb 4:15). What was their nature and purpose? Strictly speaking they are a prelude to, rather than a part of, the Public Ministry. They took place when Jesus was alone, and presumably we should have heard nothing of them had he not thought fit to recount the experience to his disciples. There is indeed a dramatic appropriateness in these particular temptations coming at this point. Our Lord had just heard the voice of the Father and received an outpouring of strength from the Holy Spirit, both alike encouraging to his human nature—apt, by the very fact that it was human, to shrink from an office so fraught with suffering and danger—to go forward on his predestined task of bringing salvation to Israel. Was it not to be expected that the forces of evil (cf. Eph 6:12) should conspire together to oppose the projected work, if not by direct attack, then at least by infecting its motives and perverting its object? If the good deed was not to be frustrated, might not wickedness secure a more subtle triumph by ensuring that it should be done for the wrong reason? Satan was bent upon undoing what Jesus, the Lord's anointed, had been called to carry through. Our Lord, in the literal meaning of the phrase, was being tempted to abandon his vocation.

d We may conjecture that Jesus, during the days of retreat in the desert, was anticipating in his mind all that was involved in the work to which he was about to set his hand. He would have the light of a knowledge derived from the union of his human nature with the Godhead; even as man his mind would enjoy, in virtue of its unique holiness, a divine illumination possessed by no other; but surely this does not exclude a mental review of what lay before him, natural to any man in such a situation, even though he had ever in mind the plan eternally foreordained by the Father. In the midst of these reflexions Satan comes to interpose his counsels.

The first temptation consists in an invitation to our Lord to use the power given him by his Father to satisfy his own personal needs. He has been fasting and is hungry—why not change these stones into bread (Mt 4:3)? Some have seen in this suggestion an even wider significance. Jesus is being tempted to use the Messianic office as a means of securing economic relief for the numerous poverty-stricken people of Palestine, and so to gain popularity and acceptance with them. However that may be, his reply, an appeal to Deut 8:3, gives no encouragement to any conception of the Messias which would apply the materialistic test of temporal prosperity. The second temptation is a crude appeal to his miracle-working powers; let him make some spectacular display, like jumping from the pinnacle of the Temple in Jerusalem, and so win 618d followers by an appeal to the vulgar desire for excitement. Jesus, as we know, will work many miracles, but not one of them in this spirit; he makes no concessions to those who seek the wonderful for its own sake (cf. Mt 16:4) and the kind of self-display which directly tempts God is to him an abomination. Again he appeals to Scripture (Deut 6:16). The last temptation perhaps suggests recourse to political means, a response to the expectations of the fanatical Zealots who looked to the Messias to overthrow the Roman and Herodian power. The tempter is dismissed with the invocation of the first and greatest of the commandments: 'The Lord thy God shalt thou adore, and him only shalt thou serve' (Mt 4:10; cf. Deut 6:13).

• The impossibility of assigning any precise chronological sequence to the Public Ministry is now generally admitted. The length of time spent by Jesus in Judaea before he began to preach in Galilee is uncertain. St John gives us some details of what happened: a striking testimony from the Baptist (1:29 ff.); the preliminary call of the first disciples (v 38 ff.); the driving of the traders out of the Temple precincts (2:14 ff.); the discussion with Nicodemus (3:1 ff.)—unless this took place, as seems likely, at the last Passover festival (§§ 771a, 736c, 765d). There is also the first miracle, the 'sign' in Cana of Galilee (2:1 ff.), the changing of water into wine, before we reach the obviously parallel passages in the synoptists. But if St John's account is really patient of chronological treatment, room must be found for the visit to Jerusalem just alluded to (2:13 ff.), the final witness of the Baptist (3:23 ff.) 'in Ennon near Salim', and the conversation with the Samaritan woman (4:6 ff.) before the opening of the Galilean ministry, which is the preoccupation of the first three evangelists (Mk 1:14; Mt 4:12; Lk 4:14; cf. Jn 4:45).

f Jesus began to teach in the synagogues (Lk 4:15), and not until later in the open air. St Luke gives us a vivid account of his early preaching at Nazareth. The Master takes as his text the famous passage from Isaiah (61:1-2), which speaks of the gracious mission of the Servant of Yahweh, and asserts that it is now being fulfilled; that is to say, in veiled language, he makes the Messianic claim. We find him next at Capharnaum. Here he made a deep impression by reason of the novel method of his teaching. His manner was original; instead of citing authorities and learned commentators, as did the scribes, he delivered his message directly and, as it were, on his own responsibility. 'You have heard that it was said to them of old. . . . But I say to you . . .' (Mt 5:21). At Capharnaum he exorcizes a demoniac, who testifies to his Messiahship, and his reputation spreads throughout Galilee. Here also he heals Simon's mother-in-law and many others brought to him after the Sabbath sunset. There followed the remarkable healing of the leper at the latter's own request. This created such a stir among the people that the popular demand would have forced Jesus's work of preaching to become purely a ministry of healing. For this reason he kept away from the towns and 'retired into the desert and prayed' (Lk 5:16). It may have been that our Lord visited the Galilean synagogues before returning to his temporary base at Capharnaum. His increasing fame has drawn upon him the attention of official Jewish ecclesiasticism as represented by the Pharisaic party. The cure of the paralytic (Mk 2:1-12; Mt 9:2-8; Lk 5:17-26), whereat Jesus declares the sick man's sins forgiven and for the first time in the gospels ascribes to himself the title 'Son of Man', creates an unfavourable impression on the minds of Pharisees who witness it. The call of Levi with the feast that follows, at which our Lord is found consorting with tax-gatherers and non-observers, causes a second clash. With the dispute about fasting and two conflicts over Sabbath observance, in which Jesus clearly places conformity to the Law on a lower plane than the common kindness of relieving human necessities, the attitude of the 618f Pharisees hardens into uncompromising hostility. They took counsel with the Herodians to be rid of him—for Sabbath-breaking is a capital offence. It is this combination of ecclesiastical and political power, originating in the Sabbath dispute, which will finally bring about the wrecking of the Galilean ministry (Mk 7:24; Mt 15:21).

619a Meanwhile, with the common people, our Lord's popularity grew. The crowds are so great that, to gain some relief, possibly also as a precaution against sudden arrest by his enemies, he resorts to the device of preaching on the lakeside from a boat. It was Simon Peter's (Lk 5:3). We now reach one of the key-points of the ministry, the choosing of the apostles following upon a night spent in prayer (Lk 6:12). Knowing that his work could only reach its final issue after his death, Jesus selects by a deliberate act of his will (Mk 3:13) twelve to be especially trained by himself (v 14). As he was acting on a mandate from the Father, so they in their turn would continue his mission (cf. Jn 17:18). Simon Peter's name comes first on the list of all three synoptists (Mk 3:16 ff.; Mt 10:2 ff.; Lk 6:14 ff.; cf. Ac 1:13). Having gathered the twelve about him, to them in particular but also to all who would afterwards call themselves his followers, our Lord delivered the teaching contained in the Sermon on the Mount—the 'Charter', as it has been called, 'of the Kingdom of God' (Mt 5-7; Lk 6:7-49).

b If we follow St Luke's order, we shall place the cure of the centurion's servant at Capernaum and the raising of the widow's son at Naim as the next important events in the Galilean ministry. The latter miracle was performed out of sheer compassion; no request came from the mother and no act of faith was demanded. The onlookers were deeply moved; Jesus's reputation was spreading throughout Palestine. Reports of him had reached as far as Machaerus, on the mountains overlooking the Dead Sea, where John the Baptist was imprisoned. Possibly to banish a temptation to doubt, possibly in order to reassure his own disciples, John sends to Jesus to inquire whether after all he is the promised Messiah (Lk 7:20). Our Lord replies, not by a direct affirmative, but by appealing to his works, leaving John to draw the inference, as he easily could (Is 29:18 ff.; 35:5-6), that in Jesus part at least of the Messianic office was being fulfilled. It may have been shortly after this, while still in Galilee, that the feet of Jesus are anointed by the sinful woman and we get the 'golden saying': 'Many sins are forgiven her, because she hath loved much' (Lk 7:47).

c Our Lord now begins to preach the Kingdom of God, no longer in the direct manner of the Sermon on the Mount, but in figures of speech, extended similes, known as parables. We touch here on a much-discussed question—See §625g infra—as the reasons for adopting this method are obscure. It will be sufficient to suggest in this place that, wishing in the short time at his disposal to concentrate on the formation of an élite, Jesus directed his attention to gathering about him the more stable and thoughtful among his hearers. This view, at any rate, finds support in the Parable of the Sower (Mt 13:3 ff.; Lk 8:5 ff.). At the end of the day's teaching in parables he does not alight from his boat-pulpit but, in order doubtless to escape being thronged by the crowd, crosses over to the eastern shore of the Lake. On this journey he stills the suddenly-rising tempest, filling his disciples with awe by his power over the elements. Arrived at the farther side, in 'the country of the Gerasenes', our Lord exorcizes an unhappy demoniac. The cured man wishes to become a disciple; but Jesus bids him rather to go and relate his good fortune to his friends. Sent thus on a sort of apostolic mission to the Gentiles—for he comes from Decapolis—the happy man begins to publish abroad the 'great things Jesus had done for him' (Mk 5:20). Returning once more to the western shore of the Lake, the Lord raises to life the daughter of Jairus and, while on his way, cures the woman with haemorrhage as a reward for her great faith. This time he enjoins that no one shall be told of it.

Nazareth is next visited and, if we may follow Lange in reading two visits into Luke 4 (the first vv 16-22a; the second vv 22b-30, paralleled by Mk 6:1-6, Mt 13:54-58; cf. Jn 4:44; 6:42), it is on this occasion that Jesus is scornfully rejected by the townsfolk; the Prophet is without honour in his own country. There now follows, after the failure at Nazareth, a third significant stage in our Lord's ministry (in line with the call of the disciples and the change from popular to parabolic teaching): he calls the Twelve about him, arms them with effective power (δύναμις) and official authority (ἐξουσία), delivers a charge, and sends them to preach the Kingdom of God through the tetrarchy of Herod Antipas. The Baptist had by this time been beheaded, and Herod, fearful and superstitious, hearing of the activities of Jesus, wonders whether it can be that John has risen from the dead. The possibility of hostile action from Herod causes Jesus to withdraw with his disciples away from the populous towns; but the crowds follow him to the remoter countryside. On one such occasion, when he has attracted no less than five thousand people, moved at the thought of their hunger, he feeds them all from five barley loaves and two fishes—a miracle recorded by all four evangelists (Mk 6:30-34; Mt 14:13-21; Lk 9:10-17; Jn 6:1-15). So great was the enthusiasm that the zealots among the crowd, reckoning they had found the leader for their political revolution, would have acclaimed him King. But he withdrew from them and hid himself (Jn 6:15). The same night he again demonstrates his mastery over nature by walking upon the waters to rejoin his disciples. The next day, with much appropriateness, having first healed many sick on the lakeside (Mk 6:53, 54; Mt 14:34-35), he preaches the discourse on the Bread of Life (Jn 6:22 ff.), in which he indicates his intention of giving his flesh and blood to be men's food and drink. Notwithstanding the previous demonstration of supernatural power, many find it a hard saying and follow him no longer (Jn 6:67).

If St John's gospel really aims at chronological sequence (following the ancient gospel harmonies, we invert the order of chapters 5 and 6), it would seem reasonable to place a visit to Jerusalem, with the Sabbath-day cure of the paralytic at the pool of Bethesda, before the three attacks made by Jesus upon Pharisaic legalism and rabbinical casuistry (Mk 7:1-23; Mt 15:1-20). Immediately afterwards he withdrew, a refugee, 'into the coasts of Tyre and Sidon' (Mk 7:24), where he cures the daughter of the Syrophenician woman. Turning south-east, but avoiding the territory of Herod Antipas, he enters the Decapolis; near the borders of the Lake he has brought to him a deaf-mute, whom he cures to the delight and wonder of the crowd. Not far from Bethsaida he feeds four thousand people from seven loaves and a few fishes—a miracle which Mk is careful to distinguish from the previous feeding of the five thousand (8:19)—and then crosses the Lake to the western shore. Here he is confronted by the hostile Pharisees; disregarding his wonderful works of healing, they demand 'a sign from heaven' as proof of his Messiahship. Jesus, who would never attempt to compel belief merely by a display of the marvellous, refuses to be put to the test in this way. 'A sign shall not be given to this generation' (Mk 8:12). Crossing the Lake, he warns his disciples against the leaven of the Pharisees and Herodians. As if to reprove their slowness to comprehend his meaning, on arrival at Bethsaida he restores sight to a blind man: a cure which he seeks to effect in private and one—like the healing of the deaf-mute: also peculiar to Mk 7:32 ff.—not presupposing the patient's faith.

We now reach what is in many respects the central point of the Public Ministry: the acknowledgement of Jesus as the Messiah by Simon Peter at Caesarea Philippi, together with the Master's felicitation and

THE PERSON AND TEACHING OF CHRIST

619f promise of the headship of the Church (Mt 16:13-20 ; cf. Mk 8:27-30 ; Lk 9:18-21). Jesus himself, having first prayed on the journey, chooses the moment for eliciting the supreme act of faith from his disciple ; but he will not allow the 'Messianic secret' (as Mk seems to see it) to be spread abroad. 'And he strictly charged them that they should not tell any man of him' (Mk 8:30). He begins to enlighten them as to the true significance of his Messianic office, 'the Son of man must suffer many things' (Mk 8:31). The impressionable yet devoted Peter is horrified at such a prospect and would banish it from his Master's mind ; only to receive from him words of rebuke no less telling than had been those of approbation shortly before. The office of Messiah, contrary to popular expectations, involves no temporal triumph, but rejection by the nation and a shameful death. Those who would follow him must likewise take up their cross. There will be a glorious resurrection one day, but only for him 'that shall lose his life for my sake' (Mt 16:25). A week later, perhaps to banish the depression and bewilderment of the disciples, taking apart Peter, James and John, Jesus is transfigured in glory before them. Moses, representing the Law, and Elias, who stands for the Prophets, are present. 'In this scene all that was most divine in Israel's past does homage to the new prophet and upholds what he has foretold about the scandal of his death' (LGJC, Eng. Tr., vol. 1, 269). On their way down from the mountain he enjoins his three favourite disciples to silence concerning what they have witnessed. In answer to their puzzled questioning about the teaching of Scripture, he tells them that Elias has already come in the person of the Baptist.

620a Our Lord next cures the epileptic boy. His teaching to the disciples now has for its constantly recurring theme the coming Passion, and he tells them that he who would be great among them must be the servant of all. They must learn also not to reject the co-operation of others who do a good work in the name of Jesus. He urges them to deeds of neighbourly charity and to the practice of self-discipline, so that the danger of scandal-giving be avoided. The method of fraternal correction is made clear, with the invoking of the authority of the Church (Mt 18:15-18) and the need for a forgiving spirit emphasized and illustrated by a parable (Mt 18:23 ff.). Arrived at Capharnaum, the Lord pays the Temple dues (Mt 17:23 ff.) at the same time imparting a lesson to Simon Peter. The Galilean ministry has come to an end, a tragic failure. Jesus laments the fate of the cities of the lakeside, Capharnaum, Corozain, Bethsaida, where he has preached in vain, and 'steadfastly set his face to go to Jerusalem' (Lk 9:51). We find him there for the feast of Tabernacles (Jn 7:10 ff.). His teaching in the Temple precincts is the occasion of a plot to arrest him. Presently he cures the man blind from birth by sending him to wash in the pool of Siloe, a miracle in keeping with his character as 'the light of the world' (Jn 9:5). Now also he reveals himself as the good shepherd who lays down his life for the sheep (Jn 10:14-15).

b Much of the material to be found in Lk 9:51-18:14 can perhaps be placed after St John's account of the visit to Jerusalem for the feast of Tabernacles. Here we find our Lord dealing with aspirants to discipleship, the mission of the 'seventy-two, the most striking declaration, Johannine in its sublimity, of the intimate relationship between himself and the Father (Mt 11:25 ff. ; Lk 10:21 ff.)—which such critics as Harnack and Wellhausen, flying in the face of the manuscript evidence, arbitrarily reject as a very early interpolation ! In close succession are recorded the greatest of the parables, that of the good Samaritan (Lk 10:30 ff.), the charming encounter with the sisters Martha and Mary—which the Church Fathers have allegorized as the type of the 'two lives', that of action and that of contemplation—and Jesus teaching the disciples how to pray. Two further cures are followed by the odious charge of the Pharisees, so effectively refuted, that Jesus performs his good works with the aid of black magic. This gross slander, to be urged from the Jewish side for centuries (*Klausner, Jesus of Nazareth, pp 18-54) testifies to the ever increasing hostility of the Pharisees. In their culpable blindness they are sinning against the light.

Abandoning the attempt to win over the Pharisaic party, our Lord gives instruction to his disciples on their preaching of the Gospel ; he emphasizes the supreme value of the human soul and the need for being ever on the watch. His gaze is fixed more and more upon the future, on the Passion, the baptism wherewith he is to be baptized, and the urgency of the Gospel dominates his thought. The curing of the deformed woman on the Sabbath (Lk 13:10-17) serves only to deepen the gulf between Jesus and official Judaism. We find him again at Jerusalem for the winter feast of the Dedication (Jn 10:22 ff.) ; this was the last great feast prior to the fateful Passover the following spring. He speaks of himself openly as the Son of God, uniquely one with the Father, to meet only with hostility and rejection (Jn 10:30 ff.). Thereafter he withdraws into Peraea, east of the Jordan. In his teaching he now speaks of the condemnation which awaits those who have refused to accept him and of their place being taken by many from 'the east and the west and the north and the south' (Lk 13:29). Undeterred by a warning from Herod, Jesus proceeds on his healing mission until the appointed hour at Jerusalem. He still dines with certain of the Pharisees, still insists without compromise on the claims of the Kingdom, while bidding men think what they do before counting themselves his disciples. Yet his message is softened by a wonderful revelation of divine mercy, illustrated by the parables of the Lost Sheep and the Prodigal Son (Lk 15).

It may be that our Lord's teaching concerning riches and the right treatment of the poor, as well as the reminder that even the most faithful of his disciples must acknowledge that they have nothing in which to glory, was delivered shortly before the final approach to Jerusalem (Lk 17:11). On his way he heals the ten lepers, he teaches the people that the Kingdom of God has already come, warns them of the advent of the Son of Man in judgement, urges them to persevere in prayer. The story of the Pharisee and the Publican, the teaching on marriage and divorce, Jesus's touching welcome to the little children, his admonition against the love of riches, the illustration of the entire gratuitousness of the divine gift by the parable of the labourers in the vineyard, are what precede the raising of Lazarus at Bethany (Jn 11). This miracle is the occasion for Caiaphas, with the leaders of the Sanhedrin, to resolve to do away with him. Political expediency demands his removal ; Jesus is now an outlaw of his own nation, virtually under sentence of death.

For the third time our Lord forewarns his disciples of what lies in store for him, while encouraging them with the prediction of his resurrection (Mk 10:32 ff. ; Mt 20:17 ff. ; Lk 18:31 ff.) ; but they, fearful and perplexed, fail to grasp his meaning. He lingers awhile on the northern outskirts of Jerusalem, preaching and teaching, before going up to Jerusalem to celebrate the momentous Pasch. He has still to rebuke James and John for their worldly ambition and remind his followers that precedence in the Kingdom goes, not with earthly prestige, but in the measure of willingness to serve. Let them weigh the implications of the fact that 'the Son of Man . . . is not come to be ministered unto, but to minister and to give his life a redemption for many' (Mk 10:45). Near Jericho he cures the blind Bartimeus in dramatic circumstances. In the town itself we have the vivid, attractive, half humorous scene of the Lord's visit to the house of the tax-gatherer, Zachaeus. Here, in an atmosphere heavy with expectation of the imminent coming of the Kingdom—did not Jesus's advance upon Jerusalem suggest some political coup d'état ?—he tells his audience 620a of tax-gatherers the parable of the pounds and talents ; his outward triumph is not yet, but let his enemies beware of what is involved in their rejection of him. There remains only the anointing at Bethany, where the Master's defence of Mary's seeming extravagance brings to a head the resolve of Judas to betray him, before the Messianic entry into Jerusalem on Palm Sunday. As he draws near he weeps over the city, now about to precipitate its doom.

f It is at this point, appropriately enough, that our Lord's words assume an unsurpassed grandeur and poignancy (cf. Jn 12:20-36) ; even the Gentiles within the Temple precincts are seeking him out. The events of Holy Week include the cursing of the barren fig tree (an acted parable symbolizing the Lord's anger with Israel, whose religion flourishes outwardly but bears no genuine fruit) and the claim before the agents of the Sanhedrin to derive his authority from the same source as John the Baptist. His teaching has for its chief theme the Jews' rejection of their Messiah ; it embraces the parables of the two sons (Mt 21:28 ff.), the wicked husbandman (partly an allegory and most striking evidence of Jesus' claim to a unique divine sonship), the eschatological parable of the wise and foolish virgins (Mt 25:1-13), as well as the two discourses on the destruction of the Temple and the coming of the Son of Man in judgement. He defends the resurrection of the dead against the Sadducees, and counters, with vigour and great dialectical skill, the polemic of the Sanhedrin representatives and the Pharisees, to the confusion of his enemies and enthusiastic admiration of his friends. He is not to be caught in the dilemma between the apparently rival claims of God and Caesar ; rather he challenges his questioners in their turn to give him an explanation of David's Messianic Psalm (Ps 109 ; Mk 12:35 ff.). Nor does his argumentative mastery fail to make its impression : with at least one member of his learned audience he is able to lift the controversy to the highest level of religion (Mk 12:28 ff.). Undaunted to the last, he denounces in their own citadel of Jerusalem the hypocrisy of the scribes and Pharisees, commenting pointedly on the value of the widow's mite cast into the Temple treasury (Mk 12:41 ff.).

g The climax is at hand. On the Wednesday of Holy Week Judas Iscariot agrees with the high-priest's faction to betray his Master for money. The evening of Maundy Thursday the Lord celebrates the Paschal Supper and institutes the Eucharist (Mk 14:22-24 ; Mt 26:26-28 ; Lk 22:19-20) ; on the same occasion he washes the disciples' feet, urges upon them the need for humility, and delivers the ever memorable discourses recorded in Jn 13:31-14:31 (see also Jn 15-17). No paraphrase or summary can convey the sublime level at which the greatest of all tragedies is now moving. From the moment of the assembly in the Upper Room, through Gethsemane, until the last word on the Cross is spoken, our eyes are fixed, in awe and wonder, on the 'Hero of Calvary'. Every sentence in the gospel-narrative should be pondered, as throwing light upon the most significant twenty hours in world history. They close, according to St John, with the pregnant words of Jesus : 'It is consummated' ; to which is added 'And bowing down his head, he gave up the ghost' (19:30).

h On the events of Easter day we have not the space to linger. As Lagrange observes (op. cit., vol. 2, 283) : 'The four evangelists relate, each in his own way, how the tomb of Jesus was found empty, to the great astonishment of Christ's friends. . . . The difficulty of harmonizing the four accounts has been greatly exaggerated. Nothing is more simple provided we do not stick at unimportant details, provided also we pay attention to the way in which each gospel was composed.' The risen Lord appears to Mary Magdalen, to the two disciples on the road to Emmaus, to Peter and then to the rest of the apostles (1 Cor 15:5). He appeared to them in Jerusalem eight days later, when the 'doubting' Thomas was present ; in Galilee also, on the shores of the Lake, where Peter, atoning for his thrice-spoken denial, makes his threefold profession of love ; and on the mountain-side (Mt 28:16 ff.) to give them the great commission to teach all nations, promising his abiding presence. There were other appearances, as we learn from St Luke (Ac 1:3), before the final moment near Jerusalem when, having foretold the Pentecostal outpouring of the Spirit, giving the apostles his blessing, 'he departed from them and was carried up to heaven' (Lk 24:51).

III Jesus : the Messiah and Son of God—'What think you of Christ ? Whose son is he ?' (Mt 22:42). 621a This most momentous of questions was posed by Jesus himself to the Pharisees. They evaded an answer to it and their example, at least in its refusal to consider the evidence without prejudice, has subsequently been followed by many students of his life. It has been said that 'Neither the question "What is the historical value of the Gospels ?" nor its corollary "What was the historical character of Jesus ?" (as we understand the problems) were raised in the Middle Ages or in the time of the Reformation' (Klausner, op. cit., 75). Both questions were discussed by the English Deists, notably Thomas Woolston (1669-1731), and solved according to the principles of that philosophy. The gospel miracles were explained away and Jesus looked upon as a great prophet, whose task it was to illuminate more profoundly the 'natural religion' existing in all men and among all nations. This line of thought was followed up by Voltaire and a group of eighteenth-century French rationalists ; they not only rejected the miracles but looked with disfavour upon the high ethical code of the NT : these 'barefaced inventions' of 'artful priests' (hence 'priestcraft' and the corresponding French term 'prêtres rusés') were devised with a view to the domination and exploitation of the masses. Jean Jacques Rousseau, while allowing Jesus to be a 'divine man' and strongly opposing the contemporary theory that he owes his existence to the fertile imagination of the evangelists, is content to rank him as a 'sage hébreu', along with Socrates, a 'sage grec'.

In contrast with these views, Reimarus (1694-1768), b in a work published posthumously by Lessing (1778), tried to explain Jesus, not as a Son of God or as a prophet or lawgiver, but simply as a Jewish Messiah. Strauss (1808-74) finds the most satisfactory explanation for the gospel miracles, not in the fact that they actually occurred, but in the 'legend-creating faith' of the first Christians. He was supported in this theory by Ferdinand Christian Baur, the founder of the Tübingen School. Bruno Bauer (1809-82) gained a reputation as an authority by first propounding the provisional hypothesis that Jesus might have existed, thence working gradually to the conclusion that he was no more than the product of Mk's able imagination ! In 1863 appeared Renan's La Vie de Jésus, which ran to twenty-three editions in the author's lifetime. Klausner justly describes it as 'rather a historical novel than a work of scholarship' ; its Hero is depicted as a philosopher-poet, a liberal with all the characteristics of a French rationalist of the eighteen-sixties. This set the fashion for a number of 'Lives' written from a liberal angle, presenting a modernist Jesus adapted to the prejudices and sensibilities of the modern man.

As a contrast to this 'modernism' comes the work of c Johannes Weiss, and still more pronouncedly in the same direction, of Albert Schweitzer. They stress the importance of eschatology in Jesus's Messianic consciousness. For Schweitzer this is the root-principle of explanation : our Lord's teaching is fundamentally an 'interim-ethic', a moral code applicable only to the short intervening period between this 'present world' and the world to come—the 'Days of the Messiah', when family, state and property cease to have any value. Jesus himself was bound up almost entirely with the beliefs of his own people, time and 621c country. In 1905 Julius Wellhausen propounded the view that 'Jesus was not a Christian: he was a Jew. He did not proclaim a new faith, but taught men to do the will of God. According to Jesus, as to the Jews generally, this will of God is to be found in the Law and the other canonical scriptures'. A few years earlier Harnack, in his What is Christianity? (E.T.), had argued a contrary thesis, that Jesus rose so far above contemporary Judaism as to be all but untouched by it. Again we are confronted with a modernist and a philosopher who emphasized, on little more than a humanitarian level, the paramount importance of the Fatherhood of God. This is the Jesus, as Klausner remarks, of the liberal and anti-Jewish Germany of the early twentieth century. Cf. §§ 604-9.

d But these aberrations need not detain us. Whatever the partial truth embodied in them, they do violence to the sources and leave much of our data unexplained. In general they are based upon an antecedent denial of the supernatural and an idealistic philosophy which, notwithstanding the learning and personal integrity of those who hold them, preclude an objective consideration of the evidence. 'To this flow and return of opinion Catholic historians of Christian origins no longer pay much heed. For the last fifty years Catholic science, thanks to its own labours and those of non-Catholic scholars, has made very great progress. Matured, on the other hand, through the Modernist crisis, it has become aware of the critical soundness of its positions' (Lemonnyer, The Theology of the NT, Eng. Tr., 17).

e Whom then do the NT records reveal Jesus to be? That he both thought of and finally proclaimed himself to be the long-awaited Messiah no serious student can doubt. Of the denial of this (based on such texts as Mk 8:30; Mt 16:20), that our Lord never regarded himself as the Messiah and only after his death was acclaimed as such by his disciples, Klausner truly observes: '... had this been true, it would never have occurred to his disciples (simple-minded Jews) that one who had suffered crucifixion ("a curse of God is he that is hanged") could be the Messiah; and the Messianic idea meant nothing whatever to the Gentile converts. Ex nihilo nihil fit: when we see that Jesus's Messianic claims became a fundamental principle of Christianity soon after his crucifixion, this is a standing proof that even in his lifetime Jesus regarded himself as the Messiah' (op. cit., 255-6).

f According to the Johannine account Jesus is recognized as the Messiah, 'him of whom Moses . . . and the prophets did write' (Jn 1:45 ff.), from the early days of his ministry. He does not, however, appear to have wished to divulge his Messianic character to the people at large; he never unequivocally ascribes to himself, in the hearing of the Jewish crowds, one of the common names of the Messiah. He knew that such a disclosure would give rise to the popular demand that he should fulfil the role generally assigned to his office; as in fact happened when a group of enthusiastic zealots, seeking the realization of their political and materialistic aims, would have acclaimed him King of Israel (Jn 6:15). After one of his exorcisms we find it recorded: 'And rebuking them he suffered them not to speak; for they knew that he was Christ' (Lk 4:41). His self-effacement was such that he would conceal his own identity rather than allow a premature revelation of it to prejudice his mission of convincing men of the paramount claims of his heavenly Father and the dire need of their own souls.

g But the simple folk could not refrain from ascribing to him the most popular of all the Messianic titles: 'Is not this the son of David?' (Mt 12:23). So in effect the act of recognition had come from the woman of Samaria (Jn 4:29), from the Canaanite woman (Mt 15:22), above all in Peter's great confession (Mt 16:16). Jesus responds by a miracle to the prayer of the blind men at Jericho, with its salutation to the 'Son of David' (Mt 20:30). The acclamations which burst forth at the triumphal entry into Jerusalem were expressly Messianic. To the protesting Pharisees Jesus replies: 'I say to you that if these shall hold their peace, the stones will cry out' (Lk 19:40). That he knows himself to be the Messianic Son of David emerges from the difficulty he propounds to the Pharisees over the meaning of Ps 109, as does also a disclosure on the mystery of his personality as yet hardly suspected even by his own disciples (Mt 22:42 ff. and parallels). Finally, at his trial, our Lord answered an explicit question from the high-priest with a no less explicit answer: 'Art thou the Christ, the Son of the Blessed God? And Jesus said to him: I am' (Mk 14:61). This was the 'blasphemy' for which 'they all condemned him to be guilty of death' (v 64).

h It must be acknowledged, however, that the title by which our Lord most frequently described himself was The Son of Man. This designation appears sixty-nine times in the synoptic gospels alone and is employed probably on forty distinct occasions (*Driver, HDB 4, 579). A whole literature has arisen on the meaning of the title; here the briefest note must suffice (cf. Lemonnyer, op. cit., 65 ff.; Allo, Le Scandale de Jésus, 52-6). In Hebrew son of man means man (cf. Ps 8:5); but in Aramaic, the language spoken by our Lord, the phrase is often no more than the idiomatic equivalent for I, myself (cf. Mt 5:11 and Lk 6:22; Mt 8:20 and Lk 9:58; Mt 11:19 and Lk 7:34, etc.; in Jn 6:26 ff. Jesus uses both 'I' and 'Son of Man' in turn). Notwithstanding this, as Lagrange observes, the familiar expression assumes on the lips of Jesus a suggestion of mysteriousness. 'Whom do men say the Son of man is?' (Mt 16:13). In the comparison between the Son of Man and John the Baptist—Mt 11:18-19; Lk 7:33-34—we get an impression of a reserved meaning which cannot be exactly expressed. The formula even hints at something of superhuman grandeur when we hear of 'blasphemy' against the Son of Man (Mt 12:31 and parallels). In such passages as Lk 5:24; 6:5; 11:30; 19:10 and Mt 13:37 the meaning seems to pass from an emphatic 'I' to that of a personal appellation; while designating Jesus, it simultaneously manifests the powers with which he considers himself invested and the mission which he claims as his. In other words 'the Son of Man' has become a Messianic title. The equivalence of 'Son of Man' and 'Messias' is taken for granted in Mk 14:61 ff. (cf. Mt 26:63 ff.; Lk 22:66 ff.). The phrase is used with a clear reference to Dan 7 when the Son of Man appears in the character of judge (Mt 13:36 ff.; Lk 17:24; Mk 13:26); but if we consider the great Messianic declaration cited above (Mk 14:61), in relation to its parallels (Mt 26:64), and especially Lk 22:69, we discover a Messianic title connected with Dan 7 which is not necessarily eschatological: what is referred to is a permanent state of Christ without reference to the Parousia. Finally, in contrast with the glorious vision of Daniel, Jesus relates himself as 'Son of Man' to the Suffering Servant in the prophecies of Isaiah (Is 42: 1-14; 49:1-6; 50:4-9; 52:13-53:12). This connexion is clear on the three distinct occasions on which our Lord announces his future Passion: after the confession of Peter (Mk 8:31 ff.; Mt 16:21 ff.; Lk 9:22 ff.), following upon the Transfiguration (Mt 17:22; cf. Mk 9:31; Lk 9:44), and lastly near Jericho when he is going up to Jerusalem (Lk 18:31 ff.; Mt 20:18 ff.; Mk 10:33 ff.). The following texts should also be consulted: Lk 17:24; Mk 9:11; Mt 12:39 ff.; 16:4 ff.; Lk 11:29 ff. The linking of the destiny of the Messiah with the Suffering Servant of Isaiah, as foretold by the prophets (cf. Lk 24:46), is by implication to show that the Messianic 'Son of Man' has another office besides that presaged by the exalted figure of Dan 7.

i A further and scarcely less significant title ascribed to Jesus in the gospels is that of Lord. This is found frequently in Mt and Lk, but also in Mk (7:28; 11:3; and implicitly in 12:35 ff.). Nor does the evidence support the theory of W. Bousset that this appellation, 622a directly signifying divinity, was only conferred upon Jesus after the Resurrection—and then by the earliest Hellenistic communities, who had been familiarized with it through the worship of the emperors and the phraseology of the mysteries. Often it may well be no more than a courtesy title: as perhaps in its use by the Canaanite woman, Mk 7:28. But of its meaning on the lips of Jesus himself in such a passage as Mk 11:3 there can be no doubt. 'Say ye that the Lord hath need of him'—viz. the colt. The context is Messianic and the title must be so too—the Lord (Maran, Kyrios) is, in the usual Court language of Syro-Greek royalties, the reigning monarch. Here it signifies the Messianic King, as his disciples must have been very clearly aware.

b We have yet to consider the meaning of the term Son of God, which is applied to Jesus with comparative frequency in the synoptics. It should be noted that neither in the OT nor in the later Jewish literature does the formula appear as a distinctively Messianic title. Even the sonship referred to in Ps 2:7 is not unique; for Israel and Cyrus are addressed elsewhere in much the same language. What is its NT significance? The Petrine confession—'Thou art Christ, the Son of the Living God' (Mt 16:16)—surely implies an acknowledgement of divinity as well as of Messiahship. Jesus is the son of God in a natural, and not (like every good Jew) merely in a moral, sense. The same interpretation is supported by the theophanies at the Lord's Baptism (Mk 1:11; Mt 3:17; Lk 3:22) and Transfiguration (Mk 9:7; Mt 17:5; Lk 9:35), by Mk 13:32, 'But of that day or hour no man knoweth, neither the angels in heaven, nor the Son, but the Father', and by the affirmative reply to the High-priest's question (Mk 14:61; Mt 26:63; Lk 22:70). In Mt 11:25–27, which might be mistaken for a passage in St John (cf. Jn 10:15—and, though the context is different, Lk 10:21), the Father and the Son are placed upon the same plane and are, as it were, strictly proportioned to one another. With reference to the not immediately significant Mt 18:20—'For where there are two or three gathered together in my name, there am I in the midst of them'—Lagrange recalls an utterance of the Rabbi Chananiah: 'Where two are seated together, intent upon the Torah, glory (Yahweh) is in the midst of them'. There is thus suggested a parallel between the presence of Jesus and the presence of Yahweh. Before leaving the synoptics we may note the centurion's confession of faith after the death of Jesus: 'Indeed this man was the Son of God' (Mk 15:39. See the interesting comment on this text in *Hoskyns, The Riddle of the NT, 91).

c Supplementing the already abundant evidence of the synoptics, St John leads us with ever deeper insight into the mystery of the personality of Jesus. Leaving aside for the moment the theological introduction (Jn 1:1–14), we find in the Johannine narrative two attributes of Christ standing out in marked relief: Light and Life, especially the latter. Mt (4:16, citing Is 9:1) tells us that 'the people that sat in darkness hath seen great light'; for Lk (2:32) Jesus himself is 'the light which shall give revelation to the Gentiles' (KNT). But the exposition of this sublime theme was left to St John. 'I am the light of the world. He that followeth me walketh not in darkness, but shall have the light of life' (Jn 8:12). 'As long as I am in the world, I am the light of the world' (9:5). Jesus is the light because he is the Truth, illuminating the minds of those who accept him (cf. 14:6; 18:37). 'I am come, a light into the world, that whosoever believeth in me may not remain in darkness' (12:46).

d 'Life eternal', which, in the synoptics, is synonymous with the Kingdom of Heaven, i.e. of God (Mk 9:44; Mt 19:16; Lk 10:25, etc.) becomes in the fourth gospel one of the chief attributes of Christ. 'And as Moses lifted up the [brazen] serpent in the desert, so must the Son of Man be lifted up [on the Cross]: that whosoever believeth in him may not perish, but 622d may have life everlasting. For God so loved the world, as to give his only begotten Son: that whosoever believeth in him may not perish, but may have life everlasting' (Jn 3:14–16). Nor are we justified in restricting the concept of Christ as the 'Life' within the limits of Messianism; the texts taken cumulatively demand the recognition of Jesus as endowed with the very life of the Godhead. The life which the Father has in himself the Son likewise has in himself (Jn 5:21). The eucharistic discourse, Jn 6:35 ff., carries us far beyond purely Messianic conceptions. Jesus here speaks of himself according to his human nature, richly endowed with the Father's gifts, but at the same time in the character of 'Son'. 'As the living Father hath sent me and I live by the Father: so he that eateth me, the same also shall live by me' (v 58). In this context the I and the me can refer only to the person of the Son, conscious of an equality in nature with the Father. This unique relation of sonship, clearly indicated in isolated texts in the synoptics (cf. Mt 11:25 ff.; Lk 10:21), is one of the chief themes of the fourth gospel. St John testifies to it, both as recorder of Jesus's own words and as their interpreter.

In the colloquy with Nicodemus, Jn 3:11 ff., we find, in veiled and designedly thought-provoking language, the full doctrine of the Incarnation—affirmed not, as we might have expected, of the Son of God, but of the Son of Man. It is he personally who 'descended from heaven'; and we are told of the continuing presence in heaven—'in the bosom of the Father' (Jn 1:18)—of the Son of God who, as Son of Man, is living on earth. He dramatically illustrates his claim to equality with the Father in his Sabbath-day cure of the infirm man at the pool of Bethesda; nor did his enemies fail to draw the correct inference. 'My Father worketh until now; and I work. Hereupon therefore the Jews sought the more to kill him, because he did not only break the Sabbath but also said God was his Father, making himself equal to God' (Jn 5:17–18). In the verses which follow our Lord implicitly accepts the charge; while derogating nothing from the profound submission which he in his human nature owes to God, he at the same time acknowledges the unique relation to the Father in which the Son is placed by the Incarnation. Considerations of space preclude further citation; the following texts should be consulted as illustrating the same doctrine: Jn 6:44 ff.; 8:42; 10:24–38; 14:8 ff.; 16:15; 17:21—for all of which, see Comm. in loco.

With the NT doctrine of the Trinity we are not here directly concerned, but it is impossible to discuss the Person of Christ without allusion to the Holy Spirit. We recall that in the early Church the Holy Spirit, plainly disclosed as a divine Person (cf. 1 Cor 6:19; Rom 8:9), takes literally the place of Jesus (cf. Ac 4:31; 5:32; 8:29; 9:31; 10:19; 16:6, etc.). That our Lord intended the Spirit to have this role, to act as his interpreter and the fulfiller of his mission, is clear from the striking passages in St John (Jn 15:26; 16:7 ff.; cf. Lk 24:49) referring to the Paraclete. As the Father has 'sent' the Son for the world's salvation (Jn 3:17; 4:34; 5:23, etc.), so likewise, and for the same purpose, the Father and the Son 'send' or 'give' the Holy Spirit to Jesus's disciples (Jn 14:16, 26; 15:26; 16:7).

g The NT synthesis of the revealed teaching on the Personality of Jesus is to be found in the Prologue to St John's gospel (1:1 ff.; see Comm. in loco). The Johannine doctrine of the Word—which is 'the Word of God' (Apoc 19:13)—has a close connexion in the writer's mind with one of the central themes of the gospel: the identification of Christ with 'life eternal'. This is evident from what is said in 1 Jn 1:1 ff.: 'That which was from the beginning, which we have heard, which we have seen with our eyes, which we have looked upon and our hands have handled, of the word of life'. The Prologue starts from the pre-existence of the Word with God, passing thence to speak of the part played by the Word in the creation of the world, 622g to rest finally on the thought that the Word has become incarnate in Jesus Christ. The familiar light and life motif is enunciated: 'the life was the light of men' (v 4). Christ is introduced, closely linked with the historical witness of the Baptist (vv 6-8), implicitly as the Word (v 14), explicitly as the Light 'which enlighteneth every man that cometh into this world' (v 9). The 'grace and truth' (v 14) which come from the Word's being made flesh ('That is to say, the Word of God ceased to be expressed in a literature or in a prophecy, and became embodied in human flesh, and there the OT was fulfilled', Hoskyns, op. cit., 218) signify humanity's participation in Light and Life. The 'finality' of Christ, the fact that he is the unique revealer of the secrets of the Godhead, is the real conclusion of the Prologue; it is the central truth of the Gospel: 'No man hath seen God at any time: the only begotten Son who is in the bosom of the Father, he hath declared him' (v 18). This was the tremendous import of the 'Messianic secret' which Jesus, with the incomparable pedagogical skill of the Master, gradually made known to his disciples, until it bore fruit in the post-resurrection faith of the reluctant Thomas: 'My Lord and my God' (Jn 20:28). From that day to this these words have summarized the authentic confession of Catholic Christianity in the Person of Jesus Christ.

622a IV The Teaching—The teaching of Jesus is embodied in his own Person; there exists an organic continuity between himself and the doctrine he propounded. Christ is the 'vine', his disciples are the 'branches', drawing all their vitality from union with him (Jn 15:1 ff.). The whole of the 'fourth' gospel is an illustration of this thesis. He who is the Truth and the Life is also 'the Way' (Jn 14:6). (We know that, from the first, practical discipleship meant precisely following 'the way': cf. Ac 16:17; 18:26; 19:23; Heb 10:20, etc.) To attempt to formulate a Christian philosophy or ethical system which should be valid independently of faith in Christ himself is an idle and presumptuous task. This is why the Church has ever been at pains to base her morality upon dogma, the practical Christian life upon a personal belief in, and surrender to, our Lord himself. The content of his teaching, despite implications of inexhaustible richness and subtlety, is in its broad outlines supremely simple. It is hardly patient of schematization, though its main drift is inescapably clear. With a one-pointedness which has embarrassed those who have looked in the NT for what it refuses to give—a metaphysic, a philosophy of culture, a programme of social reform—Jesus's utterances bear without exception upon his mission as Israel's Messiah and the Saviour of the world. In other words his message was wholly and exclusively religious, even while he gave to religion a boundless range and depth and raised it to a position of supremacy over every department of men's lives.

b 'Salvation is of the Jews' (Jn 4:22). It is against the background of the OT that our Lord's life-work must be seen. What is there foretold of the Kingdom, or Rule, of God—See §625a-f infra—and of the office of the Messias, was consciously realized by Jesus, though in a manner so elevated and transformed as to escape the grasp of those who refused to accept him as their teacher. Thus the fault of those who rejected him lay, not in their failure to anticipate that this was the kind of Messias pointed to by the prophetic writings, but in their unwillingness to receive him as the interpreter of the prophets. 'This is my beloved Son in whom I am well pleased. Hear ye him' (Mt 17:5). But this they would not do. Our Lord's awareness of his being the unique Master is evident from Mt 23:8-10; 'for one is your master, Christ'. His teaching, owing to the imperfect comprehension of the disciples, would need to be amplified and elucidated by the Holy Spirit whom he would send (Jn 16:12-13); in default of Christ's grace they could not hope to apprehend it (2 Cor 3:14); it would 622b remain no more than words unless God himself opened the ears of their understanding (Ac 16:14). While the initiative lay ever with the Lord to draw whom he would to the Father (Jn 6:44; cf. Mk 3:14), the chosen ones yet remained free to accept or reject the call (Jn 6:68-69).

The indispensable prerequisite of discipleship was living faith—an acknowledgement that the supreme revelation of God was to be found in Jesus, together with trusting self-abandonment to him. Not without this condition of soul could a fruitful response be made to the Sermon on the Mount (Mt 5-7; Lk 6:20-7:1; 11:33-36; 14:34-35), the ground-plan of the Christian life. The Beatitudes (Mt 5:3-11), offering a pledge of future and even present happiness, could be realized only as the goal of detachment from the world and adherence to God's law. They portray Christian morality at once in its most uncompromising and most attractive form: not as an arbitrary code of prescriptions and prohibitions, but as an invitation to goodness founded upon the vision of man's final destiny. The great paradox of the Gospel emerges: if we would save our lives, we must first of all lose them (Mt 10:37-39)—that is, abandon them to the cause, in the loving service of God and man. If the grain of wheat is to fructify it must fall to the earth and die (Jn 12:24-25).

The moral integrity implied in the Sermon on the Mount and the faith which it presupposes form the basis of our Lord's later teaching on the meaning of the Kingdom of God. This comprises substantially, whether as illustrated by the parables or as more directly affirmed in the Last Supper discourses, obedience to the first two commandments of the Law. 'Hear O Israel: the Lord thy God is one God. And thou shalt love the Lord thy God with thy whole heart and with thy whole soul and with thy whole mind and with thy whole strength. . . Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself' (Mt 12:29-31). Thus we find Jesus in continuity with the loftiest teaching of the OT (cf. Deut 6:4-5; Lev 19:18); he is the fulfiller, not the destroyer of the Law. Love is truly the sum and substance of the Gospel, but it is a love no more to be identified with the philanthropia of the ancients than with modern secular humanitarianism. Unlike these fundamentally irreligious counterfeits, Christian love is impregnated with religion, its vivifying principle lies in whole-hearted devotion to the all-holy will of God. Our good works must be performed, not for their own sake, still less for the pleasure which comes from beneficent action, but so as to be pleasing in the sight of our heavenly Father, who 'seeth in secret' (Mt 6:1, 3, 18). This was indeed the whole motive-force of the life of Jesus himself: 'I am not alone, because the Father is with me' (Jn 16:32); 'I do always the things that please him' (8:29); 'My meat is to do the will of him that sent me' (4:34).

The God of Jesus Christ is the God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob. As a successor to, though himself infinitely greater than, the prophets (Mt 12:41 f.), he accepts the divinely given Mosaic Law, while spiritualizing it and shaping it to his own ends in virtue of the still higher authority with which he knows himself to be vested. The OT legislated for the exterior actions of men; Jesus is concerned with the inner motives and desires (Mt 5:27 ff.). It is not only adultery but lust, not only murder but hatred, it is the well-springs of evil and not merely their outward consequences which are proscribed. These new ordinances reach a deeper level than the old; they are more exacting and yet easier to bear, because they are imposed not as an outward constraint but as evoking an intimate conversion of the heart; the response they demand is that of children and sons rather than of servants (Jn 15:15), the rule of fear has given place to the reign of love (1 Jn 4:18). In the soul wholly dedicated to God virtue comes to birth all but spontaneously; the divine life flourishes as it were by second nature. 'Come to me, all you that 623a labour and are burdened : and I will refresh you. Take up my yoke upon you and learn of me, because I am meek and humble of heart : and you shall find rest for your souls. For my yoke is sweet and my burden light' (Mt 11:28-30).

f Nothing illustrates this most encouraging truth more clearly than our Lord's attitude towards sin. See, for example, the touching incident related in Lk 7:36-50, with its 'golden saying' : 'Many sins are forgiven her, because she hath loved much' (v 47). He was the Lamb of God who had come to take away the intolerable weight of human sinfulness (Jn 1:29, 36) ; he came as one offering service to others, not demanding it for himself, 'to give his life a redemption for many' (Mk 10:45). Here, in what is often regarded as the most primitive of the gospel records, we find the doctrine of the Redemption elaborated by St Paul (1 Thess 5:9-10 ; 1 Cor 6:20 ; Rom 5:6-21 ; 8:29-32, etc.). But if Jesus is our redeemer, he is also our judge (Mt 16:27 ; 24:30-31), rewarding the good and punishing the guilty (Mt 25:34 ff.) ; the role which the Jews knew to be the prerogative of God the parables show him claiming for himself (Mt 13:37-42). It is thus noteworthy how the moral teaching of the NT implies its Christology ; we can only appreciate at their due weight our Lord's commandments and promises by reference to the divine authority vested in his person.

g The cosmic import of the revelation brought by Jesus is disclosed in the Johannine formula of 'life eternal'. Whatever the possibility of the soul's immortality apart from its union with God, Christ came to give point and meaning to the religious destiny of man. The aspirations for a supra-temporal existence, the longing for a security and purposefulness which the world of its nature cannot give, were fulfilled in him. 'Have confidence. I have overcome the world' (Jn 16:33). 'This is eternal life : That they may know thee, the only true God, and Jesus Christ, whom thou hast sent' (17:3). So he had promised from the time he began to preach : 'Blessed are the clean of heart : for they shall see God' (Mt 5:8). He had come that we might 'have life and have it more abundantly' (Jn 10:10). But at how great a price ! The good shepherd was to give his life for the sheep (v 11). The Son of Man must be raised on the Cross before he can draw all men to himself (Jn 12:32). It was thus that the world and all it stood for should be brought to judgement, the dominion of sin and death conquered (v 31). To these assurances of Jesus was added the Father's confirmation in the triumph of the Resurrection ; the sacrifice of the Cross had been accepted ; sin being blotted out by Christ's blood, man was redeemed ; in the same act death was vanquished and the prince of this world 'cast out'.

624a The redeeming mission of Jesus, however, was not yet accomplished. In the glory of the resurrected and ascended Christ we recognize the first fruits of that life eternal which he had promised to his disciples ; but it is needful that the faithful should follow in his footsteps here on earth, likewise carrying their cross, if they would have place with him in the Kingdom. Nor has he left them to make this arduous journey alone. On the night before he died, foreshadowing the sacrificial act of the morrow, he 'took bread and blessed and broke and gave to his disciples and said : Take ye and eat. This is my body. And taking the chalice, he gave thanks and gave to them, saying : Drink ye all of this. For this is my blood of the new testament, which shall be shed for many unto remission of sins' (Mt 26:26-28). To which he added the charge : 'Do this for a commemoration of me' (Lk 22:19). Faithfully the apostles obeyed : twenty-five years later we find St Paul recalling to the Corinthians what he had 'received of the Lord' (1 Cor 11:23), viz., the institution of the Eucharist. And he makes clear, in virtue of the grave responsibility of those who receive it, the transcendent holiness of the sacrament : 'whosoever shall eat this bread, or drink the chalice of the Lord unworthily, shall be guilty of the body and blood of the Lord. . . . For he that eateth and drinketh unworthily eateth and drinketh judgement to himself, not discerning the body of the Lord' (vv 27, 29).

It is in the sacramental setting of the Last Supper, b as enshrining the gift of his body and blood, that the Lord imparts to the disciples his most intimate and fundamental teaching. 'A new commandment I give unto you : That you love one another, as I have loved you, that you also love one another' (Jn 13:34). This is the essence, the 'religious philosophy' of the Gospel. The injunction to mutual love is no novelty ; but that we shall love 'as I have loved you'. That is unique. True, Jesus had said it before in other contexts, but never so expressly or so movingly. We have to imitate the love of a Saviour who 'came not to call the just but sinners' (Mk 2:17), a love destitute of all self-righteousness, full of exquisite compassion for the weak and feeble. For us it must be a fraternal charity, based upon equality and fellowship, without tincture of patronage or paternalism. 'All things therefore whatsoever you would that men should do to you, do you also to them. For this is the law and the prophets' (Mt 7:12). Mercifulness is supreme among God's attributes ; in bidding us to aim at the perfection of his heavenly Father (Mt 5:48), our Lord is in fact inviting us to imitate his mercy : 'Be ye therefore merciful, as your Father is merciful' (Lk 6:36). This is what is implied in the love of Jesus, which we must make our own. St John, with the Last Supper discourse lingering ever in his memory, recalls the life-giving truth : 'And we have known and have believed the charity which God hath to us. God is charity and he that abideth in charity abideth in God, and God in him' (1 Jn 4:16).

It was likewise at the Last Supper that Jesus spoke, c as never before, of his intimate relationship with the Father and of the Father's love for the disciples. 'And the glory which thou hast given me I have given to them : that they may be one, as we also are one. I in them, and thou in me : that they may be made perfect in one : and the world may know that thou hast sent me and hast loved them, as thou hast also loved me' (Jn 17:22-23). This is the plane upon which the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man, in which some would epitomize the Christian message, must be conceived. Here also we find the authentic source for the loving communion between God and the individual soul which has inspired the Catholic mystics and saints throughout the centuries. 'If any one love me, he will keep my word. And my Father will love him : and we will come to him and will make our abode with him' (Jn 14:23). 'I will love him and manifest myself to him' (v 21). 'But the Paraclete, the Holy Ghost, whom the Father will send in my name, he will teach you all things and bring all things to your minds, whatsoever I shall have said to you' (v 26). Thus is signalized the presence of the Blessed Trinity within the human spirit, to give countenance to that quasi-experimental knowledge of God which is the reward of the life of charity. We note how the evangelical mysticism is to be distinguished from its numerous counterfeits, ranging from philosophical neo-Platonism, through aestheticism and the various forms of 'nature mysticism', down to the eccentricities of the theosophists. Jesus lays down the condition for the aspirant to such a grace ; he must 'keep my word'. 'He that hath my commandments and keepeth them, he it is that loveth me' (Jn 14:21). For all his tenderness he is terribly in earnest, uncompromising in the demand for sincerity and truth as manifested in practical conduct. He can admit to discipleship the sinful and morally weak, but not the poseur or religious dilettante. 'Not every one that saith to me, Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of heaven : but he that doth the will of my Father who is in heaven, he shall enter into the kingdom of heaven' (Mt 7:21).

624d The religion of Jesus is above all a worship of God 'in spirit and in truth' (Jn 4:24), but he knew too well the needs of sense-bound human nature to leave his disciples without the aid of an external cultus. The clear evidence in the gospels for the institution of Baptism (Mk 16:16; Mt 28:19; Jn 3:5) and the Eucharist—which the texts show to have been a sacrifice as well as a sacrament (Mk 14:22-24; Mt 26:26-28; Lk 22:19-20; 1 Cor 11:23-25)—indicate that he willed these ordinances to be the indispensable channels of the Christian life. Moreover he did not wish his disciples to live in isolation from one another; he formed them into a living and hierarchic society, his Church. At Caesarea Philippi he had promised to make Simon Peter its rock-foundation (Mt 16:18-19), and a little later he gave to all the apostles the power of 'binding and loosing' (Mt 18:18). The content of this power is explained in the post-resurrection commission to remit and retain sins (Jn 20:23), while Peter's primacy is finally confirmed in his appointment as shepherd of the flock (Jn 21:15-17).

e The apostles were not enthusiastic volunteers, self-chosen for their task of continuing Christ's mission; they had been the object of a particular election on the part of Jesus (Mk 3:13-14), as he reminded them at the Last Supper (Jn 15:16). This initial choice had been the starting point of a special formation, the nature and course of which we can follow from the NT records. Closely grouped around the Master, they were the auditors of his discourses and witnesses to the miracles, repositories of the mystery of the Kingdom (Mk 4:11). To the crowds he spoke in parables, to the apostles he revealed all (Mk 4:34), or as much at least as they were capable of grasping; for there were many things beyond their comprehension, which the coming of the Holy Spirit would reveal to them (Jn 16:12-13). He prepared them for their subsequent labours by a preliminary mission in Galilee (Mt 10:1-42). Peter was their selected leader; all the lists of the apostles show his name first (Mk 3:16 ff.; Mt 10:2 ff.; Lk 6:14 ff.; Ac 1:13); upon him, as we have seen, the Church was to be built, unshakable and invincible by the powers of evil (Mt 16:18). To Peter Jesus gave the keys of the Kingdom and the office of binding and loosing (v 19); it was he who was charged in a special manner to support the other members of the apostolic college (Lk 22:31-32), to feed the lambs and the sheep of Christ's flock (Jn 21:15-17).

f Our Lord himself had sown the seed; the reaping of the harvest lay with the apostles. Witnesses to the life, death and above all, the resurrection of the Son of God, they were to gather in the fruits of his work, as well as dispense to others what they had received from him. Armed with his authority—'He that heareth you heareth me: and he that despiseth you despiseth me' (Lk 10:16)—and with the assurance of his abiding presence, they were commissioned to preach the 'good news' to Israel and to all the world (Mk 16:15, 20; Mt 28:19-20).

625a V Some Special Points (a)—The brief outline of the teaching of Jesus given above can be summarized, from another point of view, as his preaching of the Kingdom of God (or 'of Heaven'—a reverential periphrasis; the terms are synonymous). That the Messianic age would see the realization of the Kingdom was clearly the expectation of Israel (cf. Lagrange, Le Messianisme chez les juifs, Paris, 1909). We may accept, with certain provisos, the judgement of Loisy that 'Jesus brings the message of God; he does not preach himself. He brings the good tidings which the Father sends to men, viz. that the time is fulfilled and the Kingdom at hand', *Loisy, Les évangiles synoptiques (Paris, 1907) 434. In this respect at least the synoptics, especially Mk, show him in continuity with and as the fulfilment of the preaching of John the Baptist. 'Do penance (i.e. repent), for the Kingdom of heaven is at hand' (Mt 3:2; cf. Mk 1:15). Throughout his ministry it is the Kingdom which dominates his thought. To the disciples, as to the multitudes, he speaks of little else. 'Jesus went about all Galilee, teaching in their synagogues and preaching the gospel of the Kingdom' (Mt 4:23). 'To other cities also must I preach the Kingdom of God: for therefore am I sent' (Lk 4:43). It is the same message which is committed to the apostles (Mt 10:7) and disciples (Lk 10:9-11). 'This gospel of the Kingdom shall be preached in the whole world' (Mt 24:14). Finally we find him appearing to his disciples after the Resurrection 'and speaking of the Kingdom of God' (Ac 1:3).

What is our Lord's conception of the Kingdom? Space will allow only the briefest answer to this very large question. First it must be said that his teaching can be appreciated only against the background of the OT development of the doctrine of the Kingdom; cf. *Orr, Kingdom of God, HDB 2, 844-4. He takes from this all its most elevated and spiritual elements, more particularly as these were set in relief by the great Hebrew prophets, and gives them a new setting in relation to his own person. It was his harking back to the prophetic teaching, so much neglected in the political and materialistic conceptions of contemporary Pharisaism, which was responsible for much of the hostility and misunderstanding experienced by Jesus at the hands of the religious leaders of his day. Though it must also be remembered—and this intensified the conflict with those who would not admit him as Master—that he was conscious that his own teaching on the Kingdom contained radically new elements, of transcendence and universality, incompatible with the maintenance of the old order; it was useless to patch a worn-out garment with new cloth, idle to pour newly fermenting wine into old wine-skins (Mt 9:16-17).

The scriptural imagery in which the Kingdom is portrayed is frequently suggestive of the pomp and circumstance of earthly kingship. Indeed it could hardly be otherwise, the more so when we consider the exalted place held by King David in Jewish history and legend. Nor is this notion repudiated by Jesus; but the fundamental conception of it is the rule or dominion of God, the absolute primacy and control of the divine will which that implies, God and man being respectively what they are. The Greek word βασιλεία may mean both 'kingship' and 'realm', and the synoptics appear to use it now in one sense now in the other; but it is important to notice that these closely related ideas merge in the more fundamental one just mentioned, viz. God's unlimited mastery and lordship as manifested in nature and providence.
